Brooklyn will not have the whole of the symphony orchestra until it has a building large enough to hold it. Still, three-quarters of the organization played last night. The conspicuous absentees were Willy Hess and Timothee Adamowski, who are usually at the head of the violin corps. The concert master last night was Otto Roth. One day, however, we shall have our Academy of Music, and then we can not only have the whole of the Boston band, but shall have more music and better music than ever before. Speed the day!

NEWS
BUFFALO, N. Y.
ss
JA

The Boston Symphony Orchestra Coming Again

Inquiries are constantly being made of Mrs. Mai Davis Smith regarding the second concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra which will be given at Convention Hall Monday evening, Feb. 19. It is impossible as yet to announce either the programme or the soloist, except to say in a general way that Mr. Gericke has planned to give a programme made up entirely of modern music and thus have it in rather striking contrast to that which was given last October. It is probable that excerpts from the Wagnerian music dramas will constitute a considerable part of the evening's offering.

The Orchestra is just finishing its third regular monthly series of concerts in New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington, where the usual crowded house have been the rule. The symphonies played last week were Schumann's No. 1 in B-flat major and Brahms' No. 2 in D major. This week the orchestra will play for the first time in Boston the symphony by Ernest Chausson, the French composer. This was played in this country by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Vincent d'Indy in Philadelphia, Washington and New York. Week after next the orchestra will bring out another unknown symphony by Mahler, the talented conductor of the Imperial Opera House of Vienna. In composition he is a modern of moderns. These two, with the symphony of Amherst Webber, played a few weeks ago in Boston, make three unknown symphonies the orchestra has brought out this year.

The coming concert in Buffalo on Feb. 19 will follow the fourth monthly trip of the orchestra, which will come to this city immediately after the afternoon concert in Carnegie Hall on Saturday, Feb. 17. Tuesday evening on its way home it will play in Albany, where it usually gives one concert each season.

Full details concerning the Buffalo concert will be announced, within the next fortnight.

SUNDAY HERALD

Published Every Day in the Year.
VOL. CXIX., NO. 21.

SUNDAY, JAN. 21, 1906.

SYMPHONY GIVES ITS 12TH CONCERT

First Hearing of Chausson's Symphony, a Human and Euphonious Work, Is One Number of Programme.

The Boston Symphony orchestra gave its 12th concert last night in Symphony Hall. Mr. Gericke conducted and Miss aus der Ohe was the pianist. The programme was as follows:

Overture, "Sea-Calm and Prosperous Voyage" ..... Mendelssohn
Concerto for piano in E flat ..... Beethoven
Symphonic Poem, "Orpheus" ..... Liszt
Symphony in B flat major, op. 20 ..... Chausson

The overture to "Der Freischuetz" was announced for performance at this concert, but it was played here by the New York Symphony Orchestra last Wednesday night. It is a pity that Mendelssohn's excursion boat music was substituted, for it would have been interesting to compare the two readings. In this instance a comparison would not have been odious, and the interpretation, no doubt, would have been as creditable to Mr. Gericke and his men as it was to Mr. Weingartner and the visiting orchestra. Little differences in choice of tempo or in treatment of certain details, the suggestion of a slight variance in the general atmosphere might have excited discussion, and discussion, even when it is violent and rude, is a good thing for a musical community. When there is no difference of opinion, when there is smug complacency in the thought that everything is for the best in the best possible musical world and that this world does not extend beyond Chelsea, Chestnut Hill and Dorchester, the Muse does not dwell within our city gates.

Skimming Mr. Sonneck's "Early Secular American Music," we find a curious anticipation of Mendelssohn's overture in this country over a century ago. Jean Gehot, a violinist and composer, a Belgian by birth, who came to this country in 1792 after musical activity in London, wrote an overture in 13 movements, "expressive of a voyage from England to America," which was announced for performance in New York, the year of his arrival. Gehot's programme was as follows: "1. Introduction. 2. Meeting of the adventurers, consultation and their determination on departure. 3. March from London to Gravesend. 4. Affectionate separation from their friends. 5. Going on board, and pleasure at recollecting the encouragement they hope to meet with in a land where merit is sure to gain reward. 6. Preparation for sailing, carpenters hammering, crowing of the cock, weighing anchor, etc. 7. A storm. 8. A calm. 9. Dance on deck by the passengers. 10. Universal joy on seeing land. 11. Thanksgiving for safe a story still told in Albany. Hogeboom, retiring from the bench, addressed the lawyers in court, and in conclusion hoped that he would meet them in a better world. Paul Cooper, who was deaf, nudged the man next him, and asked: "What did the judge say?" "He hoped to meet us all in a better world." "Well," grunted Mr. Cooper, "old Hogeboom always was a sanguine cuss." Poor Gehot! He died in want and obscurity. Let us hope that Judge Hogeboom's desire was favored.

---

Liszt's "Orpheus" is seldom played, while the companion "The Preludes," also composed in 1854, has a popularity both in beer gardens and symphony concert halls. The most interesting feature of "Orpheus" is the hifalutin preface which Liszt wrote for it, a preface that still excites the envy of the most passionate press agent. No music could answer this announcement. There are a few measures that remind one of the better Liszt, and the harmonies at the end are interesting, but for the most part the invention and the expression are feeble in spite of all the pontifical pretence and preluding.

Chausson's symphony is by far the most thoroughly satisfactory of his more important works that we have heard. It is more logically conceived and bound together, it is more direct, it has a more continuous interest, it is more euphonious, it is more human in its sentiment than the Poem for violin and orchestra, which some believe his masterpiece in absolute music. Furthermore, there is more spontaneity in this symphony than in the piano quartet.

We had the pleasure of hearing the symphony when it was rehearsed by Mr. d'Indy for the December trip of the orchestra, and the impression then made by the music was strengthened last night. It is not music to be ranked by the side of Cesar Franck's symphony or d'Indy's symphony in B flat that perplexed and fatigued some when the composer conducted it, for these two works have a higher flight of imagination and a deeper beauty, and Chausson, though a hard student, had not the technic of Franck, his master, or of d'Indy, his friend. But it is pure and fine music, of genuine emotional quality, and once in a while there is a passage that Franck himself might have signed without any apology. The symphony is sonorously scored and there are measures that delight through the sheer euphony. Especially beautiful is the treatment of the choral in the finale. It is a pity that such new works of importance are heard only at widely separated intervals. It would be an excellent idea to repeat them at the following concerts.

Mr. Gericke did his utmost to put a dramatic spirit into Mendelssohn's gentlemanly music. We can see the composer on the boat as it nears the wharf, lifting his immaculate stove-pipe to ladies waving handkerchiefs. "I am very glad to see you," he exclaims in a well bred voice. "We had beautiful weather, and I wasn't sick a minute." The prose of "Orpheus" was poetically read, and the performance of the symphony must be reckoned among Mr. Gericke's most impressive achievements of the season.

Miss aus der Ohe gave a broad and noble performance of the well worn concerto. She planned her work on grand lines and played in the appropriately heroic spirit.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, JAN 21, 1906.

MUSICAL MATTERS

Adele Aus Der Ohe the Symphony Soloist.

Mr Tucker's Sunday Concerts —The Longy Club.

Various Announcements of the Week.

Chausson's symphony in B-flat major was the novelty at the 12th Symphony rehearsal and concert. The work was new to this city, though the first performance in this country was by the Boston Symphony orchestra. This was in Philadelphia last December, Vincent d'Indy conducting. It is modern French music, with here and there a touch of the Wagnerian style; a representative work by a disciple of a new school which the resources of the modern orchestra permit to "have its fling" in individuality of expression, some of which are musical problems that no one but the student, expert or devotee can easily comprehend. Chausson's symphony is in three movements, through which the severity of the mood suggested in the first one is quite strictly maintained. The composer delights in chromatic effects, the brass contingent has plenty of prominent passage work that is excellent in matter, and the thematic material is admirably handled, as if after Chausson had found a motif to suit he juggled it among the various groups of instruments. And skilfully it is done throughout the whole piece.

In the second movement, which is very somber as a whole, the arrangement of the musical dialogue is masterly, the numerous short phrases being allotted the different instruments in such a way that they run together and blend admirably. Here the treatment of the horn parts is very effective. In the final movement the new school style of development finds vivid illustration in thunderous crescendos, abrupt changes in tempo and key, extreme contrasts, modulations that are peculiar, to say the least, and in other so-called "surprises" to the ear. No choir in the orchestra is slighted in producing these effects.

---

manner in which the different instrumental groups took up their cues in the second movement deserves special mention, for everything went smoothly. The intricate figures of the last movement, many of them for solo passages, were voiced in perfect harmony, and the ensemble work was of the usual high standard of merit. The symphony is a work of importance as a type of modern composition in which skill in instrumentation, and not the musical matter, is most prominent.

Miss Aus der Ohe appeared as soloist, playing the Beethoven E-flat major piano concerto. Mendelssohn's overture, "Sea-calm and Prosperous Voyage," and Liszt's poem, "Orpheus," completed the program. Beethoven's noble work was finely interpreted by Miss Aus der Ohe, who, although lacking some of the masculine vigor necessary to compass the breadth of expression necessary for the concerto, nevertheless gave renewed evidence of a pianistic skill which has won for her a rank with the foremost pianists of her sex. The audience cordially greeted the artist and insistently recalled her at the close of her performance.

The Mendelssohn overture and the Liszt poem were each given in a sympathetic manner, the first being specially charming in its suggestions of pleasant voyaging, tranquillity and peaceful sea pictures. The orchestra's part in the concerto was performed in thorough accord with the soloist.

Saturday, Jan 27, will be the 150th anniversary of the birth of Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart, naturally a date not to be passed without notice by our orchestra. Consequently, Mr Gericke heads the 13th program of the season with what is generally acknowledged the greatest of Mozart's symphonies, that in C major, called "The Jupiter." The other selections will be "La Kremlin," a symphonic poem by Glazounoff, first time at these concerts, and Mendelssohn's E minor violin concerto, Miss Marie Hall playing the solo part.

LONGY CLUB.

The second concert of the Longy club will be given in Potter hall tomorrow evening at 8 o'clock. Admirers of the exquisite art of M. Charles Gilibert will be glad to know that he and Mme Gilibert will be the soloists. M. and Mme Gilibert will sing duets from Gounod's "Mireille" and Gretry's "Richard, Cœur de Lion" and M. Gilibert will sing four songs. The program will include instrumental pieces by Kovacek, Saint-Saens and Pevilhon. Messrs Max Hess and C. Schumann, horns, will assist.

Boston Transcript

324 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON, MASS.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 20, 1906

CHAUSSON AND BERNHARDT

HIS SYMPHONY FOR THE FIRST TIME

Music That Makes Large, Deep and Individual Impression—Bernhardt's "Fedora" Retains Something of the Old Fashion of Her Acting and Shows More of the New Yesterday, under Mr. Gericke, our orchestra played Chausson's symphony in B-flat major for the first time in Boston. Five weeks ago, under Mr. d'Indy, it played the some symphony in New York. At that time the Transcript's reviewer heard it and wrote at length of it. Yesterday, after a second hearing, he recalled the article and found nothing material to add to it or to take away from it. The symphony renewed and heightened every impression, though Mr. Gericke hardly read it with the intimate and intense affection that Mr. d'Indy poured into it. Now, and still more after tonight's performance, the music will be known to some of the Transcript's readers. It would be easy to paraphrase our original review and weaken it, but it is fairer to Chausson and his music to reprint it, with a few slight changes, as it stood. After all, as newspapers go, five weeks is a long time. Was it Mr. Chesterton who said that the newspaper of yesterday wraps the parcel of tomorrow?

Chausson's symphony, as the new French music goes, is clear. In comparison with some of Mr. d'Indy's own, for example, it is easy to grasp the contour and contents of its melodies, to follow their development, to note their relation and interplay. Chausson can wander far in the derivation of material from them and pick his way through intricate and remote modulations. But he is less abstruse than d'Indy, and there is less suggestion in the symphony of music by intellectual process, striving to express in tones the things of the intellect. Chausson's moods are not cold and abstract passions of the brain. They are more concrete and human. They seem larger, perhaps because they are more readily comprehensible. For Chausson, like Franck, and unlike Debussy and sometimes d'Indy, is content with a highly individual treatment of established musical forms. His symphony begins, for example, with a slow introduction, foreshadowing the melodic material to come. The first movement is the customary allegro, built upon two themes and, so far as outline goes, worked out in the usual fashion. The second is the prescribed adagio in form, but in depth and poignancy it is all Chausson's own. The final movement—there is no scherzo—is freer in formal handling than either of the other two and Liszt's notion and practice of "community of themes" shape and color it.

Throughout, however, there is the same individuality of treatment that makes the adagio unique. It lies less in the melodic ideas than in Chausson's handling of them. They do not seem remarkable in themselves, nor, after d'Indy, Debussy and Richard Strauss, are his strange harmonies, remote modulations and occasional dissonance, particularly impressive. Our ears almost expect them. Chausson, moreover, does not pursue the final, the most sensitive phrase for the expression of his thought or feeling with the passionate eagerness of his brethren. He is less ardent and laborious than they in the similar quest of subtleties of rhythm, and of new uses and novel combinations of instruments. Perhaps his besetting self-distrust restrains him. For he is capable of all these things, and when he does achieve them they have the inevitableness that he in Debussy's music and that is not always in d'Indy's. Chausson, like Franck, still keeps his faith in the communicative power of the curve and contents of melody. More probably still, he was seeking, consciously or unconsciously, less the poignant and peculiar phrase than the largest and deepest expression.

It is this largeness and loftiness of mood and expression that make Chausson's symphony, as it seems to us, unique among the symphonies of our own time, and that justifies the faith of his brethren in his future achievements. They like to call his symphony "noble" and they are as apt and sensitive in their choice of the word as they are in the making of their instrumental phrases. Our modern symphonies and tone-poems—Franck's aside—are anything but noble. They miss the elevation, the austerity of mastered passion that is none the less deep because it is controlled, and the breadth of mood and communicating appeal that the word implies. They are restless where Chausson is comparatively serene. The world after all is with them even when d'Indy seeks the solitude of his mountains or Debussy gazes musing upon clouds or sea. Chausson lived within himself, sufficient to himself. Living so, he escaped the neurotic contagion of his time that so often afflicts and also stirs them. He has more of the detachment of Franck, more of his absorption in a world that was in himself.

And as it seems to us, this world of thought and feeling is in some respects singularly remote from all things modern. The form and the expression are of today, but the mood is the mood almost of Sophocles's tragedies. Set your composer whose mind and emotions are of our time to the writing of a joyous allegro like the first movement of Chausson's symphony. The chances are that he will make it all nervous exuberance, or all nervous strivings, excitement and reaction. Contrast with it the comparatively serene, the deep and sane joy of Chausson's allegro. Hear the touch of austerity in it, high but never cold. One must go back to Beethoven and the classic masters to find music of such qualities. One must go back even to the Greeks for the fulness of such mood. The joy is shadowed now and then with the sorrow and the strife of life, but do not the verses of the Greek plays sometimes darken so?

Chausson's second movement is grief incarnate in tones. Our modern composers, pessimists for the most part, have often written of personal sorrow or wider woe. We may hear in their music the physical pangs, so to say, of grief, the torture and the despair of it. They are repeating Jeremiah's "Is it nothing to you, all ye that pass by? behold and see if there be any sorrow like unto my sorrow?" There is little hint of these things in Chausson's adagio. His is a larger, loftier, more impersonal woe. It is the bitter distillation, the disembodied essence of grief, the endless burden of it to the sons and the daughters of men, falling now to smothered sadness, rising again to desolate lamentation, grief that may be endured and must be, but that may not be consoled. There is such grief in more than one speech of Greek tragedy, though not one as we recall them at the moment that has the wan desolation of Chausson's. That is of himself and perhaps of his time and environment—to put desolation so into tones.

For a while, at the beginning of the final movement, Chausson seems to be struggling in the modern fashion to withstand or dispel that consuming sorrow. Clear, sharp melody, crisp and alert phrases, are his weapons. There is the solace of activity. There is the solace also of meditation. Then suddenly the mood changes, as by a revelation. The music rises like a full-throated choral. The instruments leap and swell. There is resignation in it, perhaps, but there is more of faith and exaltation. The mood runs higher and deeper; often it touches majesty. "Say not the struggle naught availeth." The end is a great and enfolding calm. And then, perhaps, Chausson is least modern and most Sophoclean of all.

H. T. P.

Mr. and Mrs. Gilibert, the excellent French singers, assist the Longy Club of virtuosi on wind instruments at its second concert in Potter Hall at eight on Monday evening. Their programme is: R. Kovácek, Sinfonietta (Op. 48), for flute, oboe, two clarinets, two horns and two bassoons. G. Hüe, Soir Paien (with flute obligato); Gounod, Mireille; Gretry, Richard Cœur de Lion; Monsieur and Madame Gilibert. Saint-Saëns, Caprice sur de Airs Danois et Russes (Op. 79), for flute, oboe, clarinet and piano. Chausard, Embarquement pour Cythère; Cl. Debussy, Mandoline; P. Vidal, A Lucette; Monsieur Gilibert. A. Perilhou, Divertissement, for two flutes, two oboes, two clarinets, two bassoons and four horns.

A concert of Russian and Bohemian music takes place in the hall of the house of the Twentieth Century Club in Joy street at eight on Wednesday evening, with Emma Noyes, the soprano, as the chief singer, and the Rheinberger String Quartet for chamber music. A quartet by Schmitt and another by Neponik, which is new to Boston, make its part of the programme. Four Russian folk songs collected by Rumsky-Korschoff, four collected by Tsohaikovsky, and four composed by Davidoff fill the rest.

The Hoffmann Quartet play a string quartet, a quintet for piano and strings, and a sonata for violin and piano, all by H. N. Redman at Jordan Hall on Friday evening. Mr. de Voto is the pianist.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.

Mendelssohn—Overture: "Sea-Calm and Prosperous voyage."
Beethoven—Concerto for Pianoforte, in E-flat major.
Miss Aus der Ohe, pianist.
Liszt—Symphonic Poem, "Orpheus."
Ernest Chausson—Symphony in B-flat major.
(First time at these concerts.)

The house-programme gave the old mistranslation of the Mendelssohn title—"Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage." The analytical programme gave it more sensibly as "Sea-calm," etc. There is a big difference between "Calm Sea" and "Becalmed at Sea," and Mendelssohn attempted (rather feebly) to picture Goethe's words,— Dreadful stillness on the waters,

Without motion rests the sea,
And the sailor sees around him
Only flat monotony.
Not a breath of air is stirring;
Solemn silence, as the grave.
In the whole wide, vast horizon,
Moveth not a single wave.

A weaker presentation of Coleridge's "Ancient Mariner"—

Day after day, day after day,
We stuck, nor life nor motion,
As idle as a painted ship
Upon a painted ocean.

Which Mendelssohn has made still weaker by some placid and conventional music. There is no part of the musical voyage where the steward or the basin is requisite, spite of the fact that Mr. Gericke managed to draw more out of the introduction than we have ever heard done before. It was a very fine performance of a tepid work. It is by no means such a seascape as "le grand Paysagist" (as Mendelssohn was sometimes called, because of his tone-pictures) brought forth in the "Hebrides" overture, and even the pretty water-picture of "The Fair Melusina" makes a stronger overture than this one.

Schubert and Beethoven have treated this same subject of Goethe in vocal forms, but there seems not to be enough in it to inspire the composer. We wish, however, that some of our great modern colorists would turn their attention to Coleridge's "Ancient Mariner"; that would make a grand topic for a symphonic poem.

The overture was substituted for the "Freischutz" overture, which had been announced. Perhaps it was generosity which suggested the change, for that work had been played on Wednesday, by Weingartner and the New York orchestra, and had made no very strong impression.

We value Mr. Gericke's reading of it quite as highly as the more theatrical one of Weingartner, and technically the work was bound to have been superior. The trumpets did some excellent playing at this concert, and the conventional triumph at "Schon seh' ich das Land!" was quite brilliantly executed.

Not many female pianists can satisfactorily interpret Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto, and Miss Aus der Ohe is the chief of the few that are able to do so. Her playing was thorough, earnest and most musicianly in its attention to ensemble. There was surety everywhere, and nowhere was there any attempt at personal display.

There was virility in the first and last movements and the Rondo was bravely attacked and dashingly carried through. The cadenza of the first movement was splendidly worked up. It is interesting to note how Beethoven gradually turned away from the personal exhibition which was involved in this showy part of the concerto, which Mozart had so complaisantly allowed to all artists.

Not satisfied with composing cadenzas for his works, so that the improvising style might be done away with, in his 4th concerto for piano, Beethoven warns the player—"La Cadenza sia corte!"—"Make your cadenza short!" But in this work he unites the orchestra with the piano in such a way that the soloist was forever balked of his chance of interpolating his private fireworks.

The cadenza was generally put in the coda of the work or movement, so that it became merely a means of winning a personal triumph for the player, often at the expense of the composer. Mendelssohn tried to circumvent this point by placing the cadenza in the middle of the first movement of his violin concerto, as will be noticed in the next concert.

To return to Miss Aus der Ohe; she played with vigor, without vehemence; everything was broad, nothing spasmodic; and she was deservedly recalled again and again at the end of the noble work. And how well the composition wears! Much of our modern music is of the sickroom or of the asylum. Oh that we might get back to the musical health of Beethoven!

"Orpheus," by Liszt, gave splendid opportunities to the harp and the oboe, and Mr. Schuecker and Mr. Longy played superbly. But the horns were indecisive once or twice. We have recently noticed a lack of surety once in a while, in this important department of the orchestra. This symphonic poem is not comparable to "Les Preludes." Its vagueness, and its rambling style become tiresome long before its final cadence is reached. It might be well to change its title to "Morpheus."

The Chausson symphony is great at times and padded at others. It does not, on the one hand, attain the glorious figure treatment and the sustained power of the Cesar Franck symphony (the best modern French symphony), nor, on the other, does it have any of the boredom and "ciphering with notes" of the D'Indy Symphonie Mathematique.

There are some noble climaxes in the work. All is not clear (on a first hearing) and the first movement seems a musical Corot, a suggestion, an impression, rather than a clear picture, but there is originality and sincere passion in many of its phrases.

The second movement seemed big with Fate. It presented gloom and suggested tragedy. Yet it had contrasts of deep tenderness which caused the sombre [illegible] to become the more intense. [illegible] was still intense, and it was something of a triumph that three movements (it has but three) without any real relief of brightness to their earnestness, should yet be far removed from monotony. The chorale-like theme in the finale was very grand, and the development of the 3-noted figure (D, B-flat, A, descending) was carried out with something of the power with which Franck treated a similar 3-noted figure in his symphony.

And a word of compliment is due to the excellent playing of the trumpet in this finale, and above all to the superb manner in which Mr. Gericke interpreted the new work. Not a climax was lost, and the power, intensity and passion were caught up in a manner that must have surprised those who deemed our conductor only "academic."

Louis C. Elson.

The Boston Journal

TWELFTH CONCERT IS MOST NOTABLE

Symphony on Saturday Night Plays First Time Here Chausson's B Flat.

The twelfth Symphony concert, on Saturday night, was notable chiefly for the first performance here of Chausson's symphony in B flat. This much-discussed work, one of the latest products of "Young France," is not so very radical, after all, nor at all formidable in the hearing.

It is clear, direct, often simply melodious in an appealing way, and it has very much of the accepted symphonic form, with scholarly transitions from one movement to another. Yet there are difficult passages here and there, hard food for the ordinary, musical digestion. It wins no popularity at a first hearing, which, of course, may mean very little as to its value. It had all the advantage of a very beautiful and finished performance.

Mendelssohn's old-fashioned, but still beautiful "Calm at Sea and Prosperous Voyage" was read and played with dainty imagery. It is the custom nowadays to jibe at this not over-strong bit of nautical tone-picturing, and yet it does suggest the lazy swell of ocean, the whistling of the wind and the smell of spray. Sea-poems are difficult in music, and a better than Mendelssohn in this particular genre is not easy to find.

Lizst does not shine in his "Orpheus" symphonic poem, and, although the playing of it was dramatic and noble, its effect was small. Adele Aus der Ohe played the well-known Beethoven concerto for pianforte with much feeling and power.

The Boston Post

The Representative Democratic Paper of New England

Issued Sunday by Post Publishing Co.
JANUARY 21, 1906. NO. 3; VOL. 39

TWELFTH SYMPHONY CONCERT

Miss Adele Aus Der Ohe, pianist, was the soloist at the 12th Symphony concert last evening, and the programme was as follows:

Overture, "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage" Mendelssohn
Concerto for piano, No. 5.....Beethoven
Symphonic Poem, "Orpheus".....Liszt
Symphony, B flat, Op. 20.....Chausson

This programme offered little of especial interest, although the Chausson symphony was a novelty, being heard here for the first time. The composer, who died from an accident in 1899, at the early age of 44, was one of the radical school of French composers, a conspicuous member of which is Vincent D'Indy.

The symphony heard here last evening, in three movements, is free in form, but on a first hearing is much less vague and easier to understand than many other works of the advanced French school heard here in recent seasons. There is considerable evidence of what most people call melody, there are many pages of beauty and imagination, and the scoring is especially elaborate. The work should be heard more than once before giving an opinion that will do it justice. The performance was one of great finish.

The other orchestral numbers did not impress to any great extent.

Miss Aus Der Ohe gave a brilliant and forceful performance of the Beethoven "Emperor" concerto, and was much applauded and several times recalled.

Miss Marie Hall, violinist, will be the soloist at the rehearsal and concert this coming week.

LONGY CLUB

The second concert of the Longy Club will be given in Potter Hall tomorrow evening at 8 o'clock. Admirers of the exquisite art of M. Charles Gilibert will be glad to know that he and Mme. Gilibert will be the soloists, Mr. Longy at the last moment having been able to make satisfactory arrangements with him. M. and Mme. Gilibert will sing duets from Gounod's "Mireille" and Gretry's "Richard, Coeur de Lion," and M. Gilibert will sing four songs. The rest of the programme is on the high standard which has always characterized the Longy concerts. The club will be assisted by Messrs. Max Hess and C. Schumann, hornists.

BOSTON EVENING RECORD

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.

Mendelssohn—Overture: "Sea-Calm and Prosperous voyage."
Beethoven—Concerto for Pianoforte, in E-flat major.
Miss Aus der Ohe, pianist.
Liszt—Symphonic Poem, "Orpheus."
Ernest Chausson—Symphony in B-flat major.
(First time at these concerts.)

The overture was substituted for the "Freischutz" overture, which had been announced. Perhaps it was generosity which suggested the change, for that work had been played on Wednesday, by Weingartner and the New York orchestra, and had made no very strong impression.

We value Mr. Gericke's reading of it quite as highly as the more theatrical one of Weingartner, and technically the work was bound to have been superior. The trumpets did some excellent playing at this concert, and the conventional triumph at "Schon seh' ich das Land!" was quite brilliantly executed.

Not many female pianists can satisfactorily interpret Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto, and Miss Aus der Ohe is the chief of the few that are able to do so. Her playing was thorough, earnest and most musicianly in its attention to ensemble. There was surety everywhere, and nowhere was there any attempt at personal display.

There was virility in the first and last movements and the Rondo was bravely attacked and dashingly carried through. The cadenza of the first movement was splendidly worked up. It is interesting to note how Beethoven gradually turned away from the personal exhibition which was involved in this showy part of the concerto, which Mozart had so complaisantly allowed to all artists.

Not satisfied with composing cadenzas for his works, so that the improvising style might be done away with, in his 4th concerto for piano, Beethoven warns the player—"La Cadenza sia corte!"—"Make your cadenza short!" But in this work he unites the orchestra with the piano in such a way that the soloist was forever balked of his chance of interpolating his private fireworks.

Louis C. Elson.

The Boston Post

The Representative Democratic Paper of New England

Issued daily by Post Publishing Co.
JANUARY 23, 1906. NO. 20; VOL. 182

LONGY CLUB CONCERT

The second concert by the Longy Club was given last evening at Potter Hall, assisted by Mr. and Mrs. Charles Gilibert, Messrs. Hess and Schumann.

The club presented a sinfonietta Op. 48, Caprice Op. 79, by Saint Saens, and a Divertissement by Perilhou.

Mr. Gilibert sang numbers by Hue, Chausard, Debussy and Pierne, and with Mrs. Gilbert, duets by Gounod and Gretry.

The programme gave general acceptance, and the performance of the Longy Club was in its usual high artistic manner. Mr. and Mrs. Gilibert were fully as successful as they were at a concert of the Longy Club last season, and several extra numbers were given.

The third and last concert will be Feb. 26.

The Boston Post

The Representative Democratic Paper of New England

Issued Sunday by Post Publishing Co.
JANUARY 28, 1906. NO. 4; VOL. 39
Office 259 Washington st., Boston, Mass.

13TH SYMPHONY CONCERT

The programme of the 13th Symphony concert last evening included Mozart's so-called "Jupiter" symphony, concerto for violin by Mendelssohn and a symphonic picture, "Kremlin," by the Russian composer, Glazounoff. Marie Hall was the soloist.

The Mozart symphony was on the programme in commemoration of the 150th anniversary of the composer's birth. One of the finest of the immortal creations of Mozart, it is a universal favorite, and the performance of the work was much applauded. The symphony, however, is always more effective when heard in a hall of small size.

The "Kremlin" symphonic picture by Glazounoff was heard here for the first time. It is ultra modern every way, yet is melodic all through, and the orchestral scoring is gorgeous in its Orientalism and effective as well as enjoyable in the highest degree. The performance was highly finished and gave great pleasure. Miss Hall, the English violinist, who has given two recitals here previously this season, appeared at a Symphony concert for the first time. She played the hackneyed Mendelssohn concerto with admirable breadth of tone, superb technic and perfect intonation. Her conception of the work was without exaggeration, with true authority, that made her performance one to be remembered for a long time. Miss Hall was enthusiastically applauded and several times recalled.

BOSTON SYMPHONY QUARTET

Professor Willy Hess will give at the next concert of the Boston Symphony quartet in Jordan Hall on Monday evening, Feb. 5, what promises to be one of the most interesting novelties of the season. The name of names in modern music just at present is that of Max Reger, professor of composition in the Munich Conservatory. He is being boomed as vigorously and fought as vigorously as ever Richard Strauss was, and from all accounts he has rather thrust Strauss from the centre of the stage, for the time being, at any rate. He has had the honor of having a symphony hissed by the Conservatives and as wildly applauded by the Radicals. In this country little of his music is known save his songs, which have made much headway this year. Therefore, his serenade for flute, violin and viola, which Professor Hess will play with Messrs. A. Maquarre and Emile Ferir, ought to attract much attention.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

MUSICAL MATTERS

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.

Mozart—Symphony in C major. "Jupiter."
Mendelssohn—Concerto for Violin.
Soloist, Miss Marie Hall.
Glazounoff—Symphonic Poem. "The Kremlin."

The Jupiter symphony was upon the programme in honor of the 150th anniversary of the birth of Mozart. It was better than giving a "Mozart Programme," which would have become tiresome. Music is an Art that is more changeable than any other and pictures the emotional and the psychological character of its age; its shifting character is its greatest element of strength.

It is therefore only natural to state that, admire Mozart as we may, he does not come as close to us as Tschaikowsky, or Richard Strauss, while a whole concert devoted to his music would be no more delightful than an entire programme made up of readings from Richardson or Spenser.

But the single symphony was entirely delightful, and again proved its title to being the broadest and noblest orchestral work of the 18th century. We begin to doubt if there is as good an interpreter of Mozart in this country as Wilhelm Gericke; he made the "Jupiter" manly and sturdy, as if it were a forerunner of the "Heroic" that came 16 years later. There was much applause consequent upon the work, showing that the public are still deeply interested in a good Mozart number, well performed.

After this Mr. Hess took the baton and led a brilliant performance of the Mendelssohn violin concerto. This work occupies the neutral ground between popular and classical music; it is not intense, as Bruch's G minor concerto, nor complex as Brahms' concerto, nor symphonic as the great Beethoven concerto, but it combines melody and technique in such a suave and graceful manner that it pleases public, classicist and performer alike, and it becomes the favorite visiting card of many a good violin soloist.

Miss Marie Hall was excellent in the work, best in the first 2 movements, but very brilliant in the finale also. Her broad tone and free bowing, her clear intonation, even in the highest positions or in harmonics (there are only a few "natural" ones in the work) were very effective. The cadenza, which Mendelssohn slyly placed in the middle of the first movement, to avoid having too much of the personal triumph in the work, was without flaw.

But there was something greater than this, which appealed to the musician; it was the sympathetic vein in which the beauties of the first two movements were revealed. We suspect that Miss Hall is greater than this concerto, that she can do deeper and nobler work. However that may be, she certainly made a tremendous success with it on Saturday, arousing the public to something like a frenzy of enthusiasm, and being recalled again and again.

One feels impelled to give to her the title that was once applied to Norman-Neruda, —"Die Geigen Fee!"—"The Fairy of the Violin!"

The Kremlin has about as much history interwoven in its stones as the Tower of London itself. It was conceived in barbarism, steeped in slaughter, and has been the scene of assassination even in most recent days. Under the foundation of the Kremlin of Nijni-Novgorod it is said that they buried a living woman, in conformance with pagan custom, and the Moscow Kremlin has scarcely been less terrible in its Oriental savagery.

This Orientalism, this barbaric splendor, Byzantine superstition and religious pomp have all been translated into boisterous tones by Glazounoff. Russia is teaching the world a lesson as regards nationality in Music; the motto,—"Para Domoi"—"Let us get Home,"—expressing the ardent desire to get away from foreign influence, which made Grieg Norwegian and Smetana Bohemian in their musical expression, finds its fullest application in Russia today, and even the noisy and bacchanalian touches were graphic and gave a new flavor to the concert. In this case it was not necessary to scratch the Russian to discover the Tartar, for the latter stood clearly revealed.

The Greek Church theme of the second movement was another new flavor. Those who have read Hatherly's book on "Byzantine Music" have some idea of the weird melodies that exist in this field, and, in spite of the great advance made by Bortniansky, the Russian Palestrina, the foundation of much Muscovite religious singing is to be sought for in these.

The Finale was as boisterous as the beginning. Like Tschaikowsky's "1812" explosion, this work attempts to portray a great popular festival and stops at nothing to achieve its end. It was tubas and trombones to the front most of the time. Nor was it unpleasant to hear,—for once; one felt that it was a true picture even if rather a repulsive one, and it appealed to one's curiosity, if no deeper.

Mr. Gericke had evidently prepared the work with much care, and he led it with a commendable abandon. The brasses blew until their lips were almost bleeding, and the violins played brilliant figures that were almost lost in the tumult. The 10 minutes' walk in the corridors became, at this concert, a Rubicon that separated civilization from barbarism; from Tennyson to Gorky could not have been a greater leap.

Louis C. Elson.

[155]

Boston Transcript
324 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON, MASS.
SATURDAY, JANUARY 27, 1906

IN THE WORLD OF MUSIC

MOZART AND GLAZOUNOFF AT THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

The Russian's "Kremlin" for the First Time—Coming Concerts—News of the Day

Mozart, with his unpretending symphony in C-major, that an after generation called his "Jupiter" symphony, began Mr. Gericke's programme yesterday afternoon. Glazounoff's frankly pretentious "Symphonic Picture in Three Parts: The Kremlin" ended it. The apt and elegant Mendelssohn made a slender bridge between the two with his concerto for violin in which Miss Marie Hall, very warmly and deservedly applauded, played the solo part with particular simplicity of feeling and graceful and shimmering tone. The world over, conductors have been making their "commemorative" programmes for the Mozart anniversary that falls today. Most of them, it is safe to say, have followed the conventional way in such things—one of Mozart's last symphonies, a concerto with a virtuoso to play it, the overture to one of the operas, and a fragment or two, instrumental or vocal, to round the list. Mr. Gericke, by a fortunate flash of originality, has seemingly preferred to honor Mozart by comparison or rather contrast. A short programme contained his "Jupiter" symphony and Glazounoff's "Symphonic Picture;" yet two compositions—and both genuinely music—could hardly be farther apart. Mendelssohn's concerto, after all, was not a bridge. It was only a resting place and much nearer to Mozart than it was to Glazounoff.

A band of Russians and a Russian conductor might doubtless have made more of Glazounoff's "tone-pictures" than did Mr. Gericke and our orchestra. Its playing of them was steadily vivid and moving, but such music as Glazounoff and some of his brethren write is still primitively racial, and there are traits in it that stir their countrymen and find expression through them as they cannot through any cosmopolitan body of cultivated virtuosi. Mozart's symphony, on the other hand, was ideally played. A few weeks ago, when the companion symphony in G-minor was on the programme, the ear detected, or fancied it detected, a slight sharpness of accent that lessened Mozart's perfect roundness of tone and a slight over-precision that similarly diminished his supple elasticity. There were no such specks on the performance of the "Jupiter" symphony. The orchestra gave out a flawless body of fluent tone. The quality of it was often the quality of pure song. Mr. Gericke's balancing and proportioning of it was as near to perfection as even such a band and such a conductor may come. Every undulation of melody, every leap of some passing figure, every glint of rhythm, and every tonal shading came spontaneously, pliantly, completely. Pure beauty and suppleness of tone, pure felicity and animation of execution could hardly have gone further. Before the first movement had finished we listeners were ready to believe in the perpetual youth of Mozart. Music, existing for the sake of its own beauty in substance and form, could not have sounded fresher and more alive. Perhaps there was a touch of sentiment in all of us for the moment from conductor and players through the elect ladies of the parquet to the humblest occupant of the "rush seats." Somehow it was in the atmosphere that Mozart should sound altogether facinating and altogether beautiful again. He did. You listened so as to say in long breaths, and you were surer than ever that it was Keats that wrote the motto, to this symphony, twenty-odd years afterward, in his ode to a Grecian urn. The particular line seems trite, to put in cold type. It did not seem so, if it happened to leap to mind under the charm and joy of this performance of the "Jupiter" symphony.

The chairs on the stage filled. The omniscient programme book ran through a long list of instruments from "three flutes, one interchangeable with piccolo," to bass drum, cymbals and gong, and we listeners were face to face with Glazounoff, the Kremlin and the festival that he has imagined within its gates for musical portrayal. (Mendelssohn had come and gone in modest, gentleman-like fashion. It was Mozart, who knows neither time nor fashion, that ears were still hearing.) Then came pompous music, festal music, pictorial music, richly colored and keenly varied—half an hour of it. And through all that time it was semi-barbarian music. For these Russians of the Russians—Glazounoff, Rimsky-Korsakoff, Liadoff and the rest—are still semi-barbarians who have mastered the use of a set of emotional edged tools. The fully civilized West gave them those tools—the expressive resources of music—and taught them by example and precept how to employ them. Then these semi-barbarians looked about for material to which they could turn the means that the West had given them.

They cast their eyes to the East, and they embodied its gorgeous and palpitating picturesqueness in such music as Rimsky-Korsakoff's familiar "Scheherazade." Or they searched their own sensitive and changeful temperament. In their moments of despair they found such music as Tschaikowski's piercing slow movements, and in their [illegible] reeling finales, smoking with the fumes of vodka. Or they heard the folk tunes, listened to the legends, bent to the dances or watched the rivers and plains and shrines of their own Russia, and into "tone poems," fantasies, ballets and all sorts of free and pictorial forms went the musical ideas and the musical moods that this contemplation inspired. It is the composer who has flowered in the cultivation of the West, like Strauss or d'Indy, who may not easily invent vivid and striking melodies. These Russians have them at their fingers' ends. They may take them from folk song or they may imitate such melodies in their own inventions. The cultivated composer inclines naturally to make music by intellectual process. The semi-barbarians of Russia are hot and spontaneous with feeling. He tempers his instrumental coloring as subtly as he may. They are all for gorgeous profusion of line and ornament, for loud pomp and glow. His musical palette is chiefly shades, theirs almost all primary colors.

Glazounoff's "symphonic picture" utilizes and blends many of these traits. "The Kremlin" is delineative music, though less seemingly of the moods that the palace might inspire than those of a pompous and popular festival, passing within it. There is Oriental flavor once and again in the music, for the Kremlin is a palace of the gorgeous East that happens to stand in snowy Moscow. The thematic bases of the music are usually folk-tunes or invented imitations of them. The treatment is warmly and poignantly imaginative and thick and glowing with instrumental colors. The boisterous din and rhythm of the crowd streaming through the gates, or the sonorous coming of the welcomed prince, alternate with some fitful vision that takes form in Oriental harmonies or in broad and mysteriously sombre ecclesiastical progressions. The composer's means to this delineation are full, sure and keen. The crowd dances, sings, riots, loses its breath, vanishes even in the first "symphonic picture." It is a half-barbarian crowd set, if one likes, in such a large barbarian fantasy as is the Kremlin itself. Solemn rite and churchly procession, heavy with mystery and magnificence, resound through the second "tone-picture," and against its deepest suggestion Glazounoff throws the inevitable tinkle of Oriental rhythms and instrumental coloring. For the third "picture" hear the crowd striding and shouting to greet its prince. He comes in tonal opulence and brilliance. They rejoice in shrill or sonorous din.

Glazounoff's imagination is large and hot. He commands his musical resources with unwavering surety. He heats them, he overwhelms them, rather than bends them to his emotional and pictorial ends. His "symphonic picture" is a huge and glowing splotch of tonal colors. The Kremlin is such an architectural splotch. Therefore, his music presumably gains its end, but it is as semi-barbarous as the pile that impelled him to write it. And after Mozart.

H. T. P.

/ / + / /

Concerts Next Week

Mr. Gericke has put the most important of the new symphonies for the current season on the programme for the fourteenth pair of Symphony Concerts on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening next. It is the fifth symphony of Gustav Mahler, the Viennese conductor and composer. None of his symphonies has yet been played here, and only one or two of them—and very rarely—in other American cities. In Germany and Austria, however, they have been for years the source of eager and sometimes bitter discussion. There are those even that place Mahler as a composer only a little below Richard Strauss. The temperate Weingartner finds him too little esteemed, and writes of Mahler's music as follows: "His works are of colossal dimensions, and require an unusually large number of executants, which makes more difficult their performance and reputation. But if we overlook these considerations, which, after all, are secondary, and turn to the composer himself, we find in him deep, strong feeling which has its own mode of expression, and which says what it has to say quite unconcerned about the possibilities of performance and success. Mahler's most striking characteristic is the remarkable breadth of his themes as well as their thoroughly musical nature. In many points he is like his teacher, Bruckner, only he understands better how to work with his themes and how to construct his movements. There may be bizarre passages, there may be needless difficulties in his works; we may notice a certain prolixity, and, perhaps, a want of severe self-criticism in the selection of his themes; but everything that Mahler writes bears the stamp of a rich imagination and of a passionate and a vivid, almost fanatic, enthusiasm, which always has awakened my sympathy." The fifth and the latest of his symphonies is as large and long as the rest. Therefore only two other numbers fill out the programme—Beethoven's overture to Goethe's "Egmont" and Schumann's concerto for piano, with Harold Bauer, the most distinguished among the pianists who are visiting America this winter, to take the solo part.

On Thursday evening Mr. Gericke and the orchestra give the third of their current series of concerts at Sanders Theatre in Cambridge. Mozart's symphony in G-minor; Chausson's in B-flat major (by request), and a concerto for violin by Bach make the programme. Miss Clara Kioberg will be the violinist.

Our orchestra gives the second concert of the season for the benefit of its pension fund on the evening of Sunday, April 1. Probably an eminent virtuoso will share in it, though no definite arrangements can yet be announced.

Boston Sunday Globe.
SUNDAY, JAN 28, 1906.

MUSICAL MATTERS

Marie Hall, Violinist, at the Symphony.

Mme Szumowska's Piano Recital Tomorrow.

Various Musical Happenings of the Week.

A graceful and wholly appropriate tribute to the genius of Wolfgang Mozart, the great composer, was paid this week on the 150th anniversary of his birth, by the 13th Symphony orchestra rehearsal and concert; the place of honor on the program being given to the magnificent "Jupiter" symphony in C major, with fugue, written by the maestro in 1788 when he had few friends save Frederick William of Prussia. The stately nobility of the work received a dignified treatment at Mr Gericke's hands wholly in keeping with its character.

The grand outpouring of a soul suffering keenly from its unwelcome surroundings is here put into exquisite music. The second or "andante" movement, is arranged also for organ, and is heard in churches sufficiently often to make it familiar to many. The opening theme of four measures in the finale is one quickly recognized as having been used by many composers of ecclesiastical music, from Bach, Handel and Beethoven down, as well as by Mozart himself in other compositions, notably in the "Sanctus" of his "Mass in C."

Mr Hess, concertmeister, ably conducted the lovely Mendelssohn E minor concerto for violin, in which the soloist was the young English virtuoso Miss Marie Hall, always heard with pleasure. It was just a year ago (to be exact Jan 29, in Jordan hall) that Fritz Kreisler played the same concerto with masterly skill; and it is high praise to say that Miss Hall's scholarly reading bears favorably the comparison. Both Kreisler and Miss Hall are unimpeachable in their interpretations, bringing to bear upon the subject a sweeping power carrying everything, for the time being, before it. The method of the two artists in playing the second as well as a part of the third movement was very different, yet both was sufficiently skilful and individual to be delightful. In Miss Hall's reading the "appassionato" movement was a thing of memorable worth.

Glazounoff's "Symphonic picture" of "The Kremlin," filled with brazen suggestions of haunting bell-tolling and other weird sounds in and about this historic place of sumptuous mystery and barbaric Russian splendor.

It was treated with marked attention to its suggestions of princely feasts, processionals and religious rites—the monastery theme being wonderfully brought out by the temple gong and vivid oriental coloring. The last movement was splendid with brass wind orchestration, and fittingly closed a program of great interest and beauty.

The 14th symphony rehearsal and concert will witness again the skill in pianoforte playing of that excellent musician, Mr Harold Bauer, whose Schumann concerto will undoubtedly be given splendidly, as so noble a composition deserves to be. A special feature of the program will be a "first time" symphony, "Number 5," by Gustav Mahler, and the Beethoven "Egmont" overture will be included in the program.

BOSTON SYMPHONY QUARTET.

Prof Villy Hess will give at the next concert of the Boston symphony quartet in Jordan hall, Monday evening, Feb 5, what promises to be one of the most interesting novelties of the season. The name of Max Reger, professor of composition in the Munich conservatory, is being boomed and fought as vigorously as ever Richard Strauss was. He has had the honor of having a symphony hissed by the conservative and as wildly applauded by the radicals.

In this country little of his music is known save his songs, which have made much headway this year. Therefore his serenade for flute, violin and viola, which Prof Hess will play with Messrs A. Maquarre and Emile Ferir, ought to attract much attention. The other works will be Mozart's quartet in C major and Brahm's pianoforte quartet in A major, op 26. The assisting pianist will be Mr Carl Stasny.

The Boston Journal

TRIBUTE TO MOZART BY THE SYMPHONY

The thirteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra fell upon Jan. 27, the 150th anniversary of the birth of Mozart, and in recognition of the occasion the great symphony in C major with fugue finale, popularly known as the Mozart "Jupiter" Symphony, was played. Miss Marie Hall was the soloist and was heard in the well known Mendelssohn concerto in E minor for violin, op. 64. "The Kremlin," styled a Symphonic picture in three parts, by Glazounoff, was given its first performance by the orchestra.

The Symphony was played splendidly. Mr. Gericke evidently was imbued with the spirit of the occasion and never did the great work receive a more sympathetic reading.

Miss Hall was heard to fine advantage in the Mendelssohn concerto. There are few great violinists who have visited Boston who have not taken a hack at this time-honored composition. There are splendid opportunities in it for the virtuoso, and Miss Hall improved them all. She was given an ovation at the conclusion of the concerto.

The "Kremlin" is a big, sonorous composition. It is an effort to depict peasant revelry, religious feeling, and the pomp and ceremony of Russian life. The three parts are styled Popular Feast, In the Monastery, and Entrance and Meeting of the Prince. The second part is by far the most impressive. It teems with religious coloring mingled with something of the Orient.

"This Country, with its Institutions, belongs to the People who Inhabit It."

BOSTON EVENING RECORD

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.

Mozart—Symphony in C major. "Jupiter."
Mendelssohn—Concerto for Violin.
Soloist, Miss Marie Hall.
Glazounoff—Symphonic Poem. "The Kremlin."

The Jupiter symphony was upon the programme in honor of the 150th anniversary of the birth of Mozart. It was better than giving a "Mozart Programme," which would have become tiresome. Music is an Art that is more changeable than any other and pictures the emotional and the psychological character of its age; its shifting character is its greatest element of strength.

The Kremlin has about as much history interwoven in its stones as the Tower of London itself. It was conceived in barbarism, steeped in slaughter, and has been the scene of assassination even in most recent days. Under the foundation of the Kremlin of Nijni-Novgorod it is said that they buried a living woman, in conformance with pagan custom, and the Moscow Kremlin has scarcely been less terrible in its Oriental savagery.

This Orientalism, this barbaric splendor, Byzantine superstition and religious pomp have all been translated into boisterous tones by Glazounoff. Russia is teaching the world a lesson as regards nationality in Music; the motto,—"Para Domoi"—"Let us get Home,"—expressing the ardent desire to get away from foreign influence.

PARIS

Date : .....

Adresse : 2, Rue Dronot

Signé : .....

De New-York :

M. Vincent d'Indy vient de diriger à New-York et à Boston une série de concerts dont le programme était exclusivement composé d'œuvres françaises modernes : Fauré, Debussy, César Franck, Dukas, Vincent d'Indy, etc...

Le compositeur français et le Boston-Symphonie-Orchestre qu'il dirigeait ont obtenu un succès énorme.

[156]

PAYS TRIBUTE TO MOZART

13th Concert the 150th Anniversary of Musician's Birth Is Observed — Modernity of Master's Music.

MISS MARIE HALL IN MENDELSSOHN WORK

"The Kremlin" an Unfamiliar Russian Musical Picture Is Given — Mozart "Jupiter" Symphony Heard.

The programme of the 13th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Gericke conductor, given in Symphony Hall last evening, was as follows:

...phony in C major, "Jupiter,".....Mozart
...concerto.....Mendelssohn
...phonic picture, "The Kremlin"...Glazounoff

Mozart was born at Salzburg Jan. 27. The "Jupiter" symphony was ...ed last night to celebrate the 150th ...ersary of the birth of the won...

...meet and proper that such an... ...ries should be celebrated with ... and ceremony. In this life that ... daily," as Jules Laforgue com... ...a life of tomorrow rather than ... we are inclined to patronize ... ancient worthies who in their own ... were very modern, or to speak ... of them as bores, with their ... of "only historical interest." Mo... has not escaped. Many concert-... yawn at his name and wonder ... such men as Richard Strauss and ... d'Indy can praise him with ... cheeks. They suspect this at... of worship to be a pose. Re... them of the fact that to such ... different characters as Rossini, ... Tschaikowsky, Brahms, the ... of musicians was Mozart. ... they say lightly, "There's no ac... for tastes; surely you do not ... to maintain that Mozart is a ... of this generation."

Mozart was neither a symbolist ... pessimist. He was not a trans... literature, sculpture, or paint... music. His imagination was ... by a metaphysical treatise. ... simply wrote music which came into ... and disquieted him until it ... down on paper. He did not ... nervously seeking for ideas. ... music is never the passionate cry, ... wild shriek of a racked soul. ... music is never hysterical, it is ... morbid. It is seldom emotional, ... necessarily and unhappily under... ... word today. Perhaps for ... reasons it is still modern, im... and not merely on account of ... and exquisite melodic line, ... inevitable background, delicate ... Music that is only the true ... of a particular generation is ... as soon as it is born.

...long ago in Paris the G minor ... of Mozart and Debussy's ... to "The Afternoon of a Faun" ... played at the same concert, and ... Lalo, a bitter foe of formu... a singularly sensitive and aggres... radical in his tastes and opinions, ... struck by a certain artistic simi... in the two works that are of a ... character, for the symphony ... abstract and the prelude is ... He found a similarity in ... grace of inspiration, in the ... logic of the thought," and also ... quality of tonal effects and in ... orchestral color, "which is all lumi... an orchestra in which not a note ... where everything has its value ... charms the ear before it speaks to ... divine spontaneous, para... visions, music full of the sun ... enchantment." And he asked ... pertinent question: "Is not the ... that which ignores all suf...

...country we do not know Mo... music in its perfection. The ...eras that are performed are ... in a huge theatre where the ... of the music quickly evaporates, ... the musical fluid cannot enwrap ... hearer. "Don Giovanni," "The Mar... of Figaro," "The Magic Flute," ... be performed in a small opera ... with a little, but careful chosen, ...estra, with singers of sensuous ... trained admirably in the old ... with a stage so arranged that ... need not be tedious waits be... groups of arias or ensembles. ...symphonies are played in vast con... halls by swollen orchestras, with ...-wind instruments doubled in the ... to balance the force of strings, ... the chamber music of Mozart is ... under favorable conditions. And ... how potent, how irresistible is Mo... music a century after it occurred.

...k of the men and women, mere... ...res of a legend or a librettist, ... are now flesh and blood, who are ... known to us, through Mozart's ... characterization, than are our ... respectable neighbors in the ... Donna Anna, the most superb ... in all opera; Donna Elvira, Zer... ...heroic Don Giovanni, whose ...acter is questioned as eagerly ... of Hamlet; the Countess and ... Cherubino—compare Mo... with the Cherubino of Beau... ...at jealous and intriguing ..., the Count, Antonio, the ... Papagena, Papageno. Then ... two Coquettes with their ... in "Cosi fan tutte"—an ... is not in the repertory. ... Even the more ..., the Statue of the ... treat but strikes ... tones of ...

Just how two sentiments in chamber music reading can be presented with musicianship and intelligence was demonstrated by the Boston Symphony quartet at the New Willard last night. This excellent organization first gave the beautiful Tschaikowsky creation for two violins, viola, and cello in F major. The unity of conception as displayed by the four men was delightful.

First, the poetic adagio, then the galloping allegro, and best of all, the andante, which, by the way, was the feature effort of the evening, were given that romantic interpretation and Slavic dash necessary to make it effective. In this number, Emile Ferir, viola, did splendid work, the tones produced by him in instances being of the old d'gamba order.

The quartet's concluding number was the well-known work of Schumann, in A major, and here again the players were most successful. Particular mention might be made of the third (adagio) movement where the ensemble work of the quartet almost made the Te Deum sing itself.

The soloist, and a good one too, was Miss Susan Metcalfe, soprano. Instead of attempting vocal heroics, the singer gave a series of appealing German works well suited to her nicely schooled voice. Her voice, with all the possibilities of a mezzo, was heard to best advantage in Brahms' 'Die Meinacht.' Miss Metcalfe was compelled to respond to an encore. She was successfully accompanied by Mrs. George Collins.

...country this week. He is booked for the following appearances in New York: with the Philharmonic Society; the Boston Symphony Orchestra; with the Metropolitan Orchestra for two Sunday night concerts; at Carnegie Hall for two recitals with Gerardy, and with the New York Symphony Orchestra.

[157]

TIMES.
WASHINGTON, D. C.
JAN 23 1906

FINE ENSEMBLE PLAYING BY SYMPHONY QUARTET

Just how two sentiments in chamber music reading can be presented with musicianship and intelligence was demonstrated by the Boston Symphony quartet at the New Willard last night. This excellent organization first gave the beautiful Tschaikowsky creation for two violins, viola, and cello in F major. The unity of conception as displayed by the four men was delightful.

First, the poetic adagio, then the galloping allegro, and best of all, the andante, which, by the way, was the feature effort of the evening, were given that romantic interpretation and Slavic dash necessary to make it effective. In this number, Emile Ferir, viola, did splendid work, the tones produced by him in instances being of the old d'gamba order.

The quartet's concluding number was the well-known work of Schumann, in A major, and here again the players were most successful. Particular mention might be made of the third (adagio) movement where the ensemble work of the quartet almost made the Te Deum sing itself.

The soloist, and a good one too, was Miss Susan Metcalfe, soprano. Instead of attempting vocal heroics, the singer gave a series of appealing German works well suited to her nicely schooled voice. Her voice, with all the possibilities of a mezzo, was heard to best advantage in Brahms' 'Die Meinacht.' Miss Metcalfe was compelled to respond to an encore. She was successfully accompanied by Mrs. George Collins.

STAR
WASHINGTON D. C.
JAN 21 1906

Boston Symphony Quartet.

With an attractive program and a distinguished singer new to Washington, the Boston Symphony Quartet will visit this city again tomorrow evening, and give its second concert in the ball room of the New Willard. The quartet will play two works, Tschaikowsky's quartet in F major, op. 22, and Schumann's quartet in A major, op. 41. The recently published letters of Tschaikowsky reveal that the quartet in F major was one of the greatest favorites with the composer and one of the first works by him which was accepted with unquestioned approval by his colleagues in Moscow.

Miss Susan Metcalfe, the singer, is a young American, who is well started on a career of promise. Four years ago, utterly unknown, she made a modest debut in New York as an interpreter of songs. Today her recitals in New York, London and Paris are ranked among the most important events of their kind in the course of a season. Miss Metcalfe is said to be endowed with a rare combination of voice, intelligence, taste and musicianship, as well as an interesting personality.

The program is as follows: (1) Tschaikowsky, quartet in F major, op. 22; (2) songs, (a) Handel, aria, "Serse;" (b) Mozart, "Das Veilchen;" (c) Schubert, "Der Neugierge;" (d) Schubert, "Ungeduld;" (e) Brahms, "Die Mainacht;" (f) Brahms, "Liebliche Wangen." (3) Schumann, quartet in A major, op. 41. Accompanist, Mrs. George Collins.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
NEWS
ss BUFFALO, N. Y.
JAN 21 1906

Two of the most prominent musical events of the late season in Buffalo will be the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to take place at Convention Hall on Monday evening, Feb. 19, and the joint recital by Henri Marteau and Jean Gerardy, to take place at Convention Hall on Monday evening, March 19.

It was a great thing for Buffalo to secure the Boston Symphony Orchestra for a second concert, the only city in this section so favored, and the programme, to be announced next week in all probability, will be of modern music, mainly made up of Wagnerian numbers.

In the meantinme, before the public sale of seats begins, reservations may be made through Mrs. Mai Davis Smith, 36 Irving Place.

As for Marteau and Gerardy, the event will be one to be long remembered in the musical annals of Buffalo. The coming of either artist would be noteworthy—how much greater the charm when the entire programme will be presented by the great French violinist and the famous Belgian cellist! Hearing both at the same recital, it is difficult to determine which is the greater. Both are magnetic, versatile, brilliant, temperamental; both possess remarkable technique, combined with originality of interpretation.

Without question, this will be one of the most beautiful and artistic recitals of the prsent season.

Marteau is due to arrive in this country this week. He is booked for the following appearances in New York: with the Philharmonic Society; the Boston Symphony Orchestra; with the Metropolitan Orchestra for two Sunday night concerts; at Carnegie Hall for two recitals with Gerardy, and with the New York Symphony Orchestra.

POST
WASHINGTON, D. C
JAN 23 1906

SYMPHONY QUARTET CONCERT.

Boston Organization Gives Delightful Affair at New Willard.

The Boston Symphony Quartet gave the second of its series of concerts last evening at the New Willard. Miss Susan Metcalf, the soprano, scored a great success and was repeatedly encored in her rendition of selections from Handel, Mozart, Schubert, and Brahms.

The audience was a representative one, some of those present being Mrs. Wallace Radcliff, Percival Gassett, Dr. and Mrs. Bretlzer, Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Evans Greene, Dr. and Mrs. Harding, Mr. and Mrs. Clarence Purley, Mr. Edwin L. Wilson, Miss Edith Morgan, Miss Alice Stevens, Mrs. Coyle, Mrs. Hunt Slater, Mr. Frank Reeside, Prof. and Miss Kaspar, Mrs. Edith Anderson, Miss Alice Burbage, Miss Caroline Haynes, Mr. and Mrs. Malcolm Hufty, Mrs. John C. Fremont, Mr. James E. Oyster, and Mr. and Mrs. Stoddard.

Prince," calls for a brass band which should be placed at a distance from the orchestra. There was no band last night, but we doubt whether its absence was of serious injury to the music which, without patriotic or national significance to outsiders, seemed poisterously ineffective.

This music might well suit a national or local festival. It might serve as an illustrative accompaniment to tableaux vivants with gorgeous stage setting and costumes, but as concert music, with the possible exception of the second section, it is disappointing. There is nothing of the wild imagination that characterizes Glazounoff's "Stenka Rasine," which is by far the most original work of this composer that has been heard here.

The symphony was beautifully played. Mr. Gericke took great pains with "The Kremlin," and the performance was brilliant whenever the music allowed brilliance. There are apparently two Glazounoff's—the young man who had enthusiasm and glowing fancy, the composer of "Stenka Rasine," and the older man of fatal fluency who writes either sonorous ballet music or symphonies after an approved model. In the second section of "The Kremlin" there are suggestions of the earlier Glazounoff; the other movements reveal the composer of glittering and unmeasuring music for spectacular shows.

MUSIC NOTE.

At the special request of the patrons of the Symphony concerts in Cambridge, Mr. Gericke has made a change in the programme of next Thursday evening. Instead of Dvorak's overture "Nature," and Tschaikowsky's "Francesca da Rimini," Chausson's symphony in B flat major will be performed. The other numbers will be Mozart's symphony in G minor and Bach's violin concerto in A minor (Miss Clara Kloberg, violinist).

N. Y. TRIBUN
Address
Date JAN 20 1906

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Quartet will be given in Mendelssohn Hall on Tuesday evening, February 6, at 8:15. Two quartets will be played, Taniew's in B flat minor, Op. 4, and Schumann's in A major, Op. 41, No. 3. The assisting artist will be Miss Susan Metcalfe, soprano, who will sing a group of six songs.

From NEW YORK SI
Address
Date JAN 28 1906

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Quartet will be given in Mendelssohn Hall on Tuesday evening, February 6, at 8:15. Two quartets will be played, Taniew's in B flat minor, op. 4, and Schumann's in A major, op. 41, No. 3.

The assisting artist will be Miss Susan Metcalfe, soprano, who will sing a group of six songs.

ILLUSTRATED TIMES
From BUFFALO, N. Y.
Address
Date JAN 21 1906

Monday evening, February 19th, and Monday evening, March 19th, will be memorable dates in musical Buffalo, for on the February evening designated the Boston Sympothy Orchestra will give its second concert at Convention Hall and on the latter night Henri Marteau, the famous French violinist, and Jean Gerardy, the great Belgian 'cellist, will be heard in a joint recital, also at Convention Hall. While Marteau and Gerardy have been heard here separately, this will be their first appearance at a joint recital, and, hearing both, it is difficult to judge which is the greater artist. Both have created a sensation in Europe and in America and it was extremely difficult to secure a Buffalo booking, owing to the demand for the brilliant pair.

rk, 18

SUNDAY HERALD
Published Every Day in the Year.
VOL. CXIX., NO. 28.
SUNDAY, JAN. 28, 1906.

SYMPHONY PAYS HONOR TO MOZART

At 13th Concert the 150th Anniversary of Musician's Birth Is Observed—Modernity of Master's Music.

MISS MARIE HALL IN MENDELSSOHN WORK

"The Kremlin" an Unfamiliar Russian Musical Picture Is Given—Mozart "Jupiter" Symphony Heard.

The programme of the 13th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Gericke conductor, given in Symphony Hall last evening, was as follows:

Symphony in C major, "Jupiter,".....Mozart
Violin concerto.....Mendelssohn
Symphonic picture, "The Kremlin"..Glazonnoff

Mozart was born at Salzburg Jan. 27, 1756. The "Jupiter" symphony was played last night to celebrate the 150th anniversary of the birth of the wondrous boy.

It is meet and proper that such anniversaries should be celebrated with pomp and ceremony. In this life that is "so daily," as Jules Laforgue complained, a life of tomorrow rather than of today, we are inclined to patronize the ancient worthies who in their own period were very modern, or to speak jauntily of them as bores, with their works of "only historical interest." Mozart has not escaped. Many concert-goers yawn at his name and wonder why such men as Richard Strauss and Vincent d'Indy can praise him with glowing cheeks. They suspect this attribute of worship to be a pose. Remind them of the fact that to such widely different characters as Rossini, Chopin, Tschaikowsky, Brahms, the musician of musicians was Mozart, and they say lightly, "There's no accounting for tastes; surely you do not pretend to maintain that Mozart is a man of this generation."

No, Mozart was neither a symbolist nor a pessimist. He was not a translator of literature, sculpture, or painting into music. His imagination was not fired by a metaphysical treatise. He simply wrote music which came into his head and disquieted him until it was jotted down on paper. He did not go about nervously seeking for ideas. His music is never the passionate cry, never the wild shriek of a racked soul. His music is never hysterical, it is never morbid. It is seldom emotional, as we necessarily and unhappily understand that word today. Perhaps for these reasons it is still modern, immortal and not merely on account of the long and exquisite melodic line, fitting, inevitable background, delicate coloring. Music that is only the true voice of a particular generation is moribund as soon as it is born.

Not long ago in Paris the G minor symphony of Mozart and Debussy's prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun" were played at the same concert, and Mr. Louis Laloy, a bitter foe of formulas, a singularly sensitive and aggressive radical in his tastes and opinions, was struck by a certain artistic similarity in the two works that are of a different character, for the symphony is purely abstract and the prelude is descriptive. He found a similarity in the "candid grace of inspiration, in the natural logic of the thought," and also in the quality of tonal effects and in the orchestral color, "which is all luminous, an orchestra in which not a note is lost, where everything has its value and charms the ear before it speaks to the heart; divine sportiveness, paradisaical visions, music full of the sun and of enchantment." And he asked this significant question: "Is not the purest art that which ignores all suffering?"

In this country we do not know Mozart's music in its perfection. The three operas that are performed are heard in a huge theatre where the charm of the music quickly evaporates, where the musical fluid cannot enwrap the hearer. "Don Giovanni," "The Marriage of Figaro," "The Magic Flute," should be performed in a small opera house with a little, but careful chosen, orchestra, with singers of sensuous voices trained admirably in the old style, with a stage so arranged that there need not be tedious waits between groups of arias or ensembles. The symphonies are played in vast concert halls by swollen orchestras, with wood-wind instruments doubled in the hope to balance the force of strings. Only the chamber music of Mozart is heard under favorable conditions. And yet how potent, how irresistible is Mozart's music a century after it occurred to him.

Think of the men and women, mere creatures of a legend or a librettist, who are now flesh and blood, who are better known to us, through Mozart's musical characterization, than are our highly respectable neighbors in the block. Donna Anna, the most superb woman in all opera; Donna Elvira, Zerlina, the heroic Don Giovanni, whose true character is questioned as eagerly as that of Hamlet; the Countess and Susanna and Cherubino—compare Mozart's Page with the Cherubino of Beaumarchais—that jealous and intriguing gentleman, the Count, Antonio, the gardner; Pamina, Papageno. Then there are the two Coquettes with their delicious music in "Cosi fan tutte"—an opera, alas, that is not in the repertory of our opera companies. Even the more fantastical creatures, the statue of the Commander with his tread, that strikes to the stoutest soul; the Queen of [illegible] with her attendants—they are so fantastical that they are real. [illegible] them. We know them by stage [illegible] ters or is absolute as in the three [illegible] symphonies and the chamber works, is as the music on Prospero's isle: "Sounds and sweet airs that give delight and hurt not." The analyst may find pleasure in praising the unsurpassable workmanship, which is akin to the spontaneity of natural phenomena; he may marvel at the simplicity of plan and expression; the simplicity that is the despair of interpreters, for it is the touchstone of their own art or artificiality—and Mozart himself, when he told his Emperor that his opera had just the right number of notes anticipated the judgment of time; but he is still far from explaining the peculiar and ineffable tenderness of this music that caresses and soothes and comforts.

The serenity, the classic suggestion of emotion without the distortion that accompanies passion would grace a tragedy by Sophocles or a comedy by Congreve. Mozart's music is essentially Grecian, yet now and then it reminds one of Watteau. Hazlett said of it that it should seem to come from the air and return to it; but he characterized it with finer appreciation when he said without mention of Mozart's name; "Music is color without form; a soul without a body; a mistress whose face is veiled; an invisible goddess." For form with Mozart is the form of fire, which, according to Plotinus, surpasses other bodies in beauty "because it obtains the order of form; for it is the most subtle of all, bordering as it were on an incorporeal nature." And for this reason Debussy is the spiritual brother of Mozart, moderns both, yet classics.

Miss Marie Hall made her first appearance at these concerts. She played the too familiar concerto of Mendelssohn, although, as we are informed, she would fain have played Tschaikowsky's, for virtuosos have their specialties. Miss Hall has given two recitals here, but she was heard last evening to much greater advantage, for, in addition to certain technical accomplishments, she displayed an individuality that was not before this so fully recognized. There was an indisputable charm in her performance, nor was the fascination merely in the quality of tone.

She was not so successful in the andante as in the first movement and in the finale, and, curiously enough, there was more sentiment in the song episodes of the first movement as she played them than in the deliberately sentimental andante. Yet she was individual throughout, nor was there, as is so often the case with young violinists, especially women, the constant suggestion of a pupil just escaped from the master and endeavoring to follow faithfully his rules and precepts. Miss Hall gave much pleasure and the audience was correspondingly grateful.

Glazounoff's "Kremlin" was performed here for the first time and we have no record of a previous performance in this country. The composer calls his work a symphonic picture. There are three sections. The first, "Popular Feast," might serve as music for a spectacular ballet. The second, "In the Monastery," is by far the most effective section, by reason of its oriental ecclesiastical character, the solemnity of its chants, the orchestral effects which are at times bizarre. The score of the third movement, "Entrance and Meeting of the Prince," calls for a brass band which should be placed at a distance from the orchestra. There was no band last night, but we doubt whether its absence was of serious injury to the music which, without patriotic or national significance to outsiders, seemed boisterously ineffective.

This music might well suit a national or local festival. It might serve as an illustrative accompaniment to tableaux vivants with gorgeous stage setting and costumes, but as concert music, with the possible exception of the second section, it is disappointing. There is nothing of the wild imagination that characterizes Glazounoff's "Stenka Rasine," which is by far the most original work of this composer that has been heard here.

The symphony was beautifully played. Mr. Gericke took great pains with "The Kremlin," and the performance was brilliant whenever the music allowed brilliance. There are apparently two Glazounoff's—the young man who had enthusiasm and glowing fancy, the composer of "Stenka Rasine," and the older man of fatal fluency who writes either sonorous ballet music or symphonies after an approved model. In the second section of "The Kremlin" there are suggestions of the earlier Glazounoff; the other movements reveal the composer of glittering and unmeasuring music for spectacular shows.

MUSIC NOTE.

At the special request of the patrons of the Symphony concerts in Cambridge, Mr. Gericke has made a change in the programme of next Thursday evening. Instead of Dvorak's overture "Nature," and Tschaikowsky's "Francesca da Rimini," Chausson's symphony in B flat major will be performed. The other numbers will be Mozart's symphony in G minor and Bach's violin concerto in A minor (Miss Clara Kloberg, violinist).

POST
WASHINGTON, D. C.
JAN 23 1906

SYMPHONY QUARTET CONCERT.

Boston Organization Gives Delightful Affair at New Willard.

The Boston Symphony Quartet gave the second of its series of concerts last evening at the New Willard. Miss Susan Metcalf, the soprano, scored a great success and was repeatedly encored in her rendition of selections from Handel, Mozart, Schubert, and Brahms.

The audience was a representative one, some of those present being Mrs. Wallace Radcliff, Percival Gassett, Dr. and Mrs. Bretizer, Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Evans Greene, Dr. and Mrs. Harding, Mr. and Mrs. Clarence Purley, Mr. Edwin L. Wilson, Miss Edith Morgan, Miss Alice Stevens, Mrs. Coyle, Mrs. Hunt Slater, Mr. Frank Reeside, Prof. and Miss Kaspar, Mrs. Edith Anderson, Miss Alice Burbage, Miss Caroline Haynes, Mr. and Mrs. Malcolm Hufty, Mrs. John C. Fremont, Mr. James E. Oyster, and Mr. and Mrs. Stoddard.

TIMES
WASHINGTON, D. C.
JAN 22 1906

FINE ENSEMBLE PLAYING BY SYMPHONY QUARTET

Just how two sentiments in chamber music reading can be presented with musicianship and intelligence was demonstrated by the Boston Symphony quartet at the New Willard last night. This excellent organization first gave the beautiful Tschaikowsky creation for two violins, viola, and cello in F major. The unity of conception as displayed by the four men was delightful.

First, the poetic adagio, then the galoping allegro, and best of all, the andante, which, by the way, was the feature effort of the evening, were given that romantic interpretation and Slavic dash necessary to make it effective. In this number, Emile Ferir, viola, did splendid work, the tones produced by him in instances being of the old d'gamba order.

The quartet's concluding number was the well-known work of Schumann, in A major, and here again the players were most successful. Particular mention might be made of the third (adagio) movement where the ensemble work of the quartet almost made the Te Deum sing itself.

The soloist, and a good one too, was Miss Susan Metcalfe, soprano. Instead of attempting vocal heroics, the singer gave a series of appealing German works well suited to her nicely schooled voice. Her voice, with all the possibilities of a mezzo, was heard to best advantage in Brahms' 'Die Meinacht.' Miss Metcalfe was compelled to respond to an encore. She was successfully accompanied by Mrs. George Collins.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
JAN 21 1906

Boston Symphony Quartet.

With an attractive program and a distinguished singer new to Washington, the Boston Symphony Quartet will visit this city again tomorrow evening, and give its second concert in the ball room of the New Willard. The quartet will play two works, Tschaikowsky's quartet in F major, op. 22, and Schumann's quartet in A major, op. 41. The recently published letters of Tschaikowsky reveal that the quartet in F major was one of the greatest favorites with the composer and one of the first works by him which was accepted with unquestioned approval by his colleagues in Moscow.

Miss Susan Metcalfe, the singer, is a young American, who is well started on a career of promise. Four years ago, utterly unknown, she made a modest debut in New York as an interpreter of songs. Today her recitals in New York, London and Paris are ranked among the most important events of their kind in the course of a season. Miss Metcalfe is said to be endowed with a rare combination of voice, intelligence, taste and musicianship, as well as an interesting personality.

The program is as follows: (1) Tschaikowsky, quartet in F major, op. 22; (2) songs, (a) Handel, aria, "Serse;" (b) Mozart, "Das Veilchen;" (c) Schubert, "Der Neugierge;" (d) Schubert, "Ungeduld;" (e) Brahms, "Die Mainacht;" (f) Brahms, "Liebliche Wangen." (3) Schumann, quartet in A major, op. 41. Accompanist, Mrs. George Collins.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
NEWS
BUFFALO, N. Y.
JAN 21 1906

Two of the most prominent musical events of the late season in Buffalo will be the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to take place at Convention Hall on Monday evening, Feb. 19, and the joint recital by Henri Marteau and Jean Gerardy, to take place at Convention Hall on Monday evening, March 19.

It was a great thing for Buffalo to secure the Boston Symphony Orchestra for a second concert, the only city in this section so favored, and the programme, to be announced next week in all probability, will be of modern music, mainly made up of Wagnerian numbers.

In the meantinme, before the public sale of seats begins, reservations may be made through Mrs. Mai Davis Smith, 26 Irving Place.

As for Marteau and Gerardy, the event will be one to be long remembered in the musical annals of Buffalo. The coming of either artist would be noteworthy—how much greater the charm when the entire programme will be presented by the great French violinist and the famous Belgian cellist! Hearing both at the same recital, it is difficult to determine which is the greater. Both are magnetic, versatile, brilliant, temperamental; both possess remarkable technique, combined with originality of interpretation.

Without question, this will be one of the most beautiful and artistic recitals of the prsent season.

Marteau is due to arrive in this country this week. He is booked for the following appearances in New York: with the Philharmonic Society; the Boston Symphony Orchestra; with the Metropolitan Orchestra for two Sunday night concerts; at Carnegie Hall for two recitals with Gerardy, and with the New York Symphony Orchestra.

[157]

Washington (DC) Sunday Jan 23 1906

FINE ENSEMBLE PLAYING BY SYMPHONY QUARTE

Just how two sentiments in chamber music reading can be presented with musicianship and intelligence was demonstrated by the Boston Symphony quartet at the New Willard last night. This excellent organization first gave the beautiful Tschaikowsky creation for two violins, viola, and cello in F major. The unity of conception as displayed by the four men was delightful.

First, the poetic adagio, then the galoping allegro, and best of all, the andante, which, by the way, was the feature effort of the evening, were given that romantic interpretation and Slavic dash necessary to make it effective. In this number, Emile Ferir, viola, did splendid work, the tones produced by him in instances being of the old d'gamba order.

The quartet's concluding number was the well-known work of Schumann, in A major, and here again the players were most successful. Particular mention might be made of the third (adagio) movement where the ensemble work of the quartet almost made the Te Deum sing itself.

The soloist, and a good one too, was Miss Susan Metcalfe, soprano. Instead of attempting vocal heroics, the singer gave a series of appealing German works well suited to her nicely schooled voice. Her voice, with all the possibilities of a mezzo, was heard to best advantage in Brahms' 'Die Meinacht.' Miss Metcalfe was compelled to respond to an encore. She was successfully accompanied by Mrs. George Collins.

[illegible]

Address [illegible]

[illegible]

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Quartet will be given in Mendelssohn Hall on Tuesday evening, February 6, at 8:15. Two quartets will be played, Taniew's in B flat minor, Op. 4, and Schumann's in A major, Op. 41, No. 3. The assisting artist will be Miss Susan Metcalfe, soprano, who will sing a group of six songs.

From NEW YORK SU

Address [illegible]

Date [illegible]

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Quartet will be given in Mendelssohn Hall on Tuesday evening, February 6, at 8:15. Two quartets will be played, Taniew's in B flat minor, op. 4, and Schumann's in A major, op. 41, No. 3.

The assisting artist will be Miss Susan Metcalfe soprano, who will sing a group of six songs.

ILLUSTRATED TIMES

From [illegible] BUFFALO, N. Y.

Address [illegible]

Date JAN 21 1906

Monday evening, February 19th, and Monday evening, March 19th, will be memorable dates in musical Buffalo, for on the February evening designated the Boston Sympothy Orchestra will give its second concert at Convention Hall and on the latter night Henri Marteau, the famous French violinist, and Jean Gerardy, the great Belgian 'cellist, will be heard in a joint recital, also at Convention Hall. While Marteau and Gerardy have been heard here separately, this will be their first appearance at a joint recital, and, hearing both, it is difficult to judge which is the greater artist. Both have created a sensation in Europe and in America and it was extremely difficult to secure a Buffalo booking, owing to the demand for the brilliant pair.

Boston Transcript
324 Washington Street, Boston, Mass.
SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 3, 1906

IN THE WORLD OF MUSIC

A SYMPHONY BY MAHLER FOR THE FIRST TIME

A Notable Performance at the Symphony Concert—Mahler's Traits as the Music Revealed Them—His Unique Command of Instrumentation and His Use of It—Concerts and Recitals of Next Week—The Cecilia's Programme—Coming Concerts

The Mahler whom we in Boston heard yesterday in the first of his symphonies to be performed here seemed hardly the Mahler whose music has been so eagerly championed and so bitterly condemned these last eight years in Germany and in Austria. Audiences have hissed and squalled at one or another of his five symphonies—they can still on occasion take their music very demonstratively in Germany—and audiences have applauded and cheered them. Some reviewers have slighted them and scorned the composer. Others have extolled them rapturously, and placed Mahler himself almost side by side with Richard Strauss. There have been Mahler "banquets," where the chief course was vehement and laudatory speechmaking, and there have been angry protests to every conductor who has ventured, if only for curiosity's sake, to put a symphony by Mahler on his programmes. As for the musical world outside of Germany and Austria, it has been told to weariness that these symphonies were of extraordinary length and that they required extraordinary forces to perform them. There are more important and interesting things about them. But the fifth of Mahler's symphonies, that Mr. Gericke put on his programme, hardly bore out even these premonitory warnings. Report had declared that to perform it required an hour and a half. In fact, it lasted fifty-five minutes, perhaps ten or fifteen minutes longer than does an ordinary symphony of large dimensions, but it held the interest of the audience to the end, with fewer desertions than are usual at the afternoon concerts and with no visible signs of weariness. The introductory pages of some of Mahler's earlier symphonies do ask an enormous and intricate orchestral and choral apparatus. In this fifth he has been content with a full modern orchestra, ample in its wood-winds and horns and in its subordinate instruments. Perhaps the new version of the score which Mahler himself prepared only two months ago and which Mr. Gericke used accounts for these surprises.

Moreover, while the symphony was steadily interesting and now and then boldly individual and strikingly impressive, there was nothing portentous, so far as a single hearing might disclose, in its matter or its manner. In no sense did it seem "epoch-making," "revolutionary," "gigantic"—we are quoting assorted German epithets—or "impudent." Like most ultra-modern and highly individual music, it will provoke very different opinions in different hearers; but it warrants very scantily either the ecstatic admiration or the savage attacks that it and Mahler's other symphonies have excited and maintained oversea. Perhaps from openness of mind, much hearing in sympathetic performances and from an even and discriminating musical temper, we at the Symphony concerts have come to take the ways of ultra-modern music more or less for granted. Usually they interest us; sometimes they move us in their kind—yet they seem to madden some of our brethren—and no farther away than New York.

Mahler, for example, used the sanctified symphonic form very freely and loosely. He condenses or extends it; he modifies, varies and reshapes it according to his imaginative purpose, ideas and sensations and the musical expression that he would give them. But the Medean and Persian lawgivers did not fix the symphonic form unalterably. (A few hidebound pedants have done that in their stead.) And the beginning and the end of a form, in music or in any other art, is to give fullest and clearest expression to the individual ideas and imaginings behind. If the composer or the artist in general have them in him to express, he will shape the form to his needs, while the significance and the power of these ideas and the beauty and appeal of these imaginings will justify all his freedom. Contrast the eloquence and range of the later quartets of Beethoven, for example, with the ordered tinkle of Haydn's. Yet both are nominally of the same musical form. So Mahler, in this fifth symphony has moulded prescribed forms to his intellectual and emotional purpose. Sometimes he departs far and freely from them. Sometimes he follows them more or less closely. Do his ideas and imaginings and the expression of them justify the departure? The expression, as it seems to us, certainly does. It is something—nowadays, when we are all restless—to be musically interesting in any form for fifty-five consecutive minutes.

Mahler's themes in his fifth symphony and in his fourth which was played in New York fifteen months ago, lack, like most themes in ultra-modern music, frankly melodic character. They do not sing as Mozart's or Schubert's sing. They are the embodiment of thoughtfully evolved musical ideas rather than the impulsive upspringings of spontaneous musical temperament. They have not the splendid finality and inevitability of Beethoven's, for example. We moderns—and Mahler with the rest of us, hollow-eyed enthusiast though he is—do not affirm anything with such majestic surety. Mahler's themes, like Strauss's in his "tone-poems" or d'Indy's in his symphonies, are the fruit of intellectual process and selection for expressive ends. Strauss's are individually poignant and acrid; d'Indy's are individually fine and haunting; Mahler's, in this symphony have an individual bigness and breadth that promise large, fruitful and moving development and expression. They sound like the themes of so argument and illustration than [illegible], and especially d'Indy theirs. Rather, he varies them and reconstructs. He divides and subdivides them, so to say, and treats each fraction with ingenuity and imagination. Sometimes he seizes a suggestion buried in them; again he pursues some remote modulation; yet again—for the music is full of such contrasts—he is content with some almost obvious implication in them. In this treatment of his themes he is masterful and fertile. His polyphony seemed hardly as intricate as Strauss's or as subtle as d'Indy's, but it is as firm and pliant of intellectual and technical grip and as unflagging in invention. Like them he catches and shapes new and strange harmonies—sometimes irresistibly. If the man were less sincere, he would seem now and then to pursue the bizarre for its own sake—to make the Philistines sit up champing, even as Strauss likes to make them. But Mahler is of another cast of mind. To himself—and to the world, if he chose—he can probably give a definite reason for his most daring and perplexing modulations. However much we that listen fail to grasp their purpose, that purpose was clearly in his mind.

Not from Mahler's themes or from his treatment or them, still less from his variations of established forms, spring what power and beauty there are in his music as this fifth symphony disclosed it. Their source, as it seemed equally in the immediate listening and in the subsequent reflection, is a command of instrumentation and an imagination in it that is unique and almost marvellous. Schubert's passion found voice in his melodies; Beethoven's in the magnificent march of his symphonic movements; Brahms's in austere contemplation. d'Indy's finds its voice in fine and disembodied subtleties of tone; Strauss's in the painting and the unrolling of superb musical canvases. There is passion in Mahler too, hot, deep, passion. There is intellectual force as well. His instrumentation is the voice of both. Thereby he is a twentieth-century Berlioz.

This instrumentation is not merely the technical mastery, the acquired suggestiveness of the practised, meditative and watchful conductor. It seldom betrays the careful reflection behind and the ingenious calculation of the effect before as Strauss's often does. It is not, seemingly, the result of long striving and searching and polishing for the apt, the precise, the ultimate instrumental word as is d'Indy's and Debussy's. Doubtless all these processes have contributed to it, but Mahler does not often let our ears hear them. Rather in him is something very like a genius for instrumentation, for the power of it, for the beauty of it. Time and again, in the fifth symphony, he makes his instrumentation amazingly intricate, yet the euphony of it delights the ear. Equally he can give it a naive and lovely simplicity. He can make a single instrument or a group of instruments flash like tongues of fire. Some of his instrumental backgrounds are like tonal mosaics of very delicate and wholly harmonious colors and of perfect jointure. There are details in his instrumentation that sound almost as inspirations. He has a painter's sense of comparative instrumental "values." His themes and his treatment of them take significance to the mind, shape to the fancy and appeal to the emotions chiefly through the instrumental coloring of them. The rhythmic depth and force, "as of a funeral march" in the first movement of the symphony; the rhythmic charm and caress of the laendler that makes the third; the impetuous restlessness of the second; the lyric sweetness of the fourth; the exhilarating sweep of the last, lie chiefly, as it seems to us, in the power and the beauty—almost the genius—of the instrumentation. By it, more than by any other capacity of music, he discloses ideas, imparts mood, compasses atmosphere, clothes his imaginings. What these would be naked the sympathetic listener neither knows nor cares. The instrumental investituve is enough. Often it is finely poignant or vividly pictorial. Almost always it is irresistibly sensuous. Of such instrumentation our conductor and our orchestra are past masters. They overcame the endless difficulties with which Mahler, who seems to write for an orchestra of Mahlers, achieves his end. Yet we that listened barely saw or felt them.

We have written of Mahler's symphony as of "absolute" music, because it is as such that most of those that listen to it are likely to hear it. "May programmes perish from the earth" was his toast at a supper in his honor. Yet he made them, though without detail, or permitted others to make them, and with infinite detail, for some of his earlier symphonies. There is a little "programmatic" suggestion in the few directions to conductor and band ("Stormily restless—with utmost vehemence," for example), that he prefixes to each movement of this fifth symphony. No doubt there was a programme—or more properly a definite succession of poetic ideas—in his mind as he wrote. There is in the last analysis, as Mr. Newman was saying a few weeks ago in this column, behind all music that is emotionally potent. In his fourth symphony Mahler was indeed writing measurably delineative music. In the fifth there is no hint of such purpose that the average imaginative listener can readily detect. No more is it music that would suggest the stress and strain and turnings and twistings of some intellectual conflict of ideas as does d'Indy's in the symphony that he conducted here. Mahler's is music of mood and passion. Often it summons the power and the beauty of ordered, imaginative and impassioned sound. Doing so, as often it kindles the mind and stirs the emotions. Thus it brings intense sensations. Within the limits palpably set by the composer, the listeners may give those sensations what color and significance they will.

H. T. P.

/ / + / /

Concerts Next Week

Next Friday and Saturday Mr. Gericke completes, for the time, the notable series of large ultra-modern compositions that he has been playing at the Symphony concerts for the last month. He began, after [illegible] to other cities, with [illegible] symphony. Last week came Glazounoff's tone-poem, "The Kremlin." This week we are hearing Mahler's fifth symphony, and for the fifteenth pair of concerts d'Indy's first symphony, "On a mountain air," stands on the programme. It runs in three movements, and it adds a piano, for which the composer has written an elaborate part, to the usual instruments. The symphony is less intricate and intellectual, more readily comprehensible and of more sensuous appeal than the second, which Mr. d'Indy himself conducted for us last December. Mr. Heinrich Gebhard, of our resident virtuosi, takes the pianoforte part in it. The programme begins with Haydn's symphony in C major, and between the two symphonies comes Saint-Saëns's concerto in A minor, for violoncello and orchestra. In it, Elsa Ruegger, the Belgian 'cellist, pleasantly remembered from her previous visit to America, plays the solo instrument. The following week the orchestra pays its monthly visit to New York and the cities southward to Washington and westward to Buffalo.

A serenade (Op. 77A) for flute, violin and viola, by Max Reger, will be played, probably for the first time in America, by Mr. Maquarre, Mr. Hess and Mr. Férir, at the fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Quartet on Monday evening at eight, in Jordan Hall. Thanks to Mr. Sharpe, we in Boston could hear a score of Reger's songs last November. Now, thanks to Mr. Hess, we are to hear a fragment of his chamber music and a very recent one. Reger is the most discussed composer of the hour in Germany and much has been written there of his chamber music. In another column, by way of introduction in his serenade, we are printing today a part of such an article from a German musical journal. To recall the Mozart anniversary of last week, the programme begins with his quartet in C major, and for ending comes Brahms's early quartet in A major (Op. 26) for piano, violin, viola and 'cello, with Mr. Stasny playing the piano part.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.

Beethoven—Egmont Overture.
Schumann—Piano Concerto in A minor.
Mr. Harold Bauer, Pianist.
Mahler—Symphony in C sharp minor. No. 5.

If "Freedom shrieked when Kosziusko fell" (and possibly he fell upon her toes) she also shrieked in the "Egmont Overture" when the Netherlands won their liberty. Beethoven was a democrat to the heart's core, and always at his strongest when writing about the emancipation of mankind, as witness the finale of the 9th symphony and this overture.

One felt the advance in orchestration in listening to this overture, for when it was written the first violins arose in indignation against the passage near the end which took them up to four-lined "C," while at this concert the passage was as easy as possible for our musicians. The piccolo, however, might have screamed a little louder in those final whip-snap runs. But the performance was on the whole an excellent one and the Gericke reading most earnest and unaffected.

Mr. Hess now took charge of the orchestra and gave an excellent reading of the Schumann concerto. With Mr. Harold Bauer as the pianist one need scarcely be told of the result,—it was something glorious. Yet the orchestration is almost infantile compared with the great modern works; but Brahms and Schumann, with their monochromatic tone-coloring tower above Mahler or Berlioz, because great musical thoughts are always more powerful than great musical scoring.

To us this Schumann concerto was one of the greatest musical delights we have had in a long time, and the public seemed to be of the same mind, for there was deep attention and frenzied applause.

Mr. Bauer played the work in strong and manly fashion; there was more of the Florestan than the Eusebius side of Schumann in the interpretation, but that was no fault, and there was sufficient of romance in the second movement. There was a surety in the playing of this great soloist which had its peculiar charm, and the climaxes were worked up with splendid breadth.

The cadenza of the first movement was superbly played. Altogether, therefore, the work, the conductor, and the soloist, deserved the very great applause which followed the end; Mr. Bauer was recalled over and over again. Then the audience rested and tried to gather strength for the Mahler symphony.

The fifth symphony of the prolific Mahler made the public sit up. No one could drink it in with dreamy delight or in a relaxed frame of mind. Yet it was intensely dramatic and deeply interesting. Boston owes hearty thanks to Mr. Gericke for this introduction to one of the most significant works of the present. It displays a distinctly greater command of thematic material than can be found in the D'Indy symphony,—No. 2.

If Mahler is occasionally dissonant, frequently complex, we feel that the idea presented sometimes demands this expression; yet this complexity is often carried too far. Like Strauss, Mahler can write beautiful melody when he wishes, and there is something more tangible in this symphony than in many of the celebrated puzzles of the modern school.

The opening movement with its Funeral March was tremendously impressive, stronger than anything that we can remember in the most modern school except the "Death and Transfiguration" of Strauss. Even Franck's symphony (the very best of the latterday French school) paled beside it, while the other Gallic productions simply shrivelled up. It began with a figure that recalled the fanfare of Mendelssohn's Wedding March, but it soon struck out in an individual path. The solo trumpet was constantly at work and Mr. Kloepfel played nobly.

[illegible] was immediately [illegible] composer did not deliberately [illegible] ugliness or ascetic [illegible] ing melodies and [illegible] monized in mellifluous [illegible] modern ascetics would avoid as [illegible] were poison. The wild tumult and [illegible] combat that followed was very impressive, and had the composer revealed a definite plot (a "programme-music" story) one can imagine that the movement would at once capture the public.

But Mahler prefers not to give a definite picture; he wishes each auditor to thrill with his own chosen emotion; he writes "absolute music," in which we are at liberty to wreathe our own fancies around the tones. Yet every part of the symphony suggests some striking and dramatic plot. Beethoven once wrote at the head of the first great piece of programme music—the Pastoral symphony,—"Mehr ein Bild der Empfindungen als Malerei" ("more a picture of impressions than a painting") but this "Mahlerei" suggests both.

After the great threnody with which the work began there came a glorious theme upon the cello. But now the faults of the Mahler system began to reveal themselves. The movement was prolix. There were so many sharp contrasts that they began to pall. The orchestra alternately roared and whispered to the audience. The movement was constantly theatrical without a theatrical plot to sustain it. It was fragmentary, and even the most striking ideas were not carried to any discernible conclusion.

Yet there was much skill displayed everywhere; there was canonic effect, contrapuntal treatment of most learned kind, and, after a long series of explosions, there came a grand chorale, or at least the outline of one. The movement was played with a superb abandon, and the "nuances" which are so important, were given flawlessly. We begin to suspect Mr. Gericke of orchestral greatness. He has never risen to such a height before, exquisite as his detail work has been. The whole performance was a great triumph for him and his orchestra.

The next movement, a Scherzo (but with 2 Trios) showed the merits and defects of Mahler vividly. There were delicious dance themes that were smothered in complexity. One melody overlaid another in such a way that they all seemed to neutralize each other.

Again the contrasts were most theatrical and sometimes seemingly uncalled for. It was as if all the dancers in the ball-room had cramps. It was difficult to perform and difficult to follow. A little further along this path and all of our performers and some of the auditors will need to seek some Sanatorium for mental repose.

The 1st and 4th movements were the most intelligible and most beautiful parts of the long work. The latter, an Adagietto for strings, gave a little repose to the overworked audience. The exquisite melody of the violins, taken in augmentation in the violoncellos, was a touch of real music, as we understand it, and from the first notes to the long-drawn-out appoggiatura at the close, there was evidence of ability to compose in the most intelligible and charming manner.

The finale gave evidence of contrapuntal skill above everything else. There was a tremendous amount of fugal writing that made the violins earn their salary thoroughly. Amid all the complexity there was a rustic flavor that was not without its effect.

Mahler here seems to be a second Bruckner (who was his teacher) plus theatrical touches which are not to be found in the older composer's works. Yet we gathered more inspiration from the simply scored concerto of Schumann, with its direct appeal to heart and brain, than from all this tremendous effort of a contrapuntal and orchestral giant.

We feel as if Music were upon the wrong path. The whole effort of the ultra-modern composer seems merely to discompose the auditor; to puzzle, to weary, to crush him. In the older days Music was a divine stimulant to what was best in him, to exalt him, and sometimes even to please and refresh him. That Mahler can write beautiful themes is evident. That he chooses to treat them with the utmost complexity, is, we think, a defect. What is the sense of using Music to make life so hard for the orchestral player, for the public, and for the reviewer?

Louis C. Elson.

The Boston Post
The Representative Democratic Paper of New England
Issued Sunday by Post Publishing Co.
FEBRUARY 4, 1906. NO. 5; VOL. 39

14TH SYMPHONY CONCERT

Harold Bauer, pianist, was the soloist of the 14th Symphony concert last evening, and the programme was as follows:

Overture, "Egmont".....Beethoven
Concerto for pianoforte, op. 54.....Schumann
Symphony No. 5.....Mahler

The feature of the concert apart from the soloist was the first performance in this city of Gustav Mahler's fifth symphony. The composer is one much discussed in Europe at the present time, and he has written many large works for orchestra in the most ultra-modern spirit. The symphony, so designated, but it is one in name only, is a series of musical pictures in three parts. The first in two sections, one a funeral march, a most effective, yet fantastic bit of orchestral scoring. The second section is more vague, and is much less of interest. Part two is a scherzo that in portions suggests a waltz movement that is very "taking," and if carried out in this vein would become immensely popular. But the end of this movement is not so satisfactory, although scored in a highly original manner.

Part three has for its first section an adagietto that is the gem of the work, melodic and highly poetic in conception. A superb bit of orchestral tone color. The finale begins with a fugal exposition of an interesting theme and the contrapuntal development is exceedingly clever, leading to a most brilliant climax. As a whole, the symphony impressed greatly and the performance was masterly in every way.

Mr. Bauer was heard at his best in the poetic concerto of Schumann, and the work received an interpretation that was memorable, being also an ideal exhibition of subjective pianism. The pianist received an immense ovation and numerous recalls, and he deserved them fully.

Miss Elsa Ruegger, 'cellist, will be the soloist at the rehearsal and concert this coming week.

SYMPHONY GIVEN

...t Performance Here of His ...ollossal Work at the 14th Symphony Concert Last Evening.

A COMPOSITION OF LENGTH AND STRENGTH

Mr. Bauer's Delightful Performance of Schumann's Piano Concerto "The Pipe of Desire" at Popular Prices.

The programme of the 14th Symphony ...ncert, Mr. Gericke conductor, given ...st night in Symphony Hall, was as ...llows:

...ture to Goethe's "Egmont"...Beethoven ... in A minor for piano...Schumann ...pony in C sharp minor, No. 5..Mahler

...is concert was one of unusual in... ...Mr. Gericke conducted the great ...ure without attempting to find in ...jects that the composer did not ...ntend or contrive; he let the music ...k for itself; he did not interrupt ...ow of the main movement by ...ng deliberately the tempo at the ...ses of the heavy chords, which ... some supposed to typify the ...n Alva or Spanish oppression in ...Netherlands. There have been Ger... post-Wagner conductors who were ...offenders in this instance, Franz ...ber, for instance. Mr. Gericke ...t sentimentalize by means of im... ...nt slackening the pace and so... "interpretation" of measures ...out special significance, and thus ...his reading the more effective.

Mr. Harold Bauer gave a very musical ...d charming performance of Schu...n's concerto. There was an ex...ite sense of proportion; there was ...poetic expression and suggestion, ...d in the last movement, which is ...rhythmically often a stumbling block to ..., he played with an apparent sim...city that would have deceived any ... not acquainted with the peculiar ...culties. The concerto displayed Mr. ... at his best, and all in all his ...rmance is to be ranked with his ...erable one of Cesar Franck's quin... ...the Kneisels a few seasons ago. ...'s first symphony was pro... ...1894, if not in 1891. Each sym... ...excited in turn hot discussion. ... composer was by some hailed a ... by others he was hooked as a ... Now the term "madman," as ... one that has departed from ...ventions or invented something ... art, has lost any peculiar sig... of reproach. Disraeli frankly ... that he was on the side of the ... the student of musical history ... afford to run the risk of ... the cause of the madmen. ... his band of wild-eyed parti... pamphleteers, who, no doubt, ... done him harm. His foes have ... him. His five symphonies have ...ayed in German cities; they have ...rantically applauded and fiercely ... his first symphony has been ...n in London (1903), but no one ...portant works had been heard ...ore last week. The first ... in this country of any ... Mahler was that of the New York, in 1904. The ... performed at Cincinnati ... These performances and ... week in Boston have been ...ones in America.

...lors have had a reasonable ex... ...not producing the second and ... which demand an extraordi... ...e orchestra. The second, also, ... voices and mixed chorus; ... for a solo contralto, female ...d boy choir. The two sym... ...very long—the second con... ...and 40 minutes. Further... ...al difficulties are great.

...Mr. Gericke for ... Mahler's Work.

...fore deserves hearty ... Mahler's ... ...ing it with the in... ...ion that is char... ...The production ... such huge dimensions, a ... in structure and in its ..., does not contribute nec... ... immediate popularity of ... There are concertgoers ... like to hear new music ... makes a direct appeal to them ... are obvious, familiar, ap... They do not wish to exert ...ually at a concert. ... they are for a jig or ... or they sleep. Or ... scraps of pedantic in... ... they turn deaf ears to that ... as did the Masteringers ...ther's free rhapsodic song. ... sometimes dimly con... ...is something in the ... strangely beautiful or ... in the course of time ... understand and enjoy. ...is piqued at the mo... ...either leave the hall, ...rm their suspicions, ... in sullen silence to ... as well as disapproval. ... and the orchestra have ... utmost patience and ... Extra rehearsals ... The hearer jauntily ...judgment: 'The sym... ...n anything. I ... out of it. Why ... stuff on the ... fair to com... ...all re... ...sym...

...ther of losing their popularity.

—o—

...he fourth Boston Symphony concert ...ill be given in the Academy of Music on ...Monday evening, February 12, with Elsa ...Ruegger, the Belgian violoncellist, as solo... ...ist. The orchestra is to play the "Eg... ...mont" overture of Beethoven, and Gustav ...Mahler's fifth symphony, which, as re... ...vised by the composer, was performed for ...the first time in this country at Boston, ...recently. Miss Ruegger's number will be ...Saint Saens's concerto in ... 1...

---

relief to the writer, but they do not convince the reader who had not the opportunity of being moved. It should also be remembered that no two persons, intelligent and sensitive though they may be, hear music in one and the same way. Each is "reminded by the instruments," but that which is awakened in the breast of each is seldom, if ever, the same.

Mahler has been reproached for his poverty of thematic invention. The reproach, as far as this symphony is concerned, is unjust. The simplicity of some of the themes is the simplicity that marks genius. The rich beauty of some of them is enhanced by the spontaneity. The dramatic stab of other themes is equally spontaneous. Nor is there any suspicion of insincerity in the treatment of these themes. Whether the mood be one of grim resignation, wild despair, naive joy in mere existence, contemplation of beauty in nature or in woman, or whooping exultation, it is never feigned, never forced. The hearer knows that Mahler himself had these mighty or whirring or calm and solemn thoughts and expressed them in his own grandiose or passionate or excited manner. The personality as well as the individuality of this music is overpowering.

The reminiscence-hunter has driven the hunter after forbidden intervals and progressions out of the field, and he will find the happiness peculiar to his kind in detecting here a few measures that suggest thoughts in Beethoven's Ninth, and here a cry that sounds for a moment as though it had been wrenched from Berlioz, and there the Kundry theme from "Parsifal," but in a long work of such amazing originality in conception and execution, such reminders serve a purpose; they entertain those who are unable to find anything else in the symphony that deserves their approbation.

Orchestral technic in this period, when expression is reckoned as of more importance than thought, runs in the streets, as Goethe said of talent. There are a few passages in the symphony that are scored thickly, harshly; yet they make their way, and the instrumentation as a whole is strikingly sonorous, while there are many instances of remarkably individual orchestral expression. The finale on the whole is orchestrally perhaps the least interesting; yet the music itself is potent; it recalls that music heard by De Quincey in an opium dream, the music that suggested to him the "undulations of fast gathering tumults . . . multitudinous movements, infinite cavalcades, tread of innumerable armies." It is music of a mighty preparation; nor does the choral at the end disappoint the expectation.

Music That Is Human Even When Most Fantastical.

This music of Mahler has blood in it. It is human even when it is most fantastical. Its extravagance in expression is titanic, but never incredible. It contains an elemental quality that is often confounded by the super-refined with coarseness; the display of native strength that alarms all feeble folk and all the genteel; this quality is found in nearly all the great in art, from Aeschylus to Thomas Hardy, from Bach to Tschaikowsky. It is never to be confounded with downright vulgarity which is always inartistic, while this peculiar coarseness is heroic whether it be found in Victor Hugo or Verdi, in Henry Fielding or in Wagner. You find it in Shakespeare, Cervantes, Rabelais. You find it in Beethoven and Michael Angelo.

This symphony has blood and tears, frantic joy and wild despair; it also has the saving quality of humor, as in the scherzo. Mahler has expressed his thoughts in a heightened musical speech of the richest harmonic, contrapuntal and orchestral vocabulary. After two hearings, it is an amazing work, full, as is nature, of inequalities, no doubt, but it is the symphony of no ordinary man and no ordinary musician. Long as it is, it rivets the attention from the beginning to the end, and last night the great majority of the audience listened gladly to a new and compelling voice.

The performance was one of extraordinary brilliance, one of which both Mr. Gericke and the orchestra may well be proud. The orchestra was one of virtuosos controlled by the intelligence and the will of a leader who had made the Symphony his own. To particularize is always invidious, yet it may be allowed for once to praise especially the manner in which the first trumpeter performed his arduous and formidable task.

Such a symphony should not be heard once and then put away for a season. It should be heard at two or three concerts in succession, and then impressions might be turned into firm convictions.

...the first performances here of a serenade for flute, violin and viola by the much discussed Max Reger. Mr. Hess lately received the music from Reger's publisher, and as it is new, its opus number being 77a, it is doubtful whether it has ever been played in this country. Practically none of Reger's instrumental music has been played in America, despite the sensation he has been making in Germany. His songs are making their way in the concert hall. Like Strauss and Mahler, Reger is a radical, and like them he is condemned by conservatives as a madman. His sinfonietta at its first performance in Berlin was both hissed and applauded.

The Hoffmann quartet on Wednesday evening will perform, with the assistance of Miss Stowell, a piano quintet by Christian Sinding that is not at all familiar here.

The Kneisel quartet will give its fourth concert in Potter Hall on Tuesday evening, the 13th. The programme will include Smetana's quartet in E minor ("Aus Meinem Leben"), Brahms' piano trio in C minor (Mr. Sigismund Stojowski, pianist), Beethoven's quartet in B flat major, op. 130. This will be Mr. Stojowski's first appearance in Boston.

The second Cambridge concert of the Boston Symphony quartet will be in Brattle Hall on Thursday evening, the 22d. The programme will include Tschaikowsky's quartet in F major, op. 22, No. 2, Brahms' trio for piano, viola and horn (Miss Laura Hawkins, Messrs Willy and Max Hess), Schumann's quartet in A major, op. 41, No. 3. Tickets may be obtained at the University bookstore.

...itself to the artists ... of Steinway ...

The name of Vincent d'Indy will appear on the program of next ... afternoon and Saturday evening. ... Gericke will present the Symphony ... for piano and orchestra on a "Mountain Air." At its former performance in this city Mr Bauer was the pianist. At its performance this week the pianist will be Mr Heinrich Gebhard. The first number on the program will be Haydn's symphony in C major; the second will be Saint-Saens' concerto for cello, in A minor. The soloists will be the Belgian cellist, Miss Elsa Ruegger.

BOSTON SYMPHONY QUARTET.

Tomorrow evening the Boston Symphony quartet at its fourth concert in Jordan hall will play an unfamiliar work by Max Reger of Munich, a serenade for flute, violin and viola. Prof. Hess lately received the music from Reger's publisher and it is new, its opus number being 77A; it is very doubtful whether it has ever been played in this country. Reger's songs are coming to be very well known through their presence on almost all recital programs. Like Strauss and Mahler, Reger is something of a revolutionist, and like them is condemned by his enemies as a madman. On this ground his symphony, at its first performance in Berlin recently, was roundly hissed by enemies and frantically applauded by friends.

The other works on the program will be Mozart's string quartet in C major and Brahm's pianoforte quartet in A major, op 26. The Mozart quartet is put on in commemoration of the composer's sesquicentennial. The assisting artists will be Mr Carl Stasny, piano and Mr Am Maquarre flute.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, FEB 4, 1906.

First Performance Here of Mahler's Symphony.

Marie Hall's Farewell Recital ---Cecelia Society.

Concerts of Interest During the Week.

Mr Harold Bauer was the soloist at last week's Symphony rehearsal and concert, playing the piano part in Schumann's A minor concerto. The program opened with Beethoven's "Egmont" overture and closed with Gustav Mahler's C sharp minor symphony, a bone of musical contention offered for the first time in this city. The distinguished pianist has so firmly established himself in the good graces of the music-loving public, and his high standard of interpretation has been so consistently maintained, that when it is said Schumann's work was performed by Mr Bauer in a thoroughly sympathetic manner it is readily understood that the beauties of the concerto were delightfully revealed by the gifted soloist. Aside from the splendid contrasts in thematic material and the brilliant playing of the elaborate coda in the first part, there is no need to reiterate praise for the artist whose skill has seemingly conquered about all the secrets of the keyboard. In the second movement and at the allegro his arpeggios and chord runs in the numerous piano and pianissimo passages were the acme of delicate finger work. That Mr Bauer is popular was shown by the generous receptions and later by the recalls to the platform.

Considerable interest has been awakened in the C-sharp minor symphony, by Gustav Mahler, a Bohemian composer whose works have been a fruitful theme for discussion in Germany. This symphony, the fifth, verified the reports of dissentions and variations in opinion regarding it, for it is as fantastic, incoherent and overwhelmingly discordant in the main as any one of the latter-day compositions heard at our concerts in recent years, not forgetting Richard Strauss in his wildest flights of imagination.

The piece is really "gigantic" in its dimensions and requires a very large orchestra, according to the composer, to do justice to the work. There are five parts and Mahler supplies no argument, merely directions such as "with measured step like a funeral train," "stormily," "scherzo," "very slow," etc, leaving the auditor to judge of the import of the music and invent an analysis to suit.

Mahler evidently is a masterhand at instrumentation, for the score bristles with difficulties for the executants, and the bizarre measures are thickly strewn throughout the whole piece. Much of it sounds chaotic, yet the intervals in which the composer shows comparative lucidity in treatment of his themes are melodic and give brief glimpses of a rich imagination that soon runs riot in dissonants and inharmonic utterances. Out of this tumultuous composition may be selected for praise, and likewise enjoyment, the scherzo, which, in the greater part, is beautifully written, especially for the strings. The pizzicatto effect was given splendidly by this contingent.

To commend the performance must be largely a matter of form, based upon the usual high grade of work by our orchestra. The horn passages in the first part sounded clear and euphonious and the various attacks appeared to be taken promptly. The "restless" suggestions were vividly shown and the scherzo, as has been mentioned, was played admirably and made the best impression of any portion of the symphony. There were fortissimo passages a-plenty, which doubtless emphasized in proper form the writer's ideas and the wielders of the instruments of percussion labored faithfully and well to bring ...desired results.

The Boston Journal

SYMPHONY GIVES MAHLER'S WORK

Highly Fantastical Fifth Symphony Performed for the First Time in Boston.

Gustav Mahler's fifth symphony, called "The Giant," was performed for the first time in this city by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the fourteenth concert Saturday night. It is a stupendous work, the creation of a composer who cares not for tradition or anything else, but who seeks and gets almost exaggerated musical expression for his ideas without regard to instrumental limitations.

It is a noble work and not one the average student would love at first hearing. Its violence and vehemence, its abruptness, harsh contrasts and seemingly unreasonable demands upon individual and ensemble performers make it too much for immediate digestion. The symphony is in five movements, programmed without the usual tempo instructions in Italian, the warnings and instructions being translated so that all may understand and heed. The first movement is a funeral march, military in the extreme, with an exquisite "trio." The second is wildly emotional, a fitting setting to "Inferno." The scherzo has a refrain, a beautiful slow waltz, while the fourth movement in F major adagietto is very sensuous. The finale is disappointing. Throughout the symphony is fntastical and in the hands of a less competent orchestra would prove impossible. Mr. Gericke was enthusiastic and read the work with rare grace and artistry. It was given a brilliant performance.

Harold Bauer, pianist, gave an exquisite and perfectly artistic performance of Schumann's concerto in A minor. Beethoven's Egmont overture opened the concert.

---

rom BULLET...
PHILA., P...

ddress ...

ate FEB 3 - 1906

---

m TELEGRAPH

ress PHILA., PA

e FEB 3 - 1906

At the fourth Boston Symphony concert to be given at the Academy of Music on Monday evening, February 12, Miss Elsa Ruegger, the Belgian 'cellist, will again be heard. She has chosen the great Saint-Saens Concerto No. 1 in A Minor. The orchestra will be heard in Beethoven's Egmont overture and in the Fifth Symphony by Gustav ...ler, that "latest word" in modern ... about which critics are disputing ... as much as they do over Richard S...

[159]

Published Every Day in the Year.
VOL. CXIX, NO. 34.
SUNDAY, FEB. 4, 1906.

MAHLER'S FIFTH SYMPHONY GIVEN

First Performance Here of His Collossal Work at the 14th Symphony Concert Last Evening.

A COMPOSITION OF LENGTH AND STRENGTH

Mr. Bauer's Delightful Performance of Schumann's Piano Concerto "The Pipe of Desire" at Popular Prices.

The programme of the 14th Symphony concert, Mr. Gericke conductor, given last night in Symphony Hall, was as follows:

Overture to Goethe's "Egmont"..Beethoven
Concerto in A minor for piano...Schumann
Symphony in C sharp minor, No. 5..Mahler

This concert was one of unusual interest. Mr. Gericke conducted the great overture without attempting to find in it effects that the composer did not imagine or contrive; he let the music speak for itself; he did not interrupt the flow of the main movement by changing deliberately the tempo at the appearance of the heavy chords, which are by some supposed to typify the Duke of Alva or Spanish oppression in the Netherlands. There have been German post-Wagner conductors who were sad offenders in this instance, Franz Wuellner, for instance. Mr. Gericke did not sentimentalize by means of impertinent slackening the pace and so-called "interpretation" of measures without special significance, and thus was his reading the more effective.

Mr. Harold Bauer gave a very musical and charming performance of Schumann's concerto. There was an exquisite sense of proportion; there was both poetic expression and suggestion, and in the last movement, which is rhythmically often a stumbling block to many, he played with an apparent simplicity that would have deceived any one not acquainted with the peculiar difficulties. The concerto displayed Mr. Bauer at his best, and all in all his performance is to be ranked with his memorable one of Cesar Franck's quintet with the Kneisels a few seasons ago.

Mahler's first symphony was produced in 1894, if not in 1891. Each symphony excited in turn hot discussion. The composer was by some hailed a genius; by others he was mocked as a madman. Now the term "madman," as applied to one that has departed from the conventions or invented something new in art, has lost any peculiar significance of reproach. Disraeli frankly admitted that he was on the side of the angels; the student of musical history can well afford to run the risk of espousing the cause of the madmen. Mahler has his band of wild-eyed partisans, his pamphleteers, who, no doubt, have done him harm. His foes have served him. His five symphonies have been played in German cities; they have been frantically applauded and fiercely hissed; his first symphony has been played even in London (1903), but no one of his important works had been heard in Boston before last week. The first performance in this country of any symphony by Mahler was that of the fourth, in New York, in 1904. The fifth was performed at Cincinnati March 25, 1905. These performances and those of last week in Boston have been the only ones in America.

Conductors have had a reasonable excuse for not producing the second and the third, which demand an extraordinarily large orchestra. The second, also, calls for solo voices and mixed chorus; the third for a solo contralto, female chorus, and boy choir. The two symphonies are very long—the second consumes an hour and 40 minutes. Furthermore, the technical difficulties are great.

Thanks Due to Mr. Gericke for Producing Mahler's Work.

Mr. Gericke therefore deserves hearty thanks for producing one of Mahler's symphonies, producing it with the infinite care in preparation that is characteristic of the man. The production of a work of such huge dimensions, a work peculiar in structure and in its musical speech, does not contribute necessarily to the immediate popularity of a conductor. There are concertgoers who do not like to hear new music unless it makes a direct appeal to them in ways that are obvious, familiar, approved. They do not wish to exert themselves mentally at a concert.

Like Polonius, they are for a jig or a tale of bawdry, or they sleep. Or, fortified with scraps of pedantic information, they turn deaf ears to that which is new, as did the Mastersingers hearing Walther's free rhapsodic song. Vexed, bored, sometimes dimly conscious that there is something in the music which is strangely beautiful or great, and that in the course of time they, too, may understand and enjoy it, their vanity is piqued at the moment; and they either leave the hall, unwilling to confirm their suspicions, or they remain in sullen silence to show courage, as well as disapproval.

The conductor and the orchestra have rehearsed with the utmost patience and with anxious care. Extra rehearsals have been called. The hearer jauntily pronounces a snap judgment: "The symphony does not mean anything. I couldn't make anything out of it. Why does Mr. Gericke put such stuff on the programme?" But is this fair to composer, conductor, orchestra? We all remember how Cesar Franck's great sym- was at first regarded here as the ion of desolation; how Richard Don Juan," when it was first was ranked as a slap in the atic or a charlatan; yet symphony and sym- they re- attac

There is no programme for Mahler's 5th symphony, and the composer abhors analytical notes. He wishes the audience to hear his music, not to read about it while it is playing. This music needs no programme. It is eloquent in itself.

It has been said that life in Vienna influenced its moods; that the opening dead march was suggested by the military funerals in Vienna; that the scherzo, a Laendler, is characteristically local in spirit; but Mahler's mighty dead march with its episode of shrieking and heaven-defying grief is universal music, and the dance was an expression of joy or of religious feeling centuries before Austria was a marquisate, centuries before the Sultan Soliman laid siege to the Kaiserstadt with his army of 200,000 men. Fortunately for Mahler, the characteristics of his symphony are not merely local.

The movements that will make a direct appeal to the average audience are the dead march, the second movement, or rather the section of it that contains the second theme announced by the cellos and the fourth movement, an exceedingly poetic adagietto with themes of rare beauty, especially beautiful in these days when too many themes are purely of cerebral invention. The portions of the Scherzo which are frankly in slow waltz time will please those who do not at one hearing appreciate the significance of the ideas that are tributary to the main waltz themes, or the surprising technical skill displayed in the treatment of the motives. The Rondo Finale is not as a whole so impressively sonorous as the other movements, although the use of the choral which has already appeared in the second movement is most effective.

No Two Persons Hear Music in One and the Same Way.

Music which reaches the heart as well as the nerves and the brain is of all music the most difficult to describe so that a reader who did not hear it can understand in some degree why the emotion of the composer made its irresistible way. Purple phrases and resounding rhetoric may be a sanitary relief to the writer, but they do not convince the reader who had not the opportunity of being moved. It should also be remembered that no two persons, intelligent and sensitive though they may be, hear music in one and the same way. Each is "reminded by the instruments," but that which is awakened in the breast of each is seldom, if ever, the same.

Mahler has been reproached for his poverty of thematic invention. The reproach, as far as this symphony is concerned, is unjust. The simplicity of some of the themes is the simplicity that marks genius. The rich beauty of some of them is enhanced by the spontaneity. The dramatic stab of other themes is equally spontaneous. Nor is there any suspicion of insincerity in the treatment of these themes. Whether the mood be one of grim resignation, wild despair, naive joy in mere existence, contemplation of beauty in nature or in woman, or whooping exultation, it is never feigned, never forced. The hearer knows that Mahler himself had these mighty or whirring or calm and solemn thoughts and expressed them in his own grandiose or passionate or excited manner. The personality as well as the individuality of this music is overpowering.

The reminiscence-hunter has driven the hunter after forbidden intervals and progressions out of the field, and he will find the happiness peculiar to his kind in detecting here a few measures that suggest thoughts in Beethoven's Ninth, and here a cry that sounds for a moment as though it had been wrenched from Berlioz, and there the Kundry theme from "Parsifal," but in a long work of such amazing originality in conception and execution, such reminders serve a purpose; they entertain those who are unable to find anything else in the symphony that deserves their approbation.

Orchestral technic in this period, when expression is reckoned as of more importance than thought, runs in the streets, as Goethe said of talent. There are a few passages in the symphony that are scored thickly, harshly; yet they make their way, and the instrumentation as a whole is strikingly sonorous, while there are many instances of remarkably individual orchestral expression. The finale on the whole is orchestrally perhaps the least interesting; yet the music itself is potent; it recalls that music heard by De Quincey in an opium dream, the music that suggested to him the "undulations of fast gathering tumults * * * multitudinous movements, infinite cavalcades, tread of innumerable armies." It is music of a mighty preparation; nor does the choral at the end disappoint the expectation.

Music That Is Human Even When Most Fantastical.

This music of Mahler has blood in it. It is human even when it is most fantastical. Its extravagance in expression is titanic, but never incredible. It contains an elemental quality that is often confounded by the super-refined with coarseness; the display of native strength that alarms all feeble folk and all the genteel; this quality is found in nearly all the great in art, from Aeschylus to Thomas Hardy, from Bach to Tschaikowsky. It is never to be confounded with downright vulgarity which is always inartistic, while this peculiar coarseness is heroic whether it be found in Victor Hugo or Verdi, in Henry Fielding or in Wagner. You find it in Shakespeare, Cervantes, Rabelais. You find it in Beethoven and Michael Angelo.

This symphony has blood and tears, frantic joy and wild despair; it also has the saving quality of humor, as in the scherzo. Mahler has expressed his thoughts in a heightened musical speech of the richest harmonic, contrapuntal and orchestral vocabulary. After two hearings, it is an amazing work, full, as is nature, of inequalities, no doubt, but it is the symphony of no ordinary man and no ordinary musician. Long as it is, it rivets the attention from the beginning to the end, and last night the great majority of the audience listened gladly to a new and compelling voice.

The performance was one of extraordinary brilliance, one of which both Mr. Gericke and the orchestra may well be proud. The orchestra was one of virtuosos controlled by the intelligence and the will of a leader who had made the Symphony his own. To particularize is always invidious, yet it may be allowed for once to praise especially the manner in which the first trumpeter performed his arduous and formidable task.

Such a symphony should not be heard once and then put away for a season. It should be heard at two or three concerts in succession, and then impressions might be turned into firm convictions.

LOCAL.

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony quartet will be distinguished by the first performance here of a serenade for flute, violin and viola by the much discussed Max Reger. Mr. Hess lately received the music from Reger's publisher, and as it is new, its opus number being 77a, it is doubtful whether it has ever been played in this country. Practically none of Reger's instrumental music has been played in America, despite the sensation he has been making in Germany. His songs are making their way in the concert hall. Like Strauss and Mahler, Reger is a radical, and like them he is condemned by conservatives as a madman. His sinfonietta at its first performance in Berlin was both hissed and applauded.

The Hoffmann quartet on Wednesday evening will perform, with the assistance of Miss Stowell, a piano quintet by Christian Sinding that is not at all familiar here.

The Kneisel quartet will give its fourth concert in Potter Hall on Tuesday evening, the 13th. The programme will include Smetana's quartet in E minor ("Aus Meinem Leben"), Brahms' piano trio in C minor (Mr. Sigismund Stojowski, pianist), Beethoven's quartet in B flat major, op. 130. This will be Mr. Stojowski's first appearance in Boston.

The second Cambridge concert of the Boston Symphony quartet will be in Brattle Hall on Thursday evening, the 22d. The programme will include Tschaikowsky's quartet in F major, op. 22, No. 2. Brahms' trio for piano, viola and horn (Miss Laura Hawkins, Messrs. Willy and Max Hess), Schumann's quartet in A major, op. 41, No. 3. Tickets may be obtained at the University bookstore.

Beethoven's Egmont ... performed in the proper spirit, the brilliant finale going with notable dash. The orchestra gave Mr Bauer splendid assistance in the concerto, and in the Mahler symphony it evidently acquitted itself to the satisfaction of Mr Gericke.

The name of Vincent d'Indy will appear on the program of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, as Mr Gericke will present the Symphony, No. 1, for piano and orchestra on a "Mountain Air." At its former performance in this city Mr Bauer was the pianist. At its performance this week the pianist will be Mr Heinrich Gebhard. The first number on the program will be Haydn's symphony in C major; the second will be Saint-Saens' concerto for cello, in A minor. The soloists will be the Belgian cellist, Miss Elsa Ruegger.

BOSTON SYMPHONY QUARTET.

Tomorrow evening the Boston Symphony quartet at its fourth concert in Jordan hall will play an unfamiliar work by Max Reger of Munich, a serenade for flute, violin and viola. Prof Hess lately received the music from Reger's publisher and it is new, its opus number being 77A; it is very doubtful whether it has ever been played in this country. Reger's songs are coming to be very well known through their presence on almost all recital programs. Like Strauss and Mahler, Reger is something of a revolutionist, and like them is condemned by his enemies as a madman. On this ground his symphony, at its first performance in Berlin recently, was roundly hissed by enemies and frantically applauded by friends.

The other works on the program will be Mozart's string quartet in C major and Brahm's pianoforte quartet in A major, op 26. The Mozart quartet is put on in commemoration of the composer's sesquicentennial. The assisting artists will be Mr Carl Stasny piano and Mr Am Maquarre flute.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, FEB 4, 1906.

First Performance Here of Mahler's Symphony.

Marie Hall's Farewell Recital ---Cecelia Society.

Concerts of Interest During the Week.

Mr Harold Bauer was the soloist at last week's Symphony rehearsal and concert, playing the piano part in Schumann's A minor concerto. The program opened with Beethoven's "Egmont" overture and closed with Gustav Mahler's C sharp minor symphony, a bone of musical contention offered for the first time in this city. The distinguished pianist has so firmly established himself in the good graces of the music-loving public, and his high standard of interpretation has been so consistently maintained, that when it is said Schumann's work was performed by Mr Bauer in a thoroughly sympathetic manner it is readily understood that the beauties of the concerto were delightfully revealed by the gifted soloist. Aside from the splendid contrasts in thematic material and the brilliant playing of the elaborate coda in the first part, there is no need to reiterate praise for the artist whose skill has seemingly conquered about all the secrets of the keyboard. In the second movement and at the allegro his arpeggios and chord runs in the numerous piano and pianissimo passages were the acme of delicate finger work. That Mr Bauer is popular was shown by the generous receptions and later by the recalls to the platform.

Considerable interest has been awakened in the C-sharp minor symphony, by Gustav Mahler, a Bohemian composer whose works have been a fruitful theme for discussion in Germany. This symphony, the fifth, verified the reports of dissentions and variations in opinion regarding it, for it is as fantastic, incoherent and overwhelmingly discordant in the main as any one of the latter-day compositions heard at our concerts in recent years, not forgetting Richard Strauss in his wildest flights of imagination.

The piece is really "gigantic" in its dimensions and requires a very large orchestra, according to the composer, to do justice to the work. There are five parts and Mahler supplies no argument, merely directions such as "with measured step like a funeral train," "stormily," "scherzo," "very slow," etc, leaving the auditor to judge of the import of the music and invent an analysis to suit.

Mahler evidently is a masterhand at instrumentation, for the score bristles with difficulties for the executants, and the bizarre measures are thickly strewn throughout the whole piece. Much of it sounds chaotic, yet the intervals in which the composer shows comparative lucidity in treatment of his themes are melodic and give brief glimpses of a rich imagination that soon runs riot in dissonants and inharmonic utterances. Out of this tumultuous composition may be selected for praise, and likewise enjoyment, the scherzo, which, in the greater part, is beautifully written, especially for the strings. The pizzicatto effect was given splendidly by this contingent.

To commend the performance must be largely a matter of form, based upon the usual high grade of work by our orchestra. The horn passages in the first part sounded clear and euphonious and the various attacks appeared to be taken promptly. The "restless" suggestions were vividly shown and the scherzo, as has been mentioned, was played admirably and made the best impression of any portion of the symphony. There were fortissimo passages a-plenty, which doubtless emphasized in proper form the writer's ideas and the wielders of the instruments of percussion labored faithfully and well to bring desired results.

The Boston Journal

SYMPHONY GIVES MAHLER'S WORK

Highly Fantastical Fifth Symphony Performed for the First Time in Boston.

Gustav Mahler's fifth symphony, called "The Giant," was performed for the first time in this city by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the fourteenth concert Saturday night. It is a stupendous work, the creation of a composer who cares not for tradition or anything else, but who seeks and gets almost exaggerated musical expression for his ideas without regard to instrumental limitations.

It is a noble work and not one the average student would love at first hearing. Its violence and vehemence, its abruptness, harsh contrasts and seemingly unreasonable demands upon individual and ensemble performers make it too much for immediate digestion. The symphony is in five movements, programmed without the usual tempo instructions in Italian, the warnings and instructions being translated so that all may understand and heed. The first movement is a funeral march, military in the extreme, with an exquisite "trio." The second is wildly emotional, a fitting setting to "Inferno." The scherzo has a refrain, a beautiful slow waltz, while the fourth movement in F major adagietto is very sensuous. The finale is disappointing. Throughout the symphony is fntastical and in the hands of a less competent orchestra would prove impossible. Mr. Gericke was enthusiastic and read the work with rare grace and artistry. It was given a brilliant performance.

Harold Bauer, pianist, gave an exquisite and perfectly artistic performance of Schumann's concerto in A minor. Beethoven's Egmont overture opened the concert.

---

rom ... BULLET.

ddress ...

ate ...

get of losing their popularity.

—o—

The fourth Boston Symphony concert will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, February 12, with Elsa Ruegger, the Belgian violoncellist, as soloist. The orchestra is to play the "Egmont" overture of Beethoven, and Gustav Mahler's fifth symphony, which, as revised by the composer, was performed for the first time in this country at Boston, recently. Miss Ruegger's number will be Saint Saens's concerto in A minor, No. 1.

m ... TELEGRAPH

ress ... PHILA. PA.

e ... FEB 5 - 1906

At the fourth Boston Symphony concert to be given at the Academy of Music on Monday evening, February 12, Miss Elsa Ruegger, the Belgian 'cellist, will again be heard. She has chosen the great Saint-Saens Concerto No. 1 in A Minor. The orchestra will be heard in Beethoven's Egmont overture and in the Fifth Symphony by Gustav Mahler, that "latest word" in modern music about whom the critics are disputing almost as much as they do over Richard Strauss.

[159]

...Day in the Year.
VOL. CXIX., NO. 41.
SUNDAY, FEB. 11, 1906.

HEAR SYMPHONY ON MOUNTAIN AIR

Earlier Work of D'Indy One of Numbers on Programme at Fifteenth Concert of the Boston Orchestra.

THIRD APPEARANCE OF MISS RUEGGER, SOLOIST

Haydn Symphony That Has Brought in Money Also Performed—Miss Hall's Last Violin Recital.

The programme of the 15th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Gericke conductor, given last night in Symphony Hall, was as follows:

Symphony in D major (B. & H. No. 2)...Haydn
Concerto in A minor No. 1 for 'cello.....Saint-Saens
Symphony on a mountain air for orchestra and piano, No. 1.....D'Indy

Haydn himself was well pleased at the first performance of this symphony. The concert was a brilliant one. Brigida Banti, the singer, who enchanted all that heard her, who lived gayly and died in the poorhouse; Anne Marichelli, who by her will left a sum of money to Napoleon Bonaparte; Viotti, the violinist, and the great oboist, Ferlendis, who then made his first appearance in London, and two singing men of renown were the soloists. It was Haydn's last benedt concert in the city where he was highly honored. He entered in that note book in which he entered many curious observations and reflections: "I took in this evening 4000 gulden (about $2000); one can make as much as this only in England." Furthermore, the orchestra on this occasion numbered about 60. The orchestra of the first six concerts was made up of about 40.

The Herald has before this discussed the injury done the symphonic music of Mozart and Hadyn by performances in a great hall by modern orchestras, in which the wind instruments are doubled in the hope of obtaining a just balance with the great band of strings. It has also referred to the attempt of some in Germany to play this music under more favorable conditions. Thus Resnicek, who has been conducting concerts of old music in Berlin, gives them in a comparatively small hall and with a small orchestra. And so in London when Mozart's birthday was celebrated last month by the Concert-Goers' Club in Bechstein Hall with Mr. Wood as conductor, the symphony in E flat, composed when Mozart was 8 years old, the introduction to "Bastien and Bastienne," composed when he was a few years older, the ballet music from "Idomeneo," the great symphony in G minor and some other pieces were played by an orchestra of only 36.

It would be an interesting experiment to hear in this city a symphony by Haydn or Mozart played in Jordan or Chickering Hall by a small orchestra of picked men. But in the present apathetic condition of the Boston musical public it would be prudent to defer the experiment.

The symphony played last night stood the unreasonable test of a huge hall much better than others of Haydn and the performance was one abounding in vitality and at the same time one of most careful finish in the details.

The intense admirers of the ultra-modern French school, which has been so recently discovered by them that they have the furious and iconoclastic zeal of recent converts, are ready to sneer at Camille Saint-Saens and to class him with the periwigged. They forget there was a time when Saint-Saens himself was looked on as a dangerous radical, a disturber of established order and pleasant, confident dreams. They blind themselves to Saint-Saens' great merits, to his talent that is akin to genius; his calm mastery of technic, his exquisite sense of proportion, his clearness, his logical arrangement of musical thought, the artful simplicity and effectiveness of his orchestra.

It is true that he has probably said his say, that his latest works have little true life; it is also true that his music was never deeply emotional; but his best works—and they are not few—are strikingly individual in their lucidity and elegance. This 'cello concerto, for instance, has distinction, and there are charming pages, as those of the minuet, which is the very essence of Saint-Saens. It also has the merit of being short—a great merit in a 'cello concerto, for a little 'cello in solo goes a long way. Miss Ruegger played in the fitting spirit, and displayed both tone and general artistry.

D'Indy no longer calls his "Wallenstein" a symphony; and his symphony "Jean Hunyade" (1876), was thrown overboard by him long ago. There is a difference of almost 20 years between the composition of the symphony on a mountain air and that of the symphony in B flat major which, played here under the composer's direction, irritated certain highly estimable persons who, to use the cant of the period, are not wholly "in touch with the modern musical movement."

When this symphony on a mountain air was produced here about four years ago, with Mr. Bauer as the pianist, it gave great pleasure to many, and we are inclined to think that it will for some years to come enjoy greater popular favor than the superb work which will in time be ranked as one of the symphonies of the world. The real...

...of the work the idea that the symphony might be a thinly disguised concerto, whereas it is nothing of the kind; the piano is an instrument in ensemble.

Again, the chief melody, which as treated by d'Indy at times bears a curious resemblance to Bruant's canaille ditty, "a la Villette," and the tributary themes are more obviously melodic than those of the second symphony, and the treatment of them is franker. It may also be said that the harmonic speech of d'Indy is here more in accordance with familiar musical usage; that there is more of superficial interest; and that the peasant and boisterous jollity of the Finale makes an immediate effect on the nerves.

D'Indy has more than once looked to the hills for inspiration, and at times in this symphony he dwells among them. The atmosphere is often that of the cool mountains, and there are suggestions of nature that are of fragrant and of outdoor beauty. The first two movements contain passages that are contemplative and serene; yet the hearer, though he stands with the composer above the every-day and garish world, is not lost in the clouds, nor does he find, as in some of d'Indy's compositions, the air too nipping and eager.

There is much pure and noble music in this symphony, and the fine taste of the composer keeps him from vulgarity in the finale where it would be easy, almost permissible, to be extremely vulgar—both rhythmically and orchestrally. The orchestration throughout is rich and sonorous, and it is especially rich in discretion. Mr. Gebhard played well his part, and the performance in general was one of the highest poetic excellence. Mr. Gericke conducted with gusto and spirit and the imagination displayed in his interpretation was in full sympathy with that of the composer.

PRESS
PHILA., PA
FEB 11 1906

To-morrow night's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be the last but one in the season's series, and Mr. Gericke has set on it as the occasion to play in Philadelphia one of the most important and interesting works of the year, Gustav Mahler's fifth symphony, which, in its revised form, was played for the first time in America at the Boston concerts of February 2 and 3. It is a work of very large dimensions, consuming considerably over an hour in performance, and Mr. Gericke had a round dozen rehearsals of it before he ventured to present it in Boston.

Even among the musical folk of this country, Mahler is known chiefly as a conductor, his reputation gained at the Imperial Opera in Vienna since 1897, and before that in Hamburg, having given him the first place in operatic conducting in Europe. In Germany, however, if controversy be a sign of great talent, as a composer he is to be reckoned almost in the same class with Richard Strauss.

Mahler, while professing the greatest admiration for Richard Strauss and his works, takes a radically different view on the subject of program music. In respect to this fifth symphony, he explicitly asks that no annotations be made, his stand being that the music must speak for itself, and that each individual auditor must take an individual impression. His theory of music is that the music should make the program, not the program the music. For this reason he has been hailed by his adherents as the one great saving factor in modern music, the man who will stem the tide of illustrating poems, books, scenes from life and systems of philosophy by means of music and will turn the coming composers back to classic simplicity, to absolute music that is really absolute—with necessary modern modifications.

Owing to the length of the symphony, the rest of the program will be very short. The opening number will be Weber's Overture Op. 2, "Der Freischuetz," and then will come Saint Saen's concerto for the violoncello, No. 1, in A minor, which Miss Elsa Ruegger, the popular Belgian 'cellist, will play.

RECORD
PHILA., PA
FEB 4 - 1906

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Mahler's New Symphony to Be Played.

The fourth Boston Symphony concert will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, February 12. The soloist will be Miss Elsa Ruegger, the 'cellist, who will play Saint-Saens' concerto for the violincello, No. 1, in A minor. The opening number will be Beethoven's "Egmont" overture. The Symphony will be Mahler's fifth, which as revised by the composer, had its first performance in America at the Boston concerts of the 2d and 3d of this month.

RECORD
PHILA., PA
FEB 11 1906

BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Herr Gericke's Band to Play Here To-morrow Evening.

MAHLER'S FIFTH SYMPHONY

Much Discussed German Work to Be Given Its First Local Hearing—Elsa Ruegger, the Soloist.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will play its last but one concert of the season to-morrow evening in the Academy of Music, revealing at the same time a new composition by one of the most aggressive and interesting personalities in the realm of modern German music. The number in question will be the Fifth Symphony of Gustav Mahler, which will be the chief orchestral feature in a concert, which will offer also the "Freeschuetz" overture and Saint Saens' concerto for violoncello, with Elsa Ruegger as soloist, as its other attractions.

Of Mahler it may be said that he at present stands in the limelight of the musical stage in connection with two other Teutons. They are Richard Strauss and Max Reger, of Munich. Of Srtauss much is known. But here in America the other two men are little more than names. Reger has written songs which it is now the fashion to put on our recital programs. But so far as Philadelphia is concerned, nothing of Mahler's has been played here, and the performance of his Fifth Symphony at to-morrow evening's Boston Symphony concerto will be the first time his name has appeared on local programs.

Concerning a man who has figured so largely as conductor and composer in Germany and Austria for the last ten years, there is surprisingly little to tell. He is forty-six years old, and since 1883 has been a conductor. A pupil of Bruckner and Epstein, he began his career in that year as second conductor in Cassel. Two years later, he went to Prague, where he was associated with Angelo Neumann. Then, in 1891, Pollini called him to Hamburg, where he was principal conductor of the opera until 1897, when he went to Vienna, where he succeeded Wilhelm Jahn, first as capellmeister and then as director of the Vienna Opera, which post he now holds. After Richter went to Manchester, for two or three years, he was the conductor of the Vienna Philharmonie, in which post he was succeeded by the younger Hellmesberger. Since then he has devoted himself entirely to the Opera which, under his direction, has been restored in a measure to the splendid efficiency which once made it the first opera of Europe.

As man and as musician, Mahler is a most unusual personality. Unquestionably one of the very greatest conductors in the world and possibly the greatest operatic conductor, he possesses certain characteristics which have made him most unpopular with all those who are brought into contact with him, however much they admire his great talent as a musician. He is a mercilessly despotic and tyrannical master. Lacking tack—or scorning it—it seems to have been his fortune to make enemies wherever he went. Striving ever after the highest ideals, he has no patience with those that lag behind him. The principal soprano, the principal tenor of the Vienna Opera are no more to him than the humble member of the orchestra who plays the triangle. Ever since he has been in Vienna he has been fighting. He drove Richter from the Opera. The placid calm which had settled over the venerable institution during the years of Jahn's incumbency disappeared like a flash when he appeared. There was a tremendous shaking up of dry bones on the stage and in front of it. The veterans fought and intrigued against him, but all to no avail, for this man with the demonic eye—it is said that he is a fettatura—put them all to rout, and the only way that the Philharmonie rid itself of him as a conductor was by a change in the constitution which released the society from the obligation of having a conductor from the Opera, and enabled it to have "guests." And even now his enemies are trying to get him out of the Opera, but the chances are that he will win again, for, despite the deficit he has been piling up, the Viennese realise what he has done for them.

While there is no question about his genius as a conductor, the most furious controversies have raged and still rage regarding him as a composer. In Germany there seems to be no middle ground. Either must one proclaim him the greatest of all moderns or damn him as a madman, and one without the slightest suspicion of creative talent. Let a work of his be played; on one side are frantic cheers, on the other as frantic hisses and cat-calls. He is claimed by some as the coming man, who is destined to work for the preservation of the older traditions against the movement that is all for program music, for symphonic pictures of persons, things, scenes from life and systems of philosophy. He has characterized his own idea of a program as being diametrically opposed to that of Richard Strauss—his music "comes to a program as to the ultimate ideal explanation of its meaning in language. With Strauss the program is as a task set to be accom-

...His first symphony—which ... hour and forty minutes ... with very unusual heavy ... second, which was perfor... first time in Hamburg ... ago, is a work of enormous ... It employed and orchestra of ... visible brass band, two solo... mixed chorus. His third sym... the "Titan," is even more ... lasting over two hours. This ... gramme as has each of its ... In general, it concerns the ... great city. Its various parts ... names as "What the flowers ... "What the animals in the wood ... "O, man! take heed," from Nietzsche ... poem of that name. The last part ... setting for female and boys' chorus ... the poem of St. Peter from "Des Knaben Wunderhorn." The fourth symphony, which was performed two years ago in New York by Walter Damrosch's orchestra, is more normal as to its orchestral requirements, but it differs from the conventional in that the last movement has a contralto solo.

The fifth symphony, which Philadelphia is to hear for the first time this week, was given its premiere in Cologne at a Gurzenich concert in October, 1904. It is a long work, its performance requiring about an hour, but unlike its immediate predecessors contains no vocal part. But it is still unconventional, for in the scherzo there is a continuous obligato for sole horns. It contains three parts and five movements, the first and second parts each having two movements. The first movement is named "A Funeral Train." This is followed by a wild allegro. The scherzo, the first movement of the second part, is an old-fashioned German "landler." Then comes the slow movement and at last the finale. It is heavily scored, many extra instruments being used in the wood choirs, and practically every instrument of percusion is brought more or less to play.

INQUIRER
PHILA., PA
FEB 11 190

Boston Symphony Orchestra

To-morrow night's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be the last but one in the season's series and Mr. Gericke has set on it as the occasion to play in Philadelphia one of the most important and interesting works of the year. Gustav Mahler's fifth symphony, which in its revised form was played for the first time in America at the Boston concerts of February 2 and 3. It is a work of very large dimensions, consuming considerably over an hour in performance, and Mr. Gericke had a round dozen rehearsals of it before he ventured to present it in Boston.

Even among the musical folk of this country Mahler is known chiefly as a conductor, his reputation gained at the Imperial Opera in Vienna since 1897 and before that in Hamburg having given him the first place in operatic conducting in Europe. In Germany, however, if controversy be a sign of great talent, as a composer he is to be reckoned almost in the same class with Richard Strauss. Almost as much ink has been spilled over his music and quite as many dispositions ruined, as a result of that ink. In his symphonies, he works on the largest scale—one of them consuming two hours and ten minutes in performance, and there is nothing in the catalogue of music-making instruments, human and mechanical, for which he has not found use. In three of his symphonies the human voice is employed, in two of these solo voices and chorus and in one only a solo voice. In the fifth, however, he confines himself to mechanical instruments—an orchestra not much larger than is normal in present musical conditions.

Mahler, while professing the greatest admiration for Richard Strauss and his works, takes a radically different view on the subject of programme music. In respect to this fifth symphony, he explicitly asks that no annotations be made, his stand being that he music must speak for itself and that each individual auditor must take an individual impression. His theory of music is that the music should make the program, not the program the music. For this reason he has been hailed by his adherents as the one great saving factor in modern music, the man who will stem the tide of illustrating poems, books, scenes from life and systems of philosophy by means of music and will turn the coming composers back to classic simplicity, to absolute music that is really absolute with necessary modern modifications.

Owing to the length of the symphony the rest of the program will be very short. The opening number will be Weber's Overture Op. 2 "Der Freyschuetz," and then will come Saint Saens' Concerto for the Violoncello, No. 1, in A minor, which Miss Elsa Ruegger, the popular Belgian 'cellist, will play.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the ...
INQUIR
PHILA., PA
FEB 4 1906

The Boston Symphony

The fourth Boston Symphony Concert ... given in the Academy of Music ... evening, February 12. The soloist ... Miss Ruegger, the 'cellist, who will ... Saens' concerto for the Violoncello ... A minor. The opening number ... Beethoven's "Egmont" overture. The ... be Mahler's fifth, which, as revised ... composer, had its first performance in ... at the Boston concerts of the 2d ... this month. The sale of seats ... will open at Miss Barr... Chestnut street, on Wed...

SUNDAY HERALD
Published Every Day in the Year.
VOL. CXIX., NO. 41.
SUNDAY, FEB. 11, 1906.

HEAR SYMPHONY ON MOUNTAIN AIR

Earlier Work of D'Indy One of Numbers on Programme at Fifteenth Concert of the Boston Orchestra.

THIRD APPEARANCE OF MISS RUEGGER, SOLOIST

Haydn Symphony That Has Brought in Money Also Performed—Miss Hall's Last Violin Recital.

The programme of the 15th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Gericke conductor, given last night in Symphony Hall, was as follows:

Symphony in D major (B. & H. No. 2)..Haydn
Concerto in A minor No. 1 for 'cello.....
.....Saint-Saens
Symphony on a mountain air for orchestra and piano, No. 1.....D'Indy

Haydn himself was well pleased at the first performance of this symphony. The concert was a brilliant one. Brigida Banti, the singer, who enchanted all that heard her, who lived gayly and died in the poorhouse; Anne Marichelli, who by her will left a sum of money to Napoleon Bonaparte; Viotti, the violinist, and the great oboist, Ferlendis, who then made his first appearance in London, and two singing men of renown were the soloists. It was Haydn's last benefit concert in the city where he was highly honored. He entered in that note book in which he entered many curious observations and reflections: "I took in this evening 4000 gulden (about $2000); one can make as much as this only in England." Furthermore, the orchestra on this occasion numbered about 69. The orchestra of the first six concerts was made up of about 40.

The Herald has before this discussed the injury done the symphonic music of Mozart and Hadyn by performances in a great hall by modern orchestras, in which the wind instruments are doubled in the hope of obtaining a just balance with the great band of strings. It has also referred to the attempt of some in Germany to play this music under more favorable conditions. Thus Reznicek, who has been conducting concerts of old music in Berlin, gives them in a comparatively small hall and with a small orchestra. And so in London when Mozart's birthday was celebrated last month by the Concert-Goers' Club in Bechstein Hall with Mr. Wood as conductor, the symphony in E flat, composed when Mozart was 8 years old, the introduction to "Bastien and Bastienne," composed when he was a few years older, the ballet music from "Idomeneo," the great symphony in G minor and some other pieces were played by an orchestra of only 36.

It would be an interesting experiment to hear in this city a symphony by Haydn or Mozart played in Jordan or Chickering Hall by a small orchestra of picked men. But in the present apathetic condition of the Boston musical public it would be prudent to defer the experiment.

The symphony played last night stood the unreasonable test of a huge hall much better than others of Haydn and the performance was one abounding in vitality and at the same time one of most careful finish in the details.

The intense admirers of the ultra-modern French school, which has been so recently discovered by them that they have the furious and iconoclastic zeal of recent converts, are ready to sneer at Camille Saint-Saens and to class him with the periwigged. They forget there was a time when Saint-Saens himself was looked on as a dangerous radical, a disturber of established order and pleasant, confident dreams. They blind themselves to Saint-Saens' great merits, to his talent that is akin to genius; his calm mastery of technic, his exquisite sense of proportion, his clearness, his logical arrangement of musical thought, the artful simplicity and effectiveness of his orchestra.

It is true that he has probably said his say, that his latest works have little true life; it is also true that his music was never deeply emotional; but his best works—and they are not few—are strikingly individual in their lucidity and elegance. This 'cello concerto, for instance, has distinction, and there are charming pages, as those of the minuet, which is the very essence of Saint-Saens. It also has the merit of being short—a great merit in a 'cello concerto, for a little 'cello in solo goes a long way. Miss Ruegger played in the fitting spirit, and displayed both tone and general artistry.

D'Indy no longer calls his "Wallenstein" a symphony; and his symphony "Jean Hunyade" (1876), was thrown overboard by him long ago. There is a difference of almost 20 years between the composition of the symphony on a mountain air and that of the symphony in B flat major which, played here under the composer's direction, irritated certain highly estimable persons who, to use the cant of the period, are not wholly "in touch with the modern musical movement."

When this symphony on a mountain air was produced here about four years ago, with Mr. Bauer as the pianist, it gave great pleasure to many, and we are inclined to think that it will for some years to come enjoy greater popular favor than the superb work which will in due time be ranked as one of the great symphonies of the world. The reasons for this present preference are not far to seek, for the music of the those interested in a soloist rather than in a conventionally scored symphonic work, and their name is legion; yet the pianist is here no more a soloist than the oboist or the English horn player. Indeed, it is a pity that the piano was placed last night in a dominating position, for this position, no doubt unavoidable, gave one unacquainted with the character of the work the idea that the symphony might be a thinly disguised concerto, whereas it is nothing of the kind; the piano is an instrument in ensemble.

Again, the chief melody, which as treated by d'Indy at times bears a curious resemblance to Bruant's canaille ditty, "a la Villette," and the tributary themes are more obviously melodic than those of the second symphony, and the treatment of them is franker. It may also be said that the harmonic speech of d'Indy is here more in accordance with familiar musical usage; that there is more of superficial interest; and that the peasant and boisterous jollity of the Finale makes an immediate effect on the nerves.

D'Indy has more than once looked to the hills for inspiration, and at times in this symphony he dwells among them. The atmosphere is often that of the cool mountains, and there are suggestions of nature that are of fragrant and of outdoor beauty. The first two movements contain passages that are contemplative and serene; yet the hearer, though he stands with the composer above the every-day and garish world, is not lost in the clouds, nor does he find, as in some of d'Indy's compositions, the air too nipping and eager.

There is much pure and noble music in this symphony, and the fine taste of the composer keeps him from vulgarity in the finale where it would be easy, almost permissible, to be extremely vulgar—both rhythmically and orchestrally. The orchestration throughout is rich and sonorous, and it is especially rich in discretion. Mr. Gebhard played well his part, and the performance in general was one of the highest poetic excellence. Mr. Gericke conducted with gusto and spirit and the imagination displayed in his interpretation was in full sympathy with that of the composer.

PRESS
FEB 17 1906

To-morrow night's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be the last but one in the season's series, and Mr. Gericke has set on it as the occasion to play in Philadelphia one of the most important and interesting works of the year, Gustav Mahler's fifth symphony, which, in its revised form, was played for the first time in America at the Boston concerts of February 2 and 3. It is a work of very large dimensions, consuming considerably over an hour in performance, and Mr. Gericke had a round dozen rehearsals of it before he ventured to present it in Boston.

Even among the musical folk of this country, Mahler is known chiefly as a conductor, his reputation gained at the Imperial Opera in Vienna since 1897, and before that in Hamburg, having given him the first place in operatic conducting in Europe. In Germany, however, if controversy be a sign of great talent, as a composer he is to be reckoned almost in the same class with Richard Strauss.

Mahler, while professing the greatest admiration for Richard Strauss and his works, takes a radically different view on the subject of program music. In respect to this fifth symphony, he explicitly asks that no annotations be made, his stand being that the music must speak for itself, and that each individual auditor must take an individual impression. His theory of music is that the music should make the program, not the program the music. For this reason he has been hailed by his adherents as the one great saving factor in modern music, the man who will stem the tide of illustrating poems, books, scenes from life and systems of philosophy by means of music and will turn the coming composers back to classic simplicity, to absolute music that is really absolute—with necessary modern modifications.

Owing to the length of the symphony, the rest of the program will be very short. The opening number will be Weber's Overture Op. 2, "Der Freischuetz," and then will come Saint Saen's concerto for the violoncello, No. 1, in A minor, which Miss Elsa Ruegger, the popular Belgian 'cellist, will play.

* * *

RECORD
PHILA. PA

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Mahler's New Symphony to be Played.

The fourth Boston Symphony concert will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, February 12. The soloist will be Miss Elsa Ruegger, the 'cellist, who will play Saint-Saens' concerto for the violincello, No. 1, in A minor. The opening number will be Beethoven's "Egmont" overture. The Symphony will be Mahler's fifth, which as revised by the composer, had its first performance in America at the Boston concerts of the 2d and 3d of this month.

RECORD
PHILA. PA
FEB 11 1906

BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Herr Gericke's Band to Play Here To-morrow Evening.

MAHLER'S FIFTH SYMPHONY

Much Discussed German Work to Be Given Its First Local Hearing—Elsa Ruegger, the Soloist.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will play its last but one concert of the season to-morrow evening in the Academy of Music, revealing at the same time a new composition by one of the most aggressive and interesting personalities in the realm of modern German music. The number in question will be the Fifth Symphony of Gustav Mahler, which will be the chief orchestral feature in a concert, which will offer also the "Freeschuetz" overture and Saint Saens' concerto for violoncello, with Elsa Ruegger as soloist, as its other attractions.

Of Mahler it may be said that he at present stands in the limelight of the musical stage in connection with two other Teutons. They are Richard Strauss and Max Reger, of Munich. Of Srtauss much is known. But here in America the other two men are little more than names. Reger has written songs which it is now the fashion to put on our recital programs. But so far as Philadelphia is concerned, nothing of Mahler's has been played here, and the performance of his Fifth Symphony at to-morrow evening's Boston Symphony concerto will be the first time his name has appeared on local programs.

Concerning a man who has figured so largely as conductor and composer in Germany and Austria for the last ten years, there is surprisingly little to tell. He is forty-six years old, and since 1883 has been a conductor. A pupil of Bruckner and Epstein, he began his career in that year as second conductor in Cassel. Two years later, he went to Pragus, where he was associated with Angelo Neumann. Then, in 1891, Pollini called him to Hamburg, where he was principal conductor of the opera until 1897, when he went to Vienna, where he succeeded Wilhelm Jahn, first as capellmeister and then as director of the Vienna Opera, which post he now holds. After Richter went to Manchester, for two or three years he was the conductor of the Vienna Philharmonie, in which post he was succeeded by the younger Hellmesberger. Since then he has devoted himself entirely to the Opera which, under his direction, has been restored in a measure to the splendid efficiency which once made it the first opera of Europe.

As man and as musician, Mahler is a most unusual personality. Unquestionably one of the very greatest conductors in the world and possibly the greatest operatic conductor, he possesses certain characteristics which have made him most unpopular with all those who are brought into contact with him, however much they admire his great talent as a musician. He is a mercilessly despotic and tyrannical master. Lacking tack—or scorning it—it seems to have been his fortune to make enemies wherever he went. Striving ever after the highest ideals, he has no patience with those that lag behind him. The principal soprano, the principal tenor of the Vienna Opera are no more to him than the humble member of the orchestra who plays the triangle. Ever since he has been in Vienna he has been fighting. He drove Richter from the Opera. The placid calm which had settled over the venerable institution during the years of Jahn's incumbency disappeared like a flash when he appeared. There was a tremendous shaking up of dry bones on the stage and in front of it. The veterans fought and intrigued against him, but all to no avail, for this man with the demonic eye—it is said that he is jettatura—put them all to rout, and the only way that the Philharmonie rid itself of him as a conductor was by a change in the constitution which released the society from the obligation of having a conductor from the Opera, and enabled it to have "guests." And even now his enemies are trying to get him out of the Opera, but the chances are that he will win again, for, despite the deficit he has been piling up, the Viennese realize what he has done for them.

While there is no question about his genius as a conductor, the most furious controversies have raged and still rage regarding him as a composer. In Germany there seems to be no middle ground. Either must one proclaim him the greatest of all moderns or damn him as a madman, and one without the slightest suspicion of creative talent. Let a work of his be played; on one side are frantic cheers, on the other as frantic hisses and cat-calls. He is claimed by some as the coming man, who is destined to work for the preservation of the older traditions against the movement that is all for program music, for symphonic pictures of persons, things, scenes from life and systems of philosophy. He has characterized his own idea of a program as being diametrically opposed to that of Richard Strauss—his music "comes to a program as to the ultimate ideal explanation of its meaning in language. With Strauss the program is as a task set to be accomplished."

—and often resorts to most archaic practices. And yet, again, Strauss in his "Sinfonia Domestica" or "Heldenleben" never piled up such combinations of music-making elements.

His first symphony—which lasts an hour and forty minutes—is not scored with very unusual heaviness, but his second, which was performed for the first time in Hamburg just 10 years ago, is a work of enormous dimensions. It employed and orchestra of 120, an invisible brass band, two soloists and a mixed chorus. His third symphony, the "Titan," is even more formidable, lasting over two hours. This has a programme as has each of its many parts. In general, it concerns the noises of a great city. Its various parts have such names as "What the flowers tell me," "What the animals in the wood tell me," "O, man! take heed," from Nietzsche's poem of that name. The last part is a setting for female and boys' chorus of the poem of St. Peter from "Des Knaben Wunderhorn." The fourth symphony, which was performed two years ago in New York by Walter Damrosch's orchestra, is more normal as to its orchestral requirements, but it differs from the conventional in that the last movement has a contralto solo.

The fifth symphony, which Philadelphia is to hear for the first time this week, was given its premiere in Cologne at a Gurzenich concert in October, 1904. It is a long work, its performance requiring about an hour, but unlike its immediate predecessors contains no vocal part. But it is still unconventional, as in the scherzo there is a continuous obligato for solo horns. It contains three parts and five movements, the first and second parts each having two movements. The first movement is named "A Funeral Train." This is followed by a wild allegro. The sherzo, the first movement of the second part, is an old-fashioned German "landler." Then comes the slow movement and at last the finale. It is heavily scored, many extra instruments being used in the wind choirs, and practically every instrument of percusion is brought more or less into play.

RECORD
ss
FEB 11 1906

Boston Symphony Orchestra

To-morrow night's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be the last but one in the season's series and Mr. Gericke has set on it as the occasion to play in Philadelphia one of the most important and interesting works of the year. Gustav Mahler's fifth symphony, which in its revised form was played for the first time in America at the Boston concerts of February 2 and 3. It is a work of very large dimensions, consuming considerably over an hour in performance, and Mr. Gericke had a round dozen rehearsals of it before he ventured to present it in Boston.

Even among the musical folk of this country Mahler is known chiefly as a conductor, his reputation gained at the Imperial Opera in Vienna since 1897 and before that in Hamburg having given him the first place in operatic conducting in Europe. In Germany, however, if controversy be a sign of great talent, as a composer he is to be reckoned almost in the same class with Richard Strauss. Almost as much ink has been spilled over his music and quite as many dispositions ruined, as a result of that ink. In his symphonies, he works on the largest scale—one of them consuming two hours and ten minutes in performance, and there is nothing in the catalogue of music-making instruments, human and mechanical, for which he has not found use. In three of his symphonies the human voice is employed, in two of these solo voices and chorus and in one only a solo voice. In the fifth, however, he confines himself to mechanical instruments, the orchestra not much larger than is normal in present musical conditions.

Mahler, while professing the greatest admiration for Richard Strauss and his works, takes a radically different view on the subject of programme music. In respect to this fifth symphony, he explicitly asks that no annotations be made, his stand being that he music must speak for itself and that each individual auditor must take an individual impression. His theory of music is that the music should make the program, not the program the music. For this reason he has been hailed by his adherents as the one great saving factor in modern music, the man who will stem the tide of illustrating poems, books, scenes from life and systems of philosophy by means of music and will turn the coming composers back to classic simplicity, to absolute music that is really absolute with necessary modern modifications.

Owing to the length of the symphony the rest of the program will be very short. The opening number will be Weber's Overture Op. 2 "Der Freyschuetz," and then will come Sain Saens' Concerto for the Violoncello, No. 1, in A minor, which Miss Elsa Ruegger, the popular Belgian 'cellist, will play.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau of the World
INQUIRER
PHILA., Pa.
FEB 06

The Boston Symphony Orchestra

The fourth Boston Symphony Concert will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, February 12. The soloist will be Miss Elsa Ruegger, the 'cellist, who will play Saint-Saens' concerto for the violoncello, No. 1, in A minor. The opening number will be Beethoven's "Egmont" overture. The symphony will be Mahler's fifth, which, as revised by the composer had its first performances in America at the Boston concerts of the 2d and 3d of this month. The sale of seats for this concert will open at Miss Harris' ticket office, 1118 Chestnut street, on next Wednesday morning.

PUBLIC LEDGER
PHILA., PA
FEB 11 1906

[illegible] musical event of the [illegible] will be the first hearing [illegible] city of the Fifth Symphony by Gustav Mahler, to be [illegible] by the Boston Symphony Orchestra tomorrow night. Heard for the first time in the United States in Cincinnati last March, its subsequent performances [illegible] some ten days ago elicited anew interest with which this work was received in the German cities. Since the symphony was first played at Cologne in October, 1904, the composer has largely revised it. In its present form it was heard for the first time in Vienna last December. The new score shortens the hour and twenty minutes originally required for a performance of the symphony by nearly half an hour. Gustav Mahler is a composer who has given the critics of Germany something to think about. By some he is scorned or acclaimed, but rarely ignored, his compositions having given rise to more controversy that those of any other living writer, always with the exception of Richard Strauss. His works always in the grand manner. One of his symphonies consumes more than two hours in performance, while in its effort to adapt every means to the expression of thought he sometimes strains a point, introducing the use of the human voice into the symphonic form or employing every known device in musical mechanics for enriching his score. There are critics to whom his methods savor of mockery, and many of his innovations have yet to find general approval.

RECORD
PHILA., PA
FEB 18 1906

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Production of a Wonderful Work by a Viennese Composer.

Interest in the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music last evening centred in the symphony in C sharp minor by Gustav Mahler, an Austrian composer whose work was previously unknown to Philadelphia, although this particular example has been played once or twice in other parts of the country and his reputation as a conductor is familiar to concert musicians.

Mahler himself has asserted that he objected to the publication of any analysis of his symphonies and, in fact, to attempt anything of the sort without months of labor would be an impossible task. The C minor symphony is an admirable sample of his work.

It is different from Strauss in his methods. Mahler is a modern of the moderns and explores depths unplumbed by the older masters.

The symphony in C minor is a monumental and terrifying work, emotional in the extreme and touching all the vibrant chords of human nature.

The dominant effect is one of sadness; a gloom persists nearly to the end; yet the last movement is far from sad, beginning with a funeral march of great power, in which the cornet and muffled drums play a prominent part, then descends into the depths in the second movement, in A minor, and grips the nerves until we are all terror-stricken. It is blind terror, Dante's Inferno set to music, music that makes the roots of one's hair tingle and which it would be dangerous for the health to hear too much.

Then comes a Scherzo in D major, which is nothing but a big, outlandish Viennese waltz, interrupted at last by a stormy episode of melancholy character, followed by a perfect note of calm, yet through which the careless rhythm of the dance still makes itself felt.

The fourth, "adagietto, very slow," in F major, is a lyric of magical beauty for strings (including the harp) alone. The expression is that of gentle melancholy, not the soul-racking sorrow of the first movement. Last of all is a rondo-finale, allegro, in D major, which bursts forth in a song of triumph in the end. It is great big music. Music before which criticism staggers at its lack of words. Although including many novel orchestral effects, Mahler does not go as far in this respect as some of the other writers, and although his symphony is founded on the sonata form, still adhered to. It is a wonderful and awe-inspiring production.

It is useless to say its interpretation under the baton of Mr. Gericke was [illegible] in the extreme.

[illegible] it is said that the Mahler symphony takes an hour and a half to perform, it readily will be understood that [illegible] left little space on the programme for selections. As a matter of fact the symphony mentioned, a violin concerto by Saint-Saens, in C [illegible] also heard for the first time [illegible] the familiar Freischutz [illegible] up the evening's entertainment. The difficulties of the concerto are numerous—were [illegible] by Miss Elsa Rueger, who [illegible] favorable impression upon [illegible] beautiful work [illegible] hearing.

TELEGRAPH
PHILA., PA
FEB 13 1906

IN THE FIELD OF MUSIC

Boston Symphony Orchestra Plays Gustav Mahler's Remarkable Fifth Symphony.

"The Dream of the Rarebit Fiend" has at last been set to music. Gustav Mahler, the very "newest note" in the art of tones, has done the deed, but he has modestly labelled his creation merely Symphony No. 5 in C-sharp minor. It was played, or, rather, done, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night at the Academy of Music. Mahler has indeed given a great picture of a nightmare. In fact it is almost too realistic. You find it hard, at times, to realize that it is only music and not the real rarebit fiend. Mahler, in the programme book, is quoted as having once said: "If a composer, by his music, forces on his hearers the sensations which streamed through his mind, then he reaches his goal." In the light of this statement one is divided between an immense sense of pity for what Mahler must have suffered and a well-grounded indignation that he should have forced anybody else to share the same pain.

After each of the five movements of this symphony, there was a pause of indecision while the audience shook itself together, and then there came quite a generous meed of applause. This seemed to spring from two reasons. First, it has become quite the thing to approve the "newest notes" in music, and, second, it seemed a pity to watch an orchestra working so hard without showing some appreciation of their efforts. The Bostonians really did remarkable work, and every now and then they sounded as though they were all playing the same piece, in spite of the composer's evident intention to avoid this old-fashioned method of expression.

The main impression carried away from this concert was that Mahler is one-third very fine musician and two-thirds very raving maniac. The Philadelphia Orchestra has announced that this Fifth Symphony will be given by them in the near future. We had always had an idea that our public had been rather loyal and generous to the Orchestra. If they have not, they certainly have committed no sin heinous enough to merit so dire and awful a retribution. This symphony is one that might be endured after we get used to it, but, in spite of many very fine passages here and there, notably the almost great fourth movement, it hardly seems worth all the bother that it causes both orchestra and audience. It was, however, well to have heard it.

Miss Elsa Ruegger, the young 'cellist was the soloist, and in the difficult but rather uninteresting Saint Saens A minor concerto repeated the successes that she has always scored here. The other orchestral number was the Freischutz overture.

LIKELY TO AMEND SMOKE LAW

INQUIRER
PHILA., PA
FEB 12 1906

MAHLER'S FIFTH SYMPHONY

The Feature of the Boston Orchestra's Program Last Evening

There are few symphonies which can afford to be an hour long, and that by Gustav Mahler in C-sharp minor, which was the feature of the concert given by the Boston Orchestra at the Academy of Music last evening, is not one of them. It is an extraordinary work, alike in its character and in its dimensions, comprising much that is interesting, something that is beautiful and not a little that is genuinely impressive; but whether the value of its contents is proportioned to the emphasis of its proclamation is more than it would be prudent to undertake deciding on a single hearing.

Its salient character is the recurrence at frequent intervals of explosive eruptions which interrupt the flow of the ensemble, but just why these eruptions should take place with such a disconcerting reiteration is not made entirely plain. They are evidently meant to bear some kind of intimate and illuminating relation to the structure and significance of the whole scheme, but just what they stand for needs to be elucidated by the kind of diagram with which it is customary to supplement compositions of this nature, but a resort to which Mr. Mahler, who seems to be something of a humorist, strongly deprecates as regards others and in his own case expressly forbids.

Perhaps about all that can be said of the symphony at this time, and all that need be said in view of the fact that it is shortly to be repeated by the Philadelphia Orchestra, is this—that there seems to be a painful disproportion between the strenuosity of the effort made and the magnitude of the means employed on the one hand, and the importance of the result achieved on the other. It recalls the true and keen remark made by Mr. Cashel Byron about the uselessness of so much struggling and striving and about the singular circumstance that the finest and worthiest achievement is that which is the most easily accomplished.

There is no sense of effort, for instance, in Schubert's big C-major symphony, but what a difference in the impression produced! Mahler's score is tremendously difficult, and the way in which it was played under Mr. Gericke's direction was a triumph of orchestral virtuosity. The other numbers on the program were the "Der Freischutz" overture, which was superbly played, and Saint Saens' concerto for the violoncella, in which Miss Elsa Ruegger made another convincing exhibition of her incomparable talent. It is not a particularly interesting work, but it was wonderfully well done.

STAR
WASHINGTON, D.
FEB 4 1906

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The fourth Washington concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the New National Theater Tuesday afternoon, February 13, at 4:30 o'clock. Again Mr. Gericke has arranged an attractive program, as follows: Beethoven's overture, "Egmont;" Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony; Schumann's concerto for the piano, and Tschaikowsky's orchestral fantasia "Francesca da Rimini." The soloist will be the popular and distinguished pianist, Mr. Harold Bauer. Seats are now on sale at T. Arthur Smith's ticket office, 1327 F street.

POST
WASHINGTON, D.
FEB 4 1906

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The fourth Washington concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the New National Theater on Tuesday afternoon, February 13, at 4:30 o'clock. Again Mr. Gericke has arranged a delightful programme. It will be as follows: Beethoven's overture, "Egmont;" Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony; Schumann's concerto for the piano, and Tschaikowsky's orchestral fantasia "Francesca da Rimini." The soloist will be the popular and distinguished pianist, Mr. Harold Bauer.

STAR
WASHINGTON, D.
FEB 7 - 1906

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the fourth concert of the series at the National Theater on Tuesday afternoon, February 13, at 4:30. A very strong and attractive program has been arranged, which includes the following numbers, with H. Bauer, the eminent pianist, as soloist:

Overture to Goethe's "Egmont," Beethoven; unfinished symphony, Schubert; concerto for pianforte, Schumann; "Francesca da Rimini," orchestral fantasia after Dante, op. 32, Tschaikowsky.

Reserved seats are now on sale at T. Arthur Smith's, 1327 F street.

STAR
WASHINGTON, D.
FEB 11 1906

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Tuesday's Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at the National Theater will be the last but one for this season, and the Boston Symphony Quartet has, likewise, but one more concert to give in this city. The patronage that has been given to Boston's famous band has been most liberal and already there are promises that next year it will even be greater. For the fourth concert Mr. Gericke has again been happy in the choice of his program, while the soloist will be one of the most popular pianists that had ever visited this country, Mr. Harold Bauer. He will play Schumann's concerto for the piano, in A minor. It requires a very particular temperament and cast of imagination to fathom the more subtle beauties of Schumann's music, and these qualities Mr. Bauer seems to possess to a large degree.

Of all the works that have been written for the orchestra, it seems hardly too much to say that none has such a hold on the affections of music lovers as the so-called "Unfinished" symphony of Franz Schubert. All of this work that Schubert ever wrote are the first two movements and nine measures of the scherzo. In 1822 Schubert was elected an honorary member of the musical societies of Linz and Graz, and as a compliment to Graz he began this symphony in October 20 of the same year. The manuscript became the property of Schubert's good friend Joseph Huettenbrenner. In 1860 he tried to get Herbeck, conductor of the "Gesellschaft der Musicfreunde" of Vienna to produce it; but its first performance, public or otherwise, did not take place until December 17, 1865, over thirty-seven years after the death of the composer. Its number of performances since then must run far into the thousands. This will be the principal work on the program.

The first number will be Beethoven's "Egmont" overture, and the last Tschaikowsky's orchestral fantasia, "Francesca da Rimini." It is an interesting fact, in view of the popularity of this fine work of the Russian composer, that it was roundly hissed when it was first performed in Berlin. So much for first impressions. Seats now on sale at T. Arthur Smith's 1327 F street.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
TIMES
From Address WASHINGTON, D.
Date FEB 4 1906

National—Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The fourth Washington concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the New National Theater on Tuesday afternoon, February 13, at 4:30 o'clock. Again Mr. Gericke has arranged a delightful program. It will be as follows: Beethoven's overture, "Egmont" Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony Schumann's concerto for the piano, and Tschaikowsky's orchestral fantasia "Francesca da Rimini." The soloist will be the popular and distinguished pianist, Mr. Harold Bauer.

York, 1884

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
TIMES
WASHINGTON, D.
FEB 8 - 1906

National—Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the fourth concert of the series at the National Theater on Tuesday afternoon, February 13, at 4:30. A very strong and attractive program has been arranged, which includes the following numbers with H. Bauer, the eminent pianist, as soloist.

Overture to Goethe's "Egmont"....
.....Beethoven
Unfinished symphony .....Schubert
Concerto for pianoforte.....Schumann
"Francesca da Rimini," orchestral fantasia after Dante, op. 32.....
.....Tschaikowsky
Soloist—Harold Bauer.

, 1884

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
TOWN & COUNTRY
From
Address NEW YORK CITY, FEB 10 1906 FEB 10
Date

Washington

After seven years of absence, the Boston Symphony Orchestra came again to Washington. When it last played there seven long years ago, Emil Paur was the director; now Mr. Gericke is again at the helm. For the concerts, the National, Washington's largest theater with the exception of Chase's Vaudeville, has been packed to its limit. Mr. Vincent d'Indy, the famous French composer, conducted at the second concert, but somehow, he didn't "take" and his program of modern French compositions was pronounced too lugubrious. At one concert, Mrs. Roosevelt, Miss Alice, Miss Carow, Mrs. Roosevelt's sister, and Mr. Longworth occupied a box. One also espied the Baroness Rosen, the wife of the Russian Ambassador, and the seventeen-year-old Baroness Elizabeth among the audience. And what of the Washing-

TIMES
WASHINGTON, D. C
FEB 11 1906

National—Boston Symphony Orchestra.

What is the most brilliant musical season Washington has ever had is rapidly drawing to a close, for next Tuesday's Boston Symphony Orchestra concert will be the last, but one, and the Boston Symphony Quartet has likewise but one more concert to give in this city. The patronage that has been given to Boston's famous band has been magnificent and already there are promises that next year it will even be greater, which must necessarily mean that the National Theater will be absolutely sold out on subscription.

For the fourth concert Mr. Gericke has again been happy in the choice of his program, while the soloist will be one of the most popular pianists that has ever visited this country, Harold Bauer. He will play Schumann's concerto for the piano, in A minor. The history of this work in recent years is a curious example of the ebb and flow in music. Five or six years ago, it was played, it seemed, at every possible occasion until the jaded concertgoer was ready to retreat as soon as a pianist took his seat at his instrument. Then the tide turned, until during the last few years it has appeared as rarely on concert programs as an out-of-date concerto by Henselt. All the more welcome will its performance by Mr. Bauer be, since he is an acknowledged master of Schumann.

This will be the principal work on the program.

The first number will be Beethoven's "Egmont" overture, and the last, Tschaikowsky's orchestral fantasia "Francesca da Rimini." It is an interesting fact, in view of the popularity of this fine work of the Russian composer, one of the most beautiful flowers of his genius, that it was roundly hissed when it was first performed in Berlin. So much for first impressions.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
PUBLIC LEDGER
PHILA., PA
ess
FEB 11 1906

THE leading musical event of the week will be the first hearing in this city of the Fifth Symphony by Gustav Mahler, to be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra tomorrow night. Heard for the first time in the United States in Cincinnati last March, its subsequent performances at Boston some ten days ago elicited anew the interest with which this work was received in the German cities. Since the symphony was first played at Cologne in October, 1904, the composer has largely revised it. In its present form it was heard for the first time in Vienna last December. The new score shortens the hour and twenty minutes originally required for a performance of the symphony by nearly half an hour. Gustav Mahler is a composer who has given the critics of Germany something to think about. By them he is scorned or acclaimed, but never ignored, his compositions having given rise to more controversy that those of any other living writer, always with the exception of Richard Strauss. He works always in the grand manner. One of his symphonies consumes more than two hours in performance, while in his effort to adapt every means to the expression of thought he sometimes strains a point, introducing the use of the human voice into the symphonic form or employing every known device in musical mechanics for enriching his score. There are critics to whom his methods savor of trickery, and many of his innovations are yet to find general approval.

n
RECORD
ess
PHILA., PA
FEB 18 1906

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Rendition of a Wonderful Work by a Viennese Composer.

Interest in the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music last evening centred in the symphony in C sharp minor by Gustav Mahler, an Austrian composer whose work was previously unknown to Philadelphia, although this particular example has been played once or twice in other parts of the country and his reputation as a conductor is familiar to local musicians.

Mahler himself has asserted that he objected to the publication of any analysis of his symphonies and, in fact, to attempt anything of the sort without weeks of labor would be an impossible task, if the C minor symphony is an average sample of his work.

Different from Strauss in his methods, Mahler is a modern of the moderns and sounds depths unplumbed by the older musicians.

The symphony in C minor is a monumental and terrifying work, emotional in the extreme and touching all the vibrant chords of human nature.

Its dominant effect is one of sadness; the minor persists nearly to the end; yet the final movement is far from sad. Beginning with a funeral march of great beauty, in which the cornet and muffled drums play a prominent part, the composer descends into the depths in the second movement, in A minor, and works upon the nerves until we are almost terror-stricken. It is blind terror, Dante's Inferno set to music, music which makes the roots of one's hair tingle and which it would be dangerous to the health to hear too much.

After this comes a Scherzo in D major, which is nothing but a big, outdoor Viennese waltz, interrupted at last by a stormy episode of melancholy character, followed by a perfect note of sound, yet through which the careless rythm of the dance still makes itself heard.

Part four, "adagietto, very slow," in F major, is a lyric of magical beauty for the strings (including the harp) alone. Its expression is that of gentle melancholy—not the soul-racking sorrow of the second movement. Last of all is a rondo-finale, allegro, in D major, which bursts into a song of triumph in the end.

It is great big music. Music before which criticism staggers at its lack of words. Although including many novel orchestral effects, Mahler does not go as far in this respect as some of the other moderns, and although his symphony is not modeled on the sonata form, still has form. It is a wonderful and awe-inspiring production.

Needless to say its interpretation under the baton of Mr. Gericke was satisfying in the extreme.

When it is said that the Mahler symphony takes an hour and a half to perform, it readily will be understood that its rendition left little space on the program for other selections. As a matter of fact, the symphony mentioned, a violoncello concerto by Saint-Saens, in C sharp minor—also heard for the first time here—and the familiar Freischutz overture made up the evening's entertainment. The difficulties of the concerto—and they are numerous—were handled well by Miss Elsa Rueger, who made a very favorable impression upon the audience.

Even the concerto, beautiful work that it is, sinks into nothingness beside [illegible] of the Vienese composer.

TELEGRAPH.
ss
PHILA., PA
FEB 13 1906

IN THE FIELD OF MUSIC

Boston Symphony Orchestra Plays Gustav Mahler's Remarkable Fifth Symphony.

"The Dream of the Rarebit Fiend" has at last been set to music. Gustav Mahler, the very "newest note" in the art of tones, has done the deed, but he has modestly labelled his creation merely Symphony No. 5 in C-sharp minor. It was played, or, rather, done, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night at the Academy of music. Mahler has indeed given a great picture of a nightmare. In fact it is almost too realistic. You find it hard, at times, to realize that it is only music and not the real rarebit fiend. Mahler, in the programme book, is quoted as having once said: "If a composer, by his music, forces on his hearers the sensations which streamed through his mind, then he reaches his goal." In the light of this statement one is divided between an immense sense of pity for what Mahler must have suffered and a well-grounded indignation that he should have forced anybody else to share the same pain.

After each of the five movements of this symphony, there was a pause of indecision while the audience shook itself together, and then there came quite a generous meed of applause. This seemed to spring from two reasons. First, it has become quite the thing to approve the "newest notes" in music, and, second, it seemed a pity to watch an orchestra working so hard without showing some appreciation of their efforts. The Bostonians really did remarkable work, and every now and then they sounded as though they were all playing the same piece, in spite of the composer's evident intention to avoid this old-fashioned method of expression.

The main impression carried away from this concert was that Mahler is one-third very fine musician and two-thirds very raving maniac. The Philadelphia Orchestra has announced that this Fifth Symphony will be given by them in the near future. We had always had an idea that our public had been rather loyal and generous to the Orchestra. If they have not, they certainly have committed no sin heinous enough to merit so dire and awful a retribution. This symphony is one that might be endured after we get used to it, but, in spite of many very fine passages here and there, notably the almost great fourth movement, it hardly seems worth all the bother that it causes both orchestra and audience. It was, however, well to have heard it.

Miss Elsa Ruegger, the young 'cellist was the soloist, and in the difficult but rather uninteresting Saint Saens A minor concerto repeated the successes that she has always scored here. The other orchestral number was the Freischutz overture.

LIKELY TO AMEND SMOKE LAW

m INQUIRER
iress PHILA., PA
FEB 18 1906

MAHLER'S FIFTH SYMPHONY

The Feature of the Boston Orchestra's Program Last Evening

There are few symphonies which can afford to be an hour long, and that by Gustav Mahler in C-sharp minor, which was the feature of the concert given by the Boston Orchestra at the Academy of Music last evening, is not one of them. It is an extraordinary work, alike in its character and in its dimensions, comprising much that is interesting, something that is beautiful and not a little that is genuinely impressive; but whether the value of its contents is proportioned to the emphasis of its proclamation is more than it would be prudent to undertake deciding on a single hearing.

Its salient character is the recurrence at frequent intervals of explosive eruptions which interrupt the flow of the ensemble, but just why these eruptions should take place with such a disconcerting reiteration is not made entirely plain. They are evidently meant to bear some kind of intimate and illuminating relation to the structure and significance of the whole scheme, but just what they stand for needs to be elucidated by the kind of diagram with which it is customary to supplement compositions of this nature, but a resort to which Mr. Mahler, who seems to be something of a humorist, strongly deprecates as regards others and in his own case expressly forbids.

Perhaps about all that can be said of the symphony at this time, and all that need be said in view of the fact that it is shortly to be repeated by the Philadelphia Orchestra, is this—that there seems to be a painful disproportion between the strenuosity of the effort made and the magnitude of the means employed on the one hand, and the importance of the result achieved on the other. It recalls the true and keen remark made by Mr. Cashel Byron about the uselessness of so much struggling and striving and about the singular circumstance that the finest and worthiest achievement is that which is the most easily accomplished.

There is no sense of effort, for instance, in Schubert's big C-major symphony, but what a difference in the impression produced! Mahler's score is tremendously difficult, and the way in which it was played under Mr. Gericke's direction was a triumph of orchestral virtuosity. The other numbers on the program were the "Der Freischutz" overture, which was superbly played, and Saint Saens' concerto for the violoncella, in which Miss Elsa Ruegger made another convincing exhibition of her incomparable talent. It is not a particularly interesting work, but it was wonderfully well done.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World n STAR
ress WASHINGTON, D. C.
e 1906

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The fourth Washington concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the New National Theater Tuesday afternoon, February 13, at 4:30 o'clock. Again Mr. Gericke has arranged an attractive program, as follows: Beethoven's overture, "Egmont;" Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony; Schumann's concerto for the piano, and Tschaikowsky's orchestral fantasia "Francesca da Rimini." The soloist will be the popular and distinguished pianist, Mr. Harold Bauer. Seats are now on sale at T. Arthur Smith's ticket office, 1327 F street.

POST
WASHINGTON, D. C.
FEB 4 1906

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The fourth Washington concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the New National Theater on Tuesday afternoon, February 13, at 4:30 o'clock. Again Mr. Gericke has arranged a delightful programme. It will be as follows: Beethoven's overture, "Egmont;" Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony; Schumann's concerto for the piano, and Tschaikowsky's orchestral fantasia "Francesca da Rimini." The soloist will be the popular and distinguished pianist, Mr. Harold Bauer.

rom STAR
ddress WASHINGTON, D. C.
ate FEB 7 - 1906

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the fourth concert of the series at the National Theater on Tuesday afternoon, February 13, at 4:30. A very strong and attractive program has been arranged, which includes the following numbers, with H. Bauer, the eminent pianist, as soloist:

Overture to Goethe's "Egmont," Beethoven; unfinished symphony, Schubert; concerto for pianforte, Schumann; "Francesca da Rimini," orchestral fantasia after Dante, op. 32, Tschaikowsky.

Reserved seats are now on sale at T. Arthur Smith's, 1327 F street.

STAR
WASHINGTON, D. C.
FEB 11 1906

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Tuesday's Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at the National Theater will be the last but one for this season, and the Boston Symphony Quartet has, likewise, but one more concert to give in this city. The patronage that has been given to Boston's famous band has been most liberal and already there are promises that next year it will even be greater. For the fourth concert Mr. Gericke has again been happy in the choice of his program, while the soloist will be one of the most popular pianists that had ever visited this country, Mr. Harold Bauer. He will play Schumann's concerto for the piano, in A minor. It requires a very particular temperament and cast of imagination to fathom the more subtle beauties of Schumann's music, and these qualities Mr. Bauer seems to possess to a large degree.

Of all the works that have been written for the orchestra, it seems hardly too much to say that none has such a hold on the affections of music lovers as the so-called "Unfinished" symphony of Franz Schubert. All of this work that Schubert ever wrote are the first two movements and nine measures of the scherzo. In 1822 Schubert was elected an honorary member of the musical societies of Linz and Graz, and as a compliment to Graz he began this symphony in October 20 of the same year. The manuscript became the property of Schubert's good friend Joseph Huettenbrenner. In 1860 he tried to get Herbeck, conductor of the "Gesellschaft der Musicfreunde" of Vienna to produce it, but its first performance, public or otherwise, did not take place until December 17, 1865, over thirty-seven years after the death of the composer. Its number of performances since then must run far into the thousands. This will be the principal work on the program.

The first number will be Beethoven's "Egmont" overture, and the last Tschaikowsky's orchestral fantasia, "Francesca da Rimini." It is an interesting fact, in view of the popularity of this fine work of the Russian composer, that it was roundly hissed when it was first performed in Berlin. So much for first impressions. Seats now on sale at T. Arthur Smith's 1327 F street.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
TIMES
From
Address
Date FEB 4 1906

National—Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The fourth Washington concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the New National Theater on Tuesday afternoon, February 13, at 4:30 o'clock. Again Mr. Gericke has arranged a delightful program. It will be as follows: Beethoven's overture "Egmont;" Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony; Schuinann's concerto for the piano, and Tschaikowsky's orchestral fantasia "Francesca da Rimini." The soloist will be the popular and distinguished pianist, Harold Bauer.

York, 1884

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
TIMES
n ress WASHINGTON, D. C.
FEB 8 - 1906
e

National—Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the fourth concert of the series at the National Theater on Tuesday afternoon, February 13, at 4:30. A very strong and attractive program has been arranged, which includes the following numbers with H. Bauer, the eminent pianist, as soloist.

Overture to Goethe's "Egmont"... Beethoven
Unfinished symphony ..... Schubert
Concerto for pianoforte..... Schumann
"Francesca da Rimini," orchestral fantasia after Dante, op. 32..... Tschaikowsky Soloist—Harold Bauer.

k, 1884

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From
Address
Date

Washington

After seven years of absence, the Boston Symphony Orchestra came again to Washington. When it last played there seven long years ago, Emil Paur was the director; now Mr. Gericke is again at the helm. For the concerts, the National, Washington's largest theater with the exception of Chase's Vaudeville, has been packed to its limit. Mr. Vincent d'Indy, the famous French composer, conducted at the second concert, but somehow, he didn't "take" and his program of modern French compositions was pronounced to lugubrious. At one concert, Mrs. Roosevelt, Miss Alice, Miss Carow, Mrs. Roosevelt's sister, and Mr. Longworth occupied a box. One also espies the Baroness Rosen, the wife of the Russian Ambassador, and the seventeen-year old Baroness Elizabeth among the audience. And what of the Washington

TIMES
FEB 11 1906

National—Boston Symphony Orchestra.

What is the most brilliant musical season Washington has ever had is rapidly drawing to a close, for next Tuesday's Boston Symphony Orchestra concert will be the last, but one, and the Boston Symphony uQartet has likewise but one more concert to give in this city. The patronage that has been given to Boston's famous band has been magnificent and already there are promises that next year it will even be greater, which must necessarily mean that the National Theater will be absolutely sold out on subscription.

For the fourth concert Mr. Gericke has again been happy in the choice of his program, while the soloist will be one of the most popular pianists that has ever visited this country, Harold Bauer. He will play Schumann's concerto for the piano, in A minor. The history of this work in recent years is a curious example of the ebb and flow in music. Five or six years ago, it was played, it seemed, at every possible occasion until the jaded concertgoer was ready to retreat as soon as a pianist took his seat at his instrument. Then the tide turned, until during the last few years it has appeared as rarely on concert programs as an out-of-date concerto by Henselt. All the more welcome will its performance by Mr. Bauer be, since he is an acknowledged master of Schumann.

This will be the principal work on the program.

The first number will be Beethoven's "Egmont" overture, and the last, Tschaikowsky's orchestral fantasia "Francesca da Rimini." It is an interesting fact, in view of the popularity of this fine work of the Russian composer, one of the most beautiful flowers of his genius, that it was roundly hissed when it was first performed in Berlin. So much for first impressions.

[161]

TIMES.

WASHINGTON, D. C.

FEB 14 1906

BAUER SHOWS HIMSELF OF FOREMOST RANK

Pianist Won Genuine Triumph by Superb Playing at Boston Symphony Orchestra's Concert.

Harold Bauer can lay claim to a foremost position in the ranks of piano virtuosi now performing in this country.

This was made plain when he appeared as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the National Theater yesterday afternoon. His is more of a poetic than a bombastic temperament and he could hardly have selected a composition better fitted to make this plain than the Schumann concerto in A minor.

In each of the movements, romance in contrapuntal form is worked into an acute demand for technique. Nothing in the way of heroics is reached for, but there is a demand for sentiment which must be displayed throughout.

And it was in this particular that Bauer showed his superb conception of the writing. His is a liquid touch following a finger method peculiarly his own and much of the type of Kullak. His performance of the concluding vivace was a distinct triumph, which was met with bravos from all over the house.

Kapellmeister Willy Hess conducted the orchestral obligato for this and did fairly well.

The orchestral numbers were introduced with the Beethoven overture to Goethe's "Egmont." Director Gericke, as usual, gave the work a splendid reading and the orchestra responded in kind.

That ever enjoyable Unfinished Symphony in B minor, by Shubert, was played as only the Boston orchestra can play it. Director Gericke took a few liberties with tempi in the first movement where the counter theme for cello and first strings becomes prominent, but the departure from an old custom by no means detracted from the finish of the performance.

Tschaikowsky's "Francesca de Rimini" fantasie concluded the performance and proved a fitting climax to an artistic concert.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the NEWS

BALTIMORE, MD

FEB 10

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Orchestra's Last Appearance But One This Season Next Week.

The musical season of 1905-6 is swiftly nearing its end, and Wednesday's Boston Symphony concert in the Lyric will be the last but one of the present series. The season, so far as the Orchestra is concerned, has been highly gratifying in every sense of the word. Baltimore's patronage of the Orchestra has shown a substantial increase over that of all previous years, and in return it is questionable whether the Orchestra has ever given such an interesting set of concerts.

For this fourth concert there will be two soloists, a violinist and a pianist. The violinist will be Marie Hall, who this season has been repeatng the wonderful success that has rewarded her playing in Europe and in England. The pianist will be Mr. Heinrich Gebhard, a young Bostonian who has been making a mark in this country since his return from Europe a few years ago. Much of Mr. Gebhard's work has been done with chamber music organizations, such as the Kneisel Quartette and the Longy Club, but he is a concert pianist of great brilliancy.

Last December at the concert of French music under the personal direction of the composer, Vincent d'Indy's symphony in B-flat major was played here in Baltimore. At the coming concert his first symphony, written for piano and orchestra, will be played here for the first time.

The "Adagietto," from Mahler's fifth symphony, brings to the attention of Baltimore music-lovers for the first time a man who, in the estimation of connoisseurs is one of the most significant figures in modern music. Gustav Mahler, for the last nine years first conductor and director of the Imperial Opera of Vienna, is best known in this country in that capacity, for he is called the greatest operatic conductor in the world. He has written six symphonies, of which only the fourth and fifth have been played in America. They are enormous works—three of them using chorus or solo voices, or both, and one of them lasting more than two hours. The fifth, which in its revised form was played for the first time by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston, February 2 and 3, requires an hour and three-quarters for performance. It made a most profound impression on the Boston public. The movement, which will be played here, is regarded by many as the most attractive.

Tschaikowsky's orchestra fantasia, "Francesca da Rimini," has long stood as one of the finest fruits of the great Russian's genius. It contains in the highest degree the qualities which have made his music so popular.

The program in detail is:

Symphony No. 2—For piano and orchestra, on a mountain air....V. d'Indy
Concerto for violin, in E minor.....Mendelssohn
"Adagietto," from Symphony No. 5.....Mahler
(First Time.)
Orchestral Fantasia, "Francesca da Rimini".....Tschaikowsky

BALTIMORE, MD.

FEB 9- 1906

The Musical World

Miss Marie Hall.

Miss Hall will be the violin soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyric next Wednesday evening.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The musical season of 1905-6 is swiftly nearing its end, and next Wednesday's Boston Symphony concert, at the Lyric, will be the last but one of the present series. The season, so far as the orchestra is concerned, has been highly gratifying in every sense of the word. Baltimore's patronage of the orchestra has shown a substantial increase over that of all previous years, and, in return, it is questionable whether the orchestra has ever given such an interesting set of concerts.

For this fourth concert there will be two soloists, a violinist and a pianist. The violinist will be Miss Marie Hall, who this season has been repeating the success that has rewarded her playing in Europe and in England. While it is only fair to say that this young English girl has a wonderful future before her as an artist—for she has by no means reached her full artistic stature—it is unfair to say this if with the statement is carried the implication that she is still immature. Few women have played the violin in this country that have commanded such a mastery over the technique of the instrument, and have united with this mastery such musical feeling and musical taste. As she grows older she will grow greater, for neither a boy nor a girl of 21 has reached the high goal for which all true artists are continually striving.

The pianist will be Heinrich Gebhard, a young Bostonian, who has been making a mark in this country since his return from Europe a few years ago. Much of Mr. Gebhard's work has been done with chamber music organizations, such as the Kneisel Quartet and the Longy Club.

Taken all in all, the program, which has been arranged for this concert, is the most interesting the orchestra has presented to its Baltimore patrons this year. With the single exception of the classic Mendelssohn Concerto it is entirely modern music.

Last December, at the concert of French music, under the personal direction of the composer, Vincent d'Indy's symphony in B flat major, was played here in Baltimore. At the coming concert his first symphony, written for piano and orchestra, will be played here for the first time. This, a much earlier work of the composer, is much more popular, and when played in New York earlier in the season made a better impression. While the piano is not a solo instrument in it, as in a concerto, it has much grateful work to do. The official designation of the work adds that it is "on a mountain air." In other words, d'Indy has used as his basic theme, one of the best known folk-tunes of the Vosges Mountains, where he was born and reared.

The Adagietto from Mahler's fifth symphony brings to the attention of Baltimore music-lovers for the first time a man who, in the estimation of connoisseurs, is one of the most significant figures in modern music. Gustav Mahler, for the last nine years first conductor and director of the Imperial Opera of Vienna, is best known in this country in that capacity, for he is called the greatest operatic conductor in the world. He has written six symphonies, of which only the fourth and fifth have been played in America. They are enormous works—three of them using chorus or solo voices, or both, and one of them lasting over two hours. The fifth, which in its revised form was played for the first time by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston, February 2 and 3, requires an hour and three-quarters for performance. It made a most profound impression on the Boston public. The movement, which will be played here, is regarded by many as the most attractive.

Tschaikowsky's orchestra fantasia, "Francesca da Rimini," has long stood as one of the finest fruits of the great Russian's genius. It contains in the highest degree the qualities which have made his music so popular.

The program in detail is:

V. d'Indy—Symphony No. 2, for piano and orchestra, on a mountain air.
Mendelssohn—Concerto for violin in E minor.
Mahler—Adagietto from Symphony No. 5.

SUN.

BALTIMORE, MD.

FEB 11 1906

The musical season of 1905-6 is swiftly nearing its end and Wednesday's Boston Symphony concert at the Lyric will be the last but one of the present series. The season, so far as the Boston Symphony Orchestra is concerned, has been highly gratifying. Baltimore's patronage of the orchestra has shown a substantial increase over that of all previous years and in return it is questionable whether the orchestra has ever given such an interesting series of concerts.

For the fourth concert there will be two soloists, a violinist and a pianist. The violinist will be Marie Hall, who this season has been repeating the wonderful success that rewarded her playing in Europe. Few women have played the violin in this country that have commanded such a mastery over the technique of the instrument and have united with this mastery such exquisite musical feeling and faultless musical taste. As she grows older Marie Hall will grow greater, for neither a boy nor girl of 21 has reached the high goal for which all true artists are continually striving. In her appearances this season with the Boston Symphony Orchestra Miss Hall has won the unanimous praise of the public, critical and lay, and her playing of the Mendelssohn concerto here will be well worth hearing.

The pianist will be Mr. Heinrich Gebhard, a young Bostonian, who has been making a mark in this country since his return from Europe a few years ago. Much of Mr. Gebhard's work has been done with chamber music organizations, such as the Kneisel Quartet and the Longy Club, but he is a concert pianist of considerable brilliancy.

Taken all in all, the program which has been arranged for Wednesday evening is the most interesting the Boston Symphony Orchestra has presented to its Baltimore patrons in many years. With the single exception of the classic Mendelssohn concerto it is entirely modern music.

Last December, at the concert of French music, under the personal direction of the composer, Vincent d'Indy's symphony in B-flat major was played here. Wednesday night D'Indy's first symphony, written for piano and orchestra, will be played for the first time. This, a much earlier work of the composer, is much more popular, and when played in New York earlier in the season made a delightful impression. While the piano is not a solo instrument in the symphony as in a concerto, it has much grateful work to do. The official designation of the work adds that it is "on a mountain air." In other words, D'Indy has used as his basic theme one of the best known folk-tunes of the Vosges Mountains, where he was born and brought up.

The adagietto, from Mahler's fifth symphony, brings to the attention of Baltimore music lovers for the first time a man who, in the estimation of connoisseurs, is one of the most significant figures in modern music. Gustav Mahler, for the last nine years first conductor and director of the Imperial Opera of Vienna, is best known in this country in that capacity, for he is called the greatest operatic conductor in the world. He has written six symphonies, of which only the fourth and fifth have been played in America. They are enormous works—three of them using chorus or solo voices, or both, and one of them lasting more than two hours. The fifth, which in its revised form was played for the first time by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston on February 2 and 3, requires an hour and three-quarters for performance. It made a deep impression on the Boston public. The movement which will be played here is regarded by many as the most attractive.

Tschaikowsky's orchestra fantasia, "Francesca da Rimini," has long stood as one of the finest fruits of the great Russian's genius. It contains in the highest degree the qualities which have made his music so popular. The program in detail is:

Symphony, No. 2, for piano and orchestra on a mountain air.....D'Indy
Concerto for violin in E minor.....Mendelssohn
Adagietto from Symphony, No. 5 (first time).....Mahler
Orchestral Fantasia—"Francesca da Dimini."

NEWS

BALTIMORE, MD.

FEB 3- 1906

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Marie Hall And Heinrich Gebhard The Soloists.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will bring to Baltimore at its next concert on Wednesday evening, February 14, two soloists, for the second time this season. One will be the charming young English violinist, Miss Marie Hall, and the other will be the distinguished pianist, Mr. Heinrich Gebhard.

The programme promises to be one of the most interesting of the year. It is as follows:

Symphony, No. 1 (for pianoforte and orchestra), "On a Mountain Air".....Vincent d'Indy
Concerto (for violin and orchestra), in E minor.....Mendelssohn
Adagietto, from Symphony No. 5 (new).....Mahler
Orchestra Fantasia, "Francesca da Rimini".....Tschaikowsky

Seats go on sale for this concert on next Wednesday at Albaugh's.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the AMERICA

From

Address BALTIMORE.

Date FEB 11

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The musical season of 1905-6 is swiftly nearing its end, and Wednesday's Boston Symphony concert in the Lyric will be the last but one of the present series. The season, so far as the orchestra is concerned, has been highly gratifying in every sense of the word.

For this fourth concert there will be two soloists, a violinist and a pianist. The violinist will be Marie Hall, who this season, has been repeating the wonderful success that has rewarded her playing in Europe and in England. While it is only fair to say that this young English girl has a wonderful future before her as an artist—for she has by no means reached her full artistic stature—it is unfair to say this if with the statement is carried the implication that she is still immature. Few women have played the violin in this country that have commanded such a mastery over the technique of the instrument and have united with this mastery such exquisite musical feeling and faultless musical taste.

The pianist will be Mr. Heinrich Gebhard, a young Bostonian, who has been making a mark in this country since his return from Europe a few years ago. Much of Mr. Gebhard's work has been done with chamber music organizations, such as the Kneisel Quartet and the Longy Club, but he is a concert pianist of great brilliancy.

Taken all in all, the program which has been arranged for this concert is the most interesting the Boston Symphony Orchestra has presented to its Baltimore patrons in many years. With the single exception of the classic Mendelssohn concerto, it is entirely modern music.

Last December at the concert of French music, under the personal direction of the composer, Vincent d'Indy's symphony in B flat major was played here in Baltimore. At the coming concert his first symphony, written for piano and orchestra, will be played here for the first time. The official designation of the work adds that it is "on a mountain air." In other words, d'Indy has used as his basic theme one of the best known folk tunes of the Vosges Mountains, where he was born and brought up.

The "adagietto," from Mahler's fifth symphony, brings to the attention of Baltimore music-lovers for the first time a man who, in the estimation of connoisseurs, is one of the most significant figures in modern music.

Tschaikowsky's orchestra fantasia "Francesca da Rimini" has long stood as one of the finest fruits of the great Russian's genius. It contains in the highest degree the qualities which have made his music so popular.

HERALD

BALTIMORE, MD.

FEB 3- 1906

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will bring to Baltimore at its next concert, on Wednesday evening, February 14, two soloists, for the second time this season. One will be the young English violinist, Miss Marie Hall, and the other will be the pianist Heinrich Gebhard. The program is as follows:

Vincent D'Indy—Symphony, No. 1, for pianoforte and orchestra on a moutain air.
Mendelssohn—Concerto for violin and orchestra in E minor.
Mahler—Adagietto from Symphony, No. 5 (new).
Tschaikowsky—Orchestra fantasia "Francesca da Rimini."

Seats go on sale for this concert next Wednesday at Albaugh's.

Newspaper Cutting AMERICA

From BALTIMORE, MD.

Address

FEB 4- 1906

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will bring to Baltimore at its next concert, on Wednesday evening, February 14, two soloists for the second time this season. One will be the charming young English violinist, Miss Marie Hall, and the other will be the distinguished pianist, Mr. Heinrich Gebhard. The program promises to be one of the most interesting of the year. It is as follows: Vincent d'Indy—Symphony No. 1, for pianoforte and orchestra, on a "Mountain Air." Mendelssohn—Concerto for violin and orchestra in E minor; Mahler-Adagietto from Symphony No. 5 (new). Tschaikowsky—Orchestra fantasia "Francesca da Rimini." Seats go on sale for this concert on next Wednesday at Albaugh's.

[162]

TIMES.
FEB 14 1906

BAUER SHOWS HIMSELF OF FOREMOST RANK

Pianist Won Genuine Triumph by Superb Playing at Boston Symphony Orchestra's Concert.

Harold Bauer can lay claim to a foremost position in the ranks of piano virtuosi now performing in this country.

This was made plain when he appeared as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the National Theater yesterday afternoon. His is more of a poetic than a bombastic temperament and he could hardly have selected a composition better fitted to make this plain than the Schumann concerto in A minor.

In each of the movements, romance in contrapuntal form is worked into an acute demand for technique. Nothing in the way of heroics is reached for, but there is a demand for sentiment which must be displayed throughout.

And it was in this particular that Bauer showed his superb conception of the writing. His is a liquid touch following a finger method peculiarly his own and much of the type of Kullak. His performance of the concluding vivace was a distinct triumph, which was met with bravos from all over the house.

Kapellmeister Willy Hess conducted the orchestral obligato for this and did fairly well.

The orchestral numbers were introduced with the Beethoven overture to Goethe's "Egmont." Director Gericke, as usual, gave the work a splendid reading and the orchestra responded in kind.

That ever enjoyable Unfinished Symphony in B minor, by Shubert, was played as only the Boston orchestra can play it. Director Gericke took a few liberties with tempi in the first movement where the counter theme for cello and first strings becomes prominent, but the departure from an old custom by no means detracted from the finish of the performance.

Tschaikowsky's "Francesca de Rimini" fantasie concluded the performance and proved a fitting climax to an artistic concert.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
FEB 10

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Orchestra's Last Appearance But One This Season Next Week.

The musical season of 1905-6 is swiftly nearing its end, and Wednesday's Boston Symphony concert in the Lyric will be the last but one of the present series. The season, so far as the Orchestra is concerned, has been highly gratifying in every sense of the word. Baltimore's patronage of the Orchestra has shown a substantial increase over that of all previous years, and in return it is questionable whether the Orchestra has ever given such an interesting set of concerts.

For this fourth concert there will be two soloists, a violinist and a pianist. The violinist will be Marie Hall, who this season has been repeatng the wonderful success that has rewarded her playing in Europe and in England. The pianist will be Mr. Heinrich Gebhard, a young Bostonian who has been making a mark in this country since his return from Europe a few years ago. Much of Mr. Gebhard's work has been done with chamber music organizations, such as the Kneisel Quartette and the Longy Club, but he is a concert pianist of great brilliancy.

Last December at the concert of French music under the personal direction of the composer, Vincent d'Indy's symphony in B-flat major was played here in Baltimore. At the coming concert his first symphony, written for piano and orchestra, will be played here for the first time.

The "Adagietto," from Mahler's fifth symphony, brings to the attention of Baltimore music-lovers for the first time a man who, in the estimation of connoisseurs is one of the most significant figures in modern music. Gustav Mahler, for the last nine years first conductor and director of the Imperial Opera of Vienna, is best known in this country in that capacity, for he is called the greatest operatic conductor in the world. The programme in detail is:

Symphony No. 2—For piano and orchestra, on a mountain air....V. d'Indy
Concerto for violin, in E minor.....
"Adaggietto," from Symphony No. 5... Mendelssohn
..... Mahler
(First Time.)
Orchestral Fantasia, "Francesca da Rimini" .....Tschaikowsky

HERALD
BALTIMORE, MD.
FEB 9- 1906

The Musical World

Miss Marie Hall

Miss Hall will be the violin soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyric next Wednesday evening.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The musical season of 1905-6 is swiftly nearing its end, and next Wednesday's Boston Symphony concert, at the Lyric, will be the last but one of the present series. The season, so far as the orchestra is concerned, has been highly gratifying in every sense of the word. Baltimore's patronage of the orchestra has shown a substantial increase over that of all previous years, and, in return, it is questionable whether the orchestra has ever given such an interesting set of concerts.

For this fourth concert there will be two soloists, a violinist and a pianist. The violinist will be Miss Marie Hall, who this season has been repeating the success that has rewarded her playing in Europe and in England. While it is only fair to say that this young English girl has a wonderful future before her as an artist—for she has by no means reached her full artistic stature—it is unfair to say this if with the statement is carried the implication that she is still immature. Few women have played the violin in this country that have commanded such a mastery over the technique of the instrument, and have united with this mastery such musical feeling and musical taste. As she grows older she will grow greater, for neither a boy nor a girl of 21 has reached the high goal for which all true artists are continually striving.

The pianist will be Heinrich Gebhard, a young Bostonian, who has been making a mark in this country since his return from Europe a few years ago. Much of Mr. Gebhard's work has been done with chamber music organizations, such as the Kneisel Quartet and the Longy Club.

Taken all in all, the program, which has been arranged for this concert, is the most interesting the orchestra has presented to its Baltimore patrons this year. With the single exception of the classic Mendelssohn Concerto it is entirely modern music.

Last December, at the concert of French music, under the personal direction of the composer, Vincent d'Indy's symphony in B flat major, was played here in Baltimore. At the coming concert his first symphony, written for piano and orchestra, will be played here for the first time. This, a much earlier work of the composer, is much more popular, and when played in New York earlier in the season made a better impression. While the piano is not a solo instrument in it, as in a concerto, it has much grateful work to do. The official designation of the work adds that it is "on a mountain air." In other words, d'Indy has used as his basic theme, one of the best known folk-tunes of the Vosges Mountains, where he was born and reared.

The Adagietto from Mahler's fifth symphony brings to the attention of Baltimore music-lovers for the first time a man who, in the estimation of connoisseurs, is one of the most significant figures in modern music. Gustav Mahler, for the last nine years first conductor and director of the Imperial Opera of Vienna, is best known in this country in that capacity, for he is called the greatest operatic conductor in the world. He has written six symphonies, of which only the fourth and fifth have been played in America. They are enormous works—three of them using chorus or solo voices, or both, and one of them lasting over two hours. The fifth, which in its revised form was played for the first time by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston, February 2 and 3, requires an hour and three-quarters for performance. It made a most profound impression on the Boston public. The movement, which will be played here, is regarded by many as the most attractive.

Tschaikowsky's orchestra fantasia, "Francesca da Rimini," has long stood as one of the finest fruits of the great Russian's genius. It contains in the highest degree the qualities which have mads his music so popular.

The program in detail is:

V. d'Indy—Symphony No. 2, for piano and orchestra, on a mountain air.
Mendelssohn—Concerto for violin in E minor.
Mahler—Adagietto from Symphony No. 5. (First time.)
Tschaikowsky—Orchestral Fantasia, "Francesca da Rimini."

[162]

SUN.
BALTIMORE, MD.
FEB 11 1906

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The musical season of 1905-6 is swiftly nearing its end and Wednesday's Boston Symphony concert at the Lyric will be the last but one of the present series. The season, so far as the Boston Symphony Orchestra is concerned, has been highly gratifying. Baltimore's patronage of the orchestra has shown a substantial increase over that of all previous years and in return it is questionable whether the orchestra has ever given such an interesting series of concerts.

For the fourth concert there will be two soloists, a violinist and a pianist. The violinist will be Marie Hall, who this season has been repeating the wonderful success that rewarded her playing in Europe. Few women have played the violin in this country that have commanded such a mastery over the technique of the instrument and have united with this mastery such exquisite musical feeling and faultless musical taste. As she grows older Marie Hall will grow greater, for neither a boy nor girl of 21 has reached the high goal for which all true artists are continually striving. In her appearances this season with the Boston Symphony Orchestra Miss Hall has won the unanimous praise of the public, critical and lay, and her playing of the Mendelssohn concerto here will be well worth hearing.

The pianist will be Mr. Heinrich Gebhard, a young Bostonian, who has been making a mark in this country since his return from Europe a few years ago. Much of Mr. Gebhard's work has been done with chamber music organizations, such as the Kneisel Quartet and the Longy Club, but he is a concert pianist of considerable brilliancy.

Taken all in all, the program which has been arranged for Wednesday evening is the most interesting the Boston Symphony Orchestra has presented to its Baltimore patrons in many years. With the single exception of the classic Mendelssohn concerto it is entirely modern music.

Last December, at the concert of French music, under the personal direction of the composer, Vincent d'Indy's symphony in B-flat major was played here. Wednesday night D'Indy's first symphony, written for piano and orchestra, will be played for the first time. This, a much earlier work of the composer, is much more popular, and when played in New York earlier in the season made a delightful impression. While the piano is not a solo instrument in the symphony as in a concerto, it has much grateful work to do. The official designation of the work adds that it is "on a mountain air." In other words, D'Indy has used as his basic theme one of the best known folk-tunes of the Vosges Mountains, where he was born and brought up.

The adagietto, from Mahler's fifth symphony, brings to the attention of Baltimore music lovers for the first time a man who, in the estimation of connoisseurs, is one of the most significant figures in modern music. Gustav Mahler, for the last nine years first conductor and director of the Imperial Opera of Vienna, is best known in this country in that capacity, for he is called the greatest operatic conductor in the world. He has written six symphonies, of which only the fourth and fifth have been played in America. They are enormous works—three of them using chorus or solo voices, or both, and one of them lasting more than two hours. The fifth, which in its revised form was played for the first time by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston on February 2 and 3, requires an hour and three-quarters for performance. It made a deep impression on the Boston public. The movement which will be played here is regarded by many as the most attractive.

Tschaikowsky's orchestra fantasia, "Francesca da Rimini," has long stood as one of the finest fruits of the great Russian's genius. It contains in the highest degree the qualities which have made his music so popular. The program in detail is:

Symphony, No. 2, for piano and orchestra on a mountain air.....D'Indy
Concerto for violin in E minor.....Mendelssohn
Adagietto from Symphony, No. 5 (first time), Mahler
Orchestral Fantasia—"Francesca da Dimini," Tschaikowsky

NEWS
BALTIMORE, MD.
FEB - 1906

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Marie Hall And Heinrich Gebhard The Soloists.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will bring to Baltimore at its next concert on Wednesday evening, February 14, two soloists, for the second time this season. One will be the charming young English violinist, Miss Marie Hall, and the other will be the distinguished pianist, Mr. Heinrich Gebhard.

The programme promises to be one of the most interesting of the year. It is as follows:

Symphony, No. 1 (for pianoforte and orchestra), "On a Mountain Air" .....Vincent d'Indy
Concerto (for violin and orchestra), in E minor.....Mendelssohn
Adagietto, from Symphony No. 5 (new)..... Mahler
Orchestra Fantasia, "Francesca da Rimini"..... Tschaikowsky

Seats go on sale for this concert on next Wednesday at Albaugh's.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From AMERICA
Address BALTIMORE, MD.
Date FEB 11 1906

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The musical season of 1905-1906 is swiftly nearing its end, and Wednesday a Boston Symphony concert in the Lyric will be the last but one of the present series. The season, so far as the orchestra is concerned, has been highly gratifying in every sense of the word.

For this fourth concert there will be two soloists, a violinist and a pianist. The violinist will be Marie Hall, who, this season, has been repeating the wonderful success that has rewarded her playing in Europe and in England. While it is only fair to say that this young English girl has a wonderful future before her as an artist—for she has by no means reached her full artistic stature—it is unfair to say this if with the statement is carried the implication that she is still immature. Few women have played the violin in this country that have commanded such a mastery over the technique of the instrument and have united with this mastery such exquisite musical feeling and faultless musical taste.

The pianist will be Mr. Heinrich Gebhard, a young Bostonian, who has been making a mark in this country since his return from Europe a few years ago. Much of Mr. Gebhard's work has been done with chamber music organizations, such as the Kneisel Quartet and the Longy Club, but he is a concert pianist of great brilliancy.

Taken all in all, the program which has been arranged for this concert is the most interesting the Boston Symphony Orchestra has presented to its Baltimore patrons in many years. With the single exception of the classic Mendelssohn concerto, it is entirely modern music.

Last December at the concert of French music, under the personal direction of the composer, Vincent d'Indy's symphony in B flat major was played here in Baltimore. At the coming concert his first symphony, written for piano and orchestra, will be played here for the first time. The official designation of the work adds that it is "on a mountain air." In other words, d'Indy has used as his basic theme one of the best known folk tunes of the Vosges Mountains, where he was born and brought up.

The "adagietto," from Mahler's fifth symphony, brings to the attention of Baltimore music-lovers for the first time a man who, in the estimation of connoisseurs, is one of the most significant figures in modern music.

Tschaikowsky's orchestra fantasia "Francesca da Rimini" has long stood as one of the finest fruits of the great Russian's genius. It contains in the highest degree the qualities which have made his music so popular.

HERALD
BALTIMORE, MD.
FEB 5- 1906

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will bring to Baltimore at its next concert, on Wednesday evening, February 14, two soloists, for the second time this season. One will be the young English violinist Miss Marie Hall, and the other will be the pianist Heinrich Gebhard. The program is as follows:

Vincent D'Indy—Symphony, No. 1, for pianoforte and orchestra on a moutain air.
Mendelssohn—Concerto for violin and orchestra in E minor.
Mahler—Adagietto from Symphony, No. 5 (new).
Tschaikowsky—Orchestra fantasia "Francesca da Rimini."

Seats go on sale for this concert next Wednesday at Albaugh's.

Newspaper Cutting AMERICA
From BALTIMORE, MD
Address
FEB 4- 1906

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will bring to Baltimore at its next concert, on Wednesday evening, February 14, two soloists for the second time this season. One will be the charming young English violinist, Miss Marie Hall, and the other will be the distinguished pianist, Mr. Heinrich Gebhard. The program promises to be one of the most interesting of the year. It is as follows: Vincent d'Indy—Symphony No. 1, for pianoforte and orchestra, on a "Mountain Air." Mendelssohn—Concerto for violin and orchestra in E minor; Mahler-Adagietto from Symphony No .5 (new). Tschaikowsky—Orchestra fantasia "Francesca da Rimini." Seats go on sale for this concert on next Wednesday at Albaugh's.

NEW
From BALTIMORE, MD.
Address
Date FEB 14 1906

the season's concerts by phony Orchestra will be this evening at 8.15 interesting programme with has been prepared. Miss the great English violinist, ever-popular Mendelssohn
Mr. Heinrich Gebhard, a pianist, will play that in-Vincent d'Indy's Symphony a Mountain Air," which will principal work on the programme.
interesting and significant novelty the Adagietta from the fifth Gustav Mahler of Vienna, composer who vies with Richard in the controversy his music caused. The last number will be kowsky's stunning orchestral fan-
Francesca da Rimini."

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
HERALD
BALTIMORE, MD.
FEB 14 1906

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The fourth of the season's concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given at the Lyric this evening at 8.15 o'clock. A most interesting program with soloists has been prepared. Miss Marie Hall, the English violinist, will play the ever popular Mendelssohn concerto, Mr. Heinrich Gebhard, a pianist, will play the first movement in Vincent d'Indy's symphony No. 1, "On a Mountain Air," which is the principal work on the programme. The most interesting and significant novelty will be the adagietto from the fifth symphony of Gustav Mahler, of Vienna, a composer who vies with Richard Strauss in the controversy his music has caused. The last number will be Tschaikowsky's stunning orchestral fantasia "Francesca de Rimini."

NEW
BALTIMORE, MD.
FEB 15 1906

MUSIC

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, With Marie Hall (Violinist) And Heinrich Gebhard (Pianist).

The playing of two d'Indy symphonies in a season of five concerts, with one of those concerts devoted entirely to music of the so-called young French school, is a propaganda more obvious and violent than pleasant or wise. Had we 20 concerts in our season, we should not mind a bit of exploring, nor even a little musical slumming now and then; but with only five programmes, moderation in eccentricities is advisable.

This symphony (No. 1) is much more genial than the No. 2 which d'Indy conducted when here. In this earlier work, one feels that the composer was still clinging to musical sanity, which like a life line had up to that time prevented him from becoming engulfed in the whirlpool of willful non-conformity. In this first symphony d'Indy is sometimes arid to a deadly degree, but he is also occasionally pleasantly euphonious and melodious. His themes are not important, and his treatment of them in development is too rigid to be interesting. It must be admitted that in plasticity of treatment the second symphony shows advance as compared with No. 1.

The piano is employed with great skill in this symphony. It is adapted as an orchestral instrument, and as played by Mr. Gebhard, never failed to justify its presence in the score. This gentleman had some trying passages and rhythms, but he never gave reason for even mild apprehension of evil.

Marie Hall is a good violinist, with pure intonation, a fair cantabile and a somewhat heavy bow arm. She gave a conventional rendering of the Mendelssohn concerto, which is not enough for these days of Maud Powells, Kreislers, etc. No one but a giant can afford to play a careworn composition. The Mendelssohn has been played so much for the past 50 years by great and small, and has become so familiar that it requires a genius to impart to it new charm.

Mahler's Adagietto was much more welcome than the whole fifth symphony would have been, if this movement be a fair sample of the whole. The piece devises no momentum from its themes, and several times becomes lost in motiveless monotony. Mahler has written some powerful music. He is, however, feared by conductors, and the public because of his phenomenal prolixity. His symphonies continue to awesome length.

"Francesca da Rimini" contains some wonderfully effective episodes, but it is not one of the great Russian's strongest inspirations. Everything was read by Mr. Gebhard in a most musicianly spirit.

The following numbers were played:

d'Indy—Symphony on a Mountain Air, for Orchestra and Pianoforte. (First time at these concerts.)
Lent, moderement anime, un plus vite, etc.
Assez modere, mais sans lenteur.

(Heinrich Gebhard, Pianist.)

Bartholdy—Concerto in E minor, for violin, Op. 64.
Allegro molto appassionato.
Andante.
Allegretto non troppo.
Allegro molto vivace.

Adagietto from Symphony No. 5, in C sharp minor.....Gustav Mahler

"Francesca da Rimini," orchestral fantasia after Dante, op. 32.....Tschaikowsky

Newspaper Cutting Bureau
BALTIMORE, MD.
FEB 15 1906

The Musical World

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The fourth appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place last evening at the Lyric under the conductorship of Mr. Gericke. The program presented consisted largely of modern works and of works little known to Baltimoreans, and included a symphony for orchestra and pianoforte by Vincent d'Indy, Mendelssohn's violin concerto; "Adagretto," from a symphony by Gustav Mahler, and "Francesca da Rimini," an orchestral fantasia after Dante, opus 32, by Tschaikowsky. The violin soloist was Miss Marie Hall and Mr. Heinrich Gebhard played the piano part of the D'Indy symphony.

A symphony for orchestra and pianoforte appears as a novelty, but, nevertheless, it is not really such an innovation as it may at first seem to be. The piano portion of Brahms' piano concerto, for instance, is far more closely interwoven with the orchestra than is usual with the majority of piano concertos. However, the highest ideal of concerto writing consists in so blending the piano and orchestra into one united whole that each unit has its individual value and use. Of course, in the work performed last night the piano was not treated as a solo instrument, and the pure symphonic form was more strictly adhered to than would have been the case had the piano been treated as the chief instrument and the orchestra merely an accompanying factor. D'Indy has had the courage—or perhaps it were better said, the originality—to write for orchestra, using the piano as an orchestral instrument, and by so doing has succeeded in producing a composition of considerable merit and interest.

The D'Indy symphony of last night was in every way a decidedly redeeming feature over the work from his pen, produced at the second Boston Symphony organization's concert. The influence of Wagner is very strong upon him, and strive as he may, he cannot throw it off, and, moreover, he is lacking Wagner's imaginative genius; still he proved that he possesses considerable power and what might be called cleverness. The ingenuity he exhibited in manipulating his thematic material was decidedly clever, and that, coupled with a fine group of orchestral technique, rendered the work very pleasing. An additional cause for its attractiveness may also be found in the directing, which under M. Gericke was artistic and effective.

The Mahler adagietto is a complete little picture in itself, although it is one of those little pictures that makes but slight impression.

Tschaikowsky had more to say and knew better how to say it than either of the two preceding composers. He has a story to tell—a story of tragedy mingled with pathos—and he uses his art with such masterly skill that every mood and every detail is marvelously portrayed, as far as it lies in the power of music to portray. It is said that musicians' work is only appreciated after death, but it is not because Tschaikowsky is dead that his work appeals more strongly than that of the other two, but rather because being instinct with life and full of sterner and more logical material, his writings command respect, whereas the others impress one as being but the hankering after greatness and originality without being sufficiently endowed with the attributes of real genius.

The Mendelssohn violin concerto received an intensely satisfying interpretation at the hands of Miss Marie Hall. The violinist, a young, frail girl, who looks as if her entire life had been given up to the acquirement of her mastery over the instrument, and to all appearances without strength to produce any tone at all, succeeded in bringing from her violin a tone of great firmness, breadth, volume and clarity. Her intonation was never in the slightest degree faulty, her bowing of exceeding grace and her conception of the master work excellent. True, at times there was a suspicion of coldness in her playing, but there is absolutely no doubt that in the space of a very few years her temperament will materially increase. Maturity only is lacking to make her, perhaps, the greatest of living woman violinists.

Mention must be made of the easy and finished manner in which Mr. Gebhard played the piano part of the symphony. A somewhat more thankless task than the playing of a recognized piano concerto, the artist, nevertheless, acquitted himself in a way that betokens the skilful pianist and musician.

Mr. Joseph Plunkett, for some years tenor at the Cathedral, has recently accepted the position of solo tenor at Mount Calvary P. E. Church. He is also a member of the choir of the Eutaw Place Synagogue. Mr. Plunkett is well known in the city as a leading light in vocal circles, and his engagement at Mount Calvary forms an important acquisition to the choir, which now numbers twenty-four members, men and boys. Mr. Horace Hill is the organist and choirmaster.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
AMERICAN. HEBREW
From
Address NEW YORK CITY.
Date FEB 8 - 1906

The Boston Symphony Quartet will give its next New York concert at Mendelssohn Hall, Thursday evening, Febuary 6. Susan Metcalf will be the assisting artist.

* * * * *

Est

[163]

From BALTIMORE, MD.
Address
Date FEB 15 1906

Boston Symphony Orchestra Pleases Large Audience.

Last evening's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyric was doubtless one of the greatest musical successes in Baltimore of the season. A splendidly chosen and ably arranged program, two capable soloists and an appreciative and enthusiastic audience all combined to make the affair the artistic triumph it proved to be.

Following was the program:

"Symphony on a Mountain Air," for orchestra and pianoforte, op. 25.....Vincent d'Indy
Assez lent, moderement anime, un peu plus vite, etc.
Assez modere, mais sans lenteur.
Anime.
Mr. Heinrich Gebhard, pianist.

Concerto in E minor, for violin, op. 64, Mendelssohn-Bartholdy
Allegro molto appassionato.
Andante.
Allegretto non troppo.
Allegro molto vivace.

Adagietto from Symphony No. 5, in C sharp minor.....Gustav Mahler

"Francesca da Rimini," orchestral fantasia after Dante, op. 32.....Tschaikowsky

Mr. Heinrich Gebhard, pianist, a student of Leschetitzki, whose home is in Boston, and Miss Marie Hall, violinist, were the soloists.

The D'Indy symphony, which was given for the first time this season by the orchestra, proved of extraordinary interest, due in a measure to the recent appearance here of the composer and the general interest given the compositions of the modern radical French school of musicians, of which he is a member. The work is a much earlier one than D'Indy's symphony in B flat major, which he conducted here personally last December, and was received with grateful enthusiasm. As the basic theme the composer has used one of the folk songs of the Vosges Mountains. The number was given with splendid effect. While the piano is not really a solo instrument in the symphony, there was ample opportunity for Mr. Gebhard to display his fine, musicianly qualities. Precision and the splendidly balanced, spontaneous work of the pianist, coupled with the general artistic excellence of the orchestra itself, marked the playing of the symphony throughout.

Miss Hall is truly a great artist, which fact she could not have demonstrated better than in the Mendelssohn-Bartholdy concerto. There is warmth and freshness about her playing, coupled with most excellent technique and musical temperament. Her playing is dignified and of a refined tone, and, especially during the second movement of the concerto, she held her audience as if in a spell for several seconds after the music had died away. At the conclusion of the number she was recalled six times.

NEW YORK STAATS ZEITUNG
FEB 4 - 1906

In Mendelssohn Hall finden in dieser Woche die folgenden Konzerte statt. Am Dinstag Nachmittag Klavierrecital von Maria von Unschuld, mit Kompositionen von Beethoven, Scarlatti, Chopin, Heller, Brahms und Anderen; am Dinstag Abend Konzert des Boston Symphony Quartett, mit je einem Streichquartett von Tanaeiff und Schumann, und Liedern, von Susan Metcalf vorgetragen, auf dem Programm; am Donnerstag Abend Konzert des Kaltenborn-Quartett, mit dem Es-dur Quartett von Mozart, dem F-moll Trio von Arensky und dem D-moll Quartett von Bazzini auf dem Programm; als Klavierspielerin wird sich in dem Trio Fräulein Wethern aus Boston hören lassen. Am Samstag Abend wird Frau Delly Friedlaender mit einem Gesangsrecital debutiren. Die Dame ist Mezzosopranistin und hat sich in Paris und anderen grossen Städten Frankreichs mit Erfolg als Liedersängerin hören lassen. Französische Lieder sind ihre Spezialität, indessen kultivirt sie auch deutsche Lieder, besonders diejenigen der modernen Komponisten. Ihr Programm enthält in der ersten Gruppe Kompositionen von alten Meistern, wie Glück, Giordani, Martini, Haydn u. s. w., in der zweiten Lieder von Chausson, Fauré, Duparc, Cesar Franck und Richard Strauß, und in der dritten solche von Gounod, Viardot, Svendsen, Massenet und Reynaldo Hahn. —

* * *

New York Times
FEB 4 1906

BOSTON SYMPHONY QUARTET.

The second of the three concerts which the Boston Symphony Quartet is giving in Mendelssohn Hall this Winter will take place on next Tuesday evening, Feb. 6, at 8:15 o'clock. Two quartets will be played, Taneiew's in B flat minor and Schumann's in A major. Miss Susan Metcalfe will sing a group of six songs. The programme is as follows:

Quartet, in B flat minor, Op. 4.....S. Taneiew
Songs.
Aria, "Serse".....Handel
"Das Veilchen".....Mozart
"Der Neugierige".....Schubert
"Ungeduld".....Schubert
"Die Mainacht".....Brahms
"Liebliche Wangen".....Brahms
Quartet, in A major, Op. 41, No. 3.....Schumann

From MAIL
NEW YORK CITY.
Address
Date FEB 7 - 1906

THREE CONCERTS OF A BUSY DAY

Weingartner and the New York Symphony Orchestra, the Boston Symphony Quartet and a New Pianist.

Three public musical events marked the afternoon and evening of yesterday. The most important was the repetition by the New York Symphony Orchestra, under Felix Weingartner, of the interesting programme given last Sunday.

At Mendelssohn Hall, the evening concert was the second of the Boston Symphony Quartet's series. In the afternoon Miss Maria von Unschuld, an Austrian pianist, now a resident of Washington, gave a recital to a numerous audience.

The Boston Symphony Quartet, comprising Messrs. Willy Hess, first violin; Otto Roth, second violin; Emile Ferir, viola, and Heinrich Warnke, 'cello, played the quartets of Taneiew, in B-flat minor, opus 4, and Schumann, in A major, opus 41, No. 3. Miss Susan Metcalfe, soprano, sang half a dozen songs of Handel, Mozart, Schubert and Brahms.

String quartets face as an ever recurring problem the adjustment of two conflicting elements. Granted temperament and zeal, and it is not difficult to give spirited and energetic performances. But as these qualities grow more conspicuous the equally essential finish and tonal balance too often diminish.

To bring them both into evidence, nothing avails but long practice and a paramount talent for concerted performance. Even in veteran quartet organizations, accidental shortcomings occasionally are noticeable, for eternal vigilance is the price demanded for this desirable union of vigor and accuracy, of spirit and precision. So it is charging nothing exceptional against the Boston Symphony Quartet to say that last evening's playing was of uneven merit. There were moments of beauty and also times when clarity, balance, delicacy of touch and sureness of intonation were frankly wanting.

The music chosen was well worth hearing again—the Taneiew quartet has been played seldom here—and the songs given by Miss Metcalfe provided an effective contrast between the two works for strings. Miss Metcalfe's subtle style, which made so deep an impression when she sang Mr. Loeffler's songs two or three years ago, has somewhat broadened. It is doubtful, however, whether she has gained by this, for Miss Metcalfe's distinction lay in her interpretation of music within a narrow range of manner and sentiment.

From NEW YORK EVG POST
Address
Date FEB 7 - 1906

The Boston Symphony Quartet.

Miss Susan Metcalfe, who has often been praised in these columns for her refined vocal art, was the soloist at last night's concert of the Boston Symphony Quartet. She was not at her best on this occasion, yet there was much to appreve and admire in her rendering of a group of songs by Handel, Schubert, Brahms, and Mozart. The Boston musicians presented quartets by Taneiff (B flat minor) and Schumann (A major). In both of these works there was much spirit in the playing, but not enough of the smoothness, refinement, and purity of intonation imperatively necessary in chamber music. The Symphony Quar needs hard practice and plenty of it be it can compete here successfully wi Kneisel and the Olive Mead Quartet

NEW
From B. [illegible], MD.
Address
FEB 14 1906
Date

...SYMPHONY TONIGHT.

Two Soloists Will Take Part In The Programme.

The fourth of the season's concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given at the Lyric this evening at 8.15 o'clock. An interesting programme with two soloists has been prepared. Miss Marie Hall, the great English violinist, will play the ever-popular Mendelssohn concerto, and Mr. Heinrich Gebhard, a distinguished pianist, will play that instrument in Vincent d'Indy's Symphony No. 1, "On a Mountain Air," which will be the principal work on the programme. An interesting and significant novelty will be the Adagietta from the fifth symphony of Gustav Mahler of Vienna, a composer who vies with Richard Strauss in the controversy his music has caused. The last number will be Tschaikowsky's stunning orchestral fan... "Francesca da Rimini."

...rk,

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
HERALD
FEB 14 1906

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The fourth of the season's concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given at the Lyric this evening at 8.15 o'clock. A most interesting program with two soloists has been prepared. Miss Marie Hall, the English violinist, will play the ever popular Mendelssohn concerto, and Heinrich Gebhard, a pianist, will play that instrument in Vincent d'Indy's symphony No. 1, "On a Mountain Air," which will be the principal work on the program. A most interesting and significant novelty will be the adagietto from the fifth symphony of Gustav Mahler, of Vienna, a composer who vies with Richard Strauss in the controversy his music has caused. The last number will be Tschaikowsky's stunning orchestral fantasia "Francesca de Rimini."

NEW
FEB 15 1906

MUSIC

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, With Marie Hall (Violinist) And Heinrich Gebhard (Pianist).

The playing of two d'Indy symphonies in a season of five concerts, with one of those concerts devoted entirely to music of the so-called young French school, is a propaganda more obvious and violent than pleasant or wise. Had we 20 concerts in our season, we should not mind a bit of exploring, nor even a little musical slumming now and then; but with only five programmes, moderation in eccentricities is advisable.

This symphony (No. 1) is much more genial than the No. 2 which d'Indy conducted when here. In this earlier work, one feels that the composer was still clinging to musical sanity, which like a life line had up to that time prevented him from becoming engulfed in the whirlpool of willful non-conformity. In this first symphony d'Indy is sometimes arid to a deadly degree, but he is also occasionally pleasantly euphonious and melodious. His themes are not important, and his treatment of them in development is too rigid to be interesting. It must be admitted that in plasticity of treatment the second symphony shows advance as compared with No. 1.

The piano is employed with great skill in this symphony. It is adapted as an orchestral instrument, and as played by Mr. Gebhard, never failed to justify its presence in the score. This gentleman had some trying passages and rhythms, but he never gave reason for even mild apprehension of evil.

Marie Hall is a good violinist, with pure intonation, a fair cantabile and a somewhat heavy bow arm. She gave a conventional rendering of the Mendelssohn concerto, which is not enough for these days of Maud Powells, Kreislers, etc. No one but a giant can afford to play a careworn composition. The Mendelssohn has been played so much for the past 50 years by great and small, and has become so familiar that it requires a genius to impart to it new charm.

Mahler's Adagietto was much more welcome than the whole fifth symphony would have been, if this movement be a fair sample of the whole. The piece derives no momentum from its themes, and several times becomes lost in motiveless monotony. Mahler has written some powerful music. He is, however, feared by conductors, and the public because of his phenomenal prolixity. His symphonies continue to awesome length.

"Francesca da Rimini" contains some wonderfully effective episodes, but it is not one of the great Russian's strongest creations. Everything was read by Mr. Gericke in a most musicianly spirit.

The following numbers were played:

Vincent d'Indy—Symphony on a Mountain Air, for Orchestra and Pianoforte, Op. 25. First time at these concerts.
1. Assez lent, moderement anime, un peu plus vite, etc.
2. Assez modere, mais sans lenteur.
3. Anime.
(Mr. Heinrich Gebhard, Pianist.)

Mendelssohn-Bartholdy—Concerto in E minor, for Violin, Op. 64.
1. Allegro molto appassionato.
2. Andante.
3. Allegretto non troppo.
4. Allegro molto vivace.

Mahler—Adagietto from Symphony No. 5, in C-sharp minor.

...ter Dante, Op. 32.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
HERALD
FEB 15 1906

The Musical World

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The fourth appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place last evening at the Lyric under the conductorship of Mr. Gericke. The program presented consisted largely of modern works and of works little known to Baltimoreans, and included a symphony for orchestra and pianoforte by Vincent d'Indy, Mendelssohn's violin concerto; "Adagretto," from a symphony by Gustav Mahler, and "Francesca da Rimini," an orchestral fantasia after Dante, opus 32, by Tschaikowsky. The violin soloist was Miss Marie Hall and Mr. Heinrich Gebhard played the piano part of the D'Indy symphony.

A symphony for orchestra and pianoforte appears as a novelty, but, nevertheless, it is not really such an innovation as it may at first seem to be. The piano portion of Brahms' piano concerto, for instance, is far more closely interwoven with the orchestra than is usual with the majority of piano concertos. However, the highest ideal of concerto writing consists in so blending the piano and orchestra into one united whole that each unit has its individual value and use. Of course, in the work performed last night the piano was not treated as a solo instrument, and the pure symphonic form was more strictly adhered to than would have been the case had the piano been treated as the chief instrument and the orchestra merely an accompanying factor. D'Indy has had the courage—or perhaps it were better said, the originality—to write for orchestra, using the piano as an orchestral instrument, and by so doing has succeeded in producing a composition of considerable merit and interest.

The D'Indy symphony of last night was in every way a decidedly redeeming feature over the work from his pen, produced at the second Boston Symphony organization's concert. The influence of Wagner is very strong upon him, and strive as he may, he cannot throw it off, and, moreover, he is lacking Wagner's imaginative genius; still he proved that he possesses considerable power and what might be called cleverness. The ingenuity he exhibited in manipulating his thematic material was decidedly clever, and that, coupled with a fine group of orchestral technique, rendered the work very pleasing. An additional cause for its attractiveness may also be found in the directing, which under M. Gericke was artistic and effective.

The Mahler adagietto is a complete little picture in itself, although it is one of those little pictures that makes but slight impression.

Tschaikowsky had more to say and knew better how to say it than either of the two preceding composers. He has a story to tell—a story of tragedy mingled with pathos—and he uses his art with such masterly skill that every mood and every detail is marvelously portrayed, as far as it lies in the power of music to portray. It is said that musicians' work is only appreciated after death, but it is not because Tschaikowsky is dead that his work appeals more strongly than that of the other two, but rather because being instinct with life and full of sterner and more logical material, his writings command respect, whereas the others impress one as being but the hankering after greatness and originality without being sufficiently endowed with the attributes of real genius.

The Mendelssohn violin concerto received an intensely satisfying interpretation at the hands of Miss Marie Hall. The violinist, a young, frail girl, who looks as if her entire life had been given up to the acquirement of her mastery over the instrument, and to all appearances without strength to produce any tone at all, succeeded in bringing from her violin a tone of great firmness, breadth, volume and clarity. Her intonation was never in the slightest degree faulty, her bowing of exceeding grace and her conception of the master work excellent. True, at times there was a suspicion of coldness in her playing, but there is absolutely no doubt that in the space of a very few years her temperament will materially increase. Maturity only is lacking to make her, perhaps, the greatest of living woman violinists.

Mention must be made of the easy and finished manner in which Mr. Gebhard played the piano part of the symphony. A somewhat more thankless task than the playing of a recognized piano concerto, the artist, nevertheless, acquitted himself in a way that betokens the skilful pianist and musician.

Mr. Joseph Plunkett, for some years tenor at the Cathedral, has recently accepted the position of solo tenor at Mount Calvary P. E. Church. He is also a member of the choir of the Eutaw Place Synagogue. Mr. Plunkett is well known in the city as a leading light in vocal circles, and his engagement at Mount Calvary forms an important acquisition to the choir, which now numbers twenty-four members, men and boys. Mr. Horace Hill is the organist and choirmaster.

...m B. [illegible]
...dress
...te

WAS MUSICAL TRIUMPH

Boston Symphony Orchestra Pleases Large Audience.

Last evening's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyric was doubtless one of the greatest musical successes in Baltimore of the season. A splendidly chosen and ably arranged program, two capable soloists and an appreciative and enthusiastic audience all combined to make the affair the artistic triumph it proved to be.

Following was the program:

"Symphony on a Mountain Air," for orchestra and pianoforte, op. 25.....Vincent d'Indy
Assez lent, moderement anime, un peu plus vite, etc.
Assez modere, mais sans lenteur.
Anime.
Mr. Heinrich Gebhard, pianist.

Concerto in E minor, for violin, op. 64, Mendelssohn-Bartholdy
Allegro molto appassionato.
Andante.
Allegretto non troppo.
Allegro molto vivace.

Adagietto from Symphony No. 5, in C sharp minor.....Gustav Mahler

"Francesca da Rimini," orchestral fantasia after Dante, op. 32.....Tschaikowsky

Mr. Heinrich Gebhard, pianist, a student of Leschetitzki, whose home is in Boston, and Miss Marie Hall, violinist, were the soloists.

The D'Indy symphony, which was given for the first time this season by the orchestra, proved of extraordinary interest, due in a measure to the recent appearance here of the composer and the general interest given the compositions of the modern radical French school of musicians, of which he is a member. The work is a much earlier one than D'Indy's symphony in B flat major, which he conducted here personally last December, and was received with grateful enthusiasm. As the basic theme the composer has used one of the folk songs of the Vosges Mountains. The number was given with splendid effect. While the piano is not really a solo instrument in the symphony, there was ample opportunity for Mr. Gebhard to display his fine, musicianly qualities. Precision and the splendidly balanced, spontaneous work of the pianist, coupled with the general artistic excellence of the orchestra itself, marked the playing of the symphony throughout.

Miss Hall is truly a great artist, which fact she could not have demonstrated better than in the Mendelssohn-Bartholdy concerto. There is warmth and freshness about her playing, coupled with most excellent technique and musical temperament. Her playing is dignified and of a refined tone, and, especially during the second movement of the concerto, she held her audience as if in a spell for several seconds after the music had died away. At the conclusion of the number she was recalled six times.

NEW YORK STAATSZEITUNG
s FEB 4 1906

In Mendelsfohn Hall finden in dieſer Woche die folgenden Konzerte ſtatt. Am Dinstag Nachmittag Klavierrecital von Maria von Unſchuld, mit Kompoſitionen von Beethoven, Scarlatti, Chopin, Heller, Brahms und Anderen; am Dinstag Abend Konzert des Boſton Symphony Quartett, mit je einem Streichquartett von Tanaeiff und Schumann, und Liedern, von Suſan Metcalf vorgetragen, auf dem Programm; am Donnerstag Abend Konzert des Kaltenborn-Quartett, mit dem Es-dur Quartett von Mozart, dem F-moll Trio von Arensky und dem D-moll Quartett von Bazzini auf dem Programm; als Klavierſpielerin wird ſich in dem Trio Fräulein Wethern aus Boſton hören laſſen. Am Samſtag Abend wird Frau Delly Friedlaender mit einem Geſangsrecital debutiren. Die Dame iſt Mezzoſopraniſtin und hat ſich in Paris und anderen großen Städten Frankreichs mit Erfolg als Liederſängerin hören laſſen. Franzöſiſche Lieder ſind ihre Spezialität, indeſſen kultivirt ſie auch deutſche Lieder, beſonders diejenigen der modernen Komponiſten. Ihr Programm enthält in der erſten Gruppe Kompoſitionen von alten Meiſtern, wie Gluck, Giordani, Martini, Haydn u. ſ. w.; in der zweiten Lieder von Chauſſon, Fauré, Duparc, Ceſar Franck und Richard Strauß, und in der dritten ſolche von Gounod, Viardot, Svendſen, Maſſenet und Reynaldo Hahn. —

* * *

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
AMERICAN. HEBREW
From
Address NEW YORK CITY.
Date FEB 2 - 1906

The Boston Symphony Quartet will give its next New York concert at Mendelssohn Hall, Thursday evening, Febuary 6. Susan Metcalf will be the assisting artist.

Est... * * * * *

[163]

New York Times.
FEB 4 1906

BOSTON SYMPHONY QUARTET.

The second of the three concerts which the Boston Symphony Quartet is giving in Mendelssohn Hall this Winter will take place on next Tuesday evening, Feb. 6, at 8:15 o'clock. Two quartets will be played, Taneiew's in B flat minor and Schumann's in A major. Miss Susan Metcalfe will sing a group of six songs. The programme is as follows:

Quartet in B flat minor. Op. 4.....S. Taneiew
Songs.
Aria, "Serse".....Handel
"Das Veilchen".....Mozart
"Der Neugierige".....Schubert
"Ungeduld".....Schubert
"Die Mainacht".....Brahms
"Liebliche Wangen".....Brahms
Quartet in A major, Op. 41, No. 3..Schumann

m MAIL
NEW YORK CITY.
ress
FEB 7 - 1906
e

THREE CONCERTS OF A BUSY DAY

Weingartner and the New York Symphony Orchestra, the Boston Symphony Quartet and a New Pianist.

Three public musical events marked the afternoon and evening of yesterday. The most important was the repetition by the New York Symphony Orchestra, under Felix Weingartner, of the interesting programme given last Sunday.

At Mendelssohn Hall, the evening concert was the second of the Boston Symphony Quartet's series. In the afternoon Miss Maria von Unschuld, an Austrian pianist, now a resident of Washington, gave a recital to a numerous audience.

The Boston Symphony Quartet, comprising Messrs. Willy Hess, first violin; Otto Roth, second violin; Emile Ferir, viola, and Heinrich Warnke, 'cello, played the quartets of Taneiew, in B-flat minor, opus 4, and Schumann, in A major, opus 41, No. 3. Miss Susan Metcalfe, soprano, sang half a dozen songs of Handel, Mozart, Schubert and Brahms.

String quartets face as an ever recurring problem the adjustment of two conflicting elements. Granted temperament and zeal, and it is not difficult to give spirited and energetic performances. But as these qualities grow more conspicuous the equally essential finish and tonal balance too often diminish.

To bring them both into evidence, nothing avails but long practice and a paramount talent for concerted performance. Even in veteran quartet organizations, accidental shortcomings occasionally are noticeable, for eternal vigilance is the price demanded for this desirable union of vigor and accuracy, of spirit and precision. So it is charging nothing exceptional against the Boston Symphony Quartet to say that last evening's playing was of uneven merit. There were moments of beauty and also times when clarity, balance, delicacy of touch and sureness of intonation were frankly wanting.

The music chosen was well worth hearing again—the Taneiew quartet has been played seldom here—and the songs given by Miss Metcalfe provided an effective contrast between the two works for strings. Miss Metcalfe's subtle style, which made so deep an impression when she sang Mr. Loeffler's songs two or three years ago, has somewhat broadened. It is doubtful, however, whether she has gained by this, for Miss Metcalfe's distinction lay in her interpretation of music within a narrow range of manner and sentiment.

m
ress
e

The Boston Symphony Quartet.

Miss Susan Metcalfe, who has often been praised in these columns for her refined vocal art, was the soloist at last night's concert of the Boston Symphony Quartet. She was not at her best on this occasion, yet there was much to approve and admire in her rendering of a group of songs by Handel, Schubert, Brahms, and Mozart. The Boston musicians presented quartets by Taneiff (B flat minor) and Schumann (A major). In both of these works there was much spirit in the playing, but not enough of the smoothness, refinement, and purity of intonation imperatively necessary in chamber music. The Symphony Quartet needs hard practice and plenty of it before it can compete here successfully with the Kneisel and the Olive Mead Quartets.

...TRIBUNE, dress FEB 7 1906
te

MUSIC.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY QUARTET.

The Boston Symphony Quartet did not provide an unqualifiedly pleasurable evening with its second concert in Mendelssohn Hall yesterday. There was much that was boisterous, and ill balanced as well, in its playing, and, for an incomprehensible reason (the meterological conditions being favorable and Mr. Hess a musician of fine skill and large experience) the intonation was frequently false, almost persistently, indeed, in the second trio of the second movement of the best known and most popular of Schumann's —that in A major—which closed last night's programme. Some roughness of tone was to have been expected in the quartet by Taneiew in B flat minor, which opened the concert as a concession to the effort which it exacts if something like emotion is to be injected into it, but after the first concert of this season we were scarcely prepared for a reversion to the manner of play which marked the beginning of the club's playing last year. When the Mannes Quartet played the work four seasons ago it seemed as if all passion had been sacrificed to a desire to preserve purity of intonation. Last night the music sounded fresher, more vigorous, and in some degree more spontaneous than it did before, but the first impressions were recalled. The least satisfactory movement is the first which might have been produced, we should say, by any of Mr. Taneiew's colleagues among the Russian conservatory professors. Much more ear filling were the second and third movements, a Largo and a Presto, which in character and purpose fulfil the classical design requiring a grave and sustained slow section and a joocosely spirited one in the middle of a quartet. The Intermezzo, which follows and is learnedly made and full of ingenious effects of color, seemed less an interloper than before, because played with finer appreciation of its effect upon the general scheme; but the finale again sounded like the work of a modern obsessed at once by the spirit of Haydn and the demands of the latter day. In spite of all, however, it was pleasant to hear the work again, and there would be no reason for regret if it were to establish itself firmly in the lists of our best exponents of chamber music.

Between the two quartets Miss Susan Metcalfe provided a vocal intermezzo, singing a group of songs in a style which has become a grief and almost an irritation to those who two or three years ago were enlisted as a band of admirers because of her exhibition of peculiarly refined and intellectually refreshing art. Since then she has lost none of her command of the technics of singing, nor has her voice (never extraordinary in sensuous charm, but singularly fascinating because of its individuality and adaptability to the purposes of its mistress) deteriorated in any respect. But the frank, unaffected, ingratiating style of the earlier day has now given place to mannerisms of tonal emission and erraticisms of reading to such a degree that the pleasure which her vocalization arouses is always mixed with vexation. She is become explosive: alternations of loud and almost inaudible phrases, coupled with breathless precipitancy in all allegros, rob her singing of the fine quality of repose which it used to have, and all this, combined with vicious pronunciation of her German texts, makes her an unsatisfactory interpreter of such songs as were upon last night's programme. All the defects were heard in Mozart's "Veilchen" and Schubert's "Ungeduld," though they reached their climax in Brahms's "O liebliche Wangen," which was gasped out pitifully. On the other hand, she sang "Ombra mai fu" from Handel's "Serse," in a most noble and beautiful manner.

From NEW YORK STAATS ZEITUNG
Address
Date FEB 7- 1906

Das „Boston Symphony Quartet".

Das Streichquartett des Bostoner Symphonieorchesters, aus den Herren Willy Heß, Otto Roth, Emile Ferir und Heinrich Warnke bestehend, gab gestern Abend in Mendelssohn Hall sein zweites Konzert der Saison. Die Herren spielten das B-moll-Quartett von Taneieff, das man vor einigen Jahren, ebenfalls in Mendelssohn Hall, vom Mannes-Quartett zu hören bekommen hatte; und ferner das populärste von Schumann's Quartetten, dasjenige in A-dur, op. 41, No. 3. Leider kann nicht gesagt werden, daß die Herren einen besonders glücklichen Tag hatten. Verschiedentlich, besonders aber im zweiten Satz des Schumann'schen Quartetts, ließ ihre Intonation viel zu wünschen übrig, und nicht selten machte sich allzu rauhe Tonbildung, zu heftiges Draufgehen unangenehm bemerklich. Wenn man auch beim Quartettspielen nicht immer ohne Bravour fertig werden kann, so ist doch Ausgleichung der vier Nummern, Abwägen der Stärkegrade, Feinheit der Schattirung unendlich viel wichtiger. Diese letzteren Qualitäten sollten aber zuerst angestrebt werden; sie schließen ja die Bravourentfaltung keineswegs aus.

Zwischen den beiden Quintetten sang Fräulein Susan Metcalfe eine Gruppe von Liedern mit ungleichem Erfolge. Es ist ganz und gar unmöglich, ihren Vortrag des „Neugierigen" und der „Ungeduld" von Schubert, oder der „Mainacht" und der „Lieblichen Wangen" von Brahms ebenfalls zu genießen, ebensowenig deren Begleitungen. Fräulein Metcalfe hat eine sympa... interessante

New York Times
ress
FEB 7- 1906

BOSTON SYMPHONY QUARTET.

Its Second Concert in Mendelssohn Hall—Miss Metcalfe the Soloist.

The Boston Symphony Quartet, led by Prof. Willy Hess of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, made its second appearance in New York last evening in Mendelssohn Hall. Its listeners were not numerous—the establishment of a large following by even the best of chamber music organizations is a matter of much time and great effort. So, too, it may be added, is the establishment of a string quartet that can exemplify the highest qualities of this most difficult and recondite form of art. On their first visit this season a month ago it was observed that Prof. Hess and his associates had made a long step forward since last season in achieving some of the excellencies in quartet playing that come only through long practice and intimate association. It was something of a disappointment, therefore, to find last evening that for some reason—perhaps a temporary indisposition—the gain was not fully maintained. The playing of the quartet did not show the same finish and precision or the same justness of intonation; and the chief sinner was Prof. Hess himself.

The programme was an interesting one; there were Taneiew's quartet in B flat minor and Schumann's in A major, and Miss Susan Metcalfe sang a group of six songs. Taneiew's quartet had been heard here before from the Mannes Quartet about three years ago. It is the work of one of the contemporaneous Russians who does not devote himself chiefly to the use of the characteristic Russian folk-song elements in his music. There is very little of it in this quartet, which is rather influenced by Mendelssohn, especially in the presto and the final allegro. Great originality or imposing power it does not show; but it is much more than well-made music. It is charming and engaging music that is worth more than a passing notice. It was played with the evident purpose of gaining spirit and a sense of vitality; but the gain was at the expense of fine ensemble and purity of tone. The same effort was made in Schumann's quartet; but here the music is less tolerant of anything but the most perfect euphony and the nicest adjustment of the four parts, and so the results were less satisfactory.

Miss Metcalfe presents perplexities to her friends and admirers as her career is unfolded. Her artistic personality and a certain charm in her singing are potent factors. Some things she did admirably, such as the sustained air from Handel's "Serse," "Ombra mai fu," and the deeply poetical "Mainacht," of Brahms. But there were faults of style and of technique that interfered with the enjoyment of some of her other songs; a breathless haste and explosiveness in Schubert's "Ungeduld" and Brahms's "Liebliche Wangen," a lack of finesse and characterization in Mozart's "Das Veilchen." Her voice has gained greatly in volume, but too often there is an evident forcing to this end that frequently results in singing sharp. Miss Metcalfe is too fine an artist, too beautifully endowed by nature for such things to be.

GLOBE
YORK COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER
FEB 7- 1906

NOTES OF THE

THE Boston Symphony Quartet did not appear to advantage at its second concert of the season at Mendelssohn Hall last evening. At its previous concert this organization seemed to have made substantial progress toward the ideal of string quartet playing. Last night it had returned to its condition of a year ago, when it gave the impression of four virtuosos, individually admirable, who happened for the occasion to be playing together—only that last night one was less sure of the virtuosity. There was much raggedness, untunefulness, and rasping throughout the performance, for which the unquestionable energy and vigor of the players could not atone. What was best in their playing appeared in the B-flat minor quartet of Taneiew—a work of much charm, but of a different charm from anything that is usually associated with Russian music. Later Prof. Hess and his men rode rough shod over the A major quartet of Schumann, and the intimate, introspective music suffered in the process.

Between the two quartets Miss Susan Metcalfe sang six songs for which she had been announced, and one, "L'Embarquement pour Cythère," by way of encore. Miss Metcalfe's singing was somewhat uneven. In passages that called for rapidity and lightness she seemed not wholly in control of her voice. Schubert's "Ungeduld" and Brahms's "Liebliche Wangen" she sang disappointingly, nor did she quite do herself or the music justice in Mozart's "Veilchen." But her delivery of Brahms's "Mainacht" and the "Ombra mai fu" from Händel's "Serse" (rescued from the vulgarity of "Händel's Largo" and restored to its own) were of a beauty, a finish, and an exquisite responsiveness to mood and music that touched perfection in the singing of songs. Long experience has shown that identifications from one art to another are notoriously a matter of personal bias. But after such singing one could make out an exceedingly pretty case for calling Miss Metcalfe the Duse of song reciters.

N. Y. EV'G SUN
dress
FEB 7 - 1906

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Col. Higginson, the musical Maecenas, often refers to as his "private yacht," has a new auxiliary cruiser in the Boston Symphony Quartet, which played again in Mendelssohn Hall last night. The Colonel has manned other cruisers for the public good. Prof. Willy Hess also admits that this is the tenth quartet he himself has organized.

As a pole-star to break the ice of some Northwest Passage in Fortieth street, New York, neither Taneiew nor Schumann quite sufficed last night. The Russian's five episodes in B flat minor, op. 4, gave a hearing in one Intermezzo to Mr. Ferir's sweet toned viola. Mr. Hess in Schumann's vexed harmonies of op. 41, No. 3, had trouble with his strings.

Miss Susan Metcalfe's "Serse" aria was old Handel's "Largo," splendid to hear sung for a novelty. Her German lieder were not so lightly delivered as one little French encore.

NEW YORK HERALD
ess
FEB 7 - 1906

Boston Symphony Quartet.

Both by the quality of its playing and in the noticeable growth of its clientèle, the Boston Symphony Quartet, in Mendelssohn Hall, last night, gave striking evidence to the effect that the "Kneisels" may not have things all their own way in definitely as the chief local interpreters of chamber music. The association of Professor Willy Hess and his three fellow artists is of too recent standing to insure ideal results as yet, but there was the promise of them in more than one aspect of their playing last night.

The programme opened with Taneiew's Quartet, opus 4, a work of uneven merit as a whole, but having at least two features of solid interest, namely its beautiful largo and spontaneously written finale. It was played with painstaking care and considerable refinement by the members of the quartet, as was also Schumann's A major quartet, the third of opus 41.

Miss Susan Metcalfe, soprano, the assisting artist, was heard in a Handelian aria and a group of songs by Mozart, Schubert and Brahms. Miss Metcalfe has frequently sung more enjoyably.

m NEW YORK SU
dress
te FEB 7 1906

The Boston Symphony Quartet.

The Boston Symphony Quartet gave its second concert last night in Mendelssohn Hall. The programme consisted of Taniev's B flat minor quartet, opus 4, and Schumann's A major quartet, between which were placed songs by Handel, Mozart, Schubert and Brahms, sung by Susan Metcalfe. An audience of large size was present and the concert evidently gave much pleasure. Prof. Willy Hess is the leader of this quartet and he is a chamber music performer of skill and temperament.

NEW YORK SUN
FEB 4 - 1906

Two moderns of moderns will occupy the places of honor in the coming pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall on February 15 and 17. Gustav Mahler and Richard Strauss. The latter will be represented by his tone poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra," and the former by his latest symphony, the fifth, which has never been played in this city. The symphony was played first in Boston on the 2d and 3d of this month. No less than six extra rehearsals were required to get the work into shape. It may be counted among the most important novelties of the season.

Marteau, the violinist

Y. EVG. TELEGRAM
FEB 7 - 1906

Boston Symphony Quartet's Second Concert.

THE Boston Symphony Quartette gave its second New York concert this season at Mendelssohn Hall last night, and deserved a larger audience. They are excellent players, inclined to be too academic perhaps, but in spite of this drawback their work is commendable.

Their opening number, Taneiew's quartet in B flat minor, opus 4, has been played in this city before, but never so well as last night. In the light of this composer's later work the quartet is decidedly interesting, particularly in the finale, with its crisp Mozartian quality. The influence of Tschaikowsky is very apparent in the other movements.

Miss Susan Metcalfe was what [illegible] gramme called an "assisting" artist. [illegible] or three years ago Miss Metcalfe was [illegible] excellent singer, but of late she has [illegible] quired certain pronounced mannerisms [illegible] developed a disagreeable, strident [illegible] quality. Her group of songs included [illegible] del, Mozart, Schubert and Brahms [illegible] could readily have spared the Brahms [illegible] poorly were they done.

The players concluded with Schu[illegible] quartet in A major, which was [illegible] lightfully rendered that the [illegible] tet may look to its laurels.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the...
NEW Y... se
FEB 1...

The Boston ... offer at Carnegie ... evening a concert ... the fifth symphony ... which, as revised by ... played for the first time ... in Boston on February 2 ... work than made a deep ... had had no less than eleven ... under Mr. Gericke's baton.

Gustav Mahler, composer-conductor, is known in New York ... his fourth symphony, which ... by the New York Symphony ... in 1904. He is the musical ... Vienna, where he presides at ...

and the Philharmonic concerts, ... potic efficiency. Mahler is now ... years old.

His fifth symphony had its first ... formance in Cologne in October. It is a long work, taking over an ... It contains three parts and five ... ments, the first and third parts ... ing two movements. The first ... is called "A Funeral Train," ... followed by an allegro of "utmost ... mence." The second part, the ... is an old-fashioned German landler ... lowed in the third part by the slow ... ment. It ends with a rondo-finale.

This concert will begin with Beethoven's "Egmont" overture; then will ... Schumann's piano concerto, with Harold Bauer as soloist, and finally the Mahler symphony.

The Boston Orchestra's Saturday afternoon list will be as follows:

Symphony in D major.....Haydn
Concerto for violin in E minor, ... Mendelssohn
Miss Marie Hall, violinist.
"Symphony on a Mountain Air," for orchestra and pianoforte, op. 25, ... Vincent d'Indy Heinrich Gebhard, pianist.
Mme. ...

N. Y. EV'G SUN
n
ress
FEB 10 1906

Both Miss Hall and Mr. Gebhard ... soloists at the Boston Symphony ... next week Saturday. The symphony ... Hadyn's in D, and not in C. Mr. ... soloist on Thursday night, when the ... Mahler symphony of which we spoke ... terday will be performed.

Fritz Scheel also announces this work ... Philadelphia soon after Mr. Gericke's ... there.

Brooklyn's Boston Symphony program ... for Friday night at the Baptist Temple ... presents romantic music at its best, ... "Freischütz" overture of Weber, "Unfinished Symphony" of Schubert, Schumann's A minor concerto, op. 54, for Harold Bauer, and the orchestral fantasie after Dante's "Francesca da Rimini," by Tschaikowsky.

NEW YORK EV'G POST
FEB 10 1906

Two moderns of moderns will be represented on the next Boston Symphony programmes in Carnegie Hall on the 15th and 17th, Richard Strauss and Gustav Mahler. The latter will be represented by his tone poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra," and the former by his latest symphony, the fifth, which in its revised form was played for the first time in America in Boston on the 2d and 3d of this month. No less than six extra rehearsals were required to get the work into shape. It will be preceded on the Thursday night programme by Beethoven's "Egmont" overture and Schumann's piano concerto (Harold Bauer). Saturday afternoon programme will include a Haydn symphony, Mendelssohn's violin concerto (Marie Hall), and D'Indy's "Mountain Symphony."

[164]

m ..... FEB 7 1906
dress .....
te .....

MUSIC.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY QUARTET.

The Boston Symphony Quartet did not provide an unqualifiedly pleasurable evening with its second concert in Mendelssohn Hall yesterday. There was much that was boisterous, and ill balanced as well, in its playing, and, for an incomprehensible reason (the meterological conditions being favorable and Mr. Hess a musician of fine skill and large experience) the intonation was frequently false, almost persistently, indeed, in the second trio of the second movement of the best known and most popular of Schumann's — that in A major — which closed last night's programme. Some roughness of tone was to have been expected in the quartet by Tanéiew in B flat minor, which opened the concert as a concession to the effort which it exacts if something like emotion is to be injected into it, but after the first concert of this season we were scarcely prepared for a reversion to the manner of play which marked the beginning of the club's playing last year. When the Mannes Quartet played the work four seasons ago it seemed as if all passion had been sacrificed to a desire to preserve purity of intonation. Last night the music sounded fresher, more vigorous, and in some degree more spontaneous than it did before, but the first impressions were recalled. The least satisfactory movement is the first which might have been produced, we should say, by any of Mr. Tanéiew's colleagues among the Russian conservatory professors. Much more ear filling were the second and third movements, a Largo and a Presto, which in character and purpose fulfil the classical design requiring a grave and sustained slow section and a jocosely spirited one in the middle of a quartet. The Intermezzo, which follows and is learnedly made and full of ingenious effects of color, seemed less an interloper than before, because played with finer appreciation of its effect upon the general scheme; but the finale again sounded like the work of a modern obsessed at once by the spirit of Haydn and the demands of the latter day. In spite of all, however, it was pleasant to hear the work again, and there would be no reason for regret if it were to establish itself firmly in the lists of our best exponents of chamber music.

Between the two quartets Miss Susan Metcalfe provided a vocal intermezzo, singing a group of songs in a style which has become a grief and almost an irritation to those who two or three years ago were enlisted as a band of admirers because of her exhibition of peculiarly refined and intellectually refreshing art. Since then she has lost none of her command of the technics of singing, nor has her voice (never extraordinary in sensuous charm, but singularly fascinating because of its individuality and adaptability to the purposes of its mistress) deteriorated in any respect. But the frank, unaffected, ingratiating style of the earlier day has now given place to mannerisms of tonal emission and erraticisms of reading to such a degree that the pleasure which her vocalization arouses is always mixed with vexation. She is become explosive; alternations of loud and almost inaudible phrases, coupled with breathless precipitancy in all allegros, rob her singing of the fine quality of repose which it used to have, and all this, combined with vicious pronunciation of her German texts, makes her an unsatisfactory interpreter of such songs as were upon last night's programme. All the defects were heard in Mozart's "Veilchen" and Schubert's "Ungeduld," though they reached their climax in Brahms's "O liebliche Wangen," which was gasped out pitifully. On the other hand, she sang "Ombra mai fù" from Handel's "Serse," in a most noble and beautiful manner.

From ..... NEW YORK STAATSZEITUNG
Address .....
Date ..... FEB 7- 1906

Das „Boston Symphony Quartet".

Das Streichquartett des Bostoner Symphonieorchesters, aus den Herren Willy Heß, Otto Roth, Emile Ferir und Heinrich Warnke bestehend, gab gestern Abend in Mendelssohn Hall sein zweites Konzert der Saison. Die Herren spielten das B-moll Quartett von Taneieff, das man vor einigen Jahren, ebenfalls in Mendelssohn Hall, vom Mannes-Quartett zu hören bekommen hatte; und ferner das populärste von Schumann's Quartetten, dasjenige in A-dur, op. 41, No. 3. Leider kann nicht gesagt werden, daß die Herren einen besonders glücklichen Tag hatten. Verschiedentlich, besonders aber im zweiten Satz des Schumann'schen Quartetts, ließ ihre Intonation viel zu wünschen übrig, und nicht selten machte sich allzu rauhe Tonbildung, zu heftiges Draufgehen unangenehm bemerklich. Wenn man auch beim Quartettspielen nicht immer ohne Bravour fertig werden kann, so ist doch Ausgleichung der vier Nummern, Abwägen der Stärkegrade, Feinheit der Schattirung unendlich viel wichtiger. Diese letzteren Qualitäten sollten aber zuerst angestrebt werden; sie schließen ja die Bravourentfaltung keineswegs aus.

Zwischen den beiden Quintetten sang Fräulein Susan Metcalfe eine Gruppe von Liedern mit ungleichem Erfolge. Es ist ganz und gar unmöglich, ihren Vortrag des „Neugierigen" und der „Ungeduld" von Schubert, oder der „Mainacht" und der „Lieblichen Wangen" von Brahms gutzuheißen; ebensowenig deren Begleitung. Fräulein Metcalfe hat eine sympathische Stimme und ist eine interessante Persönlichkeit, aber sie macht sich mancher Idiosyncrasien in der Tonbildung und im Vortrag schuldig; sie wendet oft eine explosive Art der Tonproduktion an und bevor-

m ..... New York Times
ress .....
e ..... FEB 7- 1906

BOSTON SYMPHONY QUARTET.

Its Second Concert in Mendelssohn Hall—Miss Metcalfe the Soloist.

The Boston Symphony Quartet, led by Prof. Willy Hess of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, made its second appearance in New York last evening in Mendelssohn Hall. Its listeners were not numerous—the establishment of a large following by even the best of chamber music organizations is a matter of much time and great effort. So, too, it may be added, is the establishment of a string quartet that can exemplify the highest qualities of this most difficult and recondite form of art. On their first visit this season a month ago it was observed that Prof. Hess and his associates had made a long step forward since last season in achieving some of the excellencies in quartet playing that come only through long practice and intimate association. It was something of a disappointment, therefore, to find last evening that for some reason—perhaps a temporary indisposition—the gain was not fully maintained. The playing of the quartet did not show the same finish and precision or the same justness of intonation; and the chief sinner was Prof. Hess himself.

The programme was an interesting one; there were Taneiew's quartet in B flat minor and Schumann's in A major, and Miss Susan Metcalfe sang a group of six songs. Taneiew's quartet had been heard here before from the Mannes Quartet about three years ago. It is the work of one of the contemporaneous Russians who does not devote himself chiefly to the use of the characteristic Russian folk-song elements in his music. There is very little of it in this quartet, which is rather influenced by Mendelssohn, especially in the presto and the final allegro. Great originality or imposing power it does not show; but it is much more than well-made music. It is charming and engaging music that is worth more than a passing notice. It was played with the evident purpose of gaining spirit and a sense of vitality; but the gain was at the expense of fine ensemble and purity of tone. The same effort was made in Schumann's quartet; but here the music is less tolerant of anything but the most perfect euphony and the nicest adjustment of the four parts, and so the results were less satisfactory.

Miss Metcalfe presents perplexities to her friends and admirers as her career is unfolded. Her artistic personality and a certain charm in her singing are potent factors. Some things she did admirably, such as the sustained air from Handel's "Serse," "Ombra mai fu," and the deeply poetical "Mainacht" of Brahms. But there were faults of style and of technique that interfered with the enjoyment of some of her other songs; a breathless haste and explosiveness in Schubert's "Ungeduld" and Brahms's "Liebliche Wangen," a lack of finesse and characterization in Mozart's "Das Veilchen." Her voice has gained greatly in volume, but too often there is an evident forcing to this end that frequently results in singing sharp. Miss Metcalfe is too fine an artist, too beautifully endowed by nature for such things to be.

GLOBE
YORK COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER
FEB 7 1906

NOTES OF THE

THE Boston Symphony Quartet did not appear to advantage at its second concert of the season at Mendelssohn Hall last evening. At its previous concert this organization seemed to have made substantial progress toward the ideal of string quartet playing. Last night it had returned to its condition of a year ago, when it gave the impression of four virtuosos, individually admirable, who happened for the occasion to be playing together—only that last night one was less sure of the virtuosity. There was much raggedness, untunefulness, and rasping throughout the performance, for which the unquestionable energy and vigor of the players could not atone. What was best in their playing appeared in the B-flat minor quartet of Tanefew—a work of much charm, but of a different charm from anything that is usually associated with Russian music. Later Prof. Hess and his men rode rough shod over the A major quartet of Schumann, and the intimate, introspective music suffered in the process.

Between the two quartets Miss Susan Metcalfe sang six songs for which she had been announced, and one, "L'Embarquement pour Cythère," by way of encore. Miss Metcalfe's singing was somewhat uneven. In passages that called for rapidity and lightness she seemed not wholly in control of her voice. Schubert's "Ungeduld" and Brahms's "Liebliche Wangen" she sang disappointingly, nor did she quite do herself or the music justice in Mozart's "Veilchen." But her delivery of Brahms's "Mainacht" and the "Ombra mai fu" from Händel's "Serse" (rescued from the vulgarity of "Händel's Largo" and restored to its own) were of a beauty, a finish, and an exquisite responsiveness to mood and music that touched perfection in the singing of songs. Long experience has shown that identifications from one art to another are notoriously a matter of personal bias. But after such singing one could make out an exceedingly pretty case for calling Miss Metcalfe the Duse of song reciters.

STRENGTH and fluency of technique

m ..... N. Y. EV'G SUN
ress .....
te ..... FEB 7 - 1906

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which Col. Higginson, the musical Maecenas, often refers to as his "private yacht," has a new auxiliary cruiser in the Boston Symphony Quartet, which played again in Mendelssohn Hall last night. The Colonel has manned other cruisers for the public good. Prof. Willy Hess also admits that this is the tenth quartet he himself has organized.

As a pole-star to break the ice of some Northwest Passage in Fortieth street, New York, neither Taneiew nor Schumann quite sufficed last night. The Russian's five episodes in B flat minor, op. 4, gave a hearing in one Intermezzo to Mr. Ferir's sweet toned viola. Mr. Hess in Schumann's vexed harmonies of op. 41, No. 3, had trouble with his strings.

Miss Susan Metcalfe's "Serse" aria was old Handel's "Largo," splendid to hear sung for a novelty. Her German lieder were not so lightly delivered as one little French encore.

ess .....

Boston Symphony Quartet.

Both by the quality of its playing and in the noticeable growth of its clientèle, the Boston Symphony Quartet, in Mendelssohn Hall, last night, gave striking evidence to the effect that the "Kneisels" may not have things all their own way in definitely as the chief local interpreters of chamber music. The association of Professor Willy Hess and his three fellow artists is of too recent standing to insure ideal results as yet, but there was the promise of them in more than one aspect of their playing last night.

The programme opened with Taneiew's Quartet, opus 4, a work of uneven merit as a whole, but having at least two features of solid interest, namely its beautiful largo and spontaneously written finale. It was played with painstaking care and considerable refinement by the members of the quartet, as was also Schumann's A major quartet, the third of opus 41.

Miss Susan Metcalfe, soprano, the assisting artist, was heard in a Handelian aria and a group of songs by Mozart, Schubert and Brahms. Miss Metcalfe has frequently sung more enjoyably.

dress ..... NEW YORK
te ..... FEB 7 1906

The Boston Symphony Quartet.

The Boston Symphony Quartet gave its second concert last night in Mendelssohn Hall. The programme consisted of Taniev's B flat minor quartet, opus 4, and Schumann's A major quartet, between which were placed songs by Handel, Mozart, Schubert and Brahms, sung by Susan Metcalfe. An audience of large size was present and the concert evidently gave much pleasure. Prof. Willy Hess is the leader of this quartet and he is a chamber music performer of skill and temperament.

N. Y. EVG. TELEGRAM
FEB 7 1906

Boston Symphony Quartet's Second Concert.

THE Boston Symphony Quartette gavé its second New York concert this season at Mendelssohn Hall last night, and deserved a larger audience. They are excellent players, inclined to be too academic perhaps, but in spite of this drawback their work is commendable.

Their opening number, Taneiew's quartet in B flat minor, opus 4, has been played in this city before, but never so well as last night. In the light of this composer's later work the quartet is decidedly interesting, particularly in the finale, with its crisp Mozartian quality. The influence of Tschaikowsky is very apparent in the other movements.

Miss Susan Metcalfe was what the programme called an "assisting" artist. Two or three years ago Miss Metcalfe was an excellent singer, but of late she has acquired certain pronounced mannerisms and developed a disagreeable, strident tone quality. Her group of songs included Handel, Mozart, Schubert and Brahms. We could readily have spared the Brahms, so poorly were they done.

The players concluded with Schumann's quartet in A major, which was so delightfully rendered that the Kneisel Quartet may look to its laurels.

[164]

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
NEW YORK
ss .....
FEB 10

The Boston Symphony Orchestra offer at Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening a conspicuous musical novelty, the fifth symphony by Gustav Mahler, which, as revised by its composer, was played for the first time in this country in Boston on February 2 and 3. The work then made a deep impression. It had had no less than eleven rehearsals under Mr. Gericke's baton.

Gustav Mahler, composer and conductor, is known in New York through his fourth symphony, which was played by the New York Symphony Orchestra in 1904. He is the musical autocrat of Vienna, where he presides at the opera and the Philharmonic concerts, with despotic efficiency. Mahler is now forty-six years old.

His fifth symphony had its first performance in Cologne in October, 1904. It is a long work, taking over an hour. It contains three parts and five movements, the first and third parts each having two movements. The first movement is called "A Funeral Train," which is followed by an allegro of "utmost vehemence." The second part, the scherzo, is an old-fashioned German landler, followed in the third part by the slow movement. It ends with a rondo-finale.

This concert will begin with Beethoven's "Egmont" overture; then will come Schumann's piano concerto, with Harold Bauer as soloist, and finally the Mahler symphony.

The Boston Orchestra's Saturday afternoon list will be as follows:

Symphony in D major.....Haydn
Concerto for violin in E minor,
Mendelssohn
Miss Marie Hall, violinist.
"Symphony on a Mountain Air," for orchestra and pianoforte, op. 25,
Vincent d'Indy
Heinrich Gebhard, pianist.

Mme. Emma ...

n ..... N. Y. EV'G SUN
ress .....
FEB 10 1906

Both Miss Hall and Mr. Gebhardt are soloists at the Boston Symphony matinée next week Saturday. The symphony is Hadyn's in D, and not in C. Mr. Bauer is soloist on Thursday night, when the new Mahler symphony of which we spoke yesterday will be performed.

Fritz Scheel also announces this work in Philadelphia soon after Mr. Gericke's visit there.

Brooklyn's Boston Symphony programme for Friday night at the Baptist Temple presents romantic music at its best, the "Freischütz" overture of Weber, "Unfinished Symphony" of Schubert, Schumann's A minor concerto, op. 54, for Harold Bauer, and the orchestral fantasie after Dante, "Francesca da Rimini," by Tschaikowsky.

NEW YORK
FEB 4 1906

Two moderns of moderns will occupy the places of honor in the coming pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall on February 15 and 17, Gustav Mahler and Richard Strauss. The latter will be represented by his tone poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra," and the former by his latest symphony, the fifth, which has never been played in this city. The symphony was played first in Boston on the 2d and 3d of this month. No less than six extra rehearsals were required to get the work into shape. It may be counted among the most important novelties of the season.

Marteau, the violinist

Two moderns of moderns will be represented on the next Boston Symphony programmes in Carnegie Hall on the 15th and 17th, Richard Strauss and Gustav Mahler. The latter will be represented by his tone-poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra," and the former by his latest symphony, the fifth, which in its revised form was played for the first time in America in Boston on the 2d and 3d of this month. No less than six extra rehearsals were required to get the work into shape. It will be preceded on the Thursday night programme by Beethoven's "Egmont" overture and Schumann's piano concerto (Harold Bauer). The Saturday afternoon programme will include a Haydn symphony, Mendelssohn's violin concerto (Marie Hall), and D'Indy's "Mountain Symphony."

NEW YORK STAATS ZEITUNG

FEB 4 - 1906

[illegible] von ungewöhnlicher Bedeutung uns das Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester bei seinem nächsten Besuch, in der kommenden Woche, vorspielen: Gustav Mahler's fünfte Symphonie. Das [illegible] während des vorigen Winters [illegible] Aufsehen in Deutschland [illegible]. Ueber die Berliner Aufführung [illegible] kritisch schrieb Dr. W. Kleefeld: [illegible] neueste Symphonie, diese „Fünfte", [illegible] Mahler uns ohne Ansprache, [illegible] Geleitwort, ohne Epilog. Ein Werk, [illegible] Klang, nahezu anderthalbstündiger [illegible], der in den kurzen Ueberschriften der [illegible] Sätze unserer Phantasie eine nur [illegible]lende Richtung giebt.

[illegible]rster Satz: Trauermarsch. Die Trom[illegible] ruft die Leidtragenden zusammen; [illegible] schmerzlich zuckender Miene tritt sie [illegible] die Spitze des Konduits. Der Zuhörer [illegible] sich schweigend an. Er trauert [illegible] den Traurigen. Müde senkt er das [illegible] zu Boden. Doch was ist das! Ein [illegible]ern, ein Girren, das Kichern zur Lin[illegible]. Wohl ein paar Herzlose, wie sie sich [illegible] jeder Leichenfeier finden. Da . . . [illegible] lockende Worte zur Rechten! Der [illegible] wird aufmerksam, er erhebt den [illegible]enden Blick und übersieht den Kreis. [illegible]as für ein Komplott ist er gerathen? [illegible]as ein Trauerzug? Hier flöten lie[illegible]e Paare, dort klappern Harlekins, [illegible]ein Pierrettes. Nun gehen dem bis[illegible]g Ernsthaften die Augen auf. Das [illegible]t kein Todter, dem die Feier gilt, das [illegible]t der Leichenzug des Prinzen Carneval. [illegible]e bunten Fahnen, dort die närrisch [illegible]en Trauertrommeln und der [illegible] Kreis der Leidtragenden — ein [illegible]enzug. Jetzt begreift man das halb [illegible]unterdrückte Kichern und Locken, jetzt be[illegible]greift man die gewaltsam verhaltene Freu[illegible]melodie im trioartigen Theil, die fett[illegible] ironischen Seufzer, die plänkelnde [illegible]differenzirende Gegensätzlichkeit.

[illegible]er Mahler als ernsten Tonphilo[illegible]en, als Asketen nimmt, ist betrogen. [illegible]e schönen, von vier Flöten angeführten [illegible]olzepisoden zeigen deutlich ein lachendes [illegible] ein weinendes Auge. Das ist der [illegible]ist der Satire, das ist der E. T. A. [illegible]ffmann der Symphonie, der in tollen [illegible]ungen über all den Tand der Welt sich [illegible]wegsetzt und in höchster Selbstherrlich[illegible]keit sein Reich der Tonungebundenheit [illegible]ebet. Wird der Trauerzug nicht ein [illegible]er Vorwand zu neuer Lebenstoll[illegible], wenn die Seele des Scheintodten auf [illegible]er Trompetenskala zur himmlischen [illegible]ngsarmee eingelehrt? Mit einem [illegible]chlag wechselt das Bild. Alle reißen den [illegible]rauerflor von den Gewändern, der [illegible]rauermarsch fängt an zu tanzen. Das [illegible]ello, nur mit Paukenwirbel, harmonisirt, [illegible]leicht salbungsvolle Worte, Prinz Carne[illegible] erzählt im Narrenhimmel von dem [illegible]lanz seiner Jugend. Piccolo und Harfe [illegible]egnend die Hände über dies seltene [illegible]. Dritter Satz: Scherzo. Ein welt[illegible]es Scherzo, ohne abgeschiedene Geister, [illegible]parodistische Menschheitsmoralisten [illegible]an. Aus dem zaghaften Ländler [illegible]sich der Walzer, ein feines geist[illegible]es Stück Wiener Kunst. Da [illegible] Trompete und Posaune dazwischen, [illegible]ländler knistert im Pizzicato, wie mit [illegible]em Flor umwunden, die Leid[illegible]enzen drängen sich in die Luft. [illegible]erz-Trauer, jetzt Trauer-Scherz! [illegible]Anklänge an fremde Tonbilde [illegible]auf und verschwinden. Das Scherzo [illegible]kommt nicht zur Ruhe, es zerflattert und [illegible]zerstiebt, es verliert seine beste Wirkung [illegible]durch diese breite Vergeßlichkeit. Aber ein [illegible]freundiger Widerschein blitzt doch auf den [illegible]versammelten Hörern, der Esprit, der hin[illegible]reißende Witz dieses Satzes ist unvergleich[illegible]lich. Doch schon naht die Reue, die ge[illegible]forderte Buße im vierten Satz. Das Ada[illegible]gietto gefällt sich in sentimentaler Mela[illegible]ncholie, in lang gezogener Violinelegie, in Zwie[illegible]gesprächen mit Schauern und Herzensangst. Prinz [illegible]Carneval erkennt seine Sünden, Sünden [illegible]der Liebe und des Weins. Kasteiung ist [illegible]die Devise dieser — meiner Ueberzeugung [illegible]nach nur parodistischen — Elegie, für [illegible]deren ernsthafte Auffassung Mahler ge[illegible]wiß zu modern, zu fortschrittlich aufge[illegible]klärt ist. Doch auch die kommandirten [illegible]Leibesttruppen verderben sich den Magen. [illegible]Fagott und Oboe sagen: Genug! Laßt [illegible]Farbe bekennen, laßt uns die satirische [illegible]Sache zu würdigem Ende führen. Und nun [illegible]ertönt Schlußrondo, ein Tonfest an, von [illegible]brausenden Fugatis, von tappenden [illegible]Scherzis und Rubatis; aus dem [illegible]Triumphmarsch gegen die Philister wächst [illegible]ein orgiastischer Choral, der sich in eine [illegible]wahre Genußorgie ergießt. Fasching [illegible]ist geboren, es lebe der neue Prinz [illegible]Carneval!

N. Y. TRIBUNE.

FEB 11 1906

HEINRICH GEBHARD.
Pianist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on February 17.

NEW YORK TIMES.

From [illegible]

Address [illegible]

FEB 11 1906

GESSFORD, PHOTO

HAROLD BAUER, PIANIST
With Boston Symphony Orchestra on Thursday

Newspaper Cutting Bureau, 19 Park Row.
NEW YORK TIMES

[illegible]

ess [illegible]

FEB 11 1906

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The fourth visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to New York will be made this week. At the first concert on Thursday evening Harold Bauer will be the soloist, playing Schumann's piano concerto; at the second Miss Marie Hall, violinist, will appear in Mendelssohn's concerto, and Heinrich Gebhard, pianist, will take part in Vincent d'Indy's symphony on a mountaineer air for piano and orchestra. The programmes will be as follows:

THURSDAY EVENING.

Overture, "Egmont".....Beethoven
Concerto in A minor for pianoforte, Op. 54..Schumann
Symphony, No. 5, in C sharp minor....Mahler

PART I.

1. Dead March, with measured tread, like a funeral train, C sharp minor. Suddenly faster, passionately wildly. A tempo.
2. Stirringly restless; with utmost vehemence; A minor.

PART II.

3. Scherzo; with force but not too fast; A minor.

PART III.

4. Adagietto; very slow; F major.
5. Rondo, finale; allegro; D major. (First time.)

Solo artist, Mr. Harold Bauer.

SATURDAY AFTERNOON.

Symphony in D major (B. & H. No. 2)..Haydn
Concerto for violin in E minor....Mendelssohn
Symphony on a Mountain Air for orchestra and pianoforte, Op. 25.....d'Indy
(Mr. Heidrich Gebhard, pianist.)
Solo artist, Miss Marie Hall.

[165]

N. Y. TRIBUNE,

FEB 11 1906

GUSTAV MAHLER.
His fifth symphony will be played by the Boston Orchestra.

HAROLD BAUER.
Pianist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on February 15.

[illegible]m NEW YORK STAATSZEITUNG

[illegible]ress [illegible]

FEB 11 1906

[illegible]e [illegible]

Das musikalische Ereignis der Woche steht uns am nächsten Donnerstag Abend bevor: Im Konzert des Bostoner Symphonieorchesters in Carnegie Hall wird Herr Gericke Mahler's fünfte Symphonie dirigiren. Es ist schon vor acht Tagen an dieser Stelle auf das Werk nachdrücklich aufmerksam gemacht worden. Wo es gehört worden ist, hat es Aufsehen, das heißt begeisterte Zustimmung und starken Widerspruch gefunden, und sicherlich wird es auch hier die kritischen Geister auf den Barrikaden machen. Von den größeren Werken Mahler's ist hier nur die vierte Symphonie bekannt geworden, und zwar im vorigen Winter in einem Sonntagskonzert des New Yorker Symphonie-Orchesters, wo Walter Damrosch sie dirigirte. Die fünfte Symphonie ist aber ohne Frage ein bedeutend anspruchsvolleres Werk; und wer damals mit seinem Urtheil über Mahler noch zurückhielt, wird jetzt wohl Farbe bekennen müssen. Mahler's große Orchesterwerke sind erst in den letzten Jahren häufiger gespielt worden, das heißt in den großen Städten Europas, und noch heute sind sie weit weniger bekannt, als diejenigen von Richard Strauß. Trotzdem wird Mahler bereits von manchen begeisterten Verehrern unmittelbar neben Strauß gestellt. Man denke aber nur nicht an eine offene oder versteckte Gegnerschaft zwischen den beiden hervorragendsten deutschen Komponisten der Gegenwart. Während sie zugestandenermaßen verschiedene Wege wandeln, mögen ihre Ziele doch zusammentreffen. Und persönlich bestehen zwischen ihnen die freundschaftlichsten Beziehungen. Strauß hat ohne jedes Neidgefühl für die Aufführung von Mahler'schen Werken agitirt, und Mahler hat sich neuerdings die größte Mühe gegeben, der letzten Strauß'schen Oper, „Salome", zu einer Aufführung an der Wiener Hofoper zu verhelfen.

Die Symphonie hat kein eigentliches Programm, ist aber dennoch Programmmusik im höheren Sinne. Sie besteht aus fünf Sätzen. Außer der Symphonie kommen am Donnerstag Abend nur noch Beethoven's „Egmont"-Ouverture und Schumann's Klavierkonzert zur Aufführung, das letztere von Harold Bauer gespielt. Für das Samstag Nachmittag-Konzert des Bostoner Orchesters lautet das Programm folgendermaßen: Haydn's D-Dur Symphonie (Nr. 2 der Breitkopf & Härtel'schen Ausgabe), Mendelssohn's Violinkonzert, von Marie Hall gespielt, d'Indy's „Bergsymphonie", der Klavierpart von Heinrich Gebhard gespielt.

* * *

From N. Y. TRIBUNE,

Address [illegible]

FEB 11 1906

On Saturday afternoon the Boston Orchestra will present D'Indy's Symphony, No. 1, for pianoforte and orchestra, "On a Mountain Air." This work has already been played here this winter by the New-York Symphony Orchestra, but it will bear repetition. The pianist will be Mr. Heinrich Gebhard, whose appearances in these concerts here have won a favorable impression.

Newspaper
From N. Y. TRIBUNE,

Address [illegible]

FEB 11 1906

What will be in many respects the most important musical novelty of the season will be offered by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its next evening concert in this city on Thursday, February 15. It is the fifth symphony, by Gustav Mahler, which was played in Cincinnati last year, and, as revised by its composer, in Boston on February 2 and 3. Gustav Mahler, the composer, is known in New-York through his Fourth Symphony, which was played by the New-York Symphony Orchestra in the fall of 1904. Considering that he vies with Richard Strauss and Max Reger in being the most discussed man in musical Europe, this is all the more strange, for America is not as a rule so far behind Germany in the presentation of novelties. In American minds his name is almost entirely connected with conducting, for in the years he has been in Vienna he has made a reputation as an operatic conductor and operatic director second to none in the world. A man of forty-six years, his name has appeared on programmes as a composer for over ten years, but it is only within a comparatively recent time that his works have begun to march forward toward popular favor. Mahler is a most unusual personality. He seems to possess certain characteristics which have made for him enemies wherever he has gone, even among those who admire his works. He is a mercilessly despotic and tyrannical master. Lacking tact, or scorning it, he knows not how to smooth the way before him. Striving ever after his ideals, he has no patience with those that will not follow him. While there is no question about his genius as a conductor, the most furious controversies have raged and continue to rage regarding him as a composer. In Germany there seems to be no middle ground. Either must one proclaim him the greatest of all moderns or condemn him as a madman without the slightest suspicion of creative talent. His admirers profess to look to him as the man destined to work for the preservation of the older and purer traditions of the art, against the movement which is all for programme music. He himself has given his idea of a programme as something which is the result of the music rather than the cause.

NEW YORK HERALD

[illegible]ss [illegible]

FEB 11 1906

MUSIC NOTES.

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra concert on Thursday evening in Carnegie Hall will be of special importance as bringing forward for the first time here Gustave Mahler's fifth symphony, a work which has made a profound impression throughout musical Europe, and which, it is promised, will repay the great labor expended on its preparation for this performance, eleven special rehearsals having been held. The only other numbers, owing to the great length of this symphony, will be Beethoven's "Egmont" overture and Schumann's pianoforte concerto, the soloist being Mr. Harold Bauer.

Saturday afternoon's programme will consist of D'Indy's first symphony for pianoforte and orchestra, in which Mr. Heinrich Gebhardt will be the soloist; the Mendelssohn violin concerto, played by Miss Marie Hall, and Haydn's C major symphony.

NEW YORK STAATS ZEITUNG
FEB 4 - 1906

Eine Novität von ungewöhnlicher Bedeutung wird uns das Bostoner Symphonieorchester bei seinem nächsten Besuch, in der kommenden Woche, vorspielen: Gustav Mahler's fünfte Symphonie. Das Werk hat während des vorigen Winters ungewöhnliches Aufsehen in Deutschland gemacht. Ueber die Berliner Aufführung unter Nikisch schrieb Dr. W. Kleefeld: „Die neueste Symphonie, diese „Fünfte", übergiebt Mahler uns ohne Ansprache, ohne Geleitwort, ohne Epilog. Ein Werk, ganz Klang, nahezu anderthalbstündiger Klang, der in den kurzen Ueberschriften der fünf Sätze unserer Phantasie eine nur andeutende Richtung giebt.

Erster Satz: Trauermarsch. Die Trompete ruft die Leidtragenden zusammen; mit schmerzlich zuckender Miene tritt sie an die Spitze des Kondukts. Der Zuhörer schließt sich schweigend an. Er trauert mit den Traurigen. Müde senkt er das Auge zu Boden. Doch was ist das! Ein Flüstern, ein Girren, das Kichern zur Linken. Wohl ein paar Herzlose, wie sie sich bei jeder Leichenfeier finden. Da . . . gleiche lockende Worte zur Rechten! Der Zuhörer wird aufmerksam, er erhebt den trauernden Blick und übersieht den Kreis. In was für ein Komplott ist er gerathen? Ist das ein Trauerzug? Hier flöten liebende Paare, dort klappern Harlekins, tänzeln Pierrettes. Nun gehen dem bislang Ernsthaften die Augen auf. Das ist kein Todter, dem die Feier gilt, das ist der Leichenzug des Prinzen Carneval. Hier die bunten Fahnen, dort die närrisch verbrämten Trauertrommeln und der ganze Kreis der Leidtragenden — ein Maskenzug. Jetzt begreift man das halb unterdrückte Kichern und Locken, jetzt begreift man die gewaltsam verhaltene Freudenmelodie im trioartigen Theil, die seltsam ironischen Seufzer, die plänkelnde italianisierende Gegensätzlichkeit.

Wer Mahler als ernsten Tonphilosophen, als Asketen nimmt, ist betrogen. Die schönen, von vier Flöten angeführten Holzepisoden zeigen deutlich ein lachendes und ein weinendes Auge. Das ist der Geist der Satire, das ist der E. T. A. Hoffmann der Symphonie, der in kecken Sprüngen über all den Tand der Welt sich hinwegsetzt und in höchster Selbstherrlichkeit sein Reich der Tonungebundenheit gründet. Wird der Trauerzug nicht ein köstlicher Vorwand zu neuer Lebenstollheit, wenn die Seele des Scheintodten auf gestopfter Trompetenskala zur himmlischen Faschingsarmee eingekehrt? Mit einem Schlag wechselt das Bild. Alle reißen den Trauerflor von den Gewändern, der Trauermarsch fängt an zu tanzen. Das Cello, nur mit Paukenwirbel, harmonisirt, spricht salbungsvolle Worte, Prinz Carneval erzählt im Narrenhimmel von dem Glanz seiner Jugend. Piccolo und Harfe legen segnend die Hände über dies seltene Bild. Dritter Satz: Scherzo. Ein weltliches Scherzo, ohne abgeschiedene Geister, ohne parodistische Menschheitsmoralisten hebt an. Aus dem zaghaften Ländler steigert sich der Walzer, ein feines geistsprühendes Stück Wiener Kunst. Da fahren Trompete und Posaune dazwischen, der Ländler knistert im Pizzicato, wie mit schwarzem Flor umwunden, die Leidreminiszenzen drängen sich in die Luft. Erst Scherz-Trauer, jetzt Trauer-Scherz! Bunte Anklänge an fremde Tonbilde fliegen auf und verschwinden. Das Scherzo kommt nicht zur Ruhe, es zerflattert und zerstiebt, es verliert seine beste Wirkung durch diese breite Vergeßlichkeit. Aber ein freudiger Widerschein blitzt doch auf den versammelten Hörern, der Esprit, der hinreißende Witz dieses Satzes ist unvergleichlich. Doch schon naht die Reue, die gerechte Buße im vierten Satz. Das Adagietto gefällt sich in sentimentaler Melodik, in lang gezogener Violinelegie, in Zwielichtschauern und Herzensangst. Prinz Carneval erkennt seine Sünden, Sünden der Liebe und des Weins. Kasteiung ist die Devise dieser — meiner Ueberzeugung nach nur parodistischen — Elegie, für deren ernsthafte Auffassung Mahler gewiß zu modern, zu fortschrittlich aufgeklärt ist. Doch auch die kommandirten Orchestertruppen verderben sich den Magen. Fagott und Oboe sagen: Genug! Laßt uns Farbe bekennen, laßt uns die satirische Feier zu würdigem Ende führen. Und nun hebt ein Schlußrondo, ein Tonfest an, von ausführenden Fugatis, von foppenden Sforzatis und Rubatis; aus dem Schreckensmarsch gegen die Philister wächst ein parodistischer Choral, der sich in eine brausende Genußorgie ergießt. Fasching ist neu geboren, es lebe der neue Prinz Carneval!

N. Y. TRIBUNE,
FEB 11 1906

HEINRICH GEBHARD.
Pianist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on February 17.

rom NEW YORK TRIBUNE.
ddress
FEB 11 1906

GESSFORD, PHOTO

HAROLD BAUER, PIANIST
With Boston Symphony Orchestra on Thursday

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
NEW YORK TRIBUNE
FEB 11 1906

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The fourth visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to New York will be made this week. At the first concert on Thursday evening Harold Bauer will be the soloist, playing Schumann's piano concerto; at the second Miss Marie Hall, violinist, will appear in Mendelssohn's concerto, and Heinrich Gebhard, pianist, will take part in Vincent d'Indy's symphony on a mountaineer air for piano and orchestra. The programmes will be as follows:

THURSDAY EVENING.

Overture, "Egmont".....Beethoven
Concerto in A minor for pianoforte, Op. 54..
Schumann
Symphony, No. 5, in C sharp minor....Mahler

PART I.

1. Dead March, with measured tread, like a funeral train, C sharp minor. Suddenly faster, passionately wildly. A tempo.
2. Stirringly restless; with utmost vehemence; A minor.

PART II.

3. Scherzo; with force but not too fast; A minor.

PART III.

4. Adagietto; very slow; F major.
5. Rondo, finale; allegro; D major. (First time.)

Solo artist, Mr. Harold Bauer.

SATURDAY AFTERNOON.

Symphony in D major (B. & H. No. 2)..Haydn
Concerto for violin in E minor....Mendelssohn
Symphony on a Mountain Air for orchestra and pianoforte, Op. 25.....d'Indy
(Mr. Heinrich Gebhard, pianist.)
Solo artist, Miss Marie Hall.

N. Y. TRIBUNE,
FEB 11 1906

GUSTAV MAHLER.
His fifth symphony will be played by the Boston Orchestra.

HAROLD BAUER.
Pianist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on February 15.

m NEW YORK STAATSZEITUNG
ress
FEB 11 1906

Das musikalische Ereignis der Woche steht uns am nächsten Donnerstag Abend bevor: Im Konzert des Bostoner Symphonieorchesters in Carnegie Hall wird Herr Gericke Mahler's fünfte Symphonie dirigiren. Es ist schon vor acht Tagen an dieser Stelle auf das Werk nachdrücklich aufmerksam gemacht worden. Wo es gehört worden ist, hat es Aufsehen, das heißt begeisterte Zustimmung und starken Widerspruch gefunden, und sicherlich wird es auch hier die kritischen Geister auseinanderplatzen machen. Von den größeren Werken Mahler's ist hier nur die vierte Symphonie bekannt geworden, und zwar im vorigen Winter in einem Sonntagskonzert des New Yorker Symphonie-Orchesters, wo Walter Damrosch sie dirigirte. Die fünfte Symphonie ist aber ohne Frage ein bedeutend anspruchsvolleres Werk; und wer damals mit seinem Urtheil über Mahler noch zurückhielt, wird jetzt wohl Farbe bekennen müssen. Mahler's große Orchesterwerke sind erst in den letzten Jahren häufiger gespielt worden, das heißt in den großen Städten Europas, und noch heute sind sie weit weniger bekannt, als diejenigen von Richard Strauß. Trotzdem wird Mahler bereits von manchen begeisterten Verehrern unmittelbar neben Strauß gestellt. Man denke aber nur nicht an eine offene oder versteckte Gegnerschaft zwischen den beiden hervorragendsten deutschen Komponisten den Gegenwart. Während sie zugestandenermaßen verschiedene Wege wandeln, mögen ihre Ziele doch zusammentreffen. Und persönlich bestehen zwischen ihnen die freundschaftlichsten Beziehungen. Strauß hat ohne jedes Neidgefühl für die Aufführung von Mahler'schen Werken agitirt, und Mahler hat sich neuerdings die größte Mühe gegeben, der letzten Strauß'schen Oper, „Salome", zu einer Aufführung an der Wiener Hofoper zu verhelfen.

Die Symphonie hat kein eigentliches Programm, ist aber dennoch Programmmusik im höheren Sinne. Sie besteht aus fünf Sätzen. Außer der Symphonie kommen am Donnerstag Abend nur noch Beethoven's „Egmont"-Ouverture und Schumann's Klavierkonzert zur Aufführung, das letztere von Harold Bauer gespielt. Für das Samstag Nachmittag-Konzert des Bostoner Orchesters lautet das Programm folgendermaßen: Haydn's D-Dur Symphonie (Nr. 2 der Breitkopf & Härtelschen Ausgabe), Mendelssohn's Violinkonzert, von Marie Hall gespielt, d'Indy's „Bergsymphonie", der Klavierpart von Heinrich Gebhard gespielt.

* * *

From
Address
FEB 11 1906

On Saturday afternoon the Boston Orchestra will present D'Indy's Symphony, No. 1, for pianoforte and orchestra, "On a Mountain Air." This work has already been played here this winter by the New-York Symphony Orchestra, but it will bear repetition. The pianist will be Mr. Heinrich Gebhard, whose appearances in chamber concerts here have made a favorable impression.

From N. Y. TRIBUNE,
Address
FEB 11 1906

What will be in many respects the most important musical novelty of the season will be offered by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its next evening concert in this city on Thursday, February 15. It is the fifth symphony, by Gustav Mahler, which was played in Cincinnati last year, and, as revised by its composer, in Boston on February 2 and 3. Gustav Mahler, the composer, is known in New-York through his Fourth Symphony, which was played by the New-York Symphony Orchestra in the fall of 1904. Considering that he vies with Richard Strauss and Max Reger in being the most discussed man in musical Europe, this is all the more strange, for America is not as a rule so far behind Germany in the presentation of novelties. In American minds his name is almost entirely connected with conducting, for in the years he has been in Vienna he has made a reputation as an operatic conductor and operatic director second to none in the world. A man of forty-six years, his name has appeared on programmes as a composer for over ten years, but it is only within a comparatively recent time that his works have begun to march forward toward popular favor. Mahler is a most unusual personality. He seems to possess certain characteristics which have made for him enemies wherever he has gone, even among those who admire his works. He is a mercilessly despotic and tyrannical master. Lacking tact, or scorning it, he knows not how to smooth the way before him. Striving ever after his ideals, he has no patience with those that will not follow him. While there is no question about his genius as a conductor, the most furious controversies have raged and continue to rage regarding him as a composer. In Germany there seems to be no middle ground. Either must one proclaim him the greatest of all moderns or condemn him as a madman without the slightest suspicion of creative talent. His admirers profess to look to him as the man destined to work for the preservation of the older and purer traditions of the art, against the movement which is all for programme music. He himself has given his idea of a programme as something which is the result of the music rather than the cause.

HERALD
FEB 11 1906

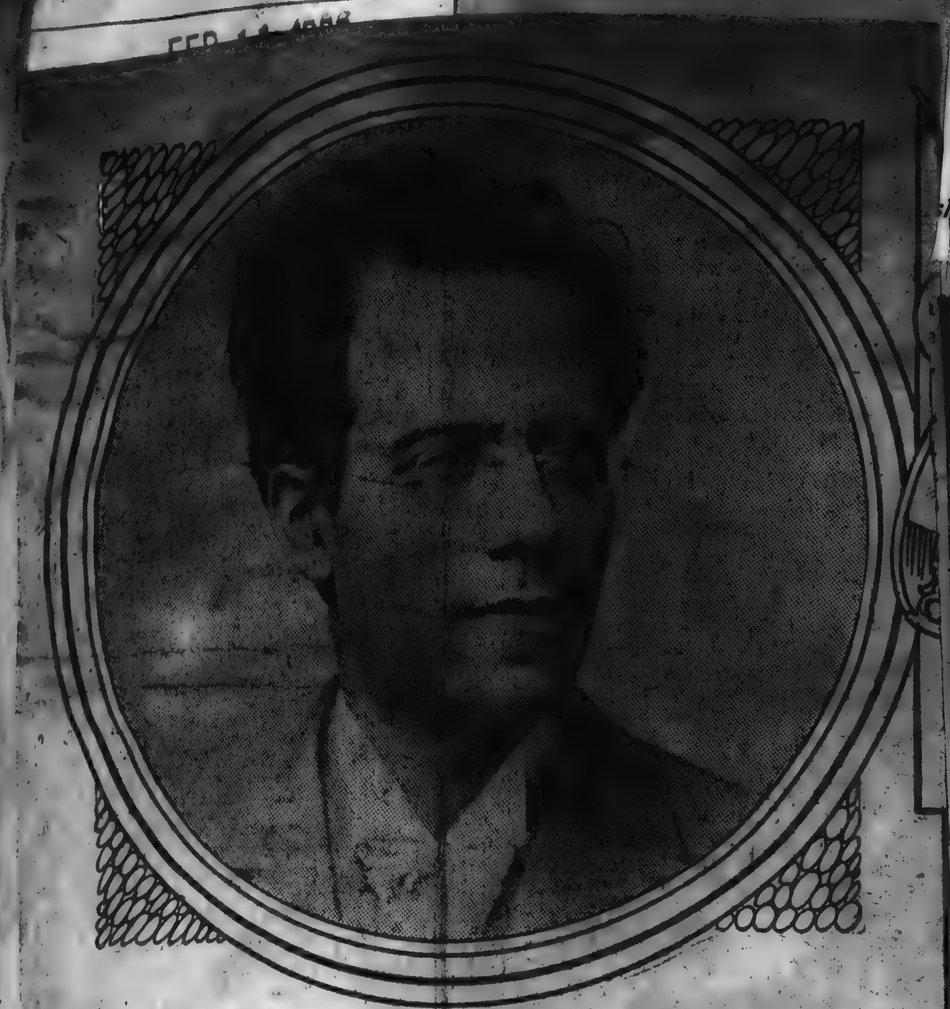
MUSIC NOTES.

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra concert on Thursday evening in Carnegie Hall will be of special importance as bringing forward for the first time here Gustave Mahler's fifth symphony, a work which has made a profound impression throughout musical Europe, and which, it is promised, will repay the great labor expended on its preparation for this performance, eleven special rehearsals having been held. The only other numbers, owing to the great length of this symphony, will be Beethoven's "Egmont" overture and Schumann's pianoforte concerto, the soloist being Mr. Harold Bauer.

Saturday afternoon's programme will consist of D'Indy's first symphony for pianoforte and orchestra, in which Mr. Heinrich Gebhardt will be the soloist; the Mendelssohn violin concerto, played by Miss Marie Hall, and Haydn's C major symphony.

[165]

NEW YORK TIMES
FEB 11 1906



GUSTAV MAHER
Whose Fifth Symphony will be played this week.

A New Symphony by Gustav Mahler

It Will Be Played by the Boston Orchestra ---His Works Have Made a Deep Impression Abroad, but Are Little Known Here.

ONE of the interesting and important incidents of the season will be the first performance in New York of Gustav Mahler's fifth symphony, which Mr. Gericke will give with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Thursday evening. Only one other of Mahler's symphonies—of which he has written six, the last not yet having been publicly performed—has been heard in New York. That is the fourth, which Walter Damrosch played last season with the New York Symphony Orchestra. The fact is noteworthy, since New York has generally heard most of the works of men of mark soon after they have been brought out in Europe. And Mahler is unquestionably a man of mark. He is one of the most distinguished of the younger school of German conductors, and is at present at the head of the Imperial Opera at Vienna, where he rules with an iron hand, bending prima donnas and first tenors to his will as though they were mere orchestral players, and brooking no interference with his policy by even the loftiest Court personages, who are prone in German Court theatres to attempt such meddling. There he has achieved results of the most remarkable sort, it is affirmed by competent witnesses, with means, at least so far as the leading singers are concerned, not of the best.

+ + +

Of late years Mahler has come to be seriously reckoned with as a composer, and some of his symphonies—he has written nothing else of importance for orchestra—have made a deep impression and have summoned up a passionate propaganda for Mahler and his works, as well as a strong opposition to them. This militant championing of somebody with something new, or at least unusual, strange and to some repellant, to say in music, seems to be one of the intellectual necessities of modern Germany. It may take the shape of "Vereine," as the "Wolf Vereins," and even the "Ansorge Verein"; as once, with much better reason, it resulted in the formation of numerous Wagner vereins, which now find their occupation gone. Or it may simply take the form of such pamphleteering as rages around Strauss and Reger, and, to a less extent, Mahler.

Mahler, however, would say with the Apostle Paul, that none of these things move him. Neither the passionate zeal of self-appointed partisans nor the abuse of the hostile seems to affect him. An interesting article about him by August Spanuth in The Boston Transcript recently pictured this unruffled attitude of Mahler, the composer. He [illegible] some time ago whether [illegible] to America [illegible] [illegible] silly love for every note he pens that some of his symphonies are interminably long. On the contrary, he is fully convinced that such lengths are necessary to make his ideas understood."

+ + +

Mahler occupies a curious and rather anomalous position in the field of modern orchestral music. He is no follower of the modern idea of "programme music," as it is most characteristically embodied in the music of Richard Strauss. What he writes he calls symphonies, though they are symphonies often only in a loose acceptance of the term. They do not follow closely, sometimes they do not follow at all, the formal outlines of symphonic movements. He vehemently objects to having any "programmes" laid down for his music, or even to permitting any thematic analyses to appear in the concert rooms where it is played, though a detailed thematic analysis of this fifth symphony has been published, apparently with his sanction. The story is told that at a supper after a concert, where his enormous C minor symphony was performed, he broke out into denunciation of "programme books." Springing up from the table, he cried in animated tones: "Away with programme books, which beget false ideas! Let the public have its own thoughts about the work performed; let it not be forced to read during the performance, let no preconceived ideas be instilled into it! If a composer has of himself impressed upon his listeners the feelings that surged through him, his object has been attained. The speech of tones has then approached that of words; but it has infinitely more to impart than words can express."

+ + +

Yet he has given in many of his works hints, and more than hints, of underlying poetic ideas outside and beyond the music itself—which constitutes the essence of programme music. The fourth symphony, played here last season, is plainly enough based on the suggestions of a naïve mediaeval poem in "Des Knaben Wunderhorn," and in the last movement a soprano voice sings this poem at length. It was said in The Times then that "the whole work is, in a certain way, the expression of the time and place and atmosphere to which the verses take us back." His third symphony he at first entitled "A Summer Morning's Dream," and the six movements had originally superscriptions suggesting various experiences with nature. Here, too, there is a contralto solo, and words that are said to be Nietzsche's. But it is to be observed that the score was published without the titles. The second symphony has also an alto [illegible] chorus, and a bird's voice, [illegible]

NEW YORK CITY
FEB 16 1906

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Gustav Mahler's fifth symphony, in C sharp minor, was the conspicuous novelty of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Carnegie Hall concert last night. It was preceded by Beethoven's "Egmont" overture and Schumann's A minor piano concerto, with Harold Bauer as soloist in the latter.

Mr. Gericke deserved the thanks of progressive and of curious folk in this musical community for bringing forward the enormous symphonic work of Mahler. The composer, who is Vienna's musical autocrat, has aroused deep enmity in Germany by his compositions, and they have been a bone of contention wherever heard. To keep the Boston Symphony's large clientele abreast of the times, Mr. Gericke played htis latest and largest of Mahler's symphonies. Boston liked it so well that it is to be repeated there.

Probably there will be no large demand in New York to have it done again soon. At first hearing this symphony, which lasts an hour and is in five movements, seems extraordinarily unimportant. It says things that are mainly trivial or borrowed, and it does so with a portentous emptiness of style. The "Siegfried Idyl" and other works are recalled by the best movements, the fourth, in F major. The first part, a funeral march, is solemnly futile.

There is less cacophony than might be expected with so many instruments to produce it, but that is a negative virtue. It i sto be feared that Mr. Mahler will not become much better known here than he now is.

Of Mr. Gericke's conducting and the orchestra's playing, the highest praise must be spoken.

Mr. Bauer was warmly applauded for his performance of the Schumann concerto.

om NEW YORK EV'G POST
dress
te FEB 16 1906

Notes.

The Boston Orchestra has an excellent programme for its Brooklyn concert tonight at the Baptist Temple. It includes Weber's "Freischütz" overture, Schubert's unfinished symphony, Schumann's piano concerto (Harold Bauer), and Tchaikovsky's "Francesca da Rimini."

NEW YORK SUN
FEB 18 1906

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Marie Hall Plays Mendelssohn Concerto Daintily.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its fifth concert at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. It was a most agreeable but unexciting entertainment. It is certainly not essential that concerts should always bite. It is, on the contrary, better for art that they should provide wholesome, unsensational enjoyment. At the same time the appearance of an element of sleepiness is to be deprecated. Yesterday's programme was cheerful and satisfying, but there was hardly enough in the performance to keep one wide eyed.

Haydn's D major symphony, with which the concert began, is one of the most melodious of the master's works, and it is also one for which Conductor Wilhelm Gericke has a great fondness. He conducted it admirably yesterday, and the orchestra played it with beautiful finish and lovely tone.

Marie Hall, the young English violinist, came forward as the soloist, and her number was the Mendelssohn concerto. She played it with daintiness of style but without distinction. Her tone is so small that she seems to do things in miniature. In the first movement her playing was not even technically accurate, but in this respect it improved greatly in the second and third movements, through it was a small performance.

Vincent d'Indy's symphony for piano and orchestra (on a mountain song) was the last number, with Heinrich Gebhard at the piano. It is a thin and watery work, without ideas or even any definite purpose. All that is good in it was better done long ago by Berlioz. Mr. Gebhard played the piano part very, very discreetly. The orchestra did its share well, but there was no opportunity for any such display of virtuosity as the first trumpet gave in the Mahler symphony on Thursday night.

m N. Y. EVG. TELEGRA
dress
FEB 10 1906

What will be in many respects the most important musical novelty of the season will be offered by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its next evening concert in this city, on Thursday, February 15. It is the fifth symphony by Gustav Mahler, which, as revised by its composer, was played for the first time in this country in Boston on February 2d and 3rd. The work made a most profound impression on the patrons of the Symphony concerts in Boston and seemed well to repay the vast amount of labor expended on its preparation, for it had no less than eleven rehearsals, all told.

jump from Fargo, S. D., to Butte, Mont., "that is the thing to think about. I have traveled farther than from Berlin to St. Petersburg without stopping. It is a great country here."

MME. GADSKI TAKES A CHANCE.

Will Race Across the Ocean for a Performance in Opera.

Mme. Gadski has become so accustomed

[166]

NEW YORK TIMES.

GUSTAV MAHER
Whose Fifth Symphony will be played this week.

A New Symphony by Gustav Mahler

It Will Be Played by the Boston Orchestra ---His Works Have Made a Deep Impression Abroad, but Are Little Known Here.

ONE of the interesting and important incidents of the season will be the first performance in New York of Gustav Mahler's fifth symphony, which Mr. Gericke will give with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Thursday evening. Only one other of Mahler's symphonies—of which he has written six, the last not yet having been publicly performed—has been heard in New York. That is the fourth, which Walter Damrosch played last season with the New York Symphony Orchestra. The fact is noteworthy, since New York has generally heard most of the works of men of mark soon after they have been brought out in Europe. And Mahler is unquestionably a man of mark. He is one of the most distinguished of the younger school of German conductors, and is at present at the head of the Imperial Opera at Vienna, where he rules with an iron hand, bending prima donnas and first tenors to his will as though they were mere orchestral players, and brooking no interference with his policy by even the loftiest Court personages, who are prone in German Court theatres to attempt such meddling. There he has achieved results of the most remarkable sort, it is affirmed by competent witnesses, with means, at least so far as the leading singers are concerned, not of the best.

+ + +

Of late years Mahler has come to be seriously reckoned with as a composer, and some of his symphonies—he has written nothing else of importance for orchestra—have made a deep impression and have summoned up a passionate propaganda for Mahler and his works, as well as a strong opposition to them. This militant championing of somebody with something new, or at least unusual, strange and to some repellant, to say in music, seems to be one of the intellectual necessities of modern Germany. It may take the shape of "Vereins," as the "Wolf Vereins," and even the "Ansorge Verein"; as once, with much better reason, it resulted in the formation of numerous Wagner vereins, which now find their occupation gone. Or it may simply take the form of such pamphleteering as rages around Strauss and Reger, and, to a less extent, Mahler.

Mahler, however, would say with the Apostle Paul, that none of these things move him. Neither the passionate zeal of self-appointed partisans nor the abuse of the hostile seems to affect him. An interesting article about him by August Spanuth in The Boston Transcript recently pictured this unruffled attitude of Mahler, the composer. He says:

"When asked some time ago whether he would not like to come to America and conduct a sort of Mahler festival [illegible] Strauss festivals should I? If I should absent myself from my post of duty during the season, my singers would ask the same privilege, and that I cannot grant. Furthermore, whenever one of my symphonies is played before a new audience, failure is a foregone conclusion.' And he said this without any apparent bitterness."

And again he writes:

"If Mahler could ever be convinced that this or that in his symphonies was bad or wrong, he would not hesitate to sacrifice it. He is not of the vain type of self-adoring weaklings; he has the making—and, besides, the looks—of an ascetic. It is apparently not from a silly love for every note he pens that some of his symphonies are interminably long. On the contrary, he is fully convinced that such lengths are necessary to make his ideas understood."

+ + +

Mahler occupies a curious and rather anomalous position in the field of modern orchestral music. He is no follower of the modern idea of "programme music," as it is most characteristically embodied in the music of Richard Strauss. What he writes he calls symphonies, though they are symphonies often only in a loose acceptance of the term. They do not follow closely, sometimes they do not follow at all, the formal outlines of symphonic movements. He vehemently objects to having any "programmes" laid down for his music, or even to permitting any thematic analyses to appear in the concert rooms where it is played, though a detailed thematic analysis of this fifth symphony has been published, apparently with his sanction. The story is told that at a supper after a concert, where his enormous C minor symphony was performed, he broke out into denunciation of "programme books." Springing up from the table, he cried in animated tones: "Away with programme books, which beget false ideas! Let the public have its own thoughts about the work performed; let it not be forced to read during the performance, let no preconceived ideas be instilled into it! If a composer has of himself impressed upon his listeners the feelings that surged through him, his object has been attained. The speech of tones has then approached that of words; but it has infinitely more to impart than words can express."

+ + +

Yet he has given in many of his works hints, and more than hints, of underlying poetic ideas outside and beyond the music itself—which constitutes the essence of programme music. The fourth symphony, played here last season, is plainly enough based on the suggestions of a naïve mediaeval poem in "Des Knaben Wunderhorn," and in the last movement a soprano voice sings this poem at length. It was said in The Times then that "the whole work is, in a certain way, the expression of the time and place and atmosphere to which the verses take us back." His third symphony he at first entitled "A Summer Morning's Dream," and the six movements had originally superscriptions suggesting various experiences with nature. Here, too, there is a contralto solo, and words that are said to be Nietzsche's. But it is to be observed that the score was published without the titles. The second symphony has also an alto solo, a chorus, and a bird's voice, all with various superscriptions that will [illegible] very little [illegible] from the composer. The [illegible]phony was originally entitled [illegible], and the five movements had curious and disconnected superscriptions—"Spring and No End," "Mosaic," "Under Full Sail," "The Hunter's Funeral Procession," "From Hell to Paradise." Some have found in this even an intention to gibe at programme music. If this were so the composer changed his mind, for the symphony is published without title or superscriptions. It is evident that his present attitude toward programme music has been reached after a change of heart.

What that attitude is Mahler has himself explained, characterizing it as diametrically opposed to Strauss's. His music, he declares, "comes to a programme as to the ultimate ideal explanation of its meaning in language; with Strauss, the programme is as a task set to be accomplished." He adds:

"When I conceive a great musical picture, I always arrive at the point where I must employ the 'word' as the bearer of my musical ideas. * * * My experience with the last movement of my second symphony was such that I actually ransacked the literature of the world up to the Bible, to find the expository 'word.'"

+ + +

He has dispensed, however, with the "word" in his fifth symphony. There is not a word in it; and there is thus less of a hint of what extra musical "meaning" it may have than either of its four predecessors. It is in five movements, which are grouped under three parts. The first part opens with a long funeral march; it is followed by a movement of stormy agitation, "with the utmost vehemence." The second part consists of a scherzo; the third, of a short adagietto, leading directly into a "dondo-finale." He has employed an elaborate orchestral apparatus—though it is not comparable with some that he has demanded in his earlier symphonies, notably the second. His style of writing, so far as we in New York know it through his fourth symphony, is individual. He has the modern's cheerful indifference in the face of dissonance and discord. He jump from Fargo, S. D., to Butte, Mont., "that is the thing to think about. I have traveled farther than from Berlin to St. Petersburg without stopping. It is a great country here."

MAIL
NEW YORK CITY
FEB 16 1906

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Gustav Mahler's fifth symphony, in C sharp minor, was the conspicuous novelty of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Carnegie Hall concert last night. It was preceded by Beethoven's "Egmont" overture and Schumann's A minor piano concerto, with Harold Bauer as soloist in the latter.

Mr. Gericke deserved the thanks of progressive and of curious folk in this musical community for bringing forward the enormous symphonic work of Mahler. The composer, who is Vienna's musical autocrat, has aroused deep enmity in Germany by his compositions, and they have been a bone of contention wherever heard. To keep the Boston Symphony's large clientele abreast of the times, Mr. Gericke played htis latest and largest of Mahler's symphonies. Boston liked it so well that it is to be repeated there.

Probably there will be no large demand in New York to have it done again soon. At first hearing this symphony, which lasts an hour and is in five movements, seems extraordinarily unimportant. It says things that are mainly trivial or borrowed, and it does so with a portentous emptiness of style. The "Siegfried Idyl" and other works are recalled by the best movements, the fourth, in F major. The first part, a funeral march, is solemnly futile.

There is less cacophony than might be expected with so many instruments to produce it, but that is a negative virtue. It i sto be feared that Mr. Mahler will not become much better known here than he now is.

Of Mr. Gericke's conducting and the orchestra's playing, the highest praise must be spoken.

Mr. Bauer was warmly applauded for his performance of the Schumann concerto.

m NEW YORK EVG POST
dress
FEB 1 [illegible]
te

Notes.

The Boston Orchestra has an excellent programme for its Brooklyn concert tonight at the Baptist Temple. It includes Weber's "Freischütz" overture, Schubert's unfinished symphony, Schumann's piano concerto (Harold Bauer), and Tchaikovsky's "Francesca da Rimini."

ss

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Marie Hall Plays Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto Daintily.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's matinée concert at Carnegie Hall yesterday was a most agreeable but unexciting entertainment. It is certainly not essential that concerts should always bite. It is, on the contrary, better for art that they should provide wholesome, unsensational enjoyment. At the same time the appearance of an element of sleepiness is to be deprecated. Yesterday's programme was cheerful and satisfying, but there was hardly enough in the performance to keep one wide eyed.

Haydn's D major symphony, with which the concert began, is one of the most melodious of the master's works, and it is also one for which Conductor Wilhelm Gericke has a great fondness. He conducted it admirably yesterday, and the orchestra played it with beautiful finish and lovely tone.

Marie Hall, the young English violinist, came forward as the soloist, and her number was the Mendelssohn concerto. She played it with daintiness of style but without distinction. Her tone is so small that she seems to do things in miniature. In the first movement her playing was not even technically accurate, but in this respect it improved greatly in the second and third movements, through it was a small performance.

Vincent d'Indy's symphony for piano and orchestra (on a mountain song) was the last number, with Heinrich Gebhard at the piano. It is a thin and watery work, without ideas or even any definite purpose. All that is good in it was better done long ago by Berlioz. Mr. Gebhard played the piano part very, very discreetly. The orchestra did its share well, but there was no opportunity for any such display of virtuosity as the first trumpet gave in the Mahler symphony on Thursday night.

m N. Y. EVG. TELEGRA
lress
FEB 10 1906

What will be in many respects the most important musical novelty of the season will be offered by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its next evening concert in this city, on Thursday, February 15. It is the fifth symphony by Gustav Mahler, which, as revised by its composer, was played for the first time in this country, in Boston on February 2d and 3rd. Their work made a most profound impression on the patrons of the Symphony concerts in Boston and seemed well to repay the vast amount of labor expended on its preparation, for it had no less than eleven rehearsals, all told.

MME. GADSKI TAKES A CHANCE.

Will Race Across the Ocean for a Performance in Opera.

Mme. Gadski has become so accustomed [illegible] numerous, but also often very extensive in compass. The analyst of this symphony points out that the opening theme of the funeral march is "only thirty-three measures long, that is, for Mahler, not a very long one." His predilection for melodies of a naïve or folk-song character, which he indulged freely in his fourth symphony, comes to light in the scherzo of this one, which has the character of an Austrian Ländler; and the tendency to develop such themes with an almost fantastic elaboration goes with it.

Some have thought to find in this symphony a picture of life in Vienna; that the opening dead march was suggested by the military funerals in that capital, and that the Ländler is characteristically local in spirit. The editor of the programme book of the Cincinnati Orchestra, which first played the symphony in this country on March 25, 1905, found a more philosophical content in it. There were the plaint of one who has not realized his aspirations, and in his disillusionment stands at the verge of desperation; his reconciliation to his lot through the harmless play and life of nature; his

[166]

om N. Y. TRIBUNE
ddress
ate FEB 16 1906

MUSIC.

...PHONY BY MAHLER.

...phony by Gustav Mahler was the ... at the fourth evening concert ... Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie ... Its most pervading key is said ... analyst to be D major, but it be... sharp minor and is therefore set down ... key. This makes it approach to within ... one of another fifth symphony in one ...one composed by Beethoven; but ... only likeness which can be imag... ... exist between the two works by even ... inspired seer. This is not said ... criticism of the work, though ... of the nature is invited by the fact that ... takes more time to say what he has to ... did Beethoven, although the school of ... to which he belongs set out upon its ... conquest a generation or so ago with a ... against the symphonic form as something ... and too verbose to suit the pregnant ... of the newer day. The symphonic poem, ... to illustrate the new notion of ... eloquence, seems already to have ... the ghost in favor of the five-... symphony and the one-storied sym... poem of equal length. Perhaps Mr. ... ought not to be held responsible for ... aries of his fellows, for he is both an ... and a confirmed symphonist. He has com... ... works which are thus entitled, and one ... is an hour and forty minutes long. The ... originally something more than one hour ... but it has been revised and benignantly ...

It endured fifty-nine minutes last ... and so did all but a score of the listeners. ... impossible briefly to describe what the work ... like, and difficult to analyse the impressions ... it created. One of the foremost of the many ... that by nature Mr. Mahler was designed to be ... straightforward and ingenuous composer. He has ... moments of frank and simple utterance, but they ... not last long, for he is obsessed by the prevalent ... that when an ounce of inspiration cannot ... a pound of reflection and labor will ... well. He differs from most of his fellows ... in a larger devotion to euphony and a ... of more melodious polyphony. Real ... breathes through the adagietto for strings, ... marvellously played last night, and the ... sort of waltz with diabolic elements, ... hit the taste of the simple minded and ... More than this cannot be said now, though ... and serious consideration is deserved ... work, which had a fine and illuminative ... fore the symphony the orchestra played ... tures to "Egmont" and aided Mr. Harold ... in a performance of Schumann's pianoforte ... which began heavily but ended with fine ...

...W YORK STAATS-ZEITUNG
ess
FEB 16 1906

Boston Symphonieorchester.

Im gestrigen Konzert des Bostoner ...phonieorchesters in Carnegie Hall be... man zum ersten Male in New York ... Symphonie von Gustav Mah... hören. Umstände halber muß eine ... Erstaufführung des umfangreichen Werkes ... zum Samstag verschoben werden. ... mag gleich bemerkt werden, daß ... deutschen und österreichischen ... Enthusiasten, die ihren Götzen ... Richard Strauß gegenüberstellen, ... Mahler einen schlechten Dienst er... ... Mahler darf mit Strauß gar... ... demselben Tage genannt werden, ... letztere kann garnichts Schlaueres ... recht viele Aufführungen Mah... Symphonien zu veranstalten. ... Abstand erscheint Strauß um ... Programm enthielt außerdem noch ... „Egmont"-Ouverture und ... humann'sche Klavierkonzert, von ... Bauer recht gut gespielt.

...W YORK SUN
ress
FEB 11 1906

...next concerts of the Boston Symphony ...estra will take place at Carnegie Hall on Thurs... ...evening and Saturday afternoon. At the even... ...concert the fifth symphony of Gustave Mahler, ...of the most important works recently written in ... will be performed, and Harold Bauer will ... Schumann piano concerto. On Saturday ... the programme will consist of Haydn's ... symphony, No. 2, Mendelssohn's violin ... and D'Indy's "Symphony on a Mountain ... Hall will be the violinist and Heinrich ... will play the piano obligato in the D'Indy

From NEW YORK WORL
Address
Date FEB 11 1906

...the Boston sym... ...play Haydn's C... ...o. 7), and D'Indy's ... ...tain Air. The ... ...will ... Yo...

om NEW YORK PRES
ddress
FEB 16 1906
ate

IN THE REALM OF MUSIC

Boston Men Play Mahler Symphony.

Particular significance attached to last night's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, through the first performance here of Gustav Mahler's symphony in C sharp minor, No. 5. The rest of the programme in Carnegie Hall offered Beethoven's "Egmont" overture and Schumann's piano concerto in A minor, with Harold Bauer as the soloist. This admirable pianist's performance presented much material for comment, but in view of the unusual interest attaching to the Mahler symphony (as given by Mr. Gericke and his men it was close to an hour in duration) main consideration is given here to the impressions that work created on first hearing. Let it be recorded at the outset that the orchestra under Gericke's analytical leadership came through a tremendously difficult task with colors flying. Ten rehearsals had been given to the gigantic composition, and there had been public performances in Boston and Philadelphia, so the result last night came so close to technical perfection that even those who had heard Gericke's phenomenal performance of Strauss's "Don Quixote" were amazed. Whatever be the ultimate verdict concerning Mahler's Fifth—and time will decide that question—the public should feel thankful to the Boston Orchestra's broad-minded conductor for bringing the work to tonal life in America. We are exceedingly skeptical as to this symphony's enduring value, but it cannot be gainsaid that Mahler has created a work which is exceedingly interesting throughout, of much beauty in spots, and, aside from its intrinsic value, an important example of the orchestral literature of to-day. It may be said without hesitation that the Fifth is decidedly superior to the Fourth, which the New York Symphony Orchestra played here a little more than a year ago.

The most striking feature of Mahler's symphony, in these days of brief and episodical melodic phrases, is the length of his themes, their apparent simplicity of outline and the important part they are made to play as melody rather than characterizing motives. This use of melody for its own sake is noteworthy, because the composer combines with it the most daring modern harmonies, contrapuntal sorceries and orchestral color-combinations. It seems Mahler is not second to Richard Strauss in his command of the instrumental paletts, and he displays a fertility of imagination in this respect which is individual. There are moments in the symphony superb for their gorgeous tone beauty, for their wonderfully conceived massings of tints and dynamic cumulations. At the same time Mahler shows supreme mastery in dissecting his themes; in shaping, molding and coloring the dismembered portions to suit his fancy; in combining pregnant elements into shapes that carry new suggestions while still retaining their original fragrance; in juggling contrapuntally with his material. And his command of rhythm is of the finest. But all the composer's technical mastery is made subservient to his principal purpose, that of putting melody in the foreground. Music this, which is honeycombed with intricate details of technique, with complex thematic broidery, with shifting, merging and blending tonalities, with instrumental alchemy. Yet this scintillating mass of skillfully wrought details never overshadows the essence of Mahler's music—his long-breathing melodies, and the effect upon the ear in these days of ultra-modern music is singularly lucid and euphonious. The plain fact is that Mahler has succeeded remarkably well in embodying classical ideals in a highly wrought, highly modernized orchestral vocabulary; in composing absolute music—music that asks for no programme; in painting a tonal picture, which, while gorgeously effective in its varied tints, is so clear in its outlines that it needs no title or explanation. But when all is said can it be affirmed this symphony is the result of genius, that it is the inevitable utterance of an inner necessity striving for expression? We think not.

We can find little in Mahler's Fifth Symphony that seems truly original, truly inspiring, either in melodic material or in workmanship. Mahler leans very heavily on his teacher, Anton Bruckner, and though he surpasses his master in intellectual grasp and is far more versatile and universal in his musical idioms, he never approaches that great composer's nobility and simple grandeur. Mahler's themes, in their outline and rhythmical structure, are modelled largely on those of Bruckner, while at the same time savoring occasionally of Brahms, of Berlioz and even Verdi. His harmonies, too, his contrapuntal art, and his brass-buckled orchestration bear the hall-mark of his preceptor. Buckner, however, never would have utilized so sentimental and sugary a theme as that on which Mahler has built the adagietto in F major of his symphony.

The symphony is divided into five movements, these again falling into three sections, as the first and last sections are divided into two parts each. Part I. opens with an impressive funeral march in C sharp minor—an exceedingly original opening for a symphony. The second movement of the first part is an allegro in A minor, which is labelled "with stormy stress; with the utmost vehemence." Part II. is a scherzo in D major. The last section opens with the adagietto in F major and ends with a rondo in D major. Last night the first two movements and the rondo created the deepest impression, the adagietto the most superficial. The scherzo is built on the typical Viennese Landler (slow waltz) and is an extremely clever piece of work. It is a polyphonic tour de force. But the essential triviality of the material out of which it is woven contrasts most incongruously with the ponderous manner in which these simple ideas are carried out. An attempt at humor it is, perhaps; but it fails to strike the true note of humor.

The underlying poetic idea of Mahler's symphony is not difficult to discern. Briefly, it gives a mood picture of sadness and despair following a loss and the natural reaction of a healthy mind—new interests, new aspirations and longings.

NEW YORK EV'G POST
ss
FEB 16 190

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

At the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall, the principal event was the performance of Gustav Mahler's latest symphony. The programme opened with Beethoven's Egmont Overture, played, as might be expected, with perfect finish. The performance of Schumann's only piano concerto by Harold Bauer was a thoroughly artistic one, but hardly calls for extended comment.

"Genius is an infinite capacity for giving pains." This aphorism may not have appeared originally in exactly this form, but it seems to be the idea adopted by the leading German "geniuses" of to-day—and French, too, for that matter. Perhaps this is a trifle too severe on the present work, for it did have lucid moments, particularly in the Adagietto—a song-like movement with the melody principally in the strings, which made the best impression of anything in the symphony. The title "Fifth Symphony" is a dangerous one; there is Beethoven, and there is Tchaikovsky, and there is a Fifth Organ Symphony by Widor, not so generally known, perhaps, but one of the best modern compositions ever written for that instrument. It is rash to predict, but it hardly seems possible that the present work will take rank with those great works.

Too many present-day composers seem to have taken their cue from the experience of Wagner and his critics. Wagner wrote as he was inspired to write, and the critics said: "Discords, discords! the man cannot write correct harmony." To-day Wagner's harmonies are universally accepted, even by the text-books. So now composers have the idea that if they can only pile the Ossa of discords on the Pelion of dissonance, and write long themes without even hinting at a common triad, generations to come will call them blessed, and the critics of to-day will follow the critics of yesterday, and they will all become Wagners. If discords can ever become dissonances, it will only be a question of time when the whole chromatic scale can be sounded at once, and it will be called harmony. Then counterpoint will be easy—any number of melodies can be sounded together—and there will be musical engineering—never architecture.

By a peculiar irony of fate, at the bottom of a page of the programme whereon is noted the tremendous instrumental apparatus of one of Mahler's symphonies, occurs this passage in an advertisement: "Beethoven said: 'I never wrote noisy music. For my instrumental works I need about sixty good musicians.'" When we remember what Wagner did in the "Siegfried Idyll" with only eight wind instruments (most of the time only seven) we recognize that it is a question of ideas, not of instruments. The reason Wagner was so much greater than Berlioz as an orchestrator was not that he knew more about orchestral combinations, but that he had so much more to say. One recalls the story of Liszt and the amateur, who wished Liszt to secure Wagner's good offices in orchestrating one of his mediocre works—he wished particularly to secure the effect of the trombones at the close of the "Tannhäuser" overture. Liszt remarked that Wagner never orchestrated for trombones unless he had ideas.

One of the rules of modern writers for the orchestra seems to be "Never play a brass instrument without mutes unless the police interfere." This is one of the effects that must be used very sparingly, like perfume, but Strauss and Mahler make it the normal tone from the brass instruments. From some of the indications in modern scores we may expect soon to see the direction: "Here the bass drum must be dropped from a height of forty feet onto the head of the first double-bass player." In Mahler's first symphony, according to the programme notes, there is actually a direction for the drum head to be switched with a bundle of rods. This is not orchestration, it is circus tricks. It need hardly be added that Mr. Gericke and his men played Mahler's complicated work with great virtuosity.

NEW YORK WORLD
ess
FEB 11 1906

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will produce an important novelty at its next concert, on Thursday evening, at Carnegie Hall, when Mahler's Fifth Symphony will be played. Mahler, who is the conductor and director of the Vienna Imperial Opera, is but slightly known here as a composer. The work to be performed is a lengthy and an ambitiously important bit of writing, and it has created favorable impressions by its foreign performances. The other orchestral number on this programme will be Beethoven's "Egmont" Overture. The soloist will be Harold Bauer, who will perform Schumann's Piano Concerto.

...LOR...
NEW YORK COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER
ress
FEB 16 1906

...is ... can give so illuminating and authoritative an introduction of a great new work as the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The first performance in New York of Mahler's fifth symphony, which this orchestra gave at its concert in Carnegie Hall last night, ranks with its first performance here of d'Indy's second symphony as an example of its ability to make strange music comprehensible. The form of the Mahler symphony is so new and its expressions, at their best, so subtle, that it might easily have seemed chaotic and meaningless if played less perfectly. Seconded by the virtuosity of his players, Mr. Gericke gave the music its shape and its meaning with a glorifying brilliance of tone and expressiveness of rhythm.

There are few works of genius that deserve so much as this symphony to be judged by their highest achievement. The movement with which the work ends is prolix and comparatively commonplace. But the dead march of the opening movement places Mahler near Strauss and d'Indy among the modern composers of "the music of the future." And the two succeeding movements are only less great. This symphony reminds one of Strauss and d'Indy in many ways. There is the same virtuosity of orchestration, the same strangeness of instrumental color, the same expulsive violences followed by poignant calm. And the rhythms have the same subtle contours and the unexpected breaks and veering.

On the other hand, the Mahler symphony shows distinct differences both of technique and spirit. Compared with the work of Strauss and d'Indy its passion is franker and less intellectualized, and its melodies, which at times are obviously reminiscent of Wagner and even of Brahms, are simpler and more sensuous. And in orchestration and in the development of themes there is less elaboration of detail. This is a simplification in the interest of the broad effect and the direct appeal, and it permits in the melodies a frequent cantabile.

In its bearing on the problem of programme music the Mahler symphony is more nearly related to d'Indy than to Strauss. There is no programme of external objects or events. It represents nothing pictorially. But the programme is there, however impossible it may be to express it precisely in words. It is the programme of the psychological development of a mood. The mood is sufficiently specified at the beginning by the tragic spirit of the dead march, and the development of the music thereafter is like the development of thought. It changes as a thought changes, evolves as one mood evolves out of another. One feels in the music the grief that at first is reverent and overwhelmed grow blasphemous, then hesitant, and submissive again, then spasmodic and ironic, at last a little tired of grief at all and relieved. The programme thus is a sort of psychological evolution from an initial well defined mood.

The very commonplaceness and absence of climax in the last movement may well have reference to the monotony and trivial intricacy of experience after the supreme experience has been passed. But it is in the definition of the mood of the opening movement that the symphony attains a supreme expressiveness. This mood has the beautiful self-conscious taint of modernity. It is grief that rebels against grieving as much as against the injury. It assumes for relief from sorrow a sardonic carelessness that crumbles and collapses when the ominous thought recurs. For the expression of the mood the composer has invented a beautifully strange tone color that is exactly appropriate. The fault of the symphony as a whole is that it flags in inspiration, though the beauty of the orchestration throughout does much to conceal the inexpressiveness of the later melodies. Its superb distinction, on the other hand, is its combination of all the technical subtleties of modern music with a profoundly sensuous beauty and the frank appeal of passion.

The soloist for the evening was Harold Bauer, who made his reappearance in New York after a long absence. He gave a noble performance of Schumann's A minor piano concerto. This melodious work runs the risk of falling into some monotony of tone by lying so largely in the middle of the keyboard. Mr. Bauer revealed the resources of his art in the way he transcended the difficulty by delicate gradations of dynamics and the most sensitive response to every variation of mood the music contains. The opening number on the programme was Beethoven's "Egmont" overture.

...W YORK HERALD
ress
FEB 16 1906
e

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

It was an especially interesting concert that the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave in Carnegie Hall last night as the fourth of the present series. Involving the first local performance of Gustav Mahler's fifth symphony, the most discussed symphonic work of the day, on the reappearance of Mr. Harold Bauer, pianist, it attracted a brilliant audience which crowded the hall.

In a measure the Beethoven "Egmont" overture, played with classic precision and high finish, seemed little more than a "curtain raiser" to the evening's real interests. Of these the Mahler Symphony engrossed chief attention. It proved scarcely as weighty a composition as the Vienna writer's previous one, the "Fourth," yet it developed features of great beauty and may ultimately prove the more popular of the two.

Mr. Gericke and his men brilliantly distinguished themselves in its performance.

Mr. Bauer displayed in the Schumann concerto his accustomed elegance and purity of style, and was enthusiastically applauded.

[167]

om ...RTBC...

ddress ...

ate ... FEB 16 1906

MUSIC.

A SYMPHONY BY MAHLER.

The fifth symphony by Gustav Mahler was the principal offering at the fourth evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall last night. Its most pervading key is said by an inspired analyst to be D major, but it begins in C sharp minor and is therefore set down as in that key. This makes it approach to within a semi-tone of another fifth symphony in one particular—one composed by Beethoven; but it is the only likeness which can be imagined to exist between the two works by even the most inspired seer. This is not said in flippant criticism of the work, though something of the nature is invited by the fact that Mr. Mahler takes more time to say what he has to say than did Beethoven, although the school of composers to which he belongs set out upon its path of conquest a generation or so ago with a protest against the symphonic form as something too diffuse and too verbose to suit the pregnant thought of the newer day. The symphonic poem, which was to illustrate the new notion of condensed eloquence, seems already to have yielded up the ghost in favor of the five-storied symphony and the one-storied symphonic poem of equal length. Perhaps Mr. Mahler ought not to be held responsible for the vagaries of his fellows, for he is both an avowed and a confirmed symphonist. He has composed six works which are thus entitled, and one of them is an hour and forty minutes long The fifth was originally something more than one hour in length, but it has been revised and benignantly curtailed. It endured fifty-nine minutes last night, and so did all but a score of the listeners. It is impossible briefly to describe what the work is like, and difficult to analyze the impressions which it created. One of the foremost of the many is that by nature Mr. Mahler was designed to be a straightforward and ingenuous composer. He has moments of frank and simple utterance, but they do not last long, for he is obsessed by the prevalent conviction that when an ounce of inspiration cannot be commanded a pound of reflection and labor will serve as well. He differs from most of his fellows, however, in a larger devotion to euphony and a command of more melodious polyphony. Real beauty breathes through the adagietta for strings, which was marvellously played last night, and the scherzo, a sort of waltz with diabolic elements, might even hit the taste of the simple minded and careless. More than this cannot be said now, though much more and serious consideration is deserved by the work, which had a fine and illuminative reading. Before the symphony the orchestra played the overture to "Egmont" and aided Mr. Harold Bauer in a performance of Schumann's pianoforte concerto, which began heavily but ended with fine brilliancy.

n ...ER YORKER ZEITUNG

ess ...

FEB 16 1906

Boston Symphonieorchester.

Im gestrigen Konzert des Bostoner Symphonieorchesters in Carnegie Hall bekam man zum ersten Male in New York die fünfte Symphonie von Gustav Mahler zu hören. Umstände halber muß eine Besprechung des umfangreichen Werkes bis zum Samstag verschoben werden. Nur das mag gleich bemerkt werden, daß diejenigen deutschen und österreichischen Mahler-Enthusiasten, die ihren Götzen einem Richard Strauß gegenüberstellen, Herrn Mahler einen schlechten Dienst erwiesen. Mahler darf mit Strauß garnicht an demselben Tage genannt werden, und der letztere kann garnichts Schlaueres thun, als recht viele Aufführungen Mahlerscher Symphonien zu veranstalten. Durch den Abstand erscheint Strauß um so größer.

Das Programm enthielt außerdem noch Beethoven's „Egmont"-Ouverture und das Schumann'sche Klavierkonzert, von Harold Bauer recht gut gespielt.

n ...W YORK SUN

ress ...

FEB 11 1906

The next concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place at Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. At the evening concert the fifth symphony of Gustave Mahler, one of the most important works recently written in Europe, will be performed, and Harold Bauer will play the Schumann piano concerto. On Saturday afternoon the programme will consist of Haydn's D major symphony, No. 2, Mendelssohn's violin concerto and D'Indy's "Symphony on a Mountain Air." Marie Hall will be the violinist and Heinrich Gebhard will play the piano obligato in the D'Indy work.

From NEW YORK WORL

Address ...

Date FEB 11 1906

At the Saturday matinee, at Carnegie Hall next Saturday, the Boston symphony Orchestra will play Haydn's C ... Symphony (No. 7), and D'Indy's ... on a Mountain Air. The ... the latter work will be ... Gebhard. The solo- ... Hall ... Yo om NEW YORK PRESS

ddress ...

ate FEB 16 1906

IN THE REALM OF MUSIC

Boston Men Play Mahler Symphony.

Particular significance attached to last night's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra through the first performance here of Gustav Mahler's symphony in C sharp minor, No. 5. The rest of the programme in Carnegie Hall offered Beethoven's "Egmont" overture and Schumann's piano concerto in A minor, with Harold Bauer as the soloist. This admirable pianist's performance presented much material for comment, but in view of the unusual interest attaching to the Mahler symphony (as given by Mr. Gericke and his men it was close to an hour in duration) main consideration is given here to the impressions that work created on first hearing. Let it be recorded at the outset that the orchestra under Gericke's analytical leadership came through a tremendously difficult task with colors flying. Ten rehearsals had been given to the gigantic composition, and there had been public performances in Boston and Philadelphia; so the result last night came so close to technical perfection that even those who had heard Gericke's phenomenal performance of Strauss's "Don Quixote" were amazed. Whatever be the ultimate verdict concerning Mahler's Fifth—and time will decide that question—the public should feel thankful to the Boston Orchestra's broad-minded conductor for bringing the work to tonal life in America. We are exceedingly skeptical as to this symphony's enduring value, but it cannot be gainsaid that Mahler has created a work which is exceedingly interesting throughout, of much beauty in spots, and, aside from its intrinsic value, an important example of the orchestral literature of to-day. It may be said without hesitation that the Fifth is decidedly superior to the Fourth, which the New York Symphony Orchestra played here a little more than a year ago.

The most striking feature of Mahler's symphony, in these days of brief and episodical melodic phrases, is the length of his themes, their apparent simplicity of outline and the important part they are made to play as melody rather than characterizing motives. This use of melody for its own sake is noteworthy, because the composer combines with it the most daring modern harmonies, contrapuntal sorceries and orchestral color-combinations. It seems Mahler is not second to Richard Strauss in his command of the instrumental palette, and he displays a fertility of imagination in this respect which is individual. There are moments in the symphony superb for their gorgeous tone beauty, for their wonderfully conceived massings of tints and dynamic cumulations. At the same time Mahler shows supreme mastery in dissecting his themes; in shaping, molding and coloring the dismembered portions to suit his fancy; in combining pregnant elements into shapes that carry new suggestions while still retaining their original fragrance; in juggling contrapuntally with his material. And his command of rhythm is of the finest. But all the composer's technical mastery is made subservient to his principal purpose, that of putting melody in the foreground. Music this, which is honeycombed with intricate details of technique, with complex thematic broidery, with shifting, merging and blending tonalities, with instrumental alchemy. Yet this scintillating mass of skillfully wrought details never overshadows the essence of Mahler's music—his long-breathing melodies, and the effect upon the ear in these days of ultra-modern music is singularly lucid and euphonious. The plain fact is that Mahler has succeeded remarkably well in embodying classical ideals in a highly wrought, highly modernized orchestral vocabulary; in composing absolute music—music that asks for no programme; in painting a tonal picture, which, while gorgeously effective in its varied tints, is so clear in its outlines that it needs no title or explanation. But when all is said, can it be affirmed this symphony is the result of genius, that it is the inevitable utterance of an inner necessity striving for exbression? We think not.

We can find little in Mahler's Fifth Symphony that seems truly original, truly inspiring, either in melodic material or in workmanship. Mahler leans very heavily on his teacher, Anton Bruckner, and though he surpasses his master in intellectual grasp and is far more versatile and universal in his musical idioms, he never approaches that great composer's nobility and simple grandeur. Mahler's themes, in their outline and rhythmical structure, are modelled largely on those of Bruckner, while at the same time savoring occasionally of Brahms, of Berlioz and even Verdi. His harmonies, too, his contrapuntal art, and his brass-buckled orchestration bear the hall-mark of his preceptor. Buckner, however, never would have utilized so sentimental and sugary a theme as that on which Mahler has built the adagietto in F major of his symphony.

The symphony is divided into five movements, these again falling into three sections, as the first and last sections are divided into two parts each. Part I. opens with an impressive funeral march in C sharp minor—an exceedingly original opening for a symphony. The second movement of the first part is an allegro in A minor, which is labelled "with stormy stress; with the utmost vehemence." Part II. is a scherzo in D major. The last section opens with the adagietto in F major and ends with a rondo in D major. Last night the first two movements and the rondo created the deepest impression, the adagietto the most superficial. The scherzo is built on the typical Viennese Landler (slow waltz) and is an extremely clever piece of work. It is a polyphonic tour de force. But the essential triviality of the material out of which it is woven contrasts most incongruously with the ponderous manner in which these simple ideas are carried out. An attempt at humor it is, perhaps; but it fails to strike the true note of humor.

The underlying poetic idea of Mahler's symphony is not difficult to discern. Briefly, it gives a mood picture of sadness and despair following a loss and the natural reaction of a healthy mind—new interests, new aspirations and longings.

NEW YORK EV'G POST

ss ...

Feb 16 '06

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

At the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall, the principal event was the performance of Gustav Mahler's latest symphony. The programme opened with Beethoven's Egmont Overture, played, as might be expected, with perfect finish. The performance of Schumann's only piano concerto by Harold Bauer was a thoroughly artistic one, but hardly calls for extended comment.

"Genius is an infinite capacity for giving pains." This aphorism may not have appeared originally in exactly this form, but it seems to be the idea adopted by the leading German "geniuses" to-day—and French, too, for that matter. Perhaps this is a trifle too severe on the present work, for it did have lucid moments, particularly in the Adagietto—a song-like movement with the melody principally in the strings, which made the best impression of anything in the symphony. The title "Fifth Symphony" is a dangerous one; there is Beethoven, and there is Tchaikovsky, and there is a Fifth Organ Symphony by Widor, not so generally known, perhaps, but one of the best modern compositions ever written for that instrument. It is rash to predict, but it hardly seems possible that the present work will take rank with these great works.

Too many present-day composers seem to have taken their cue from the experience of Wagner and his critics. Wagner wrote as he was inspired to write, and the critics said: "Discords, discords! the man cannot write correct harmony." To-day Wagner's harmonies are universally accepted, even by the text-books. So now composers have the idea that if they can only pile the Ossa of discords on the Pelion of dissonance, and write long themes without even hinting at a common triad, generations to come will call them blessed, and the critics of to-day will follow the critics of yesterday, and they will all become Wagners. If discords can ever become dissonances, it will only be a question of time when the whole chromatic scale can be sounded at once, and it will be called harmony. Then counterpoint will be easy—any number of melodies can be sounded together—and there will be musical engineering—never architecture.

By a peculiar irony of fate, at the bottom of a page of the programme whereon is noted the tremendous instrumental apparatus of one of Mahler's symphonies, occurs this passage in an advertisement: "Beethoven said: 'I never wrote noisy music. For my instrumental works I need about sixty good musicians.'" When we remember what Wagner did in the "Siegfried Idyll" with only eight wind instruments (most of the time only seven) we recognize that it is a question of ideas, not of instruments. The reason Wagner was so much greater than Berlioz as an orchestrator was not that he knew more about orchestral combinations, but that he had so much more to say. One recalls the story of Liszt and the amateur, who wished Liszt to secure Wagner's good offices in orchestrating one of his mediocre works—he wished particularly to secure the effect of the trombones at the close of the "Tannhäuser" overture. Liszt remarked that Wagner never orchestrated for trombones unless he had ideas.

One of the rules of modern writers for the orchestra seems to be "Never play a brass instrument without mutes unless the police interfere." This is one of the effects that must be used very sparingly, like perfume; but Strauss and Mahler make it the normal tone from the brass instruments. From some of the indications in modern scores we may expect soon to see the direction: "Here the bass drum must be dropped from a height of forty feet onto the head of the first double-bass player." In Mahler's first symphony, according to the programme notes, there is actually a direction for the drum head to be switched with a bundle of rods. This is not orchestration, it is circus tricks. It need hardly be added that Mr. Gericke and his men played Mahler's complicated work with great virtuosity.

NEW YORK WORLD

ess ...

FEB 11 1906

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will produce an important novelty at its next concert, on Thursday evening, at Carnegie Hall, when Mahler's Fifth Symphony will be played. Mahler, who is the conducter and director of the Vienna Imperial Opera, is but slightly known here as a composer. The work to be performed is a lengthy and an ambitiously important bit of writing, and it has created favorable impressions by its foreign performances. The other orchestral number on this programme will be Beethoven's "Egmont" Overture. The soloists will be Harold Bauer, who will perform Schumann's Piano Concerto.

n ...LOBE

ess NEW YORK COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER

FEB 16 1906

THERE is no orchestra in America that can give so illuminating and authoritative an introduction of a great new work as the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The first performance in New York of Mahler's fifth symphony, which this orchestra gave at its concert in Carnegie Hall last night, ranks with its first performance here of d'Indy's second symphony as an example of its ability to make strange music comprehensible. The form of the Mahler symphony is so new and its expressions, at their best, so subtle, that it might easily have seemed chaotic and meaningless if played less perfectly. Seconded by the virtuosity of his players, Mr. Gericke gave the music its shape and its meaning with a glorifying brilliance of tone and expressiveness of rhythm.

There are few works of genius that deserve so much as this symphony to be judged by their highest achievement. The movement with which the work ends is prolix and comparatively commonplace. But the dead march of the opening movement places Mahler near Strauss and d'Indy among the modern composers of "the music of the future." And the two succeeding movements are only less great. This symphony reminds one of Strauss and d'Indy in many ways. There is the same virtuosity of orchestration, the same strangeness of instrumental color, the same expulsive violences followed by poignant calm. And the rhythms have the same subtle contours and the unexpected breaks and veering.

On the other hand, the Mahler symphony shows distinct differences both of technique and spirit. Compared with the work of Strauss and d'Indy its passion is franker and less intellectualized, and its melodies, which at times are obviously reminiscent of Wagner and even of Brahms, are simpler and more sensuous. And in orchestration and in the development of themes there is less elaboration of detail. This is a simplification in the interest of the broad effect and the direct appeal, and it permits in the melodies a frequent cantabile.

In its bearing on the problem of programme music the Mahler symphony is more nearly related to d'Indy than to Strauss. There is no programme of external objects or events. It represents nothing pictorially. But the programme is there, however impossible it may be to express it precisely in words. It is the programme of the psychological development of a mood. The mood is sufficiently specified at the beginning by the tragic spirit of the dead march, and the development of the music thereafter is like the development of thought. It changes as a thought changes, evolves as one mood evolves out of another. One feels in the music the grief that at first is reverent and overwhelmed grow blasphemous, then hesitant, and submissive again, then spasmodic and ironic, at last a little tired of grief at all and relieved. The programme thus is a sort of psychological evolution from an initial well defined mood.

The very commonplaceness and absence of climax in the last movement may well have reference to the monotony and trivial intricacy of experience after the supreme experience has been passed. But it is in the definition of the mood of the opening movement that the symphony attains a supreme expressiveness. This mood has the beautiful self-conscious taint of modernity. It is grief that rebels against grieving as much as against the injury. It assumes for relief from sorrow a sardonic carelessness that crumbles and collapses when the ominous thought recurs. For the expression of the mood the composer has invented a beautifully strange tone color that is exactly appropriate. The fault of the symphony as a whole is that it flags in inspiration, though the beauty of the orchestration throughout does much to conceal the inexpressiveness of the later melodies. Its superb distinction, on the other hand, is its combination of all the technical subtleties of modern music with a profoundly sensuous beauty and the frank appeal of passion.

The soloist for the evening was Harold Bauer, who made his reappearance in New York after a long absence. He gave a noble performance of Schumann's A minor piano concerto. This melodious work runs the risk of falling into some monotony of tone by lying so largely in the middle of the keyboard. Mr. Bauer revealed the resources of his art in the way he transcended the difficulty by delicate gradations of dynamics and the most sensitive response to every variation of mood the music contains. The opening number on the programme was Beethoven's "Egmont" overture.

n ...

ress ...

e FEB 16 1906

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

It was an especially interesting concert that the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave in Carnegie Hall last night as the fourth of the present series. Involving the first local performance of Gustav Mahler's fifth symphony, the most discussed symphonic a work of the day, on the reappearance of Mr. Harold Bauer, pianist, it attracted a brilliant audience which crowded the hall.

In a measure the Beethoven "Egmont" overture, played with classic precision and high finish, seemed little more than a "curtain raiser" to the evening's real interests. Of these the Mahler Symphony engrossed chief attention. It proved scarcely as weighty a composition as the Vienna writer's previous one, the "Fourth," yet it developed features of great beauty and may ultimately prove the more popular of the two.

Mr. Gericke and his men brilliantly distinguished themselves in its performance.

Mr. Bauer displayed in the Schumann concerto his accustomed elegance and purity of style, and was enthusiastically applauded.

[167]

NEW YORK STAATS-ZEITUNG
FEB 18 1906

Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester.

Das Bostoner Symphonieorchester gab gestern sein vorletztes Nachmittagskonzert in Carnegie Hall vor einem sehr zahlreichen Publikum. Das Programm war kurz und nicht besonders interessant, aber es giebt genug Musikfreunde in New York, die schon wegen der außerordentlichen Leistungen dieses Musterorchesters kommen, auch wenn das Programm sie nicht besonders lockt. Und gerade solche Leute wurden gestern Nachmittag nicht enttäuscht, denn die bekannte Haydn'sche D-dur Symphonie wurde mit einer Finesse der Ausführung gespielt, die selbst blasirten Konzertstammgästen das Herz erwärmen mußte. Dann kam Mendelssohn's Violinkonzert an die Reihe, von Fräulein Marie Hall mit ungewöhnlich kleinem Ton gespielt. Dieses Konzert ist schon feminin genug, und wenn es dann noch mit mädchenhafter Zurückhaltung gespielt wird, bekommt man eine Geschmacksempfindung, als hätte man süßesten Kuchen mit Schlagsahne essen müssen.

Die dritte und letzte Nummer des Programms war Vincent d'Indy's Bergsymphonie für Orchester und Piano. Da das New Yorker Publikum erst vor einigen Wochen Gelegenheit hatte, sich an diesem uninteressanten Opus in der Entfaltung von Gould zu üben, lag kaum Veranlassung vor, ihm eine solche Gelegenheit schon wieder zu verschaffen. Die zweite Erfahrung wird aber den Zuhörern, die etwa noch Zweifel hegten, die Ueberzeugung von der hervorragenden Unbedeutendheit dieser d'Indy'schen Arbeit befestigt haben. Die Bergluft in dieser Symphonie ist denn doch etwas zu dünn für gesunde musikalische Lungen. Und wie prätentiös diese mechanische Mache erscheint! Der Pianopart wurde von Heinrich Gebhard recht sauber und sehr geschmackvoll vorgetragen. Eine pianistische That läßt sich freilich mit solchen hohlen und billigen Klavierfiguren nicht verrichten. Aber Gebhard giebt ja am nächsten Dinstag ein eignes Recital; da wird sich mehr sagen lassen.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
NEW YORK WORLD
FEB 18 1906

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
NEW YORK HERALD
FEB 18 1906

BOSTON SYMPHONY MATINEE CONCERT

Pleasing but Not a Highly Important Programme Presented by Mr. Gericke.

PIANO AND VIOLIN SOLOS

Under the Leader's Treatment the D'Indy Symphony Makes More Favorable Impression Than It Did Before.

It was a pleasing but not a highly important programme that Mr. Gericke presented in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's fourth matinee. Haydn's D major symphony, the twelfth of the "Salomon" set; the Mendelssohn violin concerto and d'Indy's "Symphony on a Mountain Air," for orchestra and pianoforte, made up the list. Miss Marie Hall, violinist, and Mr. Heinrich Gebhard, pianist, were the soloists.

Mr. Gericke's readings of Haydn are always matters for admiration, and if the works of the genial old Austrian symphonist make small demands on the technical powers of this virtuoso orchestra they exhibit admirably its fine balance and polished beauty of tone. The first two movements of the Mendelssohn concerto were creditable both to Miss Hall and her orchestral accompanists. She played the broad melody of the andante not only with fine taste and elegance, but with some sentiment as well. The final allegro she treated less happily.

The d'Indy symphony was decidedly the most interesting item in the concert. This composition, in which the piano is treated as an integral factor in the orchestra, not as a solo instrument, made a more positive and rather more favorable impression yesterday than it did some months ago at its first local performance.

Mr. Gericke treated it with more warmth than is his wont and earned for it some hearty applause, in which Mr. Heinrich Gebhard was deservedly a sharer.

REVU
NEW YORK CITY
FEB 18 1906

...Blatt; das Boston Sym... Orchester spielte Gustav Mahl... Symphonie. Von den 9 Symphonien, zu denen sich noch im Lauf des Sommers eine sechste, eben vollendete, gesellen wird, ist blos die Vierte in voriger Saison von Walter Damrosch aufgeführt worden. Die Bekanntschaft mit den ersten dreien steht noch aus, ebenso wie dieselbe mit den 9 Bruckner'schen Symphonien. Und doch kommt man zu einem möglichen Verständniß Mahler's nur durch Vertrautheit mit dem Schaffen seines Lehrers Bruckner nahe. Wie Bruckner, bewegt sich auch Mahler in Riesenformen, und der Sinn für naive, ja banale Melodik ist gemeinsam. Leider aber auch eine merkwürdige Zerfahrenheit im Aufbau, die allerdings bei Mahler, der mit viel stärkeren Mitteln arbeitet, noch viel mehr auffällt. Der Mangel an Gefühlswärme dieser Musik ist seltsam. In der eigenthümlichen, contrapunktischen Behandlung versteinern die Gedanken — auch hier die Parallele mit Bruckner. Die den Oesterreicher kennzeichnenden, auf Schubert zurückweisenden melodischen Einfälle werden starr und hart. Etwa auftauchenden Gefühlsregungen wird aus dem Weg gegangen. So in Adagietto, welches abschließt, nachdem die Vorbedingungen zur Weiterentwickelung in ein wärmer sprechendes Adagio gegeben wären.

Die Symphonie dauert eine Stunde und ist in 3 Abschnitten und 5 Sätzen geschrieben, von welchen der erste, ein merkwürdiger Trauermarsch, der aber sehr brigineller Conception nicht entbehrt, den einheitlichsten Eindruck hinterläßt.

Um so unbefriedigender ist der zweite Satz. Hier ist überhaupt nicht ersichtlich, was der Komponist ausdrücken wollte. Der Scherzo-Satz steht auf einem gemüthlichen Ländlermotiv, aber durch bizarre Gegenarbeit wird der Gemüthlichkeit bald der Boden entzogen. Von dem Adagietto ist schon die Rede gewesen. Diesem folgt als Schluß ein Rondo-Finale. Auch in diesem Satz sind die Gedankengänge nicht ersichtlich; als Abschluß ist er vollständig verfehlt. Hätte nicht Herr Gericke die Partitur zugeklappt, würde kaum ein Hörer das Ende vermuthet haben.

Das ganze Werk spricht in seinem Gesammteindruck von einem intensiven Ringen nach Ausdruck, der sich auf natürliche, gemeinverständliche Weise nicht geben will. Eigenthümlich spiegelt sich in Mahlers Geist die musikalische Gedankenwelt, und da er ein Gegner von Programmen ist, wird es schwer sein für den Hörer, dieselbe ganz zu erfassen und zu beurtheilen.

Er will durch die Kraft der Tonsprache allein seine Gefühle, und was er ausdrücken will, mittheilen. Dazu aber fehlt seiner Tonsprache das Ueberzeugende. Die Unklarheit derselben wird auch den aufmerksamsten Zuhörer über den empfangenen Eindruck im Dunkeln lassen.

New York Times
FEB 18 1906

THE BOSTON ORCHE...

Second Concert of Its Fou... New York.

The Boston Symphony Orches... ond concert yesterday afternoon ... gie Hall attracted another very ... dience, which listened to a program ... that contained only familiar things; a ... though the principal number of it h... been heard here only once before, ... was so recently that it lingered in the memories of many. This was d'Indy's symphony on the air of a French mountaineer, in which the piano is given an important part, though only in a few places a part that has anything like the prominence of a solo instrument. Mr. Damrosch played it just after Mr. d'Indy had paid his visit to New York last December, and on that occasion Mr. Pugno undertook the piano part. Yesterday this was allotted to Mr. Gebhard of Boston.

There is by no means so much in this earlier work of the French radical to puzzle and confuse the listener as there is in his second symphony. It is much easier to grasp, to perceive the composer's intentions, and there are many passages in it of a beauty that lingers in the memory, though there are also some of the stubborn obscurities of Mr. d'Indy's style, some of his deliberate harshness. But the impression it leaves on the whole is rather one of ingenious contrivance and skill than of strong inspiration. This "symphony," which is no symphony, but rather a free succession of variations, has little of the logical sequence and sustained development of the symphonic form. It presents itself in a rather fragmentary guise, in which the composer has wrought a most ingenious series of transformations in the letter and the spirit of the theme. The piano is not an effective member of the orchestral body when it is employed as such, and it is something of a self-sacrifice for any pianist to undertake the part for it. Only in the last movement does it gain any striking effect, and then it is the sort of effect that is expected in a piano concerto. Mr. Gebhard played it with much skill and with a due subordination where Mr. d'Indy had not attended to the subordination himself.

Miss Marie Hall was the soloist, and played Mendelssohn's violin concerto. It was the kind of performance we have learned to expect from her—very adept, fluent, neat, with a fine quality of tone, and musically expressive; but not in any way deeply moving or weighty. The concert was begun with a familiar symphony by Haydn, that in D and numbered 2 in Breitkopf and Härtel's catalogue. It was beautifully played with rich color and the fine, cheerful spirit that is Haydn's.

From N. Y. TRIBUNE,
Address
FEB 18 1906

MUSIC.

CONCERTS AND OPERA.

It is regrettable, for more reasons than one, that the conductors of visiting orchestras do not seem to think it worth while to inform themselves about the doings of local organizations. The Boston Orchestra is always welcome, but it might be more so if it did not so often in its concerts duplicate performances of local organizations. Yesterday's concert of the Boston Orchestra offered practically nothing to pique even legitimate curiosity. It provided the greatest pleasure for regular concert-goers by a finely sonorous and euphonous performance of one of the most familiar of Haydn's symphonies—that in D, No. 2 of the Breitkopf and Härtel series—in which a stickler for historically correct readings might perhaps have wished a more spirited tempo in the minuet, but could scarcely have asked more than he received. As for the rest, Marie Hall excited only a languid interest by her neat performance of Mendelssohn's violin concerto, and d'Indy's symphony on a mountaineer's air had so recently been heard at one of the concerts of the Symphony Orchestra under Mr. Walter Damrosch's direction and with Mr. Pugno at the pianoforte that there were no thrills in it, in spite of the capable help of Mr. Gebhard, who must come again to bring to us full appreciation of his merits as a pianist. The mountaineer's air, by the way, which Mr. Philip Hale, who gossips so genially and instructively in the programme books (which are this season handed out on the sidewalk), identifies as a folksong of Cévennes, and which sounded so like a tune from the Scottish Highlands to the Tribune's reviewer some weeks ago, turns out on a second hearing to be none other than that of "Leezie Lindsay." "Came ye gang to the Hie'land, Leezie Lindsay?" We do not know the invitation had been extended by a Frenchman. But it was a pleasant concert, and the Boston gentlemen played elegantly.

Odd Distribution of Good and Bad Music in Cosmopolitan New York.

By Edward Ziegler.

THE proof that New York is a most cosmopolitan city musically has seldom been set forth with a more marked clearness than it was last Thursday evening. On this evening, at Carnegie Hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the first performance in this city of Mahler's Fifth Symphony, a work that has excited much attention in the great centres of music abroad. At the same time the Metropolitan Opera-House was being put to undignified purposes by giving it over to a bad performance of Strauss's comic opera, "Der Zigeuner-Baron," with the addition of an all-star-circus coda; while in the lower side of this vast city, at Cooper Union, Franz X. Arens was conducting a concert of serious music to an audience of wage-earners, trying to arouse in them a love for sterner and better music than is usually fed to people of their opportunities.

The Boston Symphony concert appealed to its usual clientele, probably the most serious-minded musical people in this city. The Metropolitan Opera-House was crowded with a throng of curiosity-seekers, who came principally to see as many stars as possible for the price of one ticket, and also to see these stars conduct themselves with much the same dignity as the various members of the half-circle of minstrel show. Serious-minded opera-frequenters chose to stay away in great numbers, while others came to see just how undignified the circus would be and how unsuitable a frame the Metropolitan Opera-House is for Strauss's comic opera. Cooper Union had its usual fill of devotees, who embrace these periodical opportunities for increasing their knowledge of music and for finding a path by means of which an appreciation of the classics in music may be opened for them.

Conried Benefit a Musical Joke.

The Metropolitan Opera-House performance—if it may be dignified by such a name—was Mr. Conried's benefit. It was financially successful. This, in most cases, would silence criticism, but Herr Conried has so often and so emphatically laid stress upon his earnest views that he ought to be reminded of the fiat contradiction the production of "Der Zigeuner-Baron" offers. This comic opera is not a suitable choice for the Metropolitan Opera-House. It has pretty music and its story is amusing. In a small theatre, with competent singers and a competent conductor, this work would earn its share of applause. Mr. Conried controls a small theatre, and he could with a very small outlay [illegible] good dancers to produce "Der Zigeuner-Baron" at the Irving Place Theatre. This should satisfy his hobby—if he is so intent upon producing comic operas.

During his first season at the Metropolitan, when the freshness had not yet worn off Herr Conried's artistic promises, he chose to take, as a benefit performance, an evening of "Parsifal." That was a dignified action. But with last year's "Die Fledermaus" and this year's "Der Zigeuner-Baron" Mr. Conried's promises vanish into thin air. If the present season at the Metropolitan had been eminently an artistic one, if we had had model performances of Wagner's "Ring" and other serious works, then the plea might be made that the stage of this opera-house was free for whatever was necessary in order to put "Der Zigeuner-Baron" on the boards for a single performance.

But the "Ring" performances have been notoriously mismanaged, showing undoubted lack of competent rehearsal. More than that, the recent production of Mozart's masterpiece, "Don Giovanni," was mangled. Hence there was little artistic excuse for wasting so much time, scenery and costumes on this Strauss comic opera. It might prove, after all, to have been a pretty expensive artistic holiday for Herr Conried, since it is a difficult thing to believe in the artistic seriousness of a manager who preaches art for art's sake and practises comic opera for Conried's sake.

Mahler Symphony Disappoints.

The Mahler Fifth Symphony, performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was a disappointment to those who had anticipated much on this occasion. Its beginning is pregnant with promise, but the work soon assumes dreary lengths. It takes almost an hour in performance in its present version, which has been curtailed about twenty minutes; but there are patches of repetition that deaden the listener's interest.

This work seems to have increased the habit of bracketing the names of Mahler and Strauss, which is a grave injustice to the latter composer. Strauss is a maker of big themes, while Mahler's inventions are of doubtful importance, and his writing is reminiscent. The work was wonderfully played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and much credit is due Conductor Gericke for the pains he took with rehearsing this long work. It is tuneful and very often interesting, but it lacks much of being a great symphony.

Those who are acquainted with the various symphonies by Mahler contend that this Fifth Symphony is not even one of Mahler's great ones, that his Second and Third Symphonies are infinitely bigger. But let us not discourage Mr. Gericke for presenting a novelty. Concert programmes have contained familiar works in ample quantity to satisfy the admirers of well-worn music. The Philharmonic Society programmes, for instance, have been devoid enough of novelties this season.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
NEW YORK PRESS
FEB 18 1906

Haydn and D'Indy by Boston Men.

After the Boston Symphony Orchestra's programme of last Thursday night that of yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall came as an anti-climax. There may be doubts as to the intrinsic value of Mahler's Fifth Symphony, but the first performance in New York of this gigantic work was a musical event of importance, and in the hearing the composition held the interest tense throughout. Yesterday's list, arranged to suit what is supposed to be the taste of matinee audiences, offered Haydn's Symphony in D major (B. & H. No. 2), Mendelssohn's much-befiddled violin concerto in E minor, and D'Indy's "Symphony on a Mountain Air," for orchestra and pianoforte, opus 25. Haydn's old-fashioned work, prettily as it was played, did not quicken the sprits; the Mendelssohn concerto (must we hear every violinist in this hackneyed composition?) might well have been spared the hearing, and D'Indy's clever and effective piano-symphony had been given recently by the New York Symphony Orchestra with Raoul Pugno at his piano. Besides, New Yorkers have been satiated this year with the Frenchman's music, mainly through the kind services of the Boston orchestra under D'Indy's own direction.

Still, it was the French composer's music which gave the most enjoyment yesterday. This work is, perhaps, not the result of genuine inspiration; yet it does not interest merely through its clever workmanship and its skillful merging of the piano into the orchestral woof. D'Indy's sonorous elaboration of a simple air has vitality and energy, and it gains on repetition. Heinrich Gebhard played the piano part well, though at times his performance seemed somewhat too subdued.

The soloist was Miss Marie Hall, now a familiar figure in New York. In the Mendelssohn concerto she displayed her fleetness of finger, accuracy and nimbleness of [illegible] as usual, however, her [illegible] noteworthy for tenderness than for [illegible]

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
JOURNAL
ELIZABETH, N. J.
FEB 18 [illegible]

The Boston Symphony Orches... play a new symphony by Gustav Mah... ler at its next concert on Thurs... night. Harold Bauer is announ... the soloist.

NEW YORK STAATS ZEITG
FEB 17

Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester.

Das Bostoner Symphonieorchester gab gestern sein vorletztes Nachmittagskonzert in Carnegie Hall vor einem sehr zahlreichen Publikum. Das Programm war kurz und nicht besonders interessant, aber es giebt genug Musikfreunde in New York, die schon wegen der außerordentlichen Leistungen dieses Musterorchesters kommen, auch wenn das Programm sie nicht besonders lockt. Und gerade solche Leute wurden gestern Nachmittag nicht enttäuscht, denn die bekannte Haydn'sche D-dur Symphonie wurde mit einer Finesse der Ausführung gespielt, die selbst blasirten Konzertstammgästen das Herz erwärmen mußte. Dann kam Mendelssohn's Violinkonzert an die Reihe, von Fräulein Marie Hall mit ungewöhnlich kleinem Ton gespielt. Dieses Konzert ist schon feminin genug, und wenn es dann noch mit mädchenhafter Zurückhaltung gespielt wird, bekommt man eine Geschmacksempfindung, als hätte man süßesten Kuchen mit Schlagsahne essen müssen.

Die dritte und letzte Nummer des Programms war Vincent d'Indy's Bergsymphonie für Orchester und Piano. Da das New Yorker Publikum erst vor einigen Wochen Gelegenheit hatte, sich an diesem uninteressanten Opus in der Entfaltung von Geduld zu üben, lag kaum Veranlassung vor, ihm eine solche Gelegenheit schon wieder zu verschaffen. Die zweite Erfahrung wird aber den Zuhörern, die etwa noch Zweifel hegten, die Ueberzeugung von der hervorragenden Unbedeutendheit dieser d'Indy'schen Arbeit befestigt haben. Die Bergluft in dieser Symphonie ist denn doch etwas zu dünn für gesunde musikalische Lungen. Und wie prätentiös diese mechanische Mache erscheint! Der Pianopart wurde von Heinrich Gebhard recht sauber und sehr geschmackvoll vorgetragen. Eine pianistische That läßt sich freilich mit solchen hohlen und billigen Klavierfiguren nicht verrichten. Aber Gebhard giebt ja am nächsten Dinstag ein eigenes Recital; da wird sich mehr sagen lassen.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
NEW YORK WORLD
FEB 18 1906

Newspaper Cutting Bureau and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
NEW YORK HERALD
FEB 18 1906

BOSTON SYMPHONY MATINEE CONCERT

Pleasing but Not a Highly Important Programme Presented by Mr. Gericke.

PIANO AND VIOLIN SOLOS

Under the Leader's Treatment the D'Indy Symphony Makes More Favorable Impression Than It Did Before.

It was a pleasing but not a highly important programme that Mr. Gericke presented in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's fourth matinee. Haydn's D major symphony, the twelfth of the "Salomon" set; the Mendelssohn violin concerto and d'Indy's "Symphony on a Mountain Air," for orchestra and pianoforte, made up the list. Miss Marie Hall, violinist, and Mr. Heinrich Gebhard, pianist, were the soloists.

Mr. Gericke's readings of Haydn are always matters for admiration, and if the works of the genial old Austrian symphonist make small demands on the technical powers of this virtuoso orchestra they exhibit admirably its fine balance and polished beauty of tone. The first two movements of the Mendelssohn concerto were creditable both to Miss Hall and her orchestral accompanists. She played the broad melody of the andante not only with fine taste and elegance, but with some sentiment as well. The final allegro she treated less happily.

The d'Indy symphony was decidedly the most interesting item in the concert. This composition, in which the piano is treated as an integral factor in the orchestra, not as a solo instrument, made a more positive and rather more favorable impression yesterday than it did some months ago at its first local performance.

Mr. Gericke treated it with more warmth than is his wont and earned for it some hearty applause, in which Mr. Heinrich Gebhard was deservedly a sharer.

REVU
NEW YORK CITY
FEB 18 1906

Donnerstag Abend fand ein musikalisches Ereigniß statt; das Boston Symphonie-Orchester spielte Gustav Mahler's Fünfte Symphonie. Von den 5 Symphonien, zu denen sich noch im Lauf des Sommers eine sechste, eben vollendete, gesellen wird, ist blos die vierte in voriger Saison von Walter Damrosch aufgeführt worden. Die Bekanntschaft mit den ersten dreien steht noch aus, ebenso wie dieselbe mit den 9 Bruckner'schen Symphonien. Und doch kommt man einem möglichen Verständniß Mahler's nur durch Vertrautheit mit dem Schaffen seines Lehrers Bruckner nahe. Wie Bruckner, bewegt sich auch Mahler in Riesenformen, und der Sinn für naive, ja banale Melodik ist gemeinsam. Leider aber auch eine merkwürdige Zerfahrenheit im Aufbau, die allerdings bei Mahler, der mit viel stärkeren Mitteln arbeitet, noch viel mehr auffällt. Der Mangel an Gefühlswärme dieser Musik ist seltsam. In der eigenthümlichen, contrapunktischen Behandlung versteinern die Gedanken — auch hier die Parallele mit Bruckner. Die den Oesterreicher kennzeichnenden, auf Schubert zurückweisenden melodischen Einfälle werden starr und hart. Etwa auftauchenden Gefühlsregungen wird aus dem Weg gegangen. So in Adagietto, welches abschließt, nachdem die Vorbedingungen zur Weiterentwickelung in ein wärmer sprechendes Adagio gegeben wären.

Die Symphonie dauert eine Stunde und ist in 3 Abschnitten und 5 Sätzen geschrieben, von welchen der erste, ein merkwürdiger Trauermarsch, der aber sehr origineller Conception nicht entbehrt, den einheitlichsten Eindruck hinterläßt.

Um so unbefriedigender ist der zweite Satz. Hier ist überhaupt nicht ersichtlich, was der Komponist ausdrücken wollte. Der Scherzo-Satz steht auf einem gemüthlichen Ländlermotiv, aber durch bizarre Gegenarbeit wird der Gemüthlichkeit bald der Boden entzogen. Von dem Adagietto ist schon die Rede gewesen. Diesem folgt als Schluß ein Rondo-Finale. Auch in diesem Satz sind die Gedankengänge nicht ersichtlich; als Abschluß ist er vollständig verfehlt. Hätte nicht Herr Gericke die Partitur zugeklappt, würde kaum ein Hörer das Ende vermuthet haben.

Das ganze Werk spricht in seinem Gesammteindruck von einem intensiven Ringen nach Ausdruck, der sich auf natürliche, gemeinverständliche Weise nicht geben will. Eigenthümlich spiegelt sich in Mahlers Geist die musikalische Gedankenwelt, und da er ein Gegner von Programmen ist, wird es schwer sein für den Hörer, dieselbe ganz zu erfassen und zu beurtheilen.

Er will durch die Kraft der Tonsprache allein seine Gefühle, und was er ausdrücken will, mittheilen. Dazu aber fehlt seiner Tonsprache das Ueberzeugende. Die Unklarheit derselben wird auch den aufmerksamsten Zuhörer über den empfangenen Eindruck im Dunkeln lassen.

New York Times
FEB 18 1906

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Second Concert of Its Fourth Visit to New York.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's second concert yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall attracted another very large audience, which listened to a programme that contained only familiar things; and though the principal number of it had been heard here only once before, this was so recently that it lingered in the memories of many. This was d'Indy's symphony on the air of a Frenoh mountaineer, in which the piano is given an important part, though only in a few places a part that has anything like the prominence of a solo instrument. Mr. Damrosch played it just after Mr. d'Indy had paid his visit to New York last December, and on that occasion Mr. Pugno undertook the piano part. Yesterday this was allotted to Mr. Gebhard of Boston.

There is by no means so much in this earlier work of the French radical to puzzle and confuse the listener as there is in his second symphony. It is much easier to grasp, to perceive the composer's intentions, and there are many passages in it of a beauty that lingers in the memory, though there are also some of the stubborn obscurities of Mr. d'Indy's style, some of his deliberate harshness. But the impression it leaves on the whole is rather one of ingenious contrivance and skill than of strong inspiration. This "symphony," which is no symphony, but rather a free succession of variations, has little of the logical sequence and sustained development of the symphonic form. It presents itself in a rather fragmentary guise, in which the composer has wrought a most ingenious series of transformations in the letter and the spirit of the theme. The piano is not an effective member of the orchestral body when it is employed as such, and it is something of a self-sacrifice for any pianist to undertake the part for it. Only in the last movement does it gain any striking effect, and then it is the sort of effect that is expected in a piano concerto. Mr. Gebhard played it with much skill and with a due subordination where Mr. d'Indy had not attended to the subordination himself.

Miss Marie Hall was the soloist, and played Mendelssohn's violin concerto. It was the kind of performance we have learned to expect from her—very adept, fluent, neat, with a fine quality of tone, and musically expressive; but not in any way deeply moving or weighty. The concert was begun with a familiar symphony by Haydn, that in D and numbered 2 in Breitkopf and Härtel's catalogue. It was beautifully played with rich color and the fine, cheerful spirit that is Haydn's.

From ... N. Y. TRIBUNE
Address ... FEB 18 1906

MUSIC.

CONCERTS AND OPERA.

It is regrettable, for more reasons than one, that the conductors of visiting orchestras do not seem to think it worth while to inform themselves about the doings of local organizations. The Boston Orchestra is always welcome, but it might be more so if it did not so often in its concerts duplicate performances of local organizations. Yesterday's concert of the Boston Orchestra offered practically nothing to pique even legitimate curiosity. It provided the greatest pleasure for regular concert-goers by a finely sonorous and euphonous performance of one of the most familiar of Haydn's symphonies—that in D, No. 2 of the Breitkopf and Härtel series—in which a stickler for historically correct readings might perhaps have wished a more spirited tempo in the minuet, but could scarcely have asked more than he received. As for the rest, Marie Hall excited only a languid interest by her neat performance of Mendelssohn's violin concerto, and d'Indy's symphony on a mountaineer's air had so recently been heard at one of the concerts of the Symphony Orchestra under Mr. Walter Damrosch's direction and with Mr. Pugno at the pianoforte that there were no thrills in it, in spite of the capable help of Mr. Gebhard, who must come again to bring to us full appreciation of his merits as a pianist. The mountaineer's air, by the way, which Mr. Philip Hale, who gossips so genially and instructively in the programme books (which are this season handed out on the sidewalk), identifies as a folksong of Cévennes, and which sounded so like a une from the Scottish Highlands to the Tribune's reviewer some weeks ago, turns out on a second hearing to be none other than that of "Leezie Lindsay." "Will ye gang to the Hie'land, Leezie Lindsay?" We did not know the invitation had been extended by a Frenchman. But it was a pleasant concert, and the Boston gentlemen played elegantly.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
JOURNAL
ELIZABETH, N. J.
FEB 18

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will play a new symphony by Gustav Mahler at its next concert on Thursday night. Harold Bauer is announced as the soloist.

Odd Distribution of Good and Bad Music in Cosmopolitan New York.

By Edward Ziegler.

THE proof that New York is a most cosmopolitan city musically has seldom been set forth with a more marked clearness than it was last Thursday evening. On this evening, at Carnegie Hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the first performance in this city of Mahler's Fifth Symphony, a work that has excited much attention in the great centres of music abroad. At the same time the Metropolitan Opera-House was being put to undignified purposes by giving it over to a bad performance of Strauss's comic opera, "Der Zigeuner-Baron," with the addition of an all-star-circus coda; while in the lower side of this vast city, at Cooper Union, Franz X. Arens was conducting a concert of serious music to an audience of wage-earners, trying to arouse in them a love for sterner and better music than is usually fed to people of their opportunities.

The Boston Symphony concert appealed to its usual clientele, probably the most serious-minded musical people in this city. The Metropolitan Opera-House was crowded with a throng of curiosity-seekers, who came principally to see as many stars as possible for the price of one ticket, and also to see these stars conduct themselves with much the same dignity as the various members of the half-circle of a minstrel show. Serious-minded opera frequenters chose to stay away in great numbers, while others came to see just how undignified the circus would be and how unsuitable a frame the Metropolitan proscenium is for Strauss's comic opera. Cooper Union had its usual fill of devotees, who embrace these periodical opportunities for increasing their knowledge of music and for finding a path by means of which an appreciation of the classics in music may be opened for them.

Conried Benefit a Musical Joke.

The Metropolitan Opera-House performance—if it may be dignified by such a name—was Mr. Conried's benefit. It was financially successful. This, in most cases, would silence criticism, but Herr Conried has so often and so emphatically laid stress upon his earnest art views that he ought to be reminded of the flat contradiction the production of "Der Zigeuner-Baron" offers. This comic opera is not a suitable choice for the Metropolitan Opera-House. It has pretty music and its story is amusing. In a small theatre, with competent singers and a competent conductor, this work would earn its share of applause. Mr. Conreid controls a small theatre, and he could with a very small outlay control enough good singers to produce "Der Zigeuner-Baron" at the Irving Place Theatre. This should satisfy his hobby—if he is so intent upon producing comic operas.

During his first season at the Metropolitan, when the freshness had not yet worn off Herr Conried's artistic promises, he chose to take, as a benefit performance, an evening of "Parsifal." That was a dignified action. But with last year's "Die Fledermaus" and this year's "Der Zigeuner-Baron" Mr. Conried's promises vanish into thin air. If the present season at the Metropolitan had been eminently an artistic one, if we had had model performances of Wagner's "Ring" and other serious works, then the plea might be made that the stage of this opera-house was free for whatever was necessary in order to put "Der Zigeuner-Baron" on the boards for a single performance.

But the "Ring" performances have been notoriously mismanaged, showing undoubted lack of competent rehearsal. More than that, the recent production of Mozart's masterpiece, "Don Giovanni," was mangled. Hence there was little artistic excuse for wasting so much time, scenery and costumes on this Strauss comic opera. It might prove, after all, to have been a pretty expensive artistic holiday for Herr Conried, since it is a difficult thing to believe in the artistic seriousness of a manager who preaches art for art's sake and practises comic opera for Conried's sake.

Mahler Symphony Disappoints.

The Mahler Fifth Symphony, performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was a disappointment to those who had anticipated much on this occasion. Its beginning is pregnant with promise, but the work soon assumes dreary lengths. It takes almost an hour in performance in its present version, which has been curtailed about twenty minutes; but there are patches of repetition that deaden the listener's interest.

This work seems to have increased the habit of bracketing the names of Mahler and Strauss, which is a grave injustice to the latter composer. Strauss is a maker of big themes, while Mahler's inventions are of doubtful importance, and his writing is reminiscent. The work was wonderfully played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and much credit is due Conductor Gericke for the pains he took with rehearsing this long work. It is tuneful and very often interesting, but it lacks much of being a great symphony.

Those who are acquainted with the various symphonies by Mahler contend that this Fifth Symphony is not even one of Mahler's great ones, that his Second and Third Symphonies are infinitely bigger. But let us not discourage Mr. Gericke for presenting a novelty. Concert programmes have contained familiar works in ample quantity to satisfy the admirers of well-worn music. The Philharmonic Society programmes, for instance, have been devoid enough of novelties this season.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
NEW YORK TIMES

Haydn and D'Indy by Boston Men.

After the Boston Symphony Orchestra's programme of last Thursday night that of yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall came as an anti-climax. There may be doubts as to the intrinsic value of Mahler's Fifth Symphony, but the first performance in New York of this gigantic work was a musical event of importance, and in the hearing the composition held the interest tense throughout. Yesterday's list, arranged to suit what is supposed to be the taste of matinee audiences, offered Haydn's Symphony in D major (B. & H. No. 2); Mendelssohn's much-befiddled violin concerto in E minor, and D'Indy's "Symphony on a Mountain Air," for orchestra and pianoforte, opus 25. Haydn's old-fashioned work, prettily as it was played, did not quicken the sprits; the Mendelssohn concerto (must we hear every violinist in this hackneyed composition?) might well have been spared the hearing, and D'Indy's clever and effective piano-symphony had been given recently by the New York Symphony Orchestra with Raoul Pugno at his piano. Besides, New Yorkers have been satiated this year with the Frenchman's music, mainly through the kind services of the Boston orchestra under D'Indy's own direction.

Still, it was the French composer's music which gave the most enjoyment yesterday. This work is, perhaps, not the result of genuine inspiration; yet it does not interest merely through its clever workmanship and its skillful merging of the piano into the orchestral woof. D'Indy's sonorous elaboration of a simple air has vitality and energy, and it gains on repetition. Heinrich Gebhard played the piano part well, though at times his performance seemed somewhat too subdued.

The soloist was Miss Marie Hall, now a familiar figure in New York. In the Mendelssohn concerto she displayed her fleetness of finger, accuracy and nimbleness of bow to advantage. As usual, however, her performance was more noteworthy for technical proficiency and finish than for musical penetration and interpretative grasp. The orchestra, under Gericke's direction, played as usual with impeccable virtuosity.

NEW YORK TRE...
FEB 19 1906

...D SINGERS.

...one of the disadvantages under which students of music and amateur and professional musicians in New York labor is the lack of opportunity to become acquainted with current musical literature. Those who have kept a record of first performances in America can point out with pride—or, more accurately, with that vainglory that passes often as patriotism—that such and such a work, long since acknowledged the world over as of enduring value, was heard in New York, Boston, Chicago, Cincinnati, Pittsburg or Salt Lake City before it was given in Berlin, Dresden, Munich or Vienna; that the genius of this or that master was recognized here more promptly than abroad, and so forth. Still the fact remains that important novelties seldom are found on our programmes, and this is more true of New York than of Boston and Chicago. This season, to be sure, it seems to have been the fashion to add something to every programme which might be illuminated with the suggestive phrase, "First time in New York"—a scheme, probably, to obtain newspaper notices when the concert in itself offered little to attract the attention of the musical critic. With few exceptions these "novelties" were of the utmost insignificance, representing trash unearthed for no other reason that that, perchance, it had not been performed in public before. However, there was an inundation of D'Indy music, thanks to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and though many of the works had been heard before and few of them were received with anything like enthusiasm by the local public, there was cause to be grateful for the opportunity this gave of becoming familiar with music of the modern French school. Would that there were more such opportunities; that the music lover here could have the benefit of hearing—more than once—the important musical literature of to-day; that he could form his own opinion as to its merits and shortcomings and become, as it were, a well-read man!

As far as music is concerned, there seems to be a tendency in New York to condemn absolutely what does not seem to be the outcome of absolute genius. We read books of widely varying merit and derive enjoyment from many of them. The judicious reader recognizes easily the hand of a master; yet this does not hinder him from examining the work of minor authors and finding some enjoyment in them. It is otherwise, apparently, in the field of music. Only the highest achievements are accepted as worthy of performance; others, though they may be interesting examples of what is being accomplished by the most advanced representatives of the art of composition, are treated usually as if they deserve no hearing. This spirit of strained opposition to everything save that which by general consent looms up high in the musical firmament reacts strongly against any movement to bring before the public those works which, if they are not fated to be immortal, have at least aroused discussion in the musical world abroad. A society recently was formed in New York for the purpose of bringing worthy music of American composers to a hearing. Without quarrelling with the estimable plan of this organization, does it not seem reasonable to think there is far more need of a movement to produce the works of interesting modern composers, irrespective of their nationality? The American composer, it seems to us, has not suffered from neglect any more than has the European composer, if one considers how few of our countrymen have any claim on particular attention compared to those of Germany, Russia, Italy and France. For example, has not the music of MacDowell been brought to final life far more frequently here than that of Anton Bruckner? And will any one except Henry Finck, of course—assert that the American composer's work is of greater intrinsic merit than that of the Viennese organist, symphonist and teacher?

That Bruckner's nine gigantic symphonies are practically unknown in New York throws a peculiar light on musical conditions here. For twenty-five years the works of the Vienna composer have made themselves felt in the musical world abroad and have influenced in a measure every composer of the latest German school; yet even the master's seventh symphony, in E major, with its deeply moving adagio, is comparatively unfamiliar to New Yorkers. Last week the Boston Symphony Orchestra performed for the first time here the fifth symphony of one of Bruckner's pupils, Gustav Mahler, and thankful we are to Gericke and his men for giving to us an opportunity to hear that huge and interesting work. But why did the Boston orchestra neglect Bruckner in favor of Mahler, the more original genius in favor of the severer but less genuinely inspired disciple? Gericke produced Bruckner's ninth symphony (an unfinished work) at the close of the season of 1903-4 in Boston. He did not see fit, it would seem, to test its drawing powers in New York. At any rate the local public never has heard either the Austrian composer's ninth symphony or his eighth, and for many years the seventh has been relegated to the library shelf. If we have cause to regret that the Boston orchestra, upon which New Yorkers are forced to depend for a great portion of their musical enjoyment, has brought us no message of Bruckner's art, there is still more reason to lament the strange attitude in reference our own orchestral organizations have maintained toward that composer does not the Philharmonic Society, for example, instead of humoring its subscribers with programmes devoted to bringing out their particular strong points, by producing works that have become a necessity? Here is the list of novelties and old works brought forward by that organization this season: Schumann's Symphony, Richard Strauss's tone poems "Don Juan" and "Till Eulenspiegel," Dvorak's "New World" symphony, the Brahms variations from Schumann's Quintet, Liszt's symphonic poem after Victor Hugo's "Ce qu'entend la montagne," Wagner's "Meistersinger" overture, and not a single one of these works has been performed by the Philharmonic Society this season. Is it any wonder that the Philharmonic Society is losing its hold on the public? Is it any wonder that the public is turning to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has given us Bruckner's seventh symphony, Mahler's fifth symphony, Richard Strauss's tone poem "Don Juan,"

NEW YORK PRESS
FEB 19 1906

SONGS AND SINGERS.

One of the disadvantages under which students of music and amateur and professional musicians in New York labor is the lack of opportunity to become acquainted with current musical literature. Those who have kept a record of first performances in America can point out with pride—or, more accurately, with that vainglory that passes often as patriotism—that such and such a work, long since acknowledged the world over as of enduring value, was heard in New York, Boston, Chicago, Cincinnati, Pittsburg or Salt Lake City before it was given in Berlin, Dresden, Munich or Vienna; that the genius of this or that master was recognized here more promptly than abroad, and so forth. Still the fact remains that important novelties seldom are found on our programmes, and this is more true of New York than of Boston and Chicago. This season, to be sure, it seems to have been the fashion to add something to every programme which might be illuminated with the suggestive phrase, "First time in New York"—a scheme, probably, to obtain newspaper notices when the concert in itself offered little to attract the attention of the musical critic. With few exceptions these "novelties" were of the utmost insignificance, representing trash unearthed for no other reason that that, perchance, it had not been performed in public before. However, there was an inundation of D'Indy music, thanks to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and though many of the works had been heard before and few of them were received with anything like enthusiasm by the local public, there was cause to be grateful for the opportunity this gave of becoming familiar with music of the modern French school. Would that there were more such opportunities; that the music lover here could have the benefit of hearing—more than once—the important musical literature of to-day; that he could form his own opinion as to its merits and shortcomings and become, as it were, a well-read man!

As far as music is concerned, there seems to be a tendency in New York to condemn absolutely what does not seem to be the outcome of absolute genius. We read books of widely varying merit and derive enjoyment from many of them. The judicious reader recognizes easily the hand of a master; yet this does not hinder him from examining the work of minor authors and finding some enjoyment in them. It is otherwise, apparently, in the field of music. Only the highest achievements are accepted as worthy of performance; others, though they may be interesting examples of what is being accomplished by the most advanced representatives of the art of composition, are treated usually as if they deserve no hearing. This spirit of strained opposition to everything save that which by general consent looms up high in the musical firmament reacts strongly against any movement to bring before the public those works which, if they are not fated to be immortal, have at least aroused discussion in the musical world abroad. A society recently was formed in New York for the purpose of bringing worthy music of American composers to a hearing. Without quarreling with the estimable plan of this organization, does it not seem reasonable to think there is far more need of a movement to produce the works of interesting modern composers, irrespective of their nationality? The American composer, it seems to us, has not suffered from neglect any more than has the European composer, if one considers how few of our countrymen have any claim on particular attention compared to those of Germany, Russia, Italy and France. For example, has not the music of MacDowell been brought to tonal life far more frequently here than that of Anton Bruckner? And will any one—except Henry Finck, of course—assert that the American composer's work is of greater intrinsic merit than that of the Viennese organist, symphonist and teacher?

That Bruckner's nine gigantic symphonies are practically unknown in New York throws a peculiar light on musical conditions here. For twenty-five years the works of the Vienna composer have made themselves felt in the musical world abroad and have influenced in a measure every composer of the latest German school; yet even the master's seventh symphony, in E major, with its deeply moving adagio, is comparatively unfamiliar to New Yorkers. Last week the Boston Symphony Orchestra performed for the first time here the fifth symphony of one of Bruckner's pupils, Gustav Mahler, and thankful we are to Gericke and his men for giving to us an opportunity to hear that huge and interesting work. But why did the Boston orchestra neglect Bruckner in favor of Mahler, the more original genius in favor of the cleverer but less genuinely inspired disciple? Gericke produced Bruckner's ninth symphony (an unfinished work) at the close of the season of 1903-4 in Boston. He did not see fit, it would seem, to test its drawing powers in New York. At any rate the local public never has heard either the Austrian composer's ninth symphony or his eighth, and for many years the seventh has been relegated to the library shelf. If we have cause to regret that the Boston orchestra, upon which New Yorkers are forced to depend for a great portion of their musical enjoyment, has brought us no message of Bruckner's art, there is still more reason to lament the strange attitude of indifference our own orchestral organizations have maintained toward that composer. Why does not the Philharmonic Society, for example, instead of humoring its "star" conductors with programmes designed to bring out their particular strong points, insist on producing works that have the interest of novelty? Here is the list of purely orchestral works brought forward so far by the society this season: Schumann's fourth symphony, Richard Strauss's "Heldenleben," "Don Juan" and "Till Eulenspiegel"; Dvorak's "New World" symphony, the theme and variations from Shu- D minor quartet, Liszt's symphonic "Les Preludes," Wagner's "Meister- Prelude, Beethoven's fifth sym- Mendelssohn's "Mid- overture, Tschai- "Pathetique" symphony, and overture, "Carneval Romain." of these compositions is unworthy of Philharmonic Society's attention. Every to a greater or less extent, gave pleas- in the hearing. But not a single com- sition was performed with which the pub- was not familiar. Is this not a strange record for an orchestra of the Philhar- 's standing?

MAX SMITH.

NEW YORK SUN
FEB 16 1906

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Gustave Mahler's Fifth Symphony the Novelty of the Concert.

The fourth evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place last night at Carnegie Hall. The programme consisted of Beethoven's "Egmont" overture, Schumann's piano concerto, and Gustave Mahler's symphony No. 5 C. sharp minor. The last named work was played for the first time in this city.

The work is divided into three parts and five movements. The first and second movements constitute the first part, while the third is a part by itself. The fourth and fifth make the third part. The composer describes his first movement as a funeral march followed by a passage "suddenly faster, passionately, wildly." The second movement is marked "stormily restless."

The third is a scherzo, "with force." The fourth is an allegretto, "very slow," and the last, an allegro, in rondo form. It might be highly instructive to go into a detailed account of this work, but the truth is that it is a complex composition, and ought to be heard more than once before a verdict is pronounced.

The general impression gained from last night's performance was not extremely deep, yet the composition was genuinely interesting. It was a striking example of the state of musical thought in Germany, where it has created something like a sensation. The style is a sort of compodnd of Bruckner and Strauss. Instruments are made to do all sorts of things not according to the practice of the founders of the modern orchestra, and intentional ugliness is abundant.

In spite of all this the composer's form is neither abstruse nor lacking in symmetry. He builds well, but he uses bizarre materials. It is quite impossible to believe that this kind of music, in which cacophony is so frequently employed with apparently no other purpose than to give heightened effect to the few beautiful thoughts, is the spontaneous product of the fancy. It sounds like the result of cold, heartless and somewhat unkind calculation.

It seems to have been made not to touch hearts or warm imaginations, but purely to make people sit up and think. Perharps when we have heard it oftener we shall become accustomed to it, and then we shall like it better. One good thing it accomplished last night, and that was a triumphant display of the virtuosity of the Boston orchestra. The composition was played superbly.

Harold Bauer was the pianist, and his performance of Schumann's beautiful concerto provided the audience with the principal pleasure of the evening. He was not quite at his best in the first movement, which he took too slowly, so that it was deficient in elasticity, but his splendid playing of the last movement obliterated recollections of this and evoked well merited enthusiasm.

n
ess
F E B 1 9 '06

Henri Marteu's return to the American concert stage, after an absence of several years, was accomplished last evening at the Metropolitan Opera House concert, and the distinguished French violinist, one of the most temperamental of the visiting musicians of his nationality, will be heard again next Saturday at the Young People's Symphony concert.

The Boston Orchestra's Saturday matinee was an amiable affair; seldom did the emotional tension of the music played rise above the level of comfortable serenity. A Haydn symphony, the Mendelssohn violin concerto (with Miss Marie Hall as the efficient soloist) and Vincent d'Indy's Sympnony on a Mountain Air" for orchestra and piano, with Heinrich Gebhard as assisting pianist, comprised the programme. Mr. Gericke and the orchestra played with their invariable sanl.

"Martha" and "Tannhauser" kept operagoers busy on Saturday. To-night "Die Meistersinger" will be sung.

The People's Symphony concert at Carnegie Hall Saturday evening, conducted by F. X. Arens, brought an evening of Tschaikowsky's music to a large audience, and it was evidently deeply appreciated. This educational series of concerts is doing a splendid and telling work in this city It is worthy of the help given to it by the many prominent persons interested.

NEW YORK EVE POST
FEB 19 1906

A Haydn symphony, the Mendelssohn violin concerto, and Vicent D'Indy's "Mountain Air" symphony made up the programme of the Boston Orchestra's Saturday afternoon concert at Carnegie Hall. Miss Marie Hall played the concerto beautifully, and the orchestra and its conductor were at their best. Mr. Heinrich Gebhard played the superfluous pianoforte part in the D'Indy symphony satisfactorily.

Mme. Calvé has arranged this programme for her Carnegie Hall recital on the afternoon of Washington's birthday:

Sonata, flute and piano.....Handel
Fleury and Decreus.
A. Sehnsucht ..... R. Strauss
B. Die Ehre Gottes ..... Beethoven
Von Kehr.
Violin solo, romance ..... D'Ambeosio
Vermorel.
Mad Scene "Hamlet" ..... A. Thomas
Emma Calvé.
Alceste "Variations" ..... Gluck Saint Saëns
Prelude ..... Rachmaninoff
Feu Follet ..... Heller
Decreus.
Aria—Salome ..... Massenet
Emma Calvé.
Les Adieux ..... Sarasate
Vermorel.
French Folk Songs,
Emma Calvé.
Pogners Address, "Die Meistersinger".....Wagner
Von Kehr.
Song from "Carmen" ..... Bizet
Emma Calvé.

N. Y. EVG TELEGRAM
FEB 19 1906

The Boston Symphc

WHILE the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon was an excellent one, there was a decided lack of novelty about it. New York is now so generously supplied with symphonic music that the note of competition is creeping into concerts of this character, and a visiting band, even when it is as sterling as this one from the Hub, must needs take the competitive element into account.

Haydn's symphony in D major, which was first on the programme, is very familiar, and on account of its great melodiousness is a great favorite. Under Mr. Gericke's baton it was beautifully rendered, despite the fact that at times the band played in a manner so conservative that a drowsy effect might have been detected in the audience.

Miss Marie Hall in the Mendelssohn concerto for violin played with a tone so small that she imparted the sensation of music "at a reduction." She plays delicately, but too much so for the big Boston band.

The D'Indy Symphony for piano and orchestra, with Mr. Heinrich Gebhard at the piano, closed the performance with a general impression of disappointment. The piece is fragmentary, there is little development of symphonic form and no opportunity for special display on the part of the pianist. The earlier part of the concert was undoubtedly the better.

N. Y. EVG SUN
s
FEB 19 '06

Oh! these permanent orchestras. Hardly had the original Mæcenas, Col. Higginson, confessed that it cost him $20,000 a year to place the Boston Symphony Orchestra on its present artistic level, when the New York Symphony guarantors promptly raised a fund of $30,000 to back Mr. Walter Damrosch in securing the cooperation of Herr Weingartner this year for three seasons. And now some energetic women of the former Seidl Society are going ahead to pledge the $45,000 that may engage M. Safonoff for three years as conductor of the New York Philharmonic.

"When you have the money raised," said the dean of the society's committee on conductors, "bring it here and the society will give you its answer."

It is said that the musicians are asked to pledge but $5,000 annually in addition to the $15,000 acoruing from the outside promissory notes. In the present state of the arts in Moscow, Safonoff is "willing." But then, like a certain famous singer, he also has eight children to provide for when he comes away from home.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

NEW YORK CITY
ss
FEB 20 1906

NEGLECT MUSIC TO PLAY BRIDGE WHIST

Manager of Pittsburg Orchestra Says Public Has Been Won from Art to Play Cards.

Pittsburg, Feb. 20.—The Pittsburg Orchestra, directed by Emil Paur, may be disbanded after the close of this year, as, it is asserted by Manager Wilson, that musical Pittsburg has been won over to bridge whist to such an extent that they have no time for art.

Wilson has published a story "roasting" the people of Pittsburg for their attention to whist to the detriment of the orchestra, which it is said will lose $40,000 this season. This will have to be made up by the subscribers.

Director Paur came here from [illegible] succeeding Victor Herbert, [illegible] director of the Pittsburg Orchestra.

[169]

DIE STAATSZEITUNG
FEB 20 1906

Der Spazie

Copyright 1906 by the

Spät kommt Ihr, doch Ihr kommt In den verschiedensten Gesangvereine hat man, anläßlich des hundertundfünfzigsten Geburtstages des genialen Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart, dem Andenken des großen Genius nach besten Kräften seinen Tribut gezollt. Auch in der großen Oper hat man eine Art Mozartfeier veranstaltet, indem man sein gewaltigstes Werk, den „Don Juan" aufführte; wenn der Druckfehlerteufel sein Spiel treibe und aus „veranstaltet" zur Abwechslung „verunstaltet" machen will, so steht ihm das frei — und es entspricht leider auch der Wahrheit. Nun kommt post festum ein Verein, der von rechtswegen der erste bei den Mozartfeiern hätte sein sollen, mit einer nachträglichen Ehrung: der Aschenbrödel-Verein hat für den kommenden Sonntag eine Kammermusik-Matinee „zu Ehren Mozarts" angesetzt. Wie gesagt, eine etwas verspätete Ehrung, aber besser spät als nie! Der hochselige Herr Mozart war so ungeschickt, gerade im Januar zur Welt zu kommen, und der Januar ist für unsere Musici der geschäftigste Monat, und, bei aller Hochachtung vor dem Wolfgang Amadeus, zuerst das Geschäft und dann das Vergnügen. Immerhin, die Herren werden ihrer Ehrenpflicht nachkommen, und was sie an Promptheit versäumt haben, soll dafür durch die Güte und Würde dieser Ehrung wett gemacht werden. Unser alter, verehrter Meistersänger Emil Fischer wird Zwei Arien aus Mozart'schen Opern vortragen, Heinrich Bauer, einer der gediegensten und literarisch wohl der gebildetste unter unseren hiesigen Dirigenten, wird in einem Essay der Bedeutung Mozart's gerecht werden, die Herren von Dameck (Violine), Robert Riedel (Viola), William Ebann (Cello), Hermann Nietzel (Oboe), Henry Pischel (Fagott), William Förster (Klarinett), Walter Hornig (Horn), Franz Hauser und August Främcke (Klavier) werden das Es-dur-Quintett und das G-moll-Quartett von Mozart zu Gehör bringen, und so kann man die Verspätung dieser Feier angesichts ihres durchaus würdevollen Charakters dem „Aschenbrödel" wohl verzeihen.

Der Mozart kann mit seiner Ehrung im fremden Lande durchaus zufrieden sein; man hat seiner gedacht, trotzdem es schon anderthalb Säkula her ist, daß er das Licht dieser Welt erblickte, der er selbst ein herrliche Leuchte geworden. Ein anderer Geistesheros, der große Heinrich Heine, hat sich damit begnügen müssen, am Samstag sang- und klanglos fünfzig Jahre im Grabe zu liegen; nicht einmal die geselligen Wissenschaftler und die wissenschaftlichen Gesellen, nicht einmal der Verein, der seinen Namen trägt, hat die Gelegenheit zu einer Gedenkfeier wahrgenommen. Thut nichts, darum bleibt der Heine doch Deutschlands größter Lyriker und das Liebling der begeisterungsfrohen Mädchen und Jünglinge. Und besondere Freude hat es mir bereitet, daß aus unserem Leserkreise zwei gutgemeinte Zuschriften eingelaufen, die wir an anderer Stelle zum Abdruck bringen.

Unsere deutschen Meister werden hie manchmal so sehr in der Stille geehrt, daß die große Welt nur zufällig davon erfährt. Vor einer Woche hat die "Philharmonic Society of Tarrytown" in der dortigen Musikhalle die Oper „Martha" von Flotow als — Oratorium aufgeführt; das klingt freilich einigermaßen fremd und es muß sich auch ungeputzig ausgenommen haben, denn die teske Komik des Sir Tristram, der Humor der Lady Harriet und Nancy, die Drolerie der verschiedenen Chöre konnte in Frack und Gesellschaftstoilette kaum zum vollen Ausdruck kommen. Und trotz dieser Mängel, die die Oratorienform bedingt waren, das frische, flotte Werk einen ganzen Erfolg, der namentlich durch die vorzügliche Wiedergabe erreicht wurde. Das Orchester bestand aus renommirten New Yorker Musikern, den Chor stellte die philharmonische Gesellschaft selbst und unter Solisten interessirt uns [illegible]

...Programm ist hier leider noch nicht Gebrauch gebadt, in einer derartig großen Aufgabe zu zeigen, wie sich ihre Kunst entwickelt hat, aber sie hat bei dieser Mahler-Aufführung, wie mir berufene Kenner mittheilen, einen unanfechtbaren Erfolg erzielt. Den Lionel sang ein Herr Cecil James, der über glänzende Stimmmittel verfügt; das Originelle dabei ist, daß dieser Sänger sich erst kürzlich der Kunst zugewendet hat und bisher als Farmer sein Brod verdiente. Drüben beliebte man die Lionels unter den Droschkenkutschern zu entdecken, warum soll sich nicht ein Wachtel oder Bötel unter den Farmern finden lassen; der Loisl Burgstaller ist heute noch stolz darauf, daß er einst ein einfacher Bauerbursche gewesen und der Ernst Kraus hat in seinen jungen Jahren als Bierkutscher gearbeitet, ehe er sein Herz und seine Stimme entdeckte.

Von Interesse dürfte auch ein Brief sein, den ein Mitglied des Bostoner Symphonie Orchesters an einen hiesigen Kollegen gerichtet hat, und in dem er sich höchst originell über Felix Weingartner ausdrückt:

„Deine Karte und Zeitung erhalten. Besten Dank. Natürlich waren wir alle im Weingartner Konzert. Es war großartig. Weingartner hatte einen ungeheuren Erfolg, trotzdem es nur ziemlich gut besucht war. Die Halle war dreiviertel besetzt. Hätte müssen gepackt sein. Er ist der beste Dirigent, den ich noch gesehen habe. Diese Ruhe, Eleganz, und doch beherrscht er das Orchester und leitet es wie am Schnürchen. Keine Nüance entgeht ihm. Mit der Rechten Tempo und alle Einsätze markirend, phrasirt er mit der Linken jede Melodie der Bläser und Streicher und dies Alles mit einer Ruhe, ohne jeden Effekt, sodaß es aussieht, als spiele das Orchester allein. Und diese geniale Auffassung der einzelnen Werke, die er alle auswendig dirigirt! Es ist erstaunlich. Wenn ich dagegen den Saffonof bedenke, so ist der Vergleich gleich dem eines Paukenvirtuosen und dem eines Geigenvirtuosen ersten Ranges, so viel höher steht Weingartner. Doch ist es interessant, eine rohe Naturkraft und eine feine durchgeistete, geniale Künstlernatur in der Virtuosität des Dirigirens bewundern zu können.

Ich habe Dir ein paar Rezensionen mit dem letzten Symphony-Programm mit eingelegt. Die Zeitungen waren alle des Lobes voll, auch über das Orchester. Im Programm findest Du das nächste Programm vom Longy Club. Wir probiren jetzt an der 5. Sinfonie von Mahler. Morgen ist erste Streichprobe. Soll ein verrücktes Werk sein. Auch kommt hier (siehe Programm) eine Oper „The Pipe of Desire" in einem, allerdings langen Akt heraus, von einem hiesigen Komponisten, Converse, sehr begabter Mensch. Haben erst ein paar Orchesterproben gehabt; es ist nach Wagner'schem Styl gearbeitet. Der Komponist ist sehr reich und hat in Europa studirt; wir haben schon verschiedene sehr schöne Sachen von ihm gespielt."

Ein anderer Brief an jenen hiesigen Musiker, dessen spezielles Steckenpferd seine ausgedehnte Korrespondenz ist, kommt von einem Mitglied der Nielsen Operntruppe und enthält eine Neuigkeit aus dem goldenen Westen, die sogar hier in New York überraschen dürfte. Der Herr schreibt:

„In Los Angelos habe ich etwas gesehen und gehört, was sogar in New York noch nicht dagewesen. Es ist eine Neuigkeit auf dem musikalischen Gebiet, auf die ihr Erfinder ungemein stolz ist, weil er der einzige Besitzer dieser Novität in der ganzen Welt ist. Der Mann ist der Besitzer eines Barbierladens von ungewöhnlicher Eleganz und Größe. In diesem Barbershop spielt eine kleine Kapelle von sechs Mann, ganz acceptablen Musikern; man kriegt also dort einen „shave" nicht nur mit Bayrum und Witchhazel, sondern auch mit Musik, die je nach Wunsch modern oder klassisch geliefert wird. Und so etwas kann sich Los Angelos leisten, während Ihr in New York in dieser Hinsicht noch weit zurück seid in der Kultur."

Dem werthen Briefschreiber kann man auf seinen Vorwurf nur mit einem tiefgefühlten „Gott sei Dank" antworten.

H. R. H.

From TOWN TOPICS
Address NEW YORK CITY.
Date FEB 22 1906

The Boston Symphony concerts brought forward as soloists Harold Bauer, most eclectic pianist of them all; Mary Hall, the slim young enchantress of the violin; and Heinrich Gebhard, a Boston product, whose piano playing is remarkable chiefly for self-abnegation and humility when he employs it in ensemble performance. Those are admirable qualities to possess in a work like D'Indy's "Symphony on a Mountain Air," for piano and orchestra. The solo instrument is caught up in the orchestral web and woof and is supposed to display itself no more than any other voice in the band. Somebody once called that class of composition "Works Written against the Piano." Harold Bauer had no compunction about being thoroughly subjective in the poetical Schumann concerto, and his lovely touch, polished technic and admirably adjusted scale of dynamics made his playing an unalloyed artistic delight.

The most important of the orchestral works played at the pair of Boston Symphony concerts was the new fifth symphony by the much maligned Mahler, of Vienna—the symphony which Cologne and Berlin received with "cheers and hisses." The work had the same mixed reception here last Thursday. The air is still full of doubt, scolding, praise and argument. Some denounce Mahler as an epigone of the lesser Romanticists, while the "Anything to Beat Strauss" party worships the Vienna master as the easy superior of Beethoven, Wagner, Bach, Berlioz and Strauss rolled into one.

Now what are the facts about this fifth symphony? Mahler joins the ranks of mystery-mongers and refuses to deliver a "program" with his score. If Mahler won't divulge the "story" behind the work, then there is no reason why the critic should presume to set up one.

Judged as an absolute symphony, the work seems to lack form and cohesion—both of which it might have, were Mahler disposed to tell what his music is meant to picture. The first movement is sombre, cheerless, in the mode of a funeral march. The second movement is distinctly ugly, and too complicated to be properly estimated at a single hearing. The scherzo is in waltz rhythm, with xylophone and bell effects that lend a macabre atmosphere. The slow part seems to be frankly lyrical, and it is the most attractive as is it is the most understandable of the five movements. The finale—chaos again, with a chorale for a finish. Throughout the whole work the thematic material is meagre, the development overweighted, and the melodies are few, far between and of fragmentary outline. Of course, Mahler's orchestration, like that of all the moderns, is facile, brilliant, and multi-colored.

It is to be feared that if Mahler does not reveal the "program" of this symphony, the world will never know its real meaning—and if there are three things which this busy world is feverishly trying to fathom at the present moment, they are the outcome of the Moroccan dispute, the true state of affairs in Russia, and the real meaning of Mahler's fifth symphony.

The Pied Piper.

MME. MELBA,
Her Father, Mr. Mitchell, and Her Little Niece, Taken at Sydney, Australia, at Her Old Home.

From AMERICAN
Address WASHINGTON, D. C.
Date FEB 17 1906

Excellent Boston Symphony Concert

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT Tuesday was the most brilliant of the season. The crowd was so great at 4:20 that Mr. Rapley himself turned ticket-taker, and threw open the side door. Mrs. Roosevelt was in her usual box, Alice, Mr. Longworth, Mrs. Lowndes and Mrs. Arnold Hague with her. The orchestra was in splendid form, the volume of strings superb, and Gericke's reading of the "Egmont" Overture and the Schubert "Unfinished" Symphony incomparable. After the playing of the Schumann Concerto, Bauer received an ovation, having been recalled again and again until the piano had to be moved back. His interpretation, though traditional, had individuality, and was artistic to a high degree. In the opening chords the tone of the piano he used was slightly sharp, but his wonderful touch soon overcame it, and in the most difficult passages he merely seemed to sport with the piano, so little apparent effort did he put into the playing. The final number, Tschaikowsky's "Francesca di Rimini," was difficult enough to show what the orchestra can do. It is such music as this and the symphonic poems of Richard Strauss that we wish to hear, for these are the things forbidden to orchestras not trained as the Boston men are.

In the lower boxes were the Roosevelts, Mrs. Archibald Hopkins, Mrs. Richardson, Mrs. Charles Hallam Keep, and Baroness von Sternberg and party. In the upper boxes were Mrs. Radcliffe and Mrs. Lisner. A few of those observable in the audience were Mrs. Horace Taylor, Mrs. Stilson Hutchins, Mrs. Fremont, Mme. Leger (wife of the Haitian Minister) and her niece, Miss Bourke; Miss Alice Burbage, Miss Cryder and her cousin, Miss Chauncey; Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Evans Greene and Fraulein Stark om TIMES.

dress Brooklyn, N. Y.
te 0 1906

For the fourth and next to the last time this season, the Boston Symphony Orchestra comes to town next week for a concert at the Baptist Temple on Friday evening. Besides serving as an opportunity for the reappearance of Harold Bauer, a pianist who has proved his good qualities, the concert promises to be especially enjoyable in orchestral offerings. Mr. Bauer will play the Schumann concerto in A minor, a work that has become so popular as to be almost hackneyed until it was permitted to rest a while. It has not been heard so much lately as of yore. The announcement that the symphony will be Schubert's "Unfinished" will doubtless give great pleasure to the symphony patrons. Experience covering nearly twenty-five years has shown the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra that no symphony has such a hold on the affection of the public. This has been the experience of other orchestras also. It always brings to the concert hall, not only the regular patrons, but a large number of those who are not ostensibly music lovers, but who are always attracted by its singular charm. The other large work on the programme will be Tschaikowsky's orchestral fantasia, "Francesca da Rimini," which is now regarded as one of the great orchestral works of modern times. The whole programme is as follows:

Weber—Overture, "Der Freischutz"
Schubert—Symphony in B minor, "Unfinished."
Schumann—Concerto for pianoforte in A minor.
Tschaikowsky—Orchestral fantasia, "Francesca da Rimini."

TIMES
...lyn, N. Y.
FEB 10 1906

HAROLD BAUER,

THE MORNING TELEGRAPH
NEW YORK CITY.
FEB 20 1906

BRIDGE WHIST KILLING MUSIC IN PITTSBURG?

George Wilson Irritates Society and the Pittsburg Orchestra May End This Year.

(Special Dispatch to The Morning Telegraph.)

PITTSBURG, Feb. 19.

There is a grave rumor here that the Pittsburg Orchestra, presided over by Emil Paur, will be abandoned at the close of the present season. Bridge whist ... recent inroads ... to have ... the ...

ture to an alarming degree, and will this year wind up about $4,000 to the bad.

Manager George Wilson, of the orchestra, has published in a Pittsburg newspaper over his own name, a story in effect that if the people of Pittsburg would pay less attention to bridge whist and more to good music, things would be better.

This has offended society, which has for years gone down into its pockets to make up deficits for the Pittsburg Orchestra, and there is now a strong chance that Paur may be paid a year's salary and allowed to go. He came from Austria under a three years' contract and but two of them have expired.

There has been not a little dissatisfaction here since the retirement of Victor Herbert as director and the employment of Paur, who was once director of the Boston Symphony.

[170]

Sänger, die uns eine liebe Bekannte ist. Die begabte Schülerin der Frau Eugenie Pappenheim hat hier leider noch nicht Gelegenheit gehabt, in einer derartig großen Aufgabe zu zeigen, wie sich ihre Kunst entwickelt hat, aber sie hat bei dieser Martha-Aufführung, wie mir berufene Kenner mittheilen, einen unanfechtbaren Erfolg erzielt. Den Lionel sang ein Herr Cecil James, der über glänzende Stimmmittel verfügt; das Originelle dabei ist, daß dieser Sänger sich erst kürzlich der Kunst zugewendet hat und bisher als Farmer sein Brod verdiente. Drüben beliebte man die Lionels unter den Droschkenkutschern zu entdecken, warum soll sich nicht ein Wachtel oder Bötel unter den Farmern finden lassen; der Loisl Burgstaller ist heute noch stolz darauf, daß er einst ein einfacher Bauerbursche gewesen und der Ernst Kraus hat in seinen jungen Jahren als Bierkutscher gearbeitet, ehe er sein Herz und seine Stimme entdeckte.

Von Interesse dürfte auch ein Brief sein, den ein Mitglied des Bostoner Symphonie Orchesters an einen hiesigen Kollegen gerichtet hat, und in dem er sich höchst originell über Felix Weingartner ausdrückt:

„Deine Karte und Zeitung erhalten. Besten Dank. Natürlich waren wir alle im Weingartner Konzert. Es war großartig. Weingartner hatte einen ungeheuren Erfolg, trotzdem es nur ziemlich gut besucht war. Die Halle war dreiviertel besetzt. Hätte müssen gepackt sein. Er ist der beste Dirigent, den ich noch gesehen habe. Diese Ruhe, Eleganz, und doch beherrscht er das Orchester und leitet es wie am Schnürchen. Keine Nüance entgeht ihm. Mit der Rechten Tempo und alle Einsätze markirend, phrasirt er mit der Linken jede Melodie der Bläser und Streicher und dies Alles mit einer Ruhe, ohne jeden Effekt, sodaß es aussieht, als spiele das Orchester allein. Und diese geniale Auffassung der einzelnen Werke, die er alle auswendig dirigirt! Es ist erstaunlich. Wenn ich dagegen den Saffonof bedenke, so ist der Vergleich gleich dem eines Paukenvirtuosen und dem eines Geigenvirtuosen ersten Ranges, so viel höher steht Weingartner. Doch ist es interessant, eine rohe Naturkraft und eine feine durchgeistete, geniale Künstlernatur in der Virtuosität des Dirigirens bewundern zu können.

Ich habe Dir ein paar Rezensionen mit dem letzten Symphony-Programm mit eingelegt. Die Zeitungen waren alle des Lobes voll, auch über das Orchester. Im Programm findest Du das nächste Programm vom Longy Club. Wir probiren jetzt an der 5. Sinfonie von Mahler. Morgen ist erste Streichprobe. Soll ein verrücktes Werk sein. Auch kommt hier (siehe Programm) eine Oper „The Pipe of Desire" in einem, allerdings langen Akt heraus, von einem hiesigen Komponisten, Converse, sehr begabter Mensch. Haben erst ein paar Orchesterproben gehabt; es ist nach Wagner'schem Styl gearbeitet. Der Komponist ist sehr reich und hat in Europa studirt; wir haben schon verschiedene sehr schöne Sachen von ihm gespielt."

Ein anderer Brief an jenen hiesigen Musiker, dessen spezielles Steckenpferd seine ausgedehnte Korrespondenz ist, kommt von einem Mitglied der Nielsen Operntruppe und enthält eine Neuigkeit aus dem goldenen Westen, die sogar hier in New York überraschen dürfte. Der Herr schreibt:

„In Los Angelos habe ich etwas gesehen und gehört, was sogar in New York noch nicht dagewesen. Es ist eine Neuigkeit auf dem musikalischen Gebiet, auf die ihr Erfinder ungemein stolz ist, weil er der einzige Besitzer dieser Novität in der ganzen Welt ist. Der Mann ist der Besitzer eines Barbierladens von ungewöhnlicher Eleganz und Größe. In diesem Barbershop spielt eine kleine Kapelle von sechs Mann, ganz acceptablen Musikern; man kriegt also dort einen „shave" nicht nur mit Bayrum und Witchhazel, sondern auch mit Musik, die je nach Wunsch modern oder klassisch geliefert wird. Und so etwas kann sich Los Angelos leisten, während Ihr in New York in dieser Hinsicht noch weit zurück seid in der Kultur."

Dem werthen Briefschreiber kann man auf seinen Vorwurf nur mit einem tiefgefühlten „Gott sei Dank" antworten.

H. R. H.

TOWN TOPICS
From
NEW YORK CITY.
Address
FEB 22 1900
Date

The Boston Symphony concerts brought forward as soloists Harold Bauer, most eclectic pianist of them all; Mary Hall, the slim young enchantress of the violin; and Heinrich Gebhard, a Boston product, whose piano playing is remarkable chiefly for self-abnegation and humility when he employs it in ensemble performance. Those are admirable qualities to possess in a work like D'Indy's "Symphony on a Mountain Air," for piano and orchestra. The solo instrument is caught up in the orchestral web and woof and is supposed to display itself no more than any other voice in the band. Somebody once called that class of composition "Works Written against the Piano." Harold Bauer had no compunction about being thoroughly subjective in the poetical Schumann concerto, and his lovely touch, polished technic and admirably adjusted scale of dynamics made his playing an unalloyed artistic delight.

The most important of the orchestral works played at the pair of Boston Symphony concerts was the new fifth symphony by the much maligned Mahler, of Vienna—the symphony which Cologne and Berlin received with "cheers and hisses." The work had the same mixed reception here last Thursday. The air is still full of doubt, scolding, praise and argument. Some denounce Mahler as an epigone of the lesser Romanticists, while the "Anything to Beat Strauss" party worships the Vienna master as the easy superior of Beethoven, Wagner, Bach, Berlioz and Strauss rolled into one.

Now what are the facts about this fifth symphony? Mahler joins the ranks of mystery-mongers and refuses to deliver a "program" with his score. If Mahler won't divulge the "story" behind the work, then there is no reason why the critic should presume to set up one.

Judged as an absolute symphony, the work seems to lack form and cohesion—both of which it might have, were Mahler disposed to tell what his music is meant to picture. The first movement is sombre, cheerless, in the mode of a funeral march. The second movement is distinctly ugly, and too complicated to be properly estimated at a single hearing. The scherzo is in waltz rhythm, with xylophone and bell effects that lend a macabre atmosphere. The slow part seems to be frankly lyrical, and it is the most attractive as is it is the most understandable of the five movements. The finale—chaos again, with a chorale for a finish. Throughout the whole work the thematic material is meagre, the development overweighted, and the melodies are few, far between and of fragmentary outline. Of course, Mahler's orchestration, like that of all the moderns, is facile, brilliant, and multi-colored.

It is to be feared that if Mahler does not reveal the "program" of this symphony, the world will never know its real meaning—and if there are three things which this busy world is feverishly trying to fathom at the present moment, they are the outcome of the Moroccan dispute, the true state of affairs in Russia, and the real meaning of Mahler's fifth symphony.

The Pied Piper.

MME. MELBA,
Her Father, Mr. Mitchell, and Her Little Niece, Taken at Sydney, Australia, at Her Old Home.

THE MORNING TELEGRAPH
NEW YORK CITY.
FEB 20 1900

BRIDGE WHIST KILLING MUSIC IN PITTSBURG?

George Wilson Irritates Society and the Pittsburg Orchestra. May End This Year.

(Special Dispatch to The Morning Telegraph.)

PITTSBURG, Feb. 19.

There is a grave rumor here that the Pittsburg Orchestra, presided over by Emil Paur, will be abandoned at the close of the present season. Bridge whist is said to have made such great inroads on the attendance and interest in the orchestra that it has become a losing venture to an alarming degree, and will this year wind up about $4,000 to the bad.

Manager George Wilson, of the orchestra, has published in a Pittsburg newspaper over his own name, a story in effect that if the people of Pittsburg would pay less attention to bridge whist and more to good music, things would be better.

This has offended society, which has for years gone down into its pockets to make up deficits for the Pittsburg Orchestra, and there is now a strong chance that Paur may be paid a year's salary and allowed to go. He came from Austria under a three years' contract and but two of them have expired.

There has been not a little dissatisfaction here since the retirement of Victor Herbert as director and the employment of Paur, who was once director of the Boston Symphony.

[170]

AMERICAN
From
WASHINGTON, D. C.
FEB 17 1900
Address
Date

Excellent Boston Symphony Concert

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT of Tuesday was the most brilliant of the season. The crowd was so great at 4:20 that Mr. Rapley himself turned ticket-taker, and threw open the side door. Mrs. Roosevelt was in her usual box, Alice, Mr. Longworth, Mrs. Lowndes and Mrs. Arnold Hague with her. The orchestra was in splendid form, the volume of strings superb, and Gericke's reading of the "Egmont" Overture and the Schubert "Unfinished" Symphony incomparable. After the playing of the Schumann Concerto, Bauer received an ovation, having been recalled again and again until the piano had to be moved back. His interpretation, though traditional, had individuality, and was artistic to a high degree. In the opening chords the tone of the piano he used was slightly sharp, but his wonderful touch soon overcame it, and in the most difficult passages he merely seemed to sport with the piano, so little apparent effort did he put into the playing. The final number, Tschaikowsky's "Francesca di Rimini," was difficult enough to show what the orchestra can do. It is such music as this and the symphonic poems of Richard Strauss that we wish to hear, for these are the things forbidden to orchestras not trained as the Boston men are.

In the lower boxes were the Roosevelts, Mrs. Archibald Hopkins, Mrs. Richardson, Mrs. Charles Hallam Keep, and Baroness von Sternberg and party. In the upper boxes were Mrs. Radcliffe and Mrs. Lisner. A few of those observable in the audience were Mrs. Horace Taylor, Mrs. Stilson Hutchins, Mrs. Fremont, Mme. Leger (wife of the Haitian Minister) and her niece, Miss Bourke; Miss Alice Burbage, Miss Cryder and her cousin, Miss Chauncey; Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Evans Greene, and Fraulein Stark

om
dress
e

For the fourth and next to the last time this season, the Boston Symphony Orchestra comes to town next week for a concert at the Baptist Temple on Friday evening. Besides serving as an opportunity for the reappearance of Harold Bauer, a pianist who has proved his good qualities, the concert promises to be especially enjoyable in orchestral offerings. Mr. Bauer will play the Schumann concerto in A minor, a work that has become so popular as to be almost hackneyed until it was permitted to rest a while. It has not been heard so much lately as of yore. The announcement that the symphony will be Schubert's "Unfinished" will doubtless give great pleasure to the symphony patrons. Experience covering nearly twenty-five years has shown the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra that no symphony has such a hold on the affection of the public. This has been the experience of other orchestras also. It always brings to the concert hall, not only the regular patrons, but a large number of those who are not ostensibly music lovers, but who are always attracted by its singular charm. The other large work on the programme will be Tschaikowsky's orchestral fantasia, "Francesca da Rimini," which is now regarded as one of the great orchestral works of modern times. The whole programme is as follows:

Weber—Overture, "Der Freischutz"
Schubert—Symphony in B minor, "Unfinished."
Schumann—Concerto for pianoforte in A minor.
Tschaikowsky—Orchestral fantasia, "Francesca da Rimini."

HAROLD BAUER,
Soloist at Concert of Boston Orchestra next Friday Evening.

EAGLE
Brooklyn, N. Y.
FEB 10 1906

...ORCHESTRA AND THE CHAMINADE

...ll Give the Chief Concerts in Brooklyn Next Week, with Eminent Soloists.

...IGH JINKS AT THE OPERA

On Thursday, for Conried's Benefit, at Double Prices—Interesting Concerts.

The fourth and last but one of the Boston Symphony concerts will be given in the Baptist Temple on next Friday evening. The soloist will be the favorite pianist, Harold Bauer, who will play the Schumann concerto in A minor. This concerto is one of the most beautiful works of its kind in the literature of the piano, but it has been little played in the last few years, for the very good reason that it had been played so much that the public had begun to tire of it. Its presence on the symphony programme will be most welcome, all the more so since Mr. Bauer is acknowledged to be one of the most satisfactory interpreters of Schumann now before the public. The announcement that the symphony will be Schubert's "Unfinished" will give great pleasure to the symphony patrons. Experience covering nearly twenty-five years has shown the management of the Boston Symphony orchestra that no symphony has such a hold on the affection of the public. This has been the experience of other orchestras also. It always brings to the concert hall, not only the regular patrons but a large number of those who are not ostensibly music lovers, but who are always attracted by immortal melody. The other large work on the programme will be Tschaikowsky's stunning orchestral fantasia, "Francesca da Rimini," which is now commonly regarded as being one of the greatest orchestral works of modern times. The whole programme is as follows:

Overture, Der Freischutz.....Weber
Symphony in B minor, Unfinished.....Schubert
Concerto for pianoforte in A minor.....Schumann
Orchestral fantasia, Francesca da Rimini, Tschaikowsky

Standard Union
Brooklyn, N. Y
FEB 10 1906

The fourth and last but one of the Boston Symphony concerts will be given in the Baptist Temple on next Friday evening, Feb. 18. The soloist will be the favorite pianist, Harold Bauer, who will play the Schumann Concerto in A minor. This concerto is one of the most beautiful works of its kind in the literature of the piano, but it has been little played in the last few years, for the very good reason that it had been played so much that the public had begun to tire of it. Its presence on the symphony programme will be most welcome, all the more so since Mr. Bauer is acknowledged to be one of the most satisfactory interpreters of Schumann now before the public.

The announcement that the symphony will be Schubert's "Unfinished" will give great pleasure to the symphony patrons. Experience covering nearly twenty-five years has shown the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra that no symphony has such a hold on the affection of the public. This has been the experience of other orchestras also. It always brings to the concert hall, not only the regular patrons, but a large number of those who are not ostensibly music lovers, but who are always attracted by immortal melody.

The other large work on the programme will be Tschaikowsky's stunning orchestral fantasia, "Francesca da Rimini," which is now commonly regarded as being one of the greatest orchestral works of modern times.

The whole programme is as follows: Overture, "Der Freischutz," Weber; symphony in B minor, "Unfinished," Schubert; concerto for pianoforte in A minor, Schumann; orchestral fantasia, "Francesca da Rimini," Tschaikowsky; solo artist, Harold Bauer.

NEW YORK HERALD
Brooklyn Edition
FEB 11 1906

Boston Symphony Concert.

...fourth concert of the season by the ...Symphony Orchestra will be given ...aptist Temple next Friday night. ...e will, of course, conduct, and ...l Bauer, pianist, will be the solo... ...ing is the programme:—

...Freischutz".....Weber
...ny in B minor.....Schubert
...derato.
...son moto.
...for piano and orchestra, ...Schumann
...tion grazioso.

NEW YORK WORLD
Brooklyn Ed.
FEB 11 1906

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, Department of Music, and the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society announce the fourth Philharmonic concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Wilhelm Gericke, conductor, assisted by Harold Bauer, pianist, at the Baptist Temple, Third avenue and Schermerhorn street, on Friday evening, Feb. 16, at 8.15.

NEW YORK HERALD
FEB 11 1906

Brooklyn Institute Notes.

Music lovers of Brooklyn are looking forward with keen interest to the fourth evening Philharmonic concert of the season, to be given on next Friday evening, February 16, by the Boston Symphony orchestra, in the Baptist Temple. The following concert, on March 16, will be the last of the series. Attendance at the three already given indicates that the remaining two will receive an extraordinary patronage. Next week's concert will be preceded on Wednesday afternoon by a lecture recital on the programme by Charles M. Skinner, assisted by Robert Thallon, pianist, in Association Hall. Willy Hess, violinist, will be soloist at the Friday evening concert. The programme follows:—

Weber.
Overture—"Der Freischutz."
Schubert.
Unfinished Symphony in B minor.
II. Andante con moto.
I. Allegro affettuoso.
Schumann.
Concerto in A minor, for Piano and Orchestra, Op. 54.
I. Allegro affettuoso.
II. Intermezzo: Andantino grazioso.
III. Allegro vivace.
Tschaikowsky.
"Francesca da Rimini," Orchestral Fantasia after Dante, Op. 32.
Mr. Harold Bauer, Pianist.

Carl Pique will close his series of lec-

...CITIZEN.
Brooklyn, N. Y.
FEB 11 1906

FOURTH BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT HERE THIS WEEK

Harold Bauer, Pianist, Will Assist Orchestra.

CHAMINADE GLEE CONCERT.

Plans for People's Choral Union Annual Event—Other Programmes in the Two Boroughs.

The fourth Boston Symphony concert will be given in the Baptist Temple next Friday evening. The soloist will be the favorite pianist, Harold Bauer, who will play the Schumann concerto in A minor. This concerto is one of the most beautiful works of its kind in the literature of the piano, but it has been little played in the last few years, for the very good reason that it had been played so much that the public began to tire of it. Its presence on the symphony programme will be most welcome, all the more so since Mr. Bauer is acknowledged to be one of the most satisfactory interpreters of Schumann now before the public.

The announcement that the symphony will be Schubert's "Unfinished" will give great pleasure to the symphony patrons. Experience covering nearly twenty-five years has shown the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra that no symphony has such a hold on the affection of the public. This has been the experience of other orchestras also. It always brings to the concert hall, not only the regular patrons, but a large number of those who are not ostensibly music lovers, but who are always attracted by immortal melody.

The other large work on the programme will be Tschaikowsky's orchestral fantasia, "Francesca da Rimini," which is now commonly regarded as being one of the greatest orchestral works of modern times.

The whole programme is as follows: Overture, "Der Freischutz," Weber; symphony in B minor, "Unfinished," Schubert; concerto for pianoforte in A minor, Schumann; orchestral fantasia, "Francesca da Rimini," Tschaikowsky; solo artist, Harold Bauer.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
NEW YORK PRESS
FEB 11 1906

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will be in town once more this week to give their customary two concerts, on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, in Carnegie Hall. At the Thursday concert Mr. Gericke will offer an important novelty, in Gustav Mahler's Fifth Symphony (C sharp minor), which had its American premiere on February 2 in Boston, and was highly praised by the critics of the Hub. The composer, who is conductor of the Vienna opera, is known in New York through his Fourth Symphony, which was played by the New York Symphony Orchestra, in the fall of 1904. His works are of huge dimensions, the duration of the Fifth Symphony being close to an hour, and they bristle with the most modern complications and technical difficulties. In Germany Mahler, as a composer, has aroused bitter controversies. His admirers look upon him as the man destined to preserve the old traditions of music, as opposed to the modern tendency in favor of programme music. Mahler has refused to attach any literal meaning to his works.

Mahler's Fifth Symphony had its first performance anywhere in October, 1904, at a Guerzenich concert in Cologne. Unlike the composer's second, third and fourth symphonies, it has no vocal parts. The work is divided into three parts—chapters as it were—but has five movements, the first and third parts each being subdivided into two movements. The first movement (C sharp minor), called "A Funeral Train," is followed by an allegro, in A minor. The second part (A minor), which represents the scherzo, is an old-fashioned German Laendler. The first movement of the third part, an adagietto, is in F major, and the final movement, a rondo, is written in the key of D major. The symphony is scored for four flutes (the third and fourth interchangeable with piccolo), two bassoons, one double-bassoon, six horns (in third movement a horn obligato), four trumpets, three trombones, one bass tuba, kettledrums, snare-drum, bass-drum, cymbals, triangle, glockenspiel, gong, harp and strings.

There will be only two other numbers on Thursday's programme—Beethoven's "Egmont" overture and Schumann's piano concerto, in A minor, with Harold Bauer as the soloist.

There will be two solo artists at Saturday afternoon's concert. Miss Marie Hall will be heard in Mendelssohn's violin concerto and Heinrich Gebhard will play the piano part of D'Indy's Symphony on a Mountain Air for Orchestra and Pianoforte, opus 25, which was performed recently by the New York Symphony Orchestra and Raoul Pugno. The other number on the programme will be Haydn's symphony in D major (B. & H. No. 2).

Standard Union
Brooklyn, N. Y.
FEB 15 1906

MR. SKINNER'S LECTURE.

The fourth lecture-recital of the series of five on the programmes of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts (Brooklyn Institute and Brooklyn Philharmonic Society) was given by Charles M. Skinner of the Brooklyn "Eagle" at Association Hall yesterday afternoon, and attracted a numerous audience. Mr. Skinner was assisted by Robert Thallon, the well-known Brooklyn pianist, and two of Mr. Thallon's pupils, the Misses Lillian Seymour and Margaret Wilson, the young women playing second piano. Thus given the orchestral effect was skillfully imitated and the music wholly satisfying. Musical interpretation was given to three of the numbers to be played to-morrow night, but the last, Tschaikowsky's orchestral fantasia, "Francesca da Rimini," was not attempted. Mr. Skinner quoted Mr. Thallon in giving the reason, the musician having said: "Had I 100 fingers instead of ten, and practiced ten hours a day, for four years, I might possibly be able to play a part of it." The overture to "Der Freischutz," von Weber, was first studied by theme, then played as a whole; the B minor (unfinished) Symphony, Schubert, had part of the first given and the whole of the exquisite second movement played, and the whole of the second movement of the Concerto in A minor, for piano and orchestra, Schumann, was given, the principal parts of the others being also set forth. Mr. Thallon said that he could vouch for the tempo of the Schumann Concerto, as he had heard Mme. Clara Schumann play it.

Both musical and literary interpretation of the selections called out equal and spontaneous manifestation of enjoyment. Mr. Skinner said that in this programme Mr. Gericke has provided one of beauty and conspicuous for its unity. In the old time the endeavor was to introduce variety, but now we have learned better. The selections were called romantic but healthful. The plot of "Der Freischutz" was outlined and said to be one that a playmaker would not be apt to use at the present time, because unfortunately we have outgrown our belief in fairies, gnomes and the creations of folklore—more's the pity. "Our fathers ...ritualized the material," said he, "but ...r day we materialize the spirits ... the ...

...ewspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
NEW YORK PRESS
FEB 11 1906

...that is an aspect of ... he had other troubles also. ... never suffered it is probable he would never have written. Yet this was not played until he had been dead for four years. It must be heart-rending to be a genius. "The symphony was likened to the song the angels sing as they walk the fields of asphodel. The lecturer thought it finished and found no need for scherzo and finale, because the writer had said all he wished to say. It was placed with the Fifth of Beethoven and the Pathetique of Tschaikowsky. The value in music of the symphony was discussed, and it was said to be like an emotional play, whose appeal, like that of most forms of art, is not to the intellect, but to the feeling. Schubert was thought to be at his best in purely instrumental music, when not hampered by text. The amount of syncopated passages was noted, whose time is that of the modern "rag-time." "But had Schubert written the kind of music that infests our streets his fellow citizens would have taken him to the nearest lamp-post and there extinguished him," it was declared.

In the Schumann Concerto the old idea that the orchestra should take the place of a great guitar, as in the Italian form, is abandoned. Russian music is despairing. The lecturer thought that probably Tschaikowsky never had as much trouble as either of the German writers, but it is the despair of the race that finds voice in its music. It is like the unhappiness of age. In closing Mr. Skinner said that we have had all sorts of music of late years, but he thought that one day we will return to the healthy musical music of the older writers. The new music is introspective. He predicted the coming of the time when we shall find American names on the symphony programme, and the music will be a clear and noble declaration of man's higher destiny.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
TIMES
Brooklyn, N. Y.
FEB 16 1906

CONCERT MUSIC EXPLAINED.

Charles M. Skinner Discusses Boston Orchestra Programme for To-morrow Night.

The fourth lecture-recital of the series of five on the programmes of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given by Charles M. Skinner, of the Brooklyn Eagle, at Association Hall, yesterday afternoon, and attracted a numerous audience. Mr. Skinner was assisted by Robert Thallon, the well-known Brooklyn pianist, and two of Mr. Thallon's pupils, the Misses Lillian Seymour and Margaret Wilson, the young women playing second piano.

Schubert's B minor (unfinished) Symphony, Weber's "Der Freischutz" overture and Schumann's Concerto in A minor were the works explained and performed in part. Tschaikowsky's orchestral fantasia "Francesca da Rimini," was not attempted. Mr. Skinner quoted Mr. Thallon in giving the reason, the musician having said "Had I 100 fingers instead of ten, and practised ten hours a day, for four years, I might possibly be ably to play a part of it."

Both musical and literary interpretation of the selections called out equal and spontaneous manifestation of enjoyment. The selections were called romantic, but healthful. The plot of "Der Freischutz" was outlined and said to be one that a play maker would not be apt to use at the present time, because, unfortunately, we have outgrown our belief in fairies, gnomes and the creations of folk lore—more's the pity. But the gem of the programme was thought to be the Schubert Symphony, which lifted the poor, neglected author into the front rank of composers, and is a distinct and personal revelation of his character.

...EAGLE
...ss
FEB 17 1906

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Its Fourth Concert of the Season at Baptist Temple.

A delightful programme was given last night by Mr. Gericke and his superb band at the Baptist Temple, and it was heard by a large audience. At the same time every succeeding performance at this church emphasizes the necessity for a better auditorium, with modern appliances for lighting, warming and ventilation, and, again, not until the new Academy is built shall we hear the entire Boston Symphony Orchestra. The limitations of space compel the reduction of the force, though it is a little hard to see why the management should eliminate the concert master, Mr. Hess, among others. They surely would not do that in Manhattan.

Last night's bill began with the "Freischutz" overture, which is fairly familiar, to say the least, yet not very familiar as Mr. Gericke played it, for he took an astonishingly slow tempo for the opening, albeit his purpose may have been to give greater spirit and zest to the brisker passages that followed. It must be confessed that as compared with such a reading as we used to have from Seidl, and as we can imagine from Weingartner or Nikisch, it was an exceedingly proper sort of Satan that cut up his pranks in this version. The opera that it could precede could be performed in a Sunday school without ...

[17]

n EAGLE ress Brooklyn N Y
e FEB 10 1906

BOSTON ORCHESTRA AND THE CHAMINADE

Will Give the Chief Concerts in Brooklyn Next Week, with Eminent Soloists.

HIGH JINKS AT THE OPERA

On Thursday, for Conried's Benefit, at Double Prices—Interesting Concerts.

The fourth and last but one of the Boston Symphony concerts will be given in the Baptist Temple on next Friday evening. The soloist will be the favorite pianist, Harold Bauer, who will play the Schumann concerto in A minor. This concerto is one of the most beautiful works of its kind in the literature of the piano, but it has been little played in the last few years, for the very good reason that it had been played so much that the public had begun to tire of it. Its presence on the symphony programme will be most welcome, all the more so since Mr. Bauer is acknowledged to be one of the most satisfactory interpreters of Schumann now before the public. The announcement that the symphony will be Schubert's "Unfinished" will give great pleasure to the symphony patrons. Experience covering nearly twenty-five years has shown the management of the Boston Symphony orchestra that no symphony has such a hold on the affection of the public. This has been the experience of other orchestras also. It always brings to the concert hall, not only the regular patrons but a large number of those who are not ostensibly music lovers but who are always attracted by immortal melody. The other large work on the programme will be Tschaikowsky's stunning orchestral fantasia "Francesca da Rimini," which is now commonly regarded as being one of the greatest orchestral works of modern times. The whole programme is as follows:

Overture, Der Freischutz ..... Weber
Symphony in B minor, Unfinished..... Schubert
Concerto for pianoforte in A minor..... Schumann
Orchestral fantasia, Francesca da Rimini, Tschaikowsky

n
ress
e

The fourth and last but one of the Boston Symphony concerts will be given in the Baptist Temple on next Friday evening, Feb. 18. The soloist will be the favorite pianist, Harold Bauer, who will play the Schumann Concerto in A minor. This concerto is one of the most beautiful works of its kind in the literature of the piano, but it has been little played in the last few years, for the very good reason that it had been played so much that the public had begun to tire of it. Its presence on the symphony programme will be most welcome, all the more so since Mr. Bauer is acknowledged to be one of the most satisfactory interpreters of Schumann now before the public. The announcement that the symphony will be Schubert's "Unfinished" will give great pleasure to the symphony patrons. Experience covering nearly twenty-five years has shown the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra that no symphony has such a hold on the affection of the public. This has been the experience of other orchestras also. It always brings to the concert hall not only the regular patrons, but a large number of those who are not ostensibly music lovers, but who are always attracted by immortal melody. The other large work on the programme will be Tschaikowsky's stunning orchestral fantasia, "Francesca da Rimini," which is now commonly regarded as being one of the greatest orchestral works of modern times. The whole programme is as follows: Overture, "Der Freischutz, Weber; Symphony in B minor, "Unfinished," Schubert; Concerto for Pianoforte in A minor, Schumann; Orchestral Fantasia, "Francesca da Rimini." Solo artist, Harold Bauer.

NEW YORK HERALD
FEB 11 1906

Brooklyn Institute Notes.

Music lovers of Brooklyn are looking forward with keen interest to the fourth evening Philharmonic concert of the season, to be given on next Friday evening, February 16, by the Boston Symphony orchestra, in the Baptist Temple. The following concert, on March 16, will be the last of the series. Attendance at the three already given indicates that the remaining two will receive an extraordinary patronage. Next week's concert will be preceded on Wednesday afternoon by a lecture recital on the programme by Charles M. Skinner, assisted by Robert Thallon, pianist, in Association Hall. Willy Hess, violinist, will be soloist at the Friday evening concert. The programme follows:—

Weber.
Overture—"Der Freischutz."
Schubert.
Unfinished Symphony in B minor.
II. Andante con moto.
I. Allegro affettuoso.
Schumann.
Concerto in A minor, for Piano and Orchestra, Op. 54.
I. Allegro affettuoso.
II. Intermezzo: Andantino grazioso.
III. Allegro vivace.
Tschaikowsky.
"Francesca da Rimini," Orchestral Fantasia after Dante, Op. 32.
Mr. Harold Bauer, Pianist.

Carl Fique will close his series of lec-

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
NEW YORK HERALD
FEB 11 1906
n ress
e

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will be in town once more this week to give their customary two concerts, on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, in Carnegie Hall. At the Thursday concert Mr. Gericke will offer an important novelty, in Gustav Mahler's Fifth Symphony (C sharp minor), which had its American premiere on February 2 in Boston, and was highly praised by the critics of the Hub. The composer, who is conductor of the Vienna opera, is known in New York through his Fourth Symphony, which was played by the New York Symphony Orchestra, in the fall of 1904. His works are of huge dimensions, the duration of the Fifth Symphony being close to an hour, and they bristle with the most modern complications and technical difficulties. In Germany Mahler, as a composer, has aroused bitter controversies. His admirers look upon him as the man destined to preserve the old traditions of music, as opposed to the modern tendency in favor of programme music. Mahler has refused to attach any literal meaning to his works.

Mahler's Fifth Symphony had its first performance anywhere in October, 1904, at a Guerzenich concert in Cologne. Unlike the composer's second, third and fourth symphonies, it has no vocal parts. The work is divided into three parts—chapters as it were—but has five movements, the first and third parts each being subdivided into two movements. The first movement (C sharp minor), called "A Funeral Train," is followed by an allegro, in A minor. The second part (A minor), which represents the scherzo, is an old-fashioned German Laendler. The first movement of the third part, an adagietto, is in F major, and the final movement, a rondo, is written in the key of D major. The symphony is scored for four flutes (the third and fourth interchangeable with piccolo), two bassoons, one double-bassoon, six horns (in third movement a horn obligato), four trumpets, three trombones, one bass tuba, kettledrums, snare-drum, bass-drum, cymbals, triangle, glockenspiel, gong, harp and strings.

There will be only two other numbers on Thursday's programme—Beethoven's "Egmont" overture and Schumann's piano concerto, in A minor, with Harold Bauer as the soloist.

There will be two solo artists at Saturday afternoon's concert. Miss Marie Hall will be heard in Mendelssohn's violin concerto and Heinrich Gebhard will play the piano part of D'Indy's Symphony on a Mountain Air for Orchestra and Pianoforte, opus 25, which was performed recently by the New York Symphony Orchestra and Raoul Pugno. The other number on the programme will be Haydn's symphony in D major (B. & H. No. 2).

om
dress
te

FOURTH BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT HERE THIS WEEK

Harold Bauer, Pianist, Will Assist Orchestra.

CHAMINADE GLEE CONCERT.

Plans for People's Choral Union Annual Event—Other Programmes in the Two Boroughs.

The fourth Boston Symphony concert will be given in the Baptist Temple next Friday evening. The soloist will be the favorite pianist, Harold Bauer, who will play the Schumann concerto in A minor. This concerto is one of the most beautiful works of its kind in the literature of the piano, but it has been little played in the last few years, for the very good reason that it had been played so much that the public began to tire of it. Its presence on the symphony programme will be most welcome, all the more so since Mr. Bauer is acknowledged to be one of the most satisfactory interpreters of Schumann now before the public.

The announcement that the symphony will be Schubert's "Unfinished" will give great pleasure to the symphony patrons. Experience covering nearly twenty-five years has shown the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra that no symphony has such a hold on the affection of the public. This has been the experience of other orchestras also. It always brings to the concert hall, not only the regular patrons, but a large number of those who are not ostensibly music lovers, but who are always attracted by immortal melody.

The other large work on the programme will be Tschaikowsky's orchestral fantasia, "Francesca da Rimini," which is now commonly regarded as being one of the greatest orchestral works of modern times.

The whole programme is as follows: Overture, "Der Freischutz," Weber; symphony in B minor, "Unfinished," Schubert; concerto for pianoforte in A minor, Schumann; orchestral fantasia, "Francesca da Rimini," Tschaikowsky; solo artist, Harold Bauer.

Standard Union
N. Y.
FEB 15 1906

MR. SKINNER'S LECTURE.

The fourth lecture-recital of the series of five on the programmes of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts (Brooklyn Institute and Brooklyn Philharmonic Society) was given by Charles M. Skinner of the Brooklyn "Eagle" at Association Hall yesterday afternoon, and attracted a numerous audience. Mr. Skinner was assisted by Robert Thallon, the well-known Brooklyn pianist, and two of Mr. Thallon's pupils, the Misses Lillian Seymour and Margaret Wilson, the young women playing second piano. Thus given the orchestral effect was skilfully imitated and the music wholly satisfying. Musical interpretation was given to three of the numbers to be played to-morrow night, but the last, Tschaikowsky's orchestral fantasia, "Francesca da Rimini," was not attempted. Mr. Skinner quoted Mr. Thallon in giving the reason, the musician having said: "Had I 100 fingers instead of ten, and practiced ten hours a day, for four years, I might possibly be able to play a part of it." The overture to "Der Freischutz," von Weber, was first studied by theme, then played as a whole; the B minor (unfinished) Symphony, Schubert, had part of the first given and the whole of the exquisite second movement played, and the whole of the second movement of the Concerto in A minor, for piano and orchestra, Schumann, was given, the principal parts of the others being also set forth. Mr. Thallon said that he could vouch for the tempo of the Schumann Concerto, as he had heard Mme. Clara Schumann play it.

Both musical and literary interpretation of the selections called out equal and spontaneous manifestation of enjoyment. Mr. Skinner said that in this programme Mr. Gericke has provided one of beauty and conspicuous for its unity. In the old time the endeavor was to introduce variety, but now we have learned better. The selections were called romantic but healthful. The plot of "Der Freischutz" was outlined and said to be one that a playmaker would not be apt to use at the present time, because unfortunately we have outgrown our belief in fairies, gnomes and the creations of folklore—more's the pity. "Our fathers spiritualized the material," said he, "but in our day we materialize the spiritual." But the gem of the programme was

NEW YORK HERALD
dress
FEB 11 1906
te

Boston Symphony Concert.

The fourth concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given at the Baptist Temple next Friday night. Mr. Gericke will, of course, conduct, and Mr. Harold Bauer, pianist, will be the soloist. Following is the programme:—

Overture—"Der Freischutz".....Weber
Unfinished Symphony in B minor.....Schubert
I. Allegro moderato.
II. Andante con moto.
Concerto in A minor, for piano and orchestra, op. 54.....Schumann
I. Allegro affettuoso.
II. Intermezzo: Andantino grazioso.
III. Allegro vivace.
"Francesca da Rimini," orchestral fantasia.....Tschaikowsky

NEW YORK WORLD
dress Brooklyn, Ca
FEB 11 1906
te

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, Department of Music, and the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society announce the fourth Philharmonic concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Wilhelm Gericke, conductor, assisted by Harold Bauer, pianist, at the Baptist Temple, Third avenue and Schermerhorn street, on Friday evening, Feb. 16, at 8.15.

[17]

which lifted the poor, neglected author into the front rank of composers, and is a distinct and personal revelation of his character. It was written when he was but 26 years old. "He probably was in love at the time," said Mr. Skinner, "as that is an affliction few can escape, but he had other troubles also. If he had never suffered it is probable he would never have written. Yet this was not played until he had been dead for forty years. It must be heart-rending to be a genius. "The symphony was likened to the song the angels sing as they walk the fields of asphodel. The lecturer thought it finished and found no need for scherzo and finale, because the writer had said all he wished to say. It was placed with the Fifth of Beethoven and the Pathetique of Tschaikowsky. The value in music of the symphony was discussed, and it was said to be like an emotional play, whose appeal, like that of most forms of art, is not to the intellect but to the feeling. Schubert was thought to be at his best in purely instrumental music, when not hampered by text. The amount of syncopated passages was noted, whose time is that of the modern "rag-time." "But had Schubert written the kind of music that infests our streets his fellow citizens would have taken him to the nearest lamp-post and there extinguished him," it was declared.

In the Schumann Concerto the old idea that the orchestra should take the place of a great guitar, as in the Italian form, is abandoned. Russian music is despairing. The lecturer thought that probably Tschaikowsky never had as much trouble as either of the German writers, but it is the despair of the race that finds voice in its music. It is like the unhappiness of age. In closing Mr. Skinner said that we have had all sorts of music of late years, but he thought that one day we will return to the healthy musical music of the older writers. The new music is introspective. He predicted the coming of the time when we shall find American names on the symphony programme, and the music will be a clear and noble declaration of man's higher destiny.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
TIMES
N. Y.
ess
FEB 16 1906

CONCERT MUSIC EXPLAINED.

Charles M. Skinner Discusses Boston Orchestra Programme for To-morrow Night.

The fourth lecture-recital of the series of five on the programmes of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given by Charles M. Skinner, of the Brooklyn Eagle, at Association Hall, yesterday afternoon, and attracted a numerous audience. Mr. Skinner was assisted by Robert Thallon, the well-known Brooklyn pianist, and two of Mr. Thallon's pupils, the Misses Lillian Seymour and Margaret Wilson, the young women playing second piano.

Schubert's B minor (unfinished) Symphony, Weber's "Der Freischutz" overture and Schumann's Concerto in A minor were the works explained and performed in part. Tschaikowsky's orchestral fantasia "Francesca da Rimini," was not attempted. Mr. Skinner quoted Mr. Thallon in giving the reason, the musician having said "Had I 100 fingers instead of ten, and practised ten hours a day, for four years, I might possibly be ably to play a part of it."

Both musical and literary interpretation of the selections called out equal and spontaneous manifestation of enjoyment. The selections were called romantic, but healthful. The plot of "Der Freischutz" was outlined and said to be one that a play maker would not be apt to use at the present time, because, unfortunately, we have outgrown our belief in fairies, gnomes and the creations of folk lore—more's the pity. But the gem of the programme was thought to be the Schubert Symphony, which lifted the poor, neglected author into the front rank of composers, and is a distinct and personal revelation of his character.

ess

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Its Fourth Concert of the Season at Baptist Temple.

A delightful programme was given last night by Mr. Gericke and his superb band at the Baptist Temple, and it was heard by a large audience. At the same time every succeeding performance at this church emphasizes the necessity for a better auditorium, with modern appliances for lighting, warming and ventilation, and, again, not until the new Academy is built shall we hear the entire Boston Symphony Orchestra. The limitations of space compel the reduction of the force, though it is a little hard to see why the management should eliminate the concert master, Mr. Hess, among others. They surely would not do that in Manhattan.

Last night's bill began with the "Freischutz" overture, which is fairly familiar, to say the least, yet not very familiar as Mr. Gericke played it, for he took an astonishingly slow tempo for the opening, albeit his purpose may have been to give greater spirit and zest to the brisker passages that followed. It must be confessed that as compared with such a reading as we used to have from Seidl, and as we can imagine from Weingartner or Nikisch, it was an exceedingly proper sort of Satan that cut up his pranks in this version. The opera that it would precede could be performed in a Sunday school without any shock to the feelings of the teachers.

...performance of ... domestic and comfortable ... evidence of the opening with ... other than proved, and there was ... about a lack of contrast and emphasis. ... it is always worth while to hear this ... symphony. It is one that reveals the very ... heart of Schubert, and its pathos is height... ened by the fact that it was not played until ... nearly forty years after his death. It is not ... conceived in an epic mood, yet it is more ... than lyrical, and in its meditative andante ... there are movings of the divine. The play... ing of the symphony was almost faultless in ... respect of intonation and to a certain point ... in expression. Its lack was of fire and force, ... and of that restlessness which characterizes ... the somber first measure, soon to be dis... pated by the exquisite melody that steals ... into them, like light piercing the clouds. ... There is no heartbreak, no bitterness in ... Schubert's masterpiece—only gentleness and ... endurance, which makes its appeal the ... deeper. He never heard this music on earth, ... but who shall say that he has not heard it ... from the celestial choir?

Schumann's familiar A minor concerto, with its sparkling piano part, its song-like andantino, its almost rollicking close, and its occasional moments of thoughtfulness, fitted with the scheme of the programme, which had artistic unity, save for the last selection. The soloist for the concerto was Harold Bauer, a complacent young man, who plays with brilliancy, with a crisp, true touch, but rarely with passion. His sentiment never exceeds. He is a safe player for any music, and one whom it is pleasant to hear, for he has scholarship and refinement, yet his Pegasus never carries him much farther above the heads of the multitude than does Mr. Gericke's.

The last number was in curious contrast to the rest of the programme; indeed, it was almost dissonant in a double sense. It was Tschaikowsky's fantasia, "Francesca da Rimini." This work, inspired by a reading of Dante, has to do rather with the vision in the Inferno than with the story of the unhappy lovers and the outraged husband that precedes it. It is a dark and dismal picture that is painted by the Russian, and the listener is puzzled to discover how much of it is Russia and how much of it is hell, for the two kingdoms have much in common. Musically, it is anarchistic; it violates most of the rules of harmony with a lowlessness that would be almost cheerful, save for its subject; there is a touch of beauty in the voice of Francesca expressing her constancy to Paolo, her companion in the doom; but save for this there are few moments of charm. Considering with whom and what he dealt, Tschaikowsky resolved that there should not be; still, the question arises, if art without charm or beauty is really art. We hear the hollow booming of Tartarus and the rush of winds that swept the soul clouds through the darkness; we hear the strange boiling and heaving of the pit, and the cries of the lost; we heard the murmurous shudder that may express the feeling of Dante as he gazes on this colossal spectacle of woe. We are not pronounced in our musical likings and dislikings, or we might have expressed some discontent with the "Francesca," as they did in Germany when it was first produced there. Doubtless, our attitude is better, though it is safe to say that the fantasia had some lack of admirers last night. Its thematic involutions, its formlessness, and its melodic hardness were all the more striking because of the sane and beautiful music that had gone before.

The last concert of the orchestra in Brooklyn will be given on March 16.

TIMES
Address Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date FEB 17 1906

MUSICAL.

Boston Symphony Orchestra and Harold ... Bauer, Pianist, in Excellent Concert.

An excellent programme of pleasurable possibilities for the listener, and interpreted with a fine artistic sense of balance and executive efficiency, marked the proceedings of the fourth concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Baptist Temple last night. Mr. Gericke, always conservative with his baton, and always consistent in his control of the tone of his players, seemed more spirited in his exactions, and gave a very satisfying rendering of three orchestral works, diverse in spirit and method of disclosure yet possessing the distinguishing element that denotes the hand of genius in its creation.

Weber's "Der Freischutz" overture, Schubert's Unfinished Symphony in B minor, and Tschaikowsky's "Francesca da Rimini" symphonic-poem or tone picture, called a fantasia after Dante, have each a specific claim upon all who take to themselves the varied beauty, harmonic richness and splendor of orchestral utterance. Mr. Gericke's reading was in all respects admirable, and the fine technical equipment of this orchestra was made particularly effective in the Tschaikowsky piece, whose fantastic and lugubrious deviations call for a nice adjustment of the orchestral voices for its adequate exposition. It is a most interestingly weird bit of programme music.

Weber's overture is a welcome old friend, and the Schubert symphony is something more. Its personality is irresistibly appealing, and its loveliness claims the heart while its art takes hold of the mind, leaving room for naught but the most affectionate admiration for its individual charm as a rare product of musical genius. To these three orchestral works was added last night the Schumann Concerto in A minor for piano and orchestra, often heard in the past, though not recently. Harold Bauer was the soloist and made a good showing, his performance being charged with temperamental warmth, beauty and vitality in expression, and while not absolutely free from finger slips, was finely poised and satisfying. But Mr. Bauer seems to move around at his instrument more than formerly, and raises his hands with exaggerated display. Is he cultivating eccentricities? Please don't, Mr. Bauer. We have known you as a sanely, sensible mortal as pianists go, and please do not tax our patience by calling attention to yourself instead of to your work.

The full complement of the orchestra does not take part in the Brooklyn concerts, presumably because of the limited accoustic advantages of the temple for their work. Yet, if any of the players are to be absent, why should it be the leading ones, like Wily Hess, who has not appeared at the last two concerts. Of course his absence does not make an appreciable difference, but it doesn't look well to seem to purposely omit the accredited concert master from the proceedings. Mr. Adamowski performed duty last night.

...spaper Cutting Bureau in the World
FREE PRESS
Brooklyn, N. Y.
FEB 17 1906

Harold Bauer der Solist beim Boston Symphony Orchester.

Harold Bauer war gestern Abend im Konzerte des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters im Baptist Temple der Solist. Er spielte Schumann's A-Moll-Konzert für Klavier und Orchester. Gleich von vornherein sei gesagt, daß Herr Bauer das Konzert in wirklich künstlerisch vollendeter Weise wiedergab. Es war eine brillante Leistung, die sich durch großzügige Auffassung, durch glockenreine Technik und innige Wärme auszeichnete. Und das Publikum erkannte es dankbar an, indem sie den Künstler mehrmals hervorrief.

Das Orchester-Programm brachte gestern Abend nichts Neues. Das aber ist nicht etwa als ein Tadel zu betrachten. Die Hauptsache ist, es wurde ganz brillant gespielt. Die Ouverture zu Weber's „Freischütz", mit der das Konzert eröffnet wurde, war ein wirklicher Hochgenuß. Wohl selten wurde das Horn-Quartett in der Einleitung so wunderbar rein gehört wie gestern Abend. Auch Schubert's unbeendete Symphonie in B-Moll wurde wieder in recht anerkennenswerther Weise gespielt. Aber den Höhepunkt erreichte Herr Gericke mit dem Orchester in Tschaikowsky's bekannter „Francesca da Rimini"-Fantasia. Die dynamischen Schattirungen waren geradezu wunderbar hinreißend und ließen das Kolossalwerk richtig zur Geltung kommen. Es war, wie gesagt, ein überaus genußreicher Abend. Das Konzert fand unter den Auspizien des Brooklyner Instituts für Kunst und Wissenschaft statt. Das letzte Konzert des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters findet im Baptist Temple am 16. März statt.

From Standard Union
Address ... N. Y
Date FEB 17 1906

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

It was almost a case of S. R. O. last evening at the Baptist Temple, where the Boston Symphony orchestra, again under the direction of Mr. Gericke, gave its fourth in the series of five concerts. Concertmeister Hess was absent from his post, seeming by preference to number himself with the musicians who are prevented from playing in Brooklyn by the smallness of the stage. The principal orchestral number was the exquisite, if unfinished, Schubert symphony in B minor, a work sufficiently great to have established the composer's fame for all time, even had he not been the most prolific of writers; and which calls for something more than the purely academic treatment which it received from the conductor. It goes without saying that the orchestra played faultlessly, for this cosmopolitan group of musicians who bring honor to the name of Boston—and Higginson—are never known to do otherwise. They constitute a perfect instrument of expression, but they are not automatic. Preceding the symphony Weber's "Freischuetz" overture was played, and the concluding number was Tschaikowsky's orchestral fantasia, "Francesca da Rimini."

Harold Bauer, pianist, was the soloist, playing with the orchestra Schumann's A minor concerto. Mr. Bauer's reputation as an earnest and capable musician has already been established in this country, but it cannot be said to have been enhanced last evening. But for a single slip of the finger, he played in keeping with the technique of the orchestra, but his interpretation lacked the brilliancy which other pianists have given this same work. Perhaps he may have brought out of the score all that the eccentric Schumann put into it, while the great have added a soupoon of something more. However that may be, Mr. Bauer was heard with flattering attention, and received a cordial welcome from his numerous admirers.

COURIER
BUFFALO N. Y.
JAN 28 1906

The second and last of the season's concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Convention Hall on Monday evening, February 19. The return of this famous organization is being eagerly looked forward to not only by those who were fortunate to hear the magnificent concert the orchestra gave in Buffalo last October, but by those who were prevented from being present at that event.

To bring this band of eight men to Buffalo this time is no small undertaking because a special trip must be made for the concert. Last fall when it visited Buffalo, it made this city one of several which were visited during the week. But next month, instead of returning to Boston immediately after the matinee concert in Carnegie Hall, New York on February 12, the orchestra will be brought directly to Buffalo. This is the most expensive trip the organization has ever made and it would not be possible were it not for the generous guarantee that has been made by the band of Buffalo music-lovers who are primarily responsible for the concerts.

Full details concerning the sale of tickets, the programme and the soloist will be announced next week. The programme will be carefully selected from the most engaging works played by the orchestra in its two concerts the preceding week in New York. All inquiries regarding the concert should be addressed to Mrs. Mai Davis Smith, 26 Irving Place.

...spaper Cutting Bureau in the World
ILLUSTRATED EXPRESS
BUFFALO, N. Y.
JAN 28 1906

The second and last of the season's concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Convention Hall on Monday evening, February 19th. The return of this famous organization is being eagerly anticipated, not only by those who were fortunate to hear the magnificent concert the orchestra gave in Buffalo last October, but by those who were prevented from hearing it.

To bring this band of 80 men to Buffalo this time is no small undertaking, because a special trip must be made for the concert. Last fall when it visited Buffalo, it made this city one of several visited during the week. But next month, instead of returning to Boston immediately after the matinee concert in Carnegie Hall, New York, on February 12th, the orchestra will be brought directly to Buffalo. This is the most expensive trip the organization has ever made and it would not be possible were it not for the generous guarantee that has been made by the band of Buffalo music-lovers who are primarily responsible for the concerts.

Full details concerning the sale of tickets, the programme and the soloist will be announced next week. The programme will be carefully selected from the most engaging works played by the orchestra in its two concerts the preceding week in New York. All inquiries regarding the concert should be addressed to Mrs. Mai Davis Smith, No. 26 Irving place.

...spaper Cutting Bureau in the World
COMMERCIAL
BUFFALO N. Y
JAN 27 1906

A program selected from the most engaging works played by the orchestra in its two concerts the preceding week in New York will be presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on the occasion of its second Buffalo concert this season to be given at Convention Hall on Monday evening, February 19th. The program and soloist will be announced within a week. In the meantime all inquiries regarding the concert should be made to Mrs. Mai Davis Smith, 26 Irving place. It is an immense undertaking to bring this great orchestra of 80 men to Buffalo for a second concert, an undertaking that would not have been possible except through the generous guarantee made by a band of Buffalo music lovers. Those who heard the magnificent concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Buffalo in October will feel that they must hear the coming one, while those who missed the previous concert cannot afford to forego the delight of the second.

...
BUFFALO, N. Y.
Date FEB 1 - 1906

Boston Symphony Orchestra

With two soloists and ... program the Boston ... chestra will return to ... second concert on ... Feb. 19, at Convention ... soloists will be Miss ... er of the Metropolitan ... pany and Miss ... the popular Belgian 'cellist. ... Walker comes to this city ... known, although it is likely ... have not heard her name, for ... not been given to many ... women to win the success in ... that has been her lot. She is a ... of this State, an "up-State" girl, ... ing been born in Rome, and it is ... that she began her career as a sing... in local churches.

When she finally made up her mind that she had a voice of value she gathered up what little money she had and went to Dresden. It was not easy work, but how she persisted and succeeded is found in the fact that her first engagement was as principal mezzo soprano of the Vienna Opera. There she stayed for nine years, when she accepted an engagement from Mr. Conried, year before last, and since then she has been a member of his company in New York.

Miss Walker has a most beautiful voice of unusual range. She sings not only contralto parts, but such exacting soprano roles as those of Brunnhilde in "Die Walkure" and the Queen in Goldmark's "The Queen of Sheba."

Miss Ruegger is known in this city as a 'cellist of uncommon charm and ability. She easily stands at the head of the women who play that instrument, and her presence at the coming concert will add much to its attractiveness.

But, after all, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the orchestra is the thing and Mr. Gericke has arranged a most beautiful program, one which, by the way, will necessitate the bringing of a larger orchestra than that which came last October. The purely orchestra numbers will be Goldmark's overture, "In the Spring," the "Bacchanale" from the first act of "Tannhauser," and finally Tschaikowsky's splendid fourth symphony in F minor. Inquiries regarding the concert may be made of Mrs. Mai Davis Smith, 26 Irving Place. The seat sale opens on Monday, Feb. 12, at the Denton, Cottier & Daniels' music store.

...spaper Cutting Bureau in the World
ILLUSTRATED EXPRESS
BUFFALO, N. Y.
FEB 4 - 1906

With two soloists and with an almost ideal program me, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will return to Buffalo for its second concert on Monday evening, February 19th. The soloists will be Miss Edyth Walker of the Metropolitan Opera Company, and Miss Elsa Ruegger, the popular Belgian 'cellist. Miss Walker comes to this city a stranger, although it is likely that her name is known to most concertgoers.

It has not been given to many American women to win the success in opera that has been her lot. She is a native of this state, having been born in Rome, and it is there that she began her career as a singer in local churches.

When she finally made up her mind that she had a voice that was worth while, she gathered up what little money she had and went to Dresden. It was not easy work, but how she persisted and succeeded is found in the fact that her first engagement was as principal mezzo-soprano of the Vienna Opera. There she stayed for nine years, when she accepted an engagement from Mr. Conried, year before last, and since then she has been a member of his company.

Miss Walker has a most beautiful voice of unusual range, for she sings not only contralto parts, but such exacting soprano roles as those of Brunnhilde in Die Walkure and the Queen in Goldmark's The Queen of Sheba.

Miss Ruegger is known in this city as a 'cellist of uncommon charm and ability. She easily stands at the head of the women who play that instrument, and her presence at the coming concert will add much to its attractiveness. She will be heard in Saint-Saens's A minor concerto for 'cello.

But, after all, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the orchestra is the thing, and the way Mr. Gerricke has arranged a most beautiful program, one which, by the way, will necessitate the bringing of a larger orchestra than that which came last October. The purely orchestral numbers will be Goldmark's overture, In the Spring, the Bacchanale from the first act of Tannhauser, and finally Tschaikowsky's splendid fourth symphony in F minor. Inquiries regarding the concert may be made of Mrs. Mai Davis Smith, 26 Irving place. The seat sale opens on Monday, February 12th, at the Denton, Cottier & Daniels music store.

In relation to the performance of Schubert's unfinished symphony. While it would be impossible for so technically perfect an organization as the Boston orchestra to maltreat this lovely work, the performance of last night was rather domestic and comfortable. The tragic significance of the opening was surmised rather than proved, and there was throughout a lack of contrast and emphasis. Still it is always worth while to hear this symphony. It is one that reveals the very heart of Schubert, and its pathos is heightened by the fact that it was not played until nearly forty years after his death. It is not conceived in an epic mood, yet it is more than lyrical, and in its meditative andante there are movings of the divine. The playing of the symphony was almost faultless in respect of intonation and to a certain point in expression. Its lack was of fire and force, and of that restlessness which characterizes the somber first measure, soon to be dissipated by the exquisite melody that steals into them, like light piercing the clouds. There is no heartbreak, no bitterness in Schubert's masterpiece—only gentleness and endurance, which makes its appeal the deeper. He never heard this music on earth, but who shall say that he has not heard it from the celestial choir?

Schumann's familiar A minor concerto, with its sparkling piano part, its song-like andantino, its almost rollicking close, and its occasional moments of thoughtfulness, fitted with the scheme of the programme, which had artistic unity, save for the last selection. The soloist for the concerto was Harold Bauer, a complacent young man, who plays with brilliancy, with a crisp, true touch, but rarely with passion. His sentiment never exceeds. He is a safe player for any music, and one whom it is pleasant to hear, for he has scholarship and refinement, yet his Pegasus never carries him much farther above the heads of the multitude than does Mr. Gericke's.

The last number was in curious contrast to the rest of the programme; indeed, it was almost dissonant in a double sense. It was Tschaikowsky's fantasia, "Francesca da Rimini." This work, inspired by a reading of Dante, has to do rather with the vision in the Inferno than with the story of the unhappy lovers and the outraged husband that precedes it. It is a dark and dismal picture that is painted by the Russian, and the listener is puzzled to discover how much of it is Russia and how much of it is hell, for the two kingdoms have much in common. Musically, it is anarchistic; it violates most of the rules of harmony with a lowlessness that would be almost cheerful, save for its subject; there is a touch of beauty in the voice of Francesca expressing her constancy to Paolo, her companion in the doom; but save for this there are few moments of charm. Considering with whom and what he dealt, Tschaikowsky resolved that there should not be; still, the question arises if art without charm or beauty is really art. We hear the hollow booming of Tartarus and the rush of winds that swept the soul clouds through the darkness; we hear the strange boiling and heaving of the pit, and the cries of the lost; we heard the murmurous shudder that may express the feeling of Dante as he gazes on this colossal spectacle of woe. We are not pronounced in our musical likings and dislikings, or we might have expressed some discontent with the "Francesca," as they did in Germany when it was first produced there. Doubtless, our attitude is better, though it is safe to say that the fantasia had some lack of admirers last night. Its thematic involutions, its formlessness, and its melodic hardness were all the more striking because of the sane and beautiful music that had gone before.

The last concert of the orchestra in Brooklyn will be given on March 16.

From ...

Address ...

Date ...

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

It was almost a case of S. R. O. last evening at the Baptist Temple, where the Boston Symphony orchestra, again under the direction of Mr. Gericke, gave its fourth in the series of five concerts. Concertmeister Hess was absent from his post, seeming by preference to number himself with the musicians who are prevented from playing in Brooklyn by the smallness of the stage. The principal orchestral number was the exquisite, if unfinished, Schubert symphony in B minor, a work sufficiently great to have established the composer's fame for all time, even had he not been the most prolific of writers; and which calls for something more than the purely academic treatment which it received from the conductor. It goes without saying that the orchestra played faultlessly, for this cosmopolitan group of musicians who bring honor to the name of Boston—and Higginson—are never known to do otherwise. They constitute a perfect instrument of expression, but they are not automatic. Preceding the symphony Weber's "Freischuetz" overture was played, and the concluding number was Tschaikowsky's orchestral fantasia, "Francesca da Rimini."

Harold Bauer, pianist, was the soloist, playing with the orchestra Schumann's A minor concerto. Mr. Bauer's reputation as an earnest and capable musician has already been established in this country, but it cannot be said to have been enhanced last evening. But for a single slip of the finger, he played in keeping with the technique of the orchestra, but his interpretation lacked the brilliancy which other pianists have given this same work. Perhaps he may have brought out of the score all that the eccentric Schumann put into it, while the rest have added a soupcon of something more. However that may be, Mr. Bauer was heard with flattering attention, and received a cordial welcome from his Brooklyn admirers.

From ... Brooklyn, N. Y.

Address ...

Date ...

MUSICAL.

Boston Symphony Orchestra and Harold Bauer, Pianist, in Excellent Concert.

An excellent programme of pleasurable possibilities for the listener, and interpreted with a fine artistic sense of balance and executive efficiency, marked the proceedings of the fourth concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Baptist Temple last night. Mr. Gericke, always conservative with his baton, and always consistent in his control of the tones of his players, seemed more spirited in his exactions, and gave a very satisfying rendering of three orchestral works, diverse in spirit and method of disclosure yet possessing the distinguishing element that denotes the hand of genius in its creation.

Weber's "Der Freischutz" overture, Schubert's Unfinished Symphony in B minor, and Tschaikowsky's "Francesca da Rimini" symphonic poem or tone picture, called a fantasia after Dante, have each a specific claim upon all who take to themselves the varied beauty, harmonic richness and splendor of orchestral utterance. Mr. Gericke's reading was in all respects admirable, and the fine technical equipment of this orchestra was made particularly effective in the Tschaikowsky piece, whose fantastic and lugubrious deviations call for a nice adjustment of the orchestral voices for its adequate exposition. It is a most interestingly weird bit of programme music.

Weber's overture is a welcome old friend, and the Schubert symphony is something more. Its personality is irresistibly appealing, and its loveliness claims the heart while its art takes hold of the mind, leaving room for naught but the most affectionate admiration for its individual charm as a rare product of musical genius. To these three orchestral works was added last night the Schumann Concerto in A minor for piano and orchestra, often heard in the past, though not recently. Harold Bauer was the soloist and made a good showing, his performance being charged with temperamental warmth, beauty and vitality in expression, and while not absolutely free from finger slips, was finely poised and satisfying. But Mr. Bauer seems to move around at his instrument more than formerly, and raises his hands with exaggerated display. Is he cultivating eccentricities? Please don't, Mr. Bauer. We have known you as a sanely, sensible mortal as pianists go, and please do not tax our patience by calling attention to yourself instead of to your work.

The full complement of the orchestra does not take part in the Brooklyn concerts, presumably because of the limited accoustic advantages of the temple for their work. Yet, if any of the players are to be absent, why should it be the leading ones, like Wily Hess, who has not appeared at the last two concerts. Of course his absence does not make an appreciable difference, but it doesn't look well to seem to purposely omit the accredited concert master from the proceedings. Mr. Adamowski performed duty last night.

...spaper Cutting Bureau ... EXPRESS

... FEB 17 ...

Harold Bauer der Solist beim Boston Symphony Orchester.

Harold Bauer war gestern Abend im Konzerte des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters im Baptist Temple der Solist. Er spielte Schumann's A-Moll-Konzert für Klavier und Orchester. Gleich von vornherein sei gesagt, daß Herr Bauer das Konzert in wirklich künstlerisch vollendeter Weise wiedergab. Es war eine brillante Leistung, die sich durch großzügige Auffassung, durch glockenreine Technik und innige Wärme auszeichnete. Und das Publikum erkannte es dankbar an, indem sie den Künstler mehrmals hervorrief.

Das Orchester-Programm brachte gestern Abend nichts Neues. Das aber ist nicht etwa als ein Tadel zu betrachten. Die Hauptsache ist, es wurde ganz brillant gespielt. Die Ouverture zu Weber's „Freischütz", mit der das Konzert eröffnet wurde, war ein wirklicher Hochgenuß. Wohl selten wurde das Horn-Quartett in der Einleitung so wunderbar rein gehört, wie gestern Abend. Auch Schubert's unbeendete Symphonie in B-Moll wurde wieder in recht anerkennenswerther Weise gespielt. Aber den Höhepunkt erreichte Herr Gericke mit dem Orchester in Tschaikowsky's bekannter „Francesca da Rimini"-Fantasia. Die dynamischen Schattirungen waren geradezu wunderbar hinreißend und ließen das Kolossalwerk richtig zur Geltung kommen. Es war, wie gesagt, ein überaus genußreicher Abend. Das Konzert fand unter den Auspizien des Brooklyner Instituts für Kunst und Wissenschaft statt. Das letzte Konzert des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters findet im Baptist Temple am 16. März statt.

...

BUFFALO, N. Y.

JAN 28 1906

The second and last of the season's concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Convention Hall on Monday evening, February 14. The return of this famous organization is being eagerly looked forward to, not only by those who were fortunate to hear the magnificent concert the orchestra gave in Buffalo last October, but by those who were prevented from being present at that event.

To bring this band of eight men to Buffalo this time is no small undertaking because a special trip must be made for the concert. Last fall when it visited Buffalo, it made this city one of several which were visited during the week. But next month, instead of returning to Boston immediately after the matinee concert in Carnegie Hall, New York on February 12, the orchestra will be brought directly to Buffalo. This is the most expensive trip the organization has ever made and it would not be possible were it not for the generous guarantee that has been made by the band of Buffalo music-lovers who are primarily responsible for the concerts.

Full details concerning the sale of tickets, the programme and the soloist will be announced next week. The programme will be carefully selected from the most engaging works played by the orchestra in its two concerts the preceding week in New York. All inquiries regarding the concert should be addressed to Mrs. Mai Davis Smith, 26 Irving Place.

...spaper Cutting Bureau in the ... EXPRESS BUFFALO, N. Y.

The second and last of the season's concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Convention Hall on Monday evening, February 19th. The return of this famous organization is being eagerly anticipated, not only by those who were fortunate to hear the magnificent concert the orchestra gave in Buffalo last October, but by those who were prevented from hearing it.

To bring this band of 80 men to Buffalo this time is no small undertaking, because a special trip must be made for the concert. Last fall when it visited Buffalo, it made this city one of several visited during the week. But next month, instead of returning to Boston immediately after the matinee concert in Carnegie Hall, New York, on February 12th, the orchestra will be brought directly to Buffalo. This is the most expensive trip the organization has ever made and it would not be possible were it not for the generous guarantee that has been made by the band of Buffalo music-lovers who are primarily responsible for the concerts.

Full details concerning the sale of tickets, the programme and the soloist will be announced next week. The programme will be carefully selected from the most engaging works played by the orchestra in its two concerts the preceding week in New York. All inquiries regarding the concert should be addressed to Mrs. Mai Davis Smith, No. 26 Irving place.

...spaper ... COMMERCIAL

... JAN 27 1906

A program selected from the most engaging works played by the orchestra in its two concerts the preceding week in New York will be presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on the occasion of its second Buffalo concert this season to be given at Convention Hall on Monday evening, February 19th. The program and soloist will be announced within a week. In the meantime all inquiries regarding the concert should be made to Mrs. Mai Davis Smith, 26 Irving place. It is an immense undertaking to bring this great orchestra of 80 men to Buffalo for a second concert, an undertaking that would not have been possible except through the generous guarantee made by a band of Buffalo music lovers. Those who heard the magnificent concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Buffalo in October will feel that they must hear the coming one, while those who missed the previous concert cannot afford to forego the delight of the second.

...COURIER

BUFFALO, N. Y.

ss ...

... 1906

Boston Symphony Orchestra Feb. 19.

With two soloists and with an ideal program the Boston Symphony Orchestra will return to Buffalo for its second concert on Monday evening, Feb. 19, at Convention Hall. The soloists will be Miss Edyth Walker of the Metropolitan Opera Company and Miss Elsa Ruegger, the popular Belgian 'cellist. Miss Walker comes to this city quite unknown, although it is likely that few have not heard her name, for it has not been given to many American women to win the success in opera that has been her lot. She is a native of this State, an "up-State" girl, having been born in Rome, and it is there that she began her career as a singer in local churches.

When she finally made up her mind that she had a voice of value she gathered up what little money she had and went to Dresden. It was not easy work, but how she persisted and succeeded is found in the fact that her first engagement was as principal mezzo soprano of the Vienna Opera. There she stayed for nine years, when she accepted an engagement from Mr. Conried, year before last, and since then she has been a member of his company in New York.

Miss Walker has a most beautiful voice of unusual range. She sings not only contralto parts, but such exacting soprano roles as those of Brunnhilde in "Die Walkure" and the Queen in Goldmark's "The Queen of Sheba."

Miss Ruegger is known in this city as a 'cellist of uncommon charm and ability. She easily stands at the head of the women who play that instrument, and her presence at the coming concert will add much to its attractiveness.

But, after all, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the orchestra is the thing and Mr. Gericke has arranged a most beautiful program, one which, by the way, will necessitate the bringing of a larger orchestra than that which came last October. The purely orchestra numbers will be Goldmark's overture, "In the Spring," the "Baccanale" from the first act of "Tannhauser," and finally Tschaikowsky's splendid fourth symphony in F minor. Inquiries regarding the concert may be made of Mrs. Mai Davis Smith, 26 Irving Place. The seat sale opens on Monday, Feb. 12, at the Denton, Cottier & Daniels' music store.

...spaper Cutting Bureau in the World

TRAVELER EXPRESS

FEB 4 - 1906

With two soloists and with an almost ideal programme, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will return to Buffalo for its second concert on Monday evening, February 19th. The soloists will be Miss Edyth Walker of the Metropolitan Opera Company, and Miss Elsa Ruegger, the popular Belgian 'cellist. Miss Walker comes to this city a stranger, although it is likely that her name is known to most concertgoers.

It has not been given to many American women to win the success in opera that has been her lot. She is a native of this state, having been born in Rome, and it is there that she began her career as a singer in local churches.

When she finally made up her mind that she had a voice that was worth while, she gathered up what little money she had and went to Dresden. It was not easy work, but how she persisted and succeeded is found in the fact that her first engagement was as principal mezzo-soprano of the Vienna Opera. There she stayed for nine years, when she accepted an engagement from Mr. Conried, year before last, and since then she has been a member of his company.

Miss Walker has a most beautiful voice of unusual range, for she sings not only contralto parts, but such exacting soprano roles as those of Brunnhilde in Die Walkure and the Queen in Goldmark's The Queen of Sheba.

Miss Ruegger is known in this city as a 'cellist of uncommon charm and ability. She easily stands at the head of the women who play that instrument and her presence at the coming concert will add much to its attractiveness. She will be heard in Saint-Saens's A minor concerto for 'cello.

But, after all, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the orchestra is the thing, and the way Mr. Gerricke has arranged a most beautiful programme—one which, by the way, will necessitate the bringing of a larger orchestra than that which came last October. The purely orchestral numbers will be Goldmark's overture, In the Spring, the Bacchanale from the first act of Tannhauser, and finally Tschaikowsky's splendid fourth symphony in F minor. Inquiries regarding the concert may be made of Mrs. Mai Davis Smith, No. 26 Irving place. The seat sale opens on Monday, February 12th, at the Denton, Cottier & Daniels music store.

[172]

COURIER
BUFFALO, N. Y.
FEB 4- 1906

...and with an a... course, the Bosto... Orchestra will return ... second concert on Mon... February 19th. Th... the Miss Edyth Walker ... Metropolitan Opera Company, an...

...Ruegger, the popular Bel... Miss Walker comes to ... quite unknown, although it is ... few have not heard her ... it has not been given to ... American women to win the suc... ...opera that has been her lot. ... a native of this State, an "up... girl, having been born in Rome, ... it is there that she began her ... as a singer, in local churches. ... When she finally made up her mind ... she had a voice that was worth ... while she gathered up what little ... money she had and went to Dresden. ... was not easy work but how she per... ...and succeeded is found in the ... that her first engagement was as ... principal mezzo soprano of the Vienna ... There she stayed for nine ... years, when she accepted an engage... ...ment from Mr. Conried, year before last. ... Since then she has been a mem... of his company.

...Walker has a most beautiful ... of very unusual range, for she ... not only contralto parts, but such ... soprano roles as those of ... Brunhilde in "Die Walkure" and the ... in Goldmark's "The Queen of ...

...Ruegger is known in this city ... 'cellist of uncommon charm and ... She easily stands at the head ... women who play that instru... and her presence at the coming ... cert will add much to its attractive...

...But after all, with the Boston Sym... Orchestra, the Orchestra is the ... and Mr. Gericke has arranged ... most beautiful programme—one ... by the way, will necessitate the ... ...ing of a larger orchestra than that ... which came last October. The purely ... orchestra numbers will be Goldmark's ... overture "In the Spring," the "Bac... ...chanale" from the first act of "Tann... ...hauser" and finally Tschaikowsky's ... splendid fourth symphony in F minor. ... Inquiries regarding the concert may ... be made of Mrs. Mai Davis Smith, No. ... 26 Irving Place. The seat sale opens ... on Monday, February 12th, at the Den... ...Cottier & Daniels music store.

COMMERCIAL
FEB 10 1906
BUFFALO, N.Y.

...th two such eminent soloists as Miss ... Walker, prima donna mezzo soprano ... Metropolitan Opera House, and Miss ... Ruegger, the famous Belgian cellist, ... to the fame of its own famous or... ...tion, the Boston Symphony Orchestra ... give the second and last of its Buffalo ... concerts at Convention Hall on Monday ... evening, February 19th, the seat sale open... ...next Monday morning at the Denton, ... Cottier & Daniels music store.

...impression made by the superb per... ...ance of the Boston Symphony Orches... ...last October will not readily be effaced ... As a result there is even greater inter... ...shown in the forthcoming concert than ... in its predecessor, which brought out an ... audience that almost filled big Convention ...

...play the Wagner number on its pro... ...for the coming concert requires a ... number of men than were needed for ... the former one, which was presented by an ... orchestra of 75. For this month's perform... ...however, the orchestra will come here ... more than 80 strong, arriving direct from ... New York, where it will play the preceding ... Monday. From Buffalo it will return to ... Boston, stopping en route at Albany, where ... a concert is given by the orchestra each ...

...lowing is the Buffalo program, one of ... most beautiful and varied that Conduc... ...Gericke has arranged for the entire ...

...ture, "In the Spring" .....Goldmark
.....
Miss Walker.
...No. 1, for violoncello in A ... minor ..... Saint-Saens
Miss Elsa Ruegger.
...nale from "Tannhauser"....Wagner
.....
Miss Walker.
...ony, No. 4, in F minor. Tschaikowsky

...Miss Walker's arias will be is not ... known, the announcement being de... ...for a few days, but both will prob... ...be highly dramatic, as Miss Walker is ... a dramatic singer and delights in ... dramatic work.

...the Tschaikowsky symphonies, the ... selected by Mr. Gericke for the Buffalo ... was the great composer's favorite. ... ever that it was, for its history is ... very romantic and interesting. It was ... dedicated "To my best friend."

...Meck was this best friend and ... the between the two were strange. ... met, but to this adored friend, ... who settled upon the com... ...pension which enabled him ... musical work undisturbed ... free from care or financial re... ...The composer poured out the ... genius. This symphony ... friendship was ...

COURIER
BUFFALO, N. Y.
FEB 8- 1906

NOTED SOLOISTS WITH SYMPHONY

MISS EDYTH WALKER AND MISS ELSA RUEGGER COMING WITH THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

With two splendid soloists, Miss Edyth Walker of the Metropolitan Opera House, and Miss Elsa Ruegger, the talented Belgian 'cellist, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its second Buffalo concert this season at Convention Hall on Monday evening, February 19th.

Seats for the concert go on sale next Monday morning at the Denton, Cottier & Daniels' music store, but in the meantime reservations made may be made in advance from Mrs. Mai Davis Smith, No. 26 Irving Place.

Miss Walker, who is to appear in Buffalo for the first time, had a rare and gratifying experience when it was announced in the spring of 1903 that she would not renew her contract with the Imperial Opera in Vienna. Not only did she receive hundreds of personal letters asking her to reconsider her decision, but she was "commanded" to a personal audience with the Emperor himself, and he, too, sought to have her remain. But her mind was set on singing in her own country and she accepted Mr. Conried's terms.

COMMERCIAL
...ress BUFFALO N. Y.
FEB 8- 1906

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Convention Hall on Monday evening, February 19th. Owing to the presence on the program of the Bacchanal from "Tannhauser," it will be necessary to bring to Buffalo even a larger number of musicians than came last fall, for there will be at least eighty men in all. Moreover, there will be two soloists, Miss Edyth Walker, the great mezzo-soprano of the Metropolitan Opera House and the successful successor of Marianne Brandt in Vienna, and Elsa Ruegger, the talented Belgian 'cellist. All communications regarding the concert should be addressed to Mrs. Mai Davis Smith, 26 Irving place. Tickets for the concert will go on sale on Monday, February 12th, at Denton, Cottier & Daniels's music store.

...TIMES
BUFFALO, N. Y.
...ress FEB 8- 1906

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Convention Hall on Monday evening, February 19th. Owing to the presence on the program of the Bacchanale from "Tannhauser" it will be necessary to bring to Buffalo even a larger number of musicians than came last fall, for there will be at least 80 men in all. Moreover, there will be two soloists, Miss Edyth Walker, the great mezzo soprano of the Metropolitan Opera House and Elsa Ruegger, the talented Belgian 'cellist. All communications regarding the concert should be addressed to Mrs. Mai Davis Smith, No. 26 Irving Place. Tickets for the concert will go on sale on Monday morning next, February 12th, at the Denton, Cottier & Daniels music store.

COMMERCIAL
BUFFALO, N. Y.
...ss FEB 3- 1906

MUSICAL NEWS.

Record of Local Events and Gleanings from the General Field.

A telegram received this morning from C. A. Ellis of Boston, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announces that a second soloist will be heard with the orchestra when that famous organization visits Buffalo for its long-expected concert on Monday evening, February 19th. It will be Miss Elsa Rueger, the popular Belgian cellist, who will play the Saint Saens A Minor Concerto.

COURIER
BUFFALO, N. Y.
FEB 11 1906

Tomorrow evening the Buffalo Orpheus will give its second season concert at Convention Hall. Edwin Grasse, violinist, and Gwilm Miles, basso, will be the soloists for this concert.

* * *

The Boston Symphony Orchestra leaves Boston today on its fourth regular monthly trip, which will bring it to this city for its second concert here on next Monday night, February 19th, in Convention Hall. Tomorrow night it plays in Philadelphia; Tuesday afternoon in Washington; Wednesday in Baltimore; Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon in New York, and Friday evening in Brooklyn. Mr. Gericke and Prof. Willy Hess will come on to Buffalo next Saturday evening in order to have a quiet rest after the arduous labors of the week.

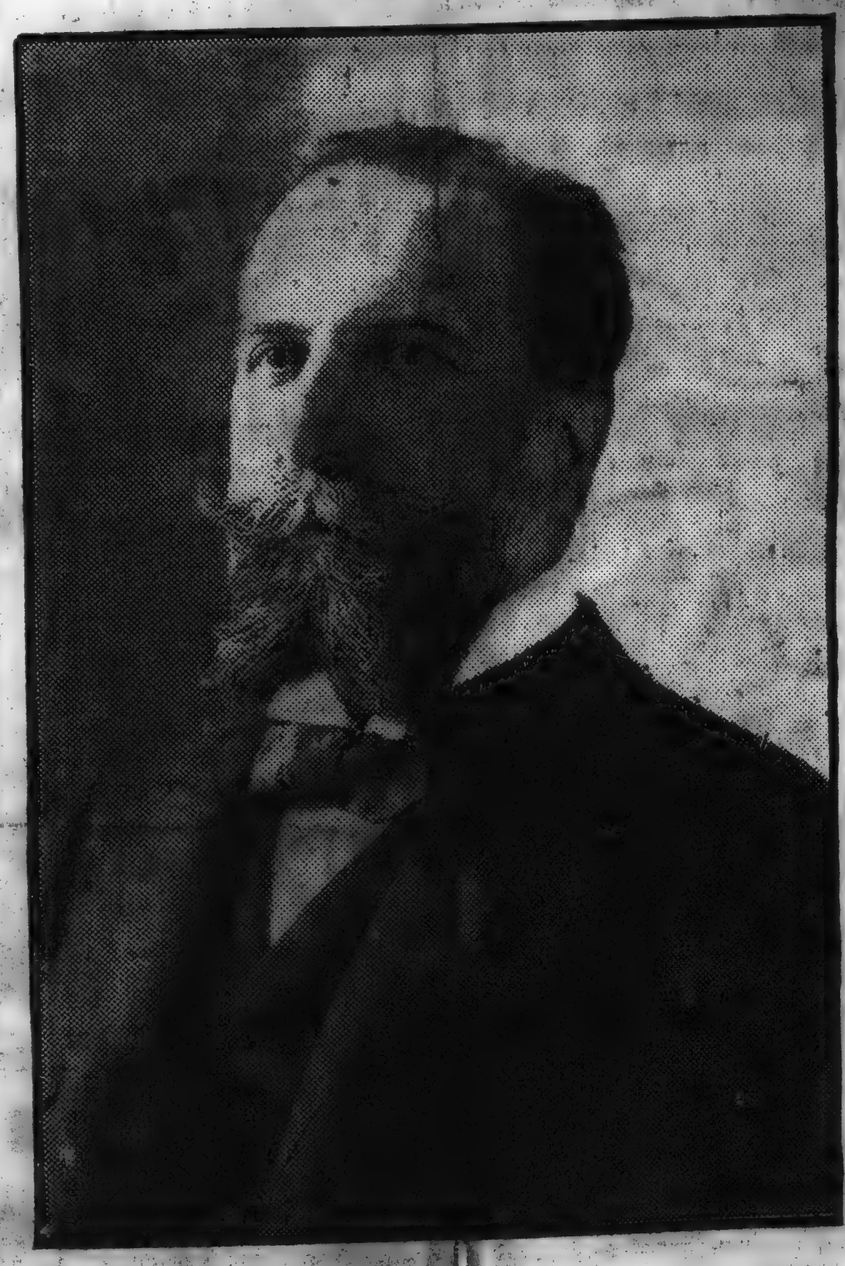
The sale of seats for this concert will open at the Denton, Cottier & Daniels' music store tomorrow morning at 9 o'clock. The prospects are favorable for an audience of even larger size than that which went to the first concert last October. This will be due, not only to the season, which is much better fitted for concert-going than the first week in October, but the impression made then by the superb performance of the orchestra will carry its weight and the programme provided for this concert will attract the widest range of music lovers. With two soloists, Edyth Walker and Elsa Ruegger, a rich feast is promised. The programme will be as follows:

Overture, "In the Spring".....Goldmark
Aria .....
Miss Walker.
Concerto No. 1, for violincello in A minor .....Saint-Saens
Miss Elsa Ruegger.
Bacchanale from "Tannhauser"..Wagner
Aria .....
Miss Walker.
Symphony No. 4, in F minor.....
.....Tschaikowsky

Romances are so often written about great musical works that it is difficult generally to sift the true from the false and oftenest it is the false that endure the longest, as, for example, the apocryphal tale about the so-called "Moonlight" sonata of Beethoven. But the charming romance which is connected with the fourth symphony of Tschaikowsky which will be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its second Buffalo concert on February 19th, comes to us from the composer himself, contained in the letters he wrote to Frau von Meck. His recently published letters have cleared up some of the mystery which has for so long surrounded the life and death of this wonderfully gifted Russian, and among other things, have explained the strange relations which existed between him and Frau von Meck. In the later seventies, when the world was black for Tschaikowsky, this Frau von Meck, a very rich Russian woman, settled on him a pension of $3,000 a year which kept him in comfort and left him free from the drudgery of teaching until his own income was sufficient.

For thirty years this man and woman were most intimate friends and yet never in that time did they ever meet, much less speak to each other. Their whole intercourse was confined to letters, letters in which they poured forth their most intimate thoughts and Tschaikowsky's have been given by his brother to the public. The friendship came suddenly to an end with much bitterness on both sides, but later Tschaikowsky realized that the great wrong which he felt his patroness had done him in reproaching him for accepting money, was due entirely to her mental condition which presaged her death.

Tschaikowsky had just begun this fourth symphony when the friendship began and to Frau von Meck it is dedicated. It was always his favorite symphony, and in all his letters to her he calls it "our symphony" for his greatest inspiration came from the woman whom he would never meet for fear lest she should not realize the ideal he had formed of her.



WILHELM GERICKE.

Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be heard at Convention Hall on the evening of February 17th.

COURIER

ss BUFFALO, N. Y.

FEB 4- 1906

* * *

With two soloists and with an almost ideal programme, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will return to Buffalo for its second concert on Monday evening, February 19th. The soloists will be Miss Edyth Walker of the Metropolitan Opera Company, and Miss Elsa Ruegger, the popular Belgian 'cellist. Miss Walker comes to this city quite unknown, although it is likely that few have not heard her name, for it has not been given to many American women to win the success in opera that has been her lot. She is a native of this State, an "upstate" girl, having been born in Rome, and it is there that she began her career as a singer, in local churches.

When she finally made up her mind that she had a voice that was worth while she gathered up what little money she had and went to Dresden. It was not easy work but how she persisted and succeeded is found in the fact that her first engagement was as principal mezzo soprano of the Vienna Opera. There she stayed for nine years, when she accepted an engagement from Mr. Conried, year before last and since then she has been a member of his company.

Miss Walker has a most beautiful voice of very unusual range, for she sings not only contralto parts, but such exacting soprano roles as those of Brunnhilde in "Die Walkure" and the Queen in Goldmark's "The Queen of Sheba."

Miss Ruegger is known in this city as a 'cellist of uncommon charm and ability. She easily stands at the head of the women who play that instrument, and her presence at the coming concert will add much to its attractiveness.

But after all, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Orchestra is the thing, and Mr. Gericke has arranged a most beautiful programme—one which, by the way, will necessitate the bringing of a larger orchestra than that which came last October. The purely orchestra numbers will be Goldmark's overture "In the Spring," the "Bacchanale" from the first act of "Tannhauser" and finally Tschaikowsky's splendid fourth symphony in F minor. Inquiries regarding the concert may be made of Mrs. Mai Davis Smith, No. 26 Irving Place. The seat sale opens on Monday, February 12th, at the Denton, Cottier & Daniels music store.

COMMERCIAL

s FEB 10 1906

effect.

With two such eminent soloists as Miss Edyth Walker, prima donna mezzo soprano of the Metropolitan Opera House, and Miss Elsa Ruegger, the famous Belgian cellist, added to the fame of its own famous organization, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the second and last of its Buffalo concerts at Convention Hall on Monday evening, February 19th, the seat sale opening next Monday morning at the Denton, Cottier & Daniels music store.

The impression made by the superb performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last October will not readily be effaced and as a result there is even greater interest shown in the forthcoming concert than in its predecessor, which brought out an audience that almost filled big Convention Hall.

To play the Wagner number on its program for the coming concert requires a larger number of men than were needed for the former one, which was presented by an orchestra of 75. For this month's performance, however, the orchestra will come here more than 80 strong, arriving direct from New York, where it will play the preceding Saturday. From Buffalo it will return to Boston, stopping en route at Albany, where a concert is given by the orchrestra each winter.

Following is the Buffalo program, one of the most beautiful and varied that Conductor Gericke has arranged for the entire season:

Overture, "In the Spring" .....Goldmark
Aria .....
Miss Walker.
Concerto, No. 1, for violoncello in A minor ..... Saint-Saens
Miss Elsa Ruegger.
Bacchanale from "Tannhauser"....Wagner
Aria .....
Miss Walker.
Symphony, No. 4, in F minor.Tschaikowsky

What Miss Walker's arias will be is not as yet known, the announcement being deferred for a few days, but both will probably be highly dramatic, as Miss Walker is a most dramatic singer and delights in temperamental work.

Of all the Tschaikowsky symphonies, the one selected by Mr. Gericke for the Buffalo program was the great composer's favorite. No wonder that it was, for its history is decidedly romantic and interesting. It was dedicated "To my best friend."

Frau von Meck was this best friend and the relations between the two were strange. They never met, but to this adored friend, a rich Russian who settled upon the composer an annual pension which enabled him to continue his musical work undisturbed by creditors, free from care or financial responsibility, the composer poured out the treasure of his genius. This symphony [illegible] at the time the friendship was [illegible] all his letters to his Russian [illegible] speaks of it as [illegible]

om COURIER

dress BUFFALO, N. Y.

te FEB 8- 1906

NOTED SOLOISTS WITH SYMPHONY

MISS EDYTH WALKER AND MISS ELSA RUEGGER COMING WITH THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

With two splendid soloists, Miss Edyth Walker of the Metropolitan Opera House, and Miss Elsa Ruegger, the talented Belgian 'cellist, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its second Buffalo concert this season at Convention Hall on Monday evening, February 19th.

Seats for the concert go on sale next Monday morning at the Denton, Cottier & Daniels' music store, but in the meantime reservations made may be made in advance from Mrs. Mai Davis Smith, No. 26 Irving Place.

Miss Walker, who is to appear in Buffalo for the first time, had a rare and gratifying experience when it was announced in the spring of 1903 that she would not renew her contract with the Imperial Opera in Vienna. Not only did she receive hundreds of personal letters asking her to reconsider her decision, but she was "commanded" to a personal audience with the Emperor himself, and he, too, sought to have her remain. But her mind was set on singing in her own country and she accepted Mr. Conried's terms.

COMMERCIAL

a ress FEB 8- 1906

e

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Convention Hall on Monday evening, February 19th. Owing to the presence on the program of the Bacchanal from "Tannhauser," it will be necessary to bring to Buffalo even a larger number of musicians than came last fall, for there will be at least eighty men in all. Moreover, there will be two soloists, Miss Edyth Walker, the great mezzo-soprano of the Metropolitan Opera House and the successful successor of Marianne Brandt in Vienna, and Elsa Ruegger, the talented Belgian 'cellist. All communications regarding the concert should be addressed to Mrs. Mai Davis Smith, 26 Irving place. Tickets for the concert will go on sale on Monday, February 12th, at Denton, Cottier & Daniels's music store.

TIMES

ess FEB 8- 1906

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Convention Hall on Monday evening, February 19th. Owing to the presence on the program of the Bacchanale from "Tannhauser" it will be necessary to bring to Buffalo even a larger number of musicians than came last fall, for there will be at least 80 men in all. Moreover, there will be two soloists, Miss Edyth Walker, the great mezzo soprano of the Metropolitan Opera House and Elsa Ruegger, the talented Belgian 'cellist All communications regarding the concert should be addressed to Mrs. Mai Davis Smith, No. 26 Irving Place. Tickets for the concert will go on sale on Monday morning next, February 12th, at the Denton, Cottier & Daniels music store.

COMMERCIAL

ss Feb 3- 1906

MUSICAL NEWS.

Record of Local Events and Gleanings from the General Field.

A telegram received this morning from C. A. Ellis of Boston, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announces that a second soloist will be heard with the orchestra when that famous organization visits Buffalo for its long-expected concert on Monday evening, February 19th. It will be Miss Elsa Rueger, the popular Belgian cellist, who will play the Saint Saens A Minor Concerto.

COURIER

FEB 11 1906

Tomorrow evening the Buffalo Orpheus will give its second season concert at Convention Hall. Edwin Grasse, violinist, and Gwilm Miles, basso, will be the soloists for this concert.

* * *

The Boston Symphony Orchestra leaves Boston today on its fourth regular monthly trip, which will bring it to this city for its second concert here on next Monday night, February 19th, in Convention Hall. Tomorrow night it plays in Philadelphia; Tuesday afternoon in Washington; Wednesday in Baltimore; Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon in New York, and Friday evening in Brooklyn. Mr. Gericke and Prof. Willy Hess will come on to Buffalo next Saturday evening in order to have a quiet rest ofter the arduous labors of the week.

The sale of seats for this concert will open at the Denton, Cottier & Daniels' music store tomorrow morning at 9 o'clock. The prospects are favorable for an audience of even larger size than that which went to the first concert last October. This will be due, not only to the season, which is much better fitted for concert-going than the first week in October, but the impression made then by the superb performance of the orchestra will carry its weight and the programme provided for this concert will attract the widest range of music lovers. With two soloists, Edyth Walker and Elsa Ruegger, a rich feast is promised. The programme will be as follows:

Overture, "In the Spring".....Goldmark
Aria .....
Miss Walker.
Concerto No. 1, for violincello in A minor .....Saint-Saens
Miss Elsa Ruegger.
Bacchanale from "Tannhauser"..Wagner
Aria .....
Miss Walker.
Symphony No. 4, in F minor.....
..... Tschaikowsky

Romances are so often written about great musical works that it is difficult generally to sift the true from the false and oftenest it is the false that endure the longest, as, for example, the apocryphal tale about the so-called "Moonlight" sonata of Beethoven. But the charming romance which is connected with the fourth symphony of Tschaikowsky which will be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its second Buffalo concert on February 19th, comes to us from the composer himself, contained in the letters he wrote to Frau von Meck. His recently published letters have cleared up much of the mystery which has for so long surrounded the life and death of this wonderfully gifted Russian, and among other things, have explained the strange relations which existed between him and Frau von Meck. In the later seventies, when the world was black for Tschaikowsky, this Frau von Meck, a very rich Russian woman, settled on him a pension of $3,000 a year which kept him in comfort and left him free from the drudgery of teaching until his own income was sufficient.

For thirty years this man and woman were most intimate friends and yet never in that time did they ever meet, much less speak to each other. Their whole intercourse was confined to letters, letters in which they poured forth their most intimate thoughts and Tschaikowsky's have been given by his brother to the public. The friendship came suddenly to an end with much bitterness on both sides, but later Tschaikowsky realized that the great wrong which he felt his patroness had done him in reproaching him for accepting money, was due entirely to her mental condition which presaged her death.

Tschaikowsky had just begun this fourth symphony when the friendship began and to Frau von Meck it is dedicated. It was always his favorite symphony, and in all his letters to her he calls it "our symphony" for his greatest inspiration came from the woman whom he would never meet for fear lest she should not realize the ideal he had formed of her.

WILHELM GERICKE.

Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be heard at Convention Hall on the evening of February 17th.

[173]

STRATED EXPRESS
BUFFALO, N. Y.
FEB 11 1906

leaves Boston today on its fourth regular monthly trip, which will bring it to this city for its second concert here on Monday night, February 19th, in Convention Hall. Tomorrow night it plays in Philadelphia, on Tuesday in Washington, on Wednesday in Baltimore, on Thursday and Saturday in New York and on Friday in Brooklyn. Mr. Gericke and Willy Hess will come on to Buffalo next Saturday evening, in order to have a rest after the arduous labors of the week.

The sale of seats for this concert will open at the Denton, Cottier & Daniels music store tomorrow morning at 9 o'clock. The prospects are favorable for an audience of even larger size than that of the October concert. This will be due not only to the season, which is better fitted for concert going than October, but the impression made then by the superb performance of the orchestra will carry its weight, and the programme provided for this concert will attract all music-lovers. With two soloists, Edyth Walker and Elsa Ruegger, a rich feast is promised. The programme follows:

Overture, In the Spring ..... Goldmark
Aria .....
Miss Walker.
Concerto, No. 1, for violoncello, in A minor ..... Saint-Saens
Miss Elsa Ruegger.
Bacchanale, from Tannhauser ..... Wagner
Miss Walker.
Aria .....
Symphony, No. 4, in F minor ..Tschaikowsky

Romances are so often written about great musical works that it is difficult generally to sift the true from the false that endure the longest, as, for example, the apocryphal tale about the so-called Moonlight sonata of Beethoven. But the charming romance which is connected with the fourth symphony of Tschaikowsky, which will be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its second Buffalo concerto on February 19th, comes to us from the composer himself, contained in the letters he wrote to Frau von Meck. In the later '70s, when the world was black for Tschaikowsky, Frau von Meck, a very rich Russian woman, settled on him a pension of $2,000 a year which kept him in comfort and left him free from the drudgery of teaching until his own income was sufficient.

For thirteen years this man and woman were most intimate friends, yet never in that time did they meet or speak to each other. Their whole intercourse was confined to letters, in which they poured forth their most intimate thoughts, and Tschaikowsky's have been given by his brother to the public. The friendship came suddenly to an end with bitterness on both sides, but later Tschaikowsky realized that the wrong which he felt his patroness had done him in reproaching him for accepting her money, was due entirely to the mental condition which presaged her death.

Tschaikowsky dedicated this fourth symphony to Frau von Meck. It was always his favorite symphony, and in all his letters to her he calls it "our symphony," for his greatest inspiration came from the woman whom he would never meet for fear that she might not realize the ideal he had formed of her.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau of the World
Press BUFFALO, N. Y.
FEB 12 1906

SEAT SALE FOR SYMPHONY CONCERT

OPENS THIS MORNING, FOR MUSICAL TREAT TO BE GIVEN NEXT MONDAY NIGHT.

This morning at 9 o'clock, at the Denton, Cottier & Daniels music store, the seat sale opens for the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given at Convention Hall on Monday evening, February 19th. This is the second and last of the concerts to be given in Buffalo this season by the famous organization. Conductor Gericke will bring 85 of his men. The soloists for the occasion will be Miss Edyth Walker, the prima donna soprano of the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, who will sing two arias, and Miss Elsa Ruegger, the famous Belgian cellist.

EXPRESS
BUFFALO, N. Y.
FEB 12 1906

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

This morning at 9 o'clock, at the Denton, Cottier & Daniels music store, the sale of seats opens for the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given at Convention Hall next Monday evening, February 19th.

Conductor Wilhelm Gericke will bring on 85 of his men for this concert, the second and last to be given here this season. The famous organization will add to its own attractions two eminent soloists, Miss Edyth Walker, prima donna soprano of the Metropolitan Opera-House, New York, and Miss Elsa Ruegger, the talented Belgian cellist.

COMMERCIAL.
BUFFALO, N. Y.
FEB 12 1906

HEAVY SALE OF SEATS.

A heavy demand for seats marked the opening of the Boston Symphony Orchestra sale this morning at the Denton, Cottier & Daniels music store, and it looks as if the famous organization would be greeted by an immense audience when it gives its second and last Buffalo concert next Monday evening, February 19th, at Convention Hall.

Not content with bringing on 85 players, Conductor Gericke of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has added two splendid soloists for his Buffalo program, Miss Edyth Walker, prima donna soprano of the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, and Miss Elsa Ruegger, the eminent Belgian cellist.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau of the World
ILLUSTRATED TIMES,
Press BUFFALO, N. Y.
FEB 11 1906

The Boston Symphony Orchestra leaves Boston today on its fourth regular monthly trip, which will bring it to this city for its second concert here on next Monday night, February 19th, in Convention Hall. Tomorrow night it plays in Philadelphia, Tuesday afternoon in Washington, Wednesday in Baltimore, Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon in New York and Friday evening in Brooklyn. Mr. Gericke and Prof. Willy Hess will come on to Buffalo next Saturday evening, in order to have a quiet rest after the arduous labors of the week.

The sale of seats for this concert will open at the Denton, Cottier and Daniels' music store tomorrow morning at 9 o'clock. The prospects are favorable for an audience of even larger size than that which went to the first concert last October. This will be due, not only to the season which is much better fitted for concert-going than the first week of October, but the impression made then by the superb performance of the orchestra will carry its weight and the program provided for this concert will attract the widest range of music-lovers. With two soloists, Edyth Walker and Elsa Ruegger, a rich feast is promised. The program will be as follows:

Overture, "In the Spring"...Goldmark
Aria .....
Miss Walker.
Concerto, No. 1, for violoncello in A minor.....
Miss Elsa Ruegger.
Bacchanale, from "Tannhauser"..
..... Wagner
Aria .....
Miss Walker.
Symphony, No. 4, in F minor....
..... Tschaikowsky

Romances are so often written about great musical works that it is difficult generally to sift the true from the false and oftenest it is the false that endure the longest, as, for example, the apocryphal tale about the so-called "moonlight" sonata of Beethoven. But the charming romance which is connected with the fourth symphony of Tschaikowsky which will be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its second Buffalo concerto on February 9th, comes to us from the composer himself, contained in the letters he wrote to Frau von Meck. His recently published letters have cleared up much of the mystery which has for so long surrounded the life and death of this wonderfully gifted Russian, and among other things, have explained the strange relations which existed between him and Frau von Meck. In the latter 70s, when the world was black for Tschaikowsky, this Frau von Meck, a very rich Russian woman, settled on him a pension of $2,000 a year, which kept him in comfort and left him free from the drudgery of teaching until his own income was sufficient.

For 13 years this man and woman were most intimate friends and yet never in that time did they ever meet, much less speak to each other. Their whole intercourse was confined to letters, letters in which they poured forth their most intimate thoughts and Tschaikowsky's have been given by his brother to the public. The friendship came suddenly to an end with much bitterness on both sides but later Tschaikowski realized that the great wrong which he felt his patroness had done him in reproaching him for accepting her money, was due entirely to her mental condition which presaged her death.

Tschaikowsky had just begun this fourth symphony when the friendship began and to Frau von Meck it is dedicated. It was always his favorite symphony and in all his letters to her he calls it "our symphony" for his greatest inspiration came from the

COMMERCIAL
BUFFALO, N. Y.
FEB 17 1906

It would seem as if orchestral music had reached its consummation in the program to be presented next Monday night at Convention Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Conductor Wilhelm Gericke bringing on 85 of his players, headed by Prof. Willy Hess, the distinguished concert-meister, who was the soloist at the first orchestra concert, given last October.

For next Monday evening Mr. Gericke has not been content to offer a single soloist, but has announced two in addition to the famous orchestra he is bringing here. Miss Edyth Walker, the favorite mezzo-soprano of the Metropolitan Opera House, and Miss Elsa Ruegger, the most distinguished woman cellist now before the public.

Success has characterized the career of the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the quarter of a century it has existed, artistic success from the first, financial success for a long time, while the orchestra is counted the greatest in America and one of the finest in the world.

Boston is justly proud of its famous organization, but, alive to the fact that the only way to arouse musical enthusiasm in America is to give the country the best, it is not slow to lend its great organization to other cities from time to time. For years Buffalo has been clamoring for the orchestra, but this season is the first in which an attempt to arrange a series of concerts has been successful.

In the extraordinary press of symphony concerts which has characterized the present season in New York City, the Boston Symphony Orchestra has more than held its own. It has happened that there has never been less than six orchestral concerts in Carnegie Hall each time the Boston Orchestra has gone to that city this season, and one week—in January—there were nine. This makes competition and when the opera is considered, it is seen that even a great, rich city like New York has reached the point of safety. And yet the Boston Symphony Orchestra has had larger patronage than ever before in its history. This is a most remarkable tribute.

Buffalo, too, has been quick to appreciate the musical treat presented in two concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in one season and the seat sale for the second and last concert has been gratifyingly large. It is now in progress at the Denton, Cottier & Daniels' music store.

Conductor Gericke has prepared many beautiful programs, but he has exceeded himself in the musical feast he has arranged for Buffalo next Monday night, which beyond any question completely eclipses any previous one the orchestra has ever presented here.

The program in its entirety is as follows:

Concert Overture, "In the Spring," A major, Op. 36 .....Goldmark
Eglantine's Recitative and Aria from "Euryanthe," "Er konnte mich um sie verschmah'n" .....Weber
Miss Edyth Walker.
Concerto in A minor, No. 1, for violoncello and orchestra, Op 33....
..... Saint-Saens
1. Allegro non troppo
2. Allegretto con moto
3. Come prima
Miss Elsa Ruegger.
Bacchanale from "Tannhauser," Act I ..... Wagner
Songs with pianoforte—
1. Die Ehre Gottes in der Natur....
..... Beethoven
2. An die Leier .....Schubert
3. Roeselein ..... Schumann
4. Meine Liebe ist gruen.....Brahms
Miss Edyth Walker.
Symphony, No. 4, in F minor, Op 36...
..... Tschaikowsky
1. Andante sostenuto
Moderato con anima in movimento di valse
2. Andantino in modo di cansona
3. Scherzo, "Pizzicato ostinate"; Allegro
4. Finale: Allegro con fuoco.

BUFFALO, N. Y.
FEB 17 1906

FINE CONCERT TO BE GIVEN BY THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

A fine concert is to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Convention Hall, Monday evening next, and the seat sale, now in progress at the Denton, Cottier & Daniels music store, is very large, indicating that Buffalonians appreciate the opportunity of hearing this splendid organization for a second time this season. Conductor Wilhelm Gericke and his concert meister, Prof. Willy Hess, arrive here tomorrow, the orchestra, numbering 85, coming from New York by special train. The soloists for the concert are Miss Edyth Walker, the famous mezzo of the New York Metropolitan Opera House, and Elsa Ruegger, the greatest woman 'cellist now before the public. The program arranged by Conductor Gericke for Monday night is beyond any question the finest and most varied ever presented here by the greatest orchestra in America.

[174]

SOLOists [illegible]

Boston Symphony [illegible] Walker and Manager Delight a Large Audience—Gericke Masterly Conductor.

PROGRAMME FULL OF MUSICAL TREATS

Two concerts by first-class orchestras in one week was the situation which faced Buffalo music-lovers for some time past. Pessimists predicted an empty house for one, or at least a failure for both, but predictions proved false in one case and are almost sure to be defeated in the other.

Convention Hall was well filled last evening on the occasion of the second and last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Wilhelm Gericke conductor. Although the conductor appeared on the stage promptly at 8:15 o'clock, the audience was nearly all seated and only a few remained standing during the first number.

For those who love the truly classical in music, there can be no organization more satisfying than the Boston Symphony Orchestra. All thought of technical equipment on the part of the players is forgotten, as each is a finished artist in his chosen line, and the ensemble work is perfect. Beauty of tone on strings, brasses and woodwinds, nice balance and beautiful shading are the qualities of this fine body which combine to make a perfect whole. There is no straining after bizarre effect, only a sincere effort on the part of conductor and players to present in the most perfect way possible the musical intentions of the composer.

THE PROGRAMME.

The Goldmark Concert Overture in A Major, "In the Spring," was the opening number. A rich, highly colored piece of musical writing named "Spring" is this composition of Goldmark. The overture begins with an allegro movement and a delightful theme which changes into various keys. Four themes are worked out in the overture in brilliant succession, each one treated with an originality and freshness which is strongly suggestive of its name. Although the Tschaikowsky Symphony in F. Minor No. 4 was the most important number on the programme, it did not surpass in beauty or interest the Bacchanale music from Tannhauser. This music, though familiar, has never been more beautifully presented in Buffalo. The work of the strings and the soft, veiled tones of the woodwinds made an irresistible combination.

The Tschaikowsky Symphony closed the programme and proved to be deeply interesting, as it is a composition characteristic of Tschaikowsky. The first and second movements are noble and intricate in construction. The scherzo or third movement is a pizzicato and is delightfully dainty in character, and the finale is a wild rondo in which the themes are repeated in varied forms.

TWO FINE SOLOISTS.

The management of the concert was particularly generous in providing two first-class soloists for the occasion. Miss Edyth Walker, mezzo soprano, a member of the Metropolitan Grand Opera Company, appeared twice on the programme, singing for her first number an aria from Euryanthe by Von Weber, and later a group of songs by Beethoven, Schubert, Schumann and Brahms. Miss Walker has a powerful voice of lucious quality in middle and lower register. Although her top notes are resonant and true they have a hard, metallic ring, which is not at all times musical. Her singing of the aria was entirely satisfactory, and the songs were given with nice finish.

Miss Elsa Ruegger, the 'cello soloist, filled in every respect the expectations of those who had heard good things about her work. In the Saint-Saens Concerto for 'cello in A Minor, she displayed all the qualities which prove the master musician. She has a large, sympathetic tone and fine technique, and her presentation of the Concerto was scholarly. The orchestral support was, of course, excellent.

Max Zach, a member of the orchestra, played the singer's accompaniments in fine style.

EXPRESS
FEB 11 1906

The Boston Symphony Orchestra leaves Boston today on its fourth regular monthly trip, which will bring it to this city for its second concert here on Monday night, February 19th, in Convention Hall. Tomorrow night it plays in Philadelphia, on Tuesday in Washington, on Wednesday in Baltimore, on Thursday and Saturday in New York and on Friday in Brooklyn. Mr. Gericke and Willy Hess will come on to Buffalo next Saturday evening, in order to have a rest after the arduous labors of the week.

The sale of seats for this concert will open at the Denton, Cottier & Daniels music store tomorrow morning at 9 o'clock. The prospects are favorable for an audience of even larger size than that of the October concert. This will be due not only to the season, which is better fitted for concert going than October, but the impression made then by the superb performance of the orchestra will carry its weight, and the programme provided for this concert will attract all music-lovers. With two soloists, Edyth Walker and Elsa Ruegger, a rich feast is promised. The programme follows:

Overture, In the Spring ..... Goldmark
Aria .....
Miss Walker.
Concerto, No. 1, for violoncello, in A minor ..... Saint-Saens
Miss Elsa Ruegger.
Bacchanale, from Tannhauser ..... Wagner
Miss Walker.
Aria .....
Symphony, No. 4, in F minor ..Tschaikowsky

Romances are so often written about great musical works that it is difficult generally to sift the true from the false that endure the longest, as, for example, the apocryphal tale about the so-called Moonlight sonata of Beethoven. But the charming romance which is connected with the fourth symphony of Tschaikowsky, which will be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its second Buffalo concerto on February 19th, comes to us from the composer himself, contained in the letters he wrote to Frau von Meck. In the later '70s, when the world was black for Tschaikowsky, Frau von Meck, a very rich Russian woman, settled on him a pension of $3,000 a year which kept him in comfort and left him free from the drudgery of teaching until his own income was sufficient.

For thirteen years this man and woman were most intimate friends, yet never in that time did they meet or speak to each other. Their whole intercourse was confined to letters, in which they poured forth their most intimate thoughts, and Tschaikowsky's have been given by his brother to the public. The friendship came suddenly to an end with bitterness on both sides, but later Tschaikowsky realized that the wrong which he felt his patroness had done him in reproaching him for accepting her money, was due entirely to the mental condition which presaged her death.

Tschaikowsky dedicated this fourth symphony to Frau von Meck. It was always his favorite symphony, and in all his letters to her he calls it "our symphony," for his greatest inspiration came from the woman whom he would never meet for fear that she might not realize the ideal he had formed of her.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
ILLUSTRATED
BUFFALO, N. Y.
FEB 12 1906

SEAT SALE FOR SYMPHONY CONCERT

OPENS THIS MORNING, FOR MUSICAL TREAT TO BE GIVEN NEXT MONDAY NIGHT.

This morning at 9 o'clock, at the Denton, Cottier & Daniels music store, the seat sale opens for the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given at Convention Hall on Monday evening, February 19th. This is the second and last of the concerts to be given in Buffalo this season by the famous organization. Conductor Gericke will bring 85 of his men. The soloists for the occasion will be Miss Edyth Walker, the prima donna soprano of the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, who will sing two arias, and Miss Elsa Ruegger, the famous Belgian cellist.

EXPRESS
BUFFALO, N. Y.
FEB 12 1906

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

This morning at 9 o'clock, at the Denton, Cottier & Daniels music store, the sale of seats opens for the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given at Convention Hall next Monday evening, February 19th.

Conductor Wilhelm Gericke will bring on 85 of his men for this concert, the second and last to be given here this season. The famous organization will add to its own attractions two eminent soloists, Miss Edyth Walker, prima donna soprano of the Metropolitan Opera-House, New York, and Miss Elsa Ruegger, the talented Belgian cellist.

COMMERCIAL.
BUFFALO, N. Y.
FEB 12 1906

HEAVY SALE OF SEATS.

A heavy demand for seats marked the opening of the Boston Symphony Orchestra sale this morning at the Denton, Cottier & Daniels music store, and it looks as if the famous organization would be greeted by an immense audience when it gives its second and last Buffalo concert next Monday evening, February 19th, at Convention Hall.

Not content with bringing on 85 players, Conductor Gericke of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has added two splendid soloists for his Buffalo program, Miss Edyth Walker, prima donna soprano of the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, and Miss Elsa Ruegger, the eminent Belgian cellist.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
ILLUSTRATED TIMES
ress
FEB 11 1906

The Boston Symphony Orchestra leaves Boston today on its fourth regular monthly trip, which will bring it to this city for its second concert here on next Monday night, February 19th, in Convention Hall. Tomorrow night it plays in Philadelphia, Tuesday afternoon in Washington, Wednesday in Baltimore, Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon in New York and Friday evening in Brooklyn. Mr. Gericke and Prof. Willy Hess will come on to Buffalo next Saturday evening, in order to have a quiet rest after the arduous labors of the week.

The sale of seats for this concert will open at the Denton, Cottier and Daniels' music store tomorrow morning at 9 o'clock. The prospects are favorable for an audience of even larger size than that which went to the first concert last October. This will be due, not only to the season which is much better fitted for concert-going than the first week of October, but the impression made then by the superb performance of the orchestra will carry its weight and the program provided for this concert will attract the widest range of music-lovers. With two soloists, Edyth Walker and Elsa Ruegger, a rich feast is promised. The program will be as follows:

Overture, "In the Spring"...Goldmark
Aria .....
Miss Walker.
Concerto, No. 1, for violoncello in A minor.....
Miss Elsa Ruegger.
Bacchanale, from "Tannhauser"..
..... Wagner
Aria .....
Miss Walker.
Symphony, No. 4, in F minor....
..... Tschaikowsky

Romances are so often written about great musical works that it is difficult generally to sift the true from the false and oftenest it is the false that endure the longest, as, for example, the apocryphal tale about the so-called "moonlight" sonata of Beethoven. But the charming romance which is connected with the fourth symphony of Tschaikowsky which will be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its second Buffalo concerto on February 9th, comes to us from the composer himself, contained in the letters he wrote to Frau von Meck. His recently published letters have cleared up much of the mystery which has for so long surrounded the life and death of this wonderfully gifted Russian, and among other things, have explained the strange relations which existed between him and Frau von Meck. In the latter 70s, when the world was black for Tschaikowsky, this Frau von Meck, a very rich Russian woman, settled on him a pension of $3,000 a year, which kept him in comfort and left him free from the drudgery of teaching until his own income was sufficient.

For 13 years this man and woman were most intimate friends and yet never in that time did they ever meet, much less speak to each other. Their whole intercourse was confined to letters, letters in which they poured forth their most intimate thoughts and Tschaikowsky's have been given by his brother to the public. The friendship came suddenly to an end with much bitterness on both sides but later Tschaikowski realized that the great wrong which he felt his patroness had done him in reproaching him for accepting her money, was due entirely to her mental condition which presaged her death.

Tschaikowsky had just begun this fourth symphony when the friendship began and to Frau von Meck it is dedicated. It was always his favorite symphony and in all his letters to her he calls it "our symphony" for his greatest inspiration came from the woman whom he would never meet for fear lest she should not realize the ideal he had formed of her.

COMMERCIAL
BUFFALO, N. Y.
ess
FEB 17 1906

It would seem as if orchestral music had reached its consummation in the program to be presented next Monday night at Convention Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Conductor Wilhelm Gericke bringing on 85 of his players, headed by Prof. Willy Hess, the distinguished concertmeister, who was the soloist at the first orchestra concert, given last October.

For next Monday evening Mr. Gericke has not been content to offer a single soloist, but has announced two in addition to the famous orchestra he is bringing here. Miss Edyth Walker, the favorite mezzo-soprano of the Metropolitan Opera House, and Miss Elsa Ruegger, the most distinguished woman cellist now before the public.

Success has characterized the career of the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the quarter of a century it has existed, artistic success from the first, financial success for a long time, while the orchestra is counted the greatest in America and one of the finest in the world.

Boston is justly proud of its famous organization, but, alive to the fact that the only way to arouse musical enthusiasm in America is to give the country the best, it is not slow to lend its great organization to other cities from time to time. For years Buffalo has been clamoring for the orchestra, but this season is the first in which an attempt to arrange a series of concerts has been successful.

In the extraordinary press of symphony concerts which has characterized the present season in New York City, the Boston Symphony Orchestra has more than held its own. It has happened that there has never been less than six orchestral concerts in Carnegie Hall each time the Boston Orchestra has gone to that city this season, and one week—in January—there were nine. This makes competition and when the opera is considered, it is seen that even a great, rich city like New York has reached the point of satiety. And yet the Boston Symphony Orchestra has had larger patronage than ever before in its history. This is a most remarkable tribute.

Buffalo, too, has been quick to appreciate the musical treat presented in two concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in one season and the seat sale for the second and last concert has been gratifyingly large. It is now in progress at the Denton, Cottier & Daniels' music store.

Conductor Gericke has prepared many beautiful programs, but he has exceeded himself in the musical feast he has arranged for Buffalo next Monday night, which beyond any question completely eclipses any previous one the orchestra has ever presented here.

The program in its entirety is as follows:

Concert Overture, "In the Spring," A major, Op. 36 .....Goldmark
Eglantine's Recitative and Aria from "Euryanthe," "Er konnte mich um sie verschmah'n" .....Weber
Miss Edyth Walker.
Concerto in A minor, No. 1, for violoncello and orchestra, Op 33....
..... Saint-Saens
1. Allegro non troppo
2. Allegretto con moto
3. Come prima
Miss Elsa Ruegger.
Bacchanale from "Tannhauser," Act I ..... Wagner
Songs with pianoforte—
1. Die Ehre Gottes in der Natur....
..... Beethoven
2. An die Leier .....Schubert
3. Roeselein ..... Schumann
4. Meine Liebe ist gruen.....Brahms
Miss Edyth Walker.
Symphony, No. 4, in F minor, Op 36..
..... Tschaikowsky
1. Andante sostenuto
Moderato con anima in movimento di valse
2. Andantino in modo di canzona
3. Scherzo, "Pizzicato ostinate"; Allegro
4. Finale: Allegro con fuoco.

BUFFALO, N. Y.
FEB 17 1906

FINE CONCERT TO BE GIVEN BY THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

A fine concert is to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Convention Hall, Monday evening next, and the seat sale, now in progress at the Denton, Cottier & Daniels music store, is very large, indicating that Buffalonians appreciate the opportunity of hearing this splendid organization for a second time this season. Conductor Wilhelm Gericke and his concert meister, Prof. Willy Hess, arrive here tomorrow, the orchestra, numbering 85, coming from New York by special train. The soloists for the concert are Miss Edyth Walker, the famous mezzo of the New York Metropolitan Opera House, and Elsa Ruegger, the greatest woman 'cellist now before the public. The program arranged by Conductor Gericke for Monday night is beyond any question the finest and most varied ever presented here by the greatest orchestra in America.

[174]

COURIER
BUFFALO, N. Y.
ess
FEB 20 1906

ORCHESTRA AND SOLOISTS CHARM

Boston Symphony, Miss Walker and Miss Ruegger Delight a Large Audience—Gericke Masterly Conductor.

PROGRAMME FULL OF MUSICAL TREATS

Two concerts by first-class orchestras in one week was the situation which faced Buffalo music-lovers for some time past. Pessimists predicted an empty house for one, or at least a failure for both, but predictions proved false in one case and are almost sure to be defeated in the other.

Convention Hall was well filled last evening on the occasion of the second and last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Wilhelm Gericke conductor. Although the conductor appeared on the stage promptly at 8:15 o'clock, the audience was nearly all seated and only a few remained standing during the first number.

For those who love the truly classical in music, there can be no organization more satisfying than the Boston Symphony Orchestra. All thought of technical equipment on the part of the players is forgotten, as each is a finished artist in his chosen line, and the ensemble work is perfect. Beauty of tone on strings, brasses and woodwinds, nice balance and beautiful shading are the qualities of this fine body which combine to make a perfect whole. There is no straining after bizarre effect, only a sincere effort on the part of conductor and players to present in the most perfect way possible the musical intentions of the composer.

THE PROGRAMME.

The Goldmark Concert Overture in A Major, "In the Spring," was the opening number. A rich, highly colored piece of musical writing named "Spring" is this composition of Goldmark. The overture begins with an allegro movement and a delightful theme which changes into various keys. Four themes are worked out in the overture in brilliant succession, each one treated with an originality and freshness which is strongly suggestive of its name. Although the Tschaikowsky Symphony in F. Minor No. 4 was the most important number on the programme, it did not surpass in beauty or interest the Bacchanale music from Tannhauser. This music, though familiar, has never been more beautifully presented in Buffalo. The work of the strings and the soft, veiled tones of the woodwinds made an irresistible combination.

The Tschaikowsky Symphony closed the programme and proved to be deeply interesting, as it is a composition characteristic of Tschaikowsky. The first and second movements are noble and intricate in construction. The scherzo or third movement is a pizzicato and is delightfully dainty in character, and the finale is a wild rondo in which the themes are repeated in varied forms.

TWO FINE SOLOISTS.

The management of the concert was particularly generous in providing two first-class soloists for the occasion. Miss Edyth Walker, mezzo soprano, a member of the Metropolitan Grand Opera Company, appeared twice on the programme, singing for her first number an aria from Euryanthe by Von Weber, and later a group of songs by Beethoven, Schubert, Schumann and Brahms. Miss Walker has a powerful voice of lucious quality in middle and lower register. Although her top notes are resonant and true, they have a hard, metallic ring, which is not at all times musical. Her singing of the aria was entirely satisfactory, and the songs were given with nice finish.

Miss Elsa Ruegger, the 'cello soloist filled in every respect the expectation of those who had heard good things about her work. In the Saint-Saens Concerto for 'cello in A Minor, she displayed all the qualities which prove the master musician. She has a large, sympathetic tone and fine technique, and her presentation of the Concerto was scholarly. The orchestral support was, of course, excellent.

Max Zach, a member of the orchestra, played the singer's accompaniments in fine style.

...City Symphony will use th...

REDUCTION

RATIO

13x

2.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.0 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

150 mm

100 mm

A5

A4

1.0 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.0 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

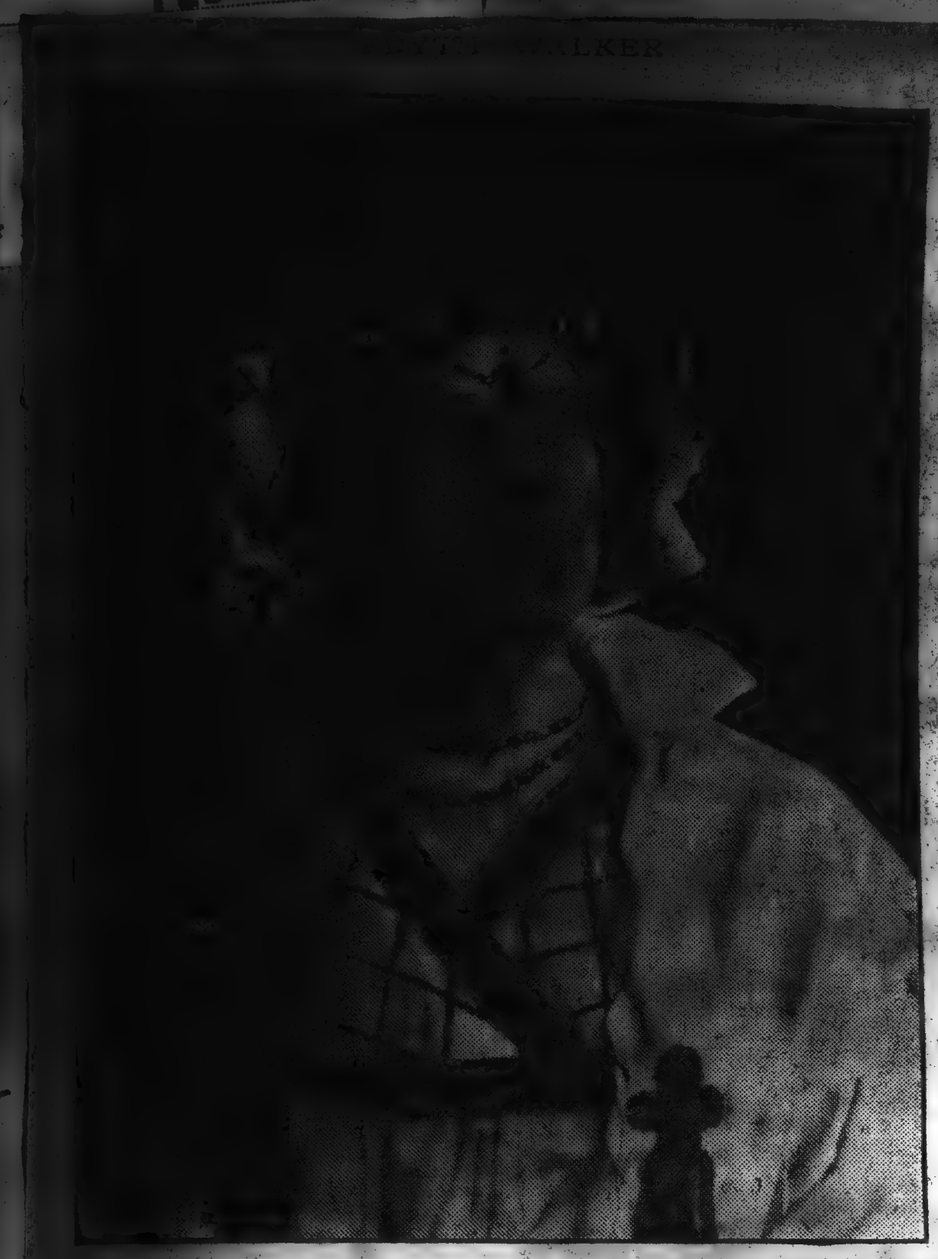
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

4.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

3.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.0 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

FEB 18 1906



Plucky Rome, N. Y., Girl Who Has Gained the First Rank of the World's Sweetest Singers by Hard Work That Would Discourage Most Girls.

THE WONDERFUL SUCCESS OF A PLUCKY ROME, N. Y., GIRL.

Edyth Walker, Whose Voice is Charming the World's Greatest Music Lovers, Had a Hard Struggle to Win Fame and Fortune.

FROM a church choir in the little town of Rome, this State, to the position of leading mezzo-soprano of the most famous opera in Europe and this in less than five years—such is a record seldom made even by plucky and persistent American girls even if Nature has given them a voice of unusual beauty and range. Yet such, in short, is the artistic history of Edyth Walker, the singer who will make her first appearance in Buffalo with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the second concert of that organization which will be given in Convention Hall on Monday evening, Feb. 19. Now in the very prime of life and at the flood-tide of her artistic career, she is ending a three-years' engagement with the Conried Opera Company and is preparing to return to Europe for a series of "guest" performances at the leading opera houses of Germany and Austria.

Miss Walker's career is interesting as an illustration of what a girl of no means save indomitable courage, unquestioning confidence in self and a beautiful voice may accomplish if once she sets about and is willing to work hard and cherishes ever the high artistic ideals that animated her in the beginning. Born and bred in Rome, it was there that her career as a singer began. It was there that she made up her mind that her voice was good enough for better things than church work in a little town. So she went to New York, sang there some and got the interest of some women who ultimately helped her to carry out her plan of foreign study.

Studied in Dresden.

When she got to Dresden, the city she chose, she had not much money, but she made up her mind that she would never return to America except as a successful singer, one who had been truly successful in one of the important operas. A clever, tactful woman, she made friends in the highest court circles of the Saxon capital, for court circles play a mighty part in the matter of operatic engagements on the continent. She worked hard and honestly, but long before she had done all that was needed her money gave out. It might have been possible even then to have secured an engagement in one of the minor German cities but more than most American girls who abroad, she realized that if she career in a small opera prepared, she would a hard house was interest in her suggested one of her rich country-greatest difficulty that arrangements were made by which she could come to Buffalo with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Miss Walker's voice is one of unusual range and unusual beauty. While she is classed among the mezzi soprani, her range in operatic roles extends from those which are truly contralto, such as Amneris in "Aida" and Erda in Wagner's "Ring" up to purely soprano parts such as the Queen in Goldmark's "The Queen of Sheba" and Brunnhilde in the "Ring," roles where the music runs up into the highest altitudes. Her repertory includes Ortrud, Brangaene, Fricka, Erda and Amneris while in the last two years she has added such widely differing roles as Brunnhilde in "Die Walkure," La Cieca in "La Gioconda," Leonora in "La Favorita," and the Queen in "The Queen of Sheba." Her Brunnhilde was one of the great sensations of the recent seasons in New York.

Established and Most Complete Cutting Bureau in the TED
FEB 18 1906

Won Fame Abroad.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give, on Monday night at Convention Hall, its long-heralded second concert. Conductor Gericke brings two eminent soloists here in addition to his own famous organization of 85 men. The soloists are Miss Edyth Walker, prima donna of the Metropolitan Opera House, and Miss Elsa Ruegger, the Belgian 'cellist.

The career of Edyth Walker is of especial interest in America, as is that of any American girl who makes her first success on the other side.

From a church choir in the little town of Rome, N. Y., to the position of leading mezzo-soprano of the most famous opera in Europe, and this in less than five years, is Edyth Walker's record.

She studied in Dresden, where she received every encouragement. At last her money gave out, and, acting on the advice of one interested in her, she wrote to William K. Vanderbilt, whom she had never seen, stating her case. As a consequence Mr. Vanderbilt sent her $1,000, with the request that some day she would sing to him.

She finished her studies and at the end was called to Vienna to take the place about which clung the ineffacable memory of Marianne Brandt. It was a most trying ordeal for a young American singer, but her debut was a triumph, and during the eight years she was with the Imperial Opera she was the favorite of the Viennese public.

In the meantime, Miss Walker had not been confining herself to operatic work. Her song recitals were coming to be most important events, not only in the cities of Austria, but in the critical centers of Berlin, Dresden, Leipsic and Munich. In the spring of 1903 her contract in Vienna having come to an end, she decided that it was time for her to come home and she accepted a three-year engagement with Mr. Conried.

Americans are buying Canada.

(Continued from page 4.)

interest you in our lands, and, if you see anyone who wants to buy, send him to me—I mean any man with good hard

MISS EDYTH WALKER.
Who will sing at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert.

om
dress
te
FEB 14 1906

Seat Sale brisk for the Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert.

That Buffalo was eagerly awaiting the second concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given at Convetion Hall next Monday evening, February 19th, has been exemplified by the large demand for seats, which are now on sale at the music store of Denton, Cottier & Daniels.

Not content with bringing to Buffalo his superb organization of 85 men, Conductor Gericke has also arranged for two eminent soloists to appear with the orchestra, Miss Edyth Walker, the prima donna mezzo-soprano of the Metropolitan Opera House, and Miss Elsa Ruegger, the distinguished Belgian 'cellist.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
om
dress
te
BUFFALO, N.Y.
FEB 14 1906

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

One of the greatest musical organizations in the world, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, comes to Buffalo next Monday evening, Feb. 19, for its second and last concert for the season at Convention Hall. In addition to the orchestra, are two distinguished soloists, Miss Edyth Walker, the favorite mezzo soprano of the New York Metropolitan Opera House, and Miss Elsa Ruegger, the distinguished Belgian 'cellist. The seat sale for the concert is now in progress at the Denton, Cottier & Daniels' music store.

COMMERCIA
FEB 15 1906

WONDERFUL 'CELLIST.

With Boston Symphony Orchestra, Which Gives a Concert Here Next Monday Evening.

Miss Elsa Ruegger, who will be one of the soloists with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its concert in Convention Hall next Monday evening, is unquestionably the foremost woman 'cellist in the world today and as such ranks with the greatest masters of that instrument. She is a young and attractive girl, a Belgian, whose career has been one of uninterrupted success ever since she first began to play in public. This is her third visit to America. Her playing is characterized not merely by a faultless technique but by a tone of peculiar richness, brilliancy and nobility. It seems strange that a slight girl can draw such a beautiful tone from her rather unwieldy instrument. Moreover, she is a musician of highest attainments and plays with musicianly taste and feeling. She will play Saint-Saens' concerto in A minor.

The sale of seats for the Boston Symphony Orchestra is now in progress at the Denton, Cottier & Daniels music store.

[175]

FEB 18 1904

Plucky Rome, N. Y., Girl Who Has Gained the First Rank of the World's Sweetest Singers by Hard Work That Would Discourage Most Girls.

THE WONDERFUL SUCCESS OF A PLUCKY ROME, N. Y., GIRL.

Eayth Walker, Whose Voice is Charming the World's Greatest Music Lovers, Had a Hard Struggle to Win Fame and Fortune.

FROM a church choir in the little town of Rome, this State, to the position of leading mezzo-soprano of the most famous opera in Europe and this in less than five years—such is a record seldom made even by plucky and persistent American girls even if Nature has given them a voice of unusual beauty and range. Yet such, in short, is the artistic history of Edyth Walker, the singer who will make her first appearance in Buffalo with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the second concert of that organization which will be given in Convention Hall on Monday evening, Feb. 19. Now in the very prime of life and at the flood-tide of her artistic career, she is ending a three-years' engagement with the Conried Opera Company and is preparing to return to Europe for a series of "guest" performances at the leading opera houses of Germany and Austria.

Miss Walker's career is interesting as an illustration of what a girl of no means save indomitable courage, unquestioning confidence in self and a beautiful voice may accomplish if once she sets about and is willing to work hard and cherishes ever the high artistic ideals that animated her in the beginning. Born and bred in Rome, it was there that her career as a singer began. It was there that she made up her mind that her voice was good enough for better things than church work in a little town. So she went to New York, sang there some and got the interest of some women who ultimately helped her to carry out her plan of foreign study.

Studied in Dresden.

When she got to Dresden, the city she chose, she had not much money, but she made up her mind that she would never return to America except as a successful singer, one who had been truly successful in one of the important operas. A clever, tactful woman, she made friends in the highest court circles of the Saxon capital, for court circles play a mighty part in the matter of operatic engagements on the continent. She worked hard and honestly, but long before she had done all that was needed her money gave out. It might have been possible even then to have secured an engagement in one of the minor German cities but wiser than most American girls who study abroad, she realized that if she began her career in a small opera house only partly prepared, she would [illegible] and her career as a hard-working singer utterly unknown to the [illegible]ing. Then it happened that one of the princes of the Saxon house who had taken an interest in her suggested that perhaps one of her rich countrymen might advance her the money she needed. She had not much faith in the result, but on the principle of nothing ventured, nothing won, she wrote to William K. Vanderbilt, a man whom she had never seen, and put her case before him. The immediate result was a draft for $1000 with the petition that some day she would sing for him.

This money was sufficient for her to finish her studies and, at their end, she was called to Vienna to take a place about which clung the ineffaceable memory of Marianne Brandt. It was a most trying ordeal for a young American singer, but her debut was a triumph and during the eight years she was with the Imperial Opera she was the favorite of the Viennese public. The training she received there was invaluable, for the principal conductors were such masters of music and stage craft as Hans Richter and Gustav Mahler and when, several years ago Miss Walker was invited to Covent Garden for the season of opera there, her success was as great as it had been on the continent.

In the meantime, Miss Walker had not been confining herself to operatic work. Her song recitals were coming to be most important events not only in the cities of Austria, but in the critical centers of Berlin, Dresden, Leipsic and Munich. In the spring of 1903 her contract in Vienna having come to an end, she decided that it was time for her to come home and she accepted a three years' engagement with Mr. Conried. Her work at the Metropolitan Opera House has been so engrossing that she has had [illegible] for concert engagements in [illegible]ny and it was only with the greatest difficulty that arrangements were made by which she could come to Buffalo with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Miss Walker's voice is one of unusual range and unusual beauty. While she is classed among the mezzi soprani, her range in operatic roles extends from those which are truly contralto, such as Amneris in "Aida" and Erda in Wagner's "Ring" up to purely soprano parts such as the Queen in Goldmark's "The Queen of Sheba" and Brunnhilde in the "Ring," roles where the music runs up into the highest altitudes. Her repertory includes Ortrud, Brangaene, Fricka, Erda and Amneris while in the last two years she has added such widely differing roles as Brunnhilde in "Die Walkure," La Cieca in "La Gioconda," Leonora in "La Favorita," and the Queen in "The Queen of Sheba." Her Brunnhilde was one of the great sensations of the recent seasons in New York.

Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
EXPRESS
FEB 18 1904

Won Fame Abroad.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give, on Monday night at Convention Hall, its long-heralded second concert. Conductor Gericke brings two eminent soloists here in addition to his own famous organization of 85 men. The soloists are Miss Edyth Walker, prima donna of the Metropolitan Opera House, and Miss Elsa Ruegger, the Belgian 'cellist.

The career of Edyth Walker is of especial interest in America, as is that of any American girl who makes her first success on the other side.

From a church choir in the little town of Rome, N. Y., to the position of leading mezzo-soprano of the most famous opera in Europe, and this in less than five years, is Edyth Walker's record.

She studied in Dresden, where she received every encouragement. At last her money gave out, and, acting on the advice of one interested in her, she wrote to William K. Vanderbilt, whom she had never seen, stating her case. As a consequence Mr. Vanderbilt sent her $1,000, with the request that some day she would sing to him.

She finished her studies and at the end was called to Vienna to take the place about which clung the ineffacable memory of Marianne Brandt. It was a most trying ordeal for a young American singer, but her debut was a triumph, and during the eight years she was with the Imperial Opera she was the favorite of the Viennese public.

In the meantime, Miss Walker had not been confining herself to operatic work. Her song recitals were coming to be most important events, not only in the cities of Austria, but in the critical centers of Berlin, Dresden, Leipsic and Munich. In the spring of 1903 her contract in Vienna having come to an end, she decided that it was time for her to come home and she accepted a three-year engagement with Mr. Conried.

Americans are buying Canada.

(Continued from page 4.)

interest you in our lands, and, if you see anyone who wants to buy, send him to me—I mean any man with good hard

MISS EDYTH WALKER.
Who will sing at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert.

MISS ELSA RUEGGE
Will play at the Boston Sym

om.....
dress.....
te.....

Seat Sale brisk for the Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert.

That Buffalo was eagerly awaiting the second concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given at Convetion Hall next Monday evening, February 19th, has been exemplified by the large demand for seats, which are now on sale at the music store of Denton, Cottier & Daniels.

Not content with bringing to Buffalo his superb organization of 85 men, Conductor Gericke has also arranged for two eminent soloists to appear with the orchestra, Miss Edyth Walker, the prima donna mezzo-soprano of the Metropolitan Opera House, and Miss Elsa Ruegger, the distinguished Belgian 'cellist.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
m.....
dress.....
te.....

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

One of the greatest musical organizations in the world, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, comes to Buffalo next Monday evening, Feb. 19, for its second and last concert for the season at Convention Hall. In addition to the orchestra are two distinguished soloists, Miss Edyth Walker, the favorite mezzo soprano of the New York Metropolitan Opera House, and Miss Elsa Ruegger, the distinguished Belgian 'cellist. The seat sale for the concert is now in progress at the Denton, Cottier & Daniels' music store.

WONDERFUL 'CELLIST.

With Boston Symphony Orchestra, Which Gives a Concert Here Next Monday Evening.

Miss Elsa Ruegger, who will be one of the soloists with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its concert in Convention Hall next Monday evening, is unquestionably the foremost woman 'cellist in the world today and as such ranks with the greatest masters of that instrument. She is a young and attractive girl, a Belgian, whose career has been one of uninterrupted success ever since she first began to play in public. This is her third visit to America. Her playing is characterized not merely by a faultless technique but by a tone of peculiar richness, brilliancy and nobility. It seems strange that a slight girl can draw such a beautiful tone from her rather unwieldy instrument. Moreover, she is a musician of highest attainments and plays with musicianly taste and feeling. She will play Saint-Saens' concerto in A minor.

The sale of seats for the Boston Symphony Orchestra is now in progress at the Denton, Cottier & Daniels music store.

[175]

REDUCTION

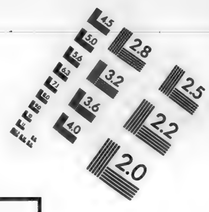
RATIO

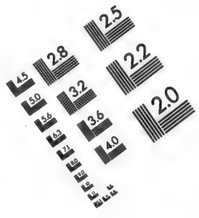
12x

2.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

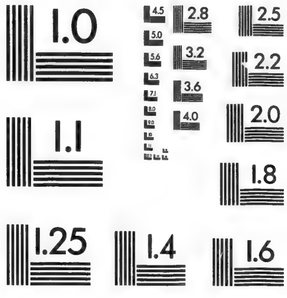
PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC





150 mm

100 mm



1.0 mm

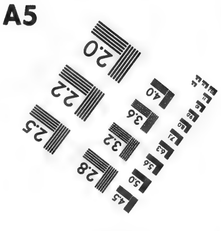
1.5 mm

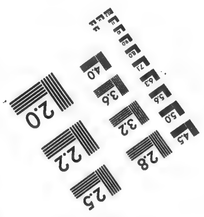
2.0 mm

2.5 mm

A5

A4



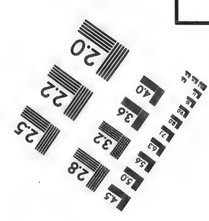


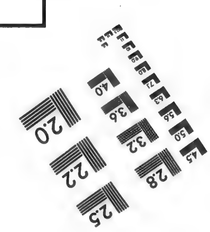
PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119





ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

4.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ

3.0 mm

MISS ELSA RUEGGER, THE CELLIST.
Will play at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert.

NEWS
BUFFALO, N. Y.
FEB 18 1906

The Boston Symphony Orchestra a Big Attraction

The very bold experiment of bringing the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Buffalo twice in a season will find its ultimate justification tomorrow evening, when that famous organization, under Mr. Gericke, will give its second concert in Convention Hall. The Boston Orchestra is, in a sense, an expensive luxury, since it costs so much to bring it so far from its home city. In the years it has been spreading its evangel of art it has built up for itself a clientele so numerous and so loyal that it requires much to tempt it to stray far from its beaten path. Moreover, it is such a very expensive organization, by far the most expensive orchestra in the world, that figures which are attractive to younger orchestras mean loss to it. But so handsome has been the support given to the guarantors of these concerts that it is now fairly certain that two visits by the Boston Symphony will be a feature of every musical season in Buffalo.

Great pains has been taken by Mr. Gericke to make the program for this second concert as attractive as possible and there seems to be no doubt that he has succeeded. There will be two soloists, Miss Edyth Walker, first mezzo of the Metropolitan Opera Company, who comes through special arrangement with Mr. Conried, and Elsa Ruegger, the young Belgian 'cellist who was the soloist with the orchestra at the Boston concerts of the 9th and 10th. There is a certain school of extremists which holds that the symmetry of an orchestral concert—or rather of a symphony concert—should not be broken by the presence of a soloist. But the public has as yet refused to endorse this idea in America, in England or even in Germany, and it is therefore always the effort with program makers to get as attractive soloists as possible and yet have them fit perfectly into the program, the purpose of the soloist being chiefly to lend contrast to a program.

This will be accomplished tomorrow evening. Both Miss Walker and Miss Ruegger are artists of the first rank and their numbers have been most happily chosen. Miss Walker, who is a true exponent of the rapidly disappearing "grand style" of singing has chosen a rarely heard recitative and scena from Weber's "Euryanthe," an opera of which practically only the overture is now known to the concert-going public. Big with dramatic content, full of the broad melody which characterized the composer, it gives a great singer with a great voice splendid opportunity to display her art. Only such a singer dare attempt any of these great scenes of Weber with any hope of success. In the four songs Miss Walker will sing are four distinct moods. Short as it is, the Beethoven song mirrors profound religious belief. The Schubert song is one of ecstasy; the Schumann, bright and homely; and the Brahms song is a superb expression of passionate love.

Miss Ruegger will play Saint-Saens' concerto for violoncello in A minor, Op. 33, one of the most grateful works in the literature of that instrument. While it gives the executant ample opportunity for the display of the dazzling technique of which she is capable, it is full of melody which displays the finest qualities of the instrument.

The orchestral numbers will be three. First will be Goldmark's overture "In the Spring," tuneful, bright and charming, full of the season whose moods it seeks to portray. The second orchestral number will be the Bacchanale from the first act of the Paris version of "Tannhaeuser," that extraordinary ballet which turned the ballet forces of the grand opera topsy turvy and had not a little to do with the disorders which attended the fiasco of the opera when it was first produced in Paris in 1861. Of it may be said that it has inspired more minor poets to waste midnight oil than any other scene in any other opera.

The final number will be Tschaikowsky's fourth symphony in F minor, a work which to the day of his death was the composer's favorite, not merely because of the sentiment which surrounded its making, but because he felt that his inspiration was freshest and most spontaneous in it. Of his three great symphonies, this, the fifth and the sixth, this one is generally the least known although this year it has had more performances in New York than any other symphony, due probably to the extraordinary tribute paid to Mr. Gericke and the orchestra when they played it at their first concert in Carnegie Hall last November. After the entrancing third movement the applause was so long and so vociferous that Mr Gericke compelled the men in the orchestra to rise from their seats and acknowledge it. The program in full is as follows:

Goldmark—Concert Overture, "In the Spring," A major, Op. 36.

Weber—Eglantine's Recitative and Aria from "Euryanthe," "Er konnte mich um sie verschumaeh'n."
Miss Edyth Walker.

Saint-Saens—Concerto in A minor, No. 1, for Violoncello and Orchestra, Op. 33.
I. Allegro non troppo.
II. Allegretto con moto.
III. Come prima.
Miss Elsa Ruegger.

Wagner—Bacchanale from "Tannhauser," Act I.

Songs with Pianoforte—
I. Beethoven—Die Ehre Gottes in der Natur.
II. Schubert—An die Leier.
III. Schumann—Roeselein.
IV. Brahms—Meine Liebe ist gruen.
Miss Edyth Walker.

Tschaikowsky—Symphony, No. 4, in F minor, Op. 34.
I. Andante sostenuto; moderato con anima in movimento di valse.
II. Andantino in modo di canzona.
III. Scherzo, "Pizzicato ostinato"; Allegro.
IV. Finale: Allegro con fuoco.

ELSA RUEGGER.

'Cellist Who Comes to Buffalo This Week With the Boston Symphony.

ATED TIMES.
FEB 18 1906

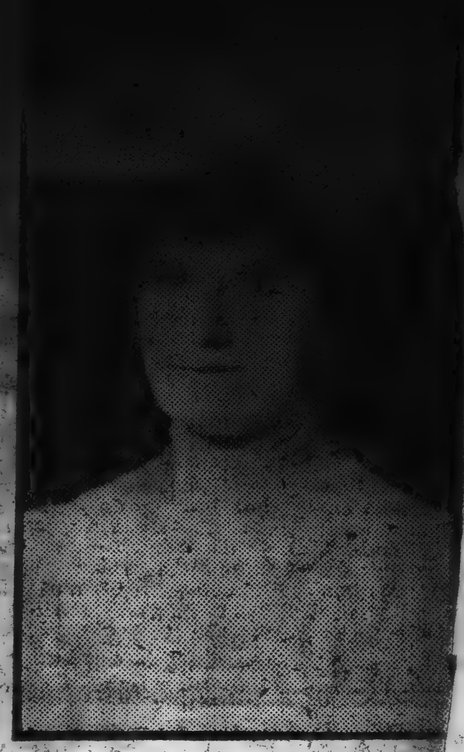
IN THE MUSICAL WORLD

The very bold experiment of bringing the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Buffalo twice in a season will find its ultimate justification tomorrow evening when that famous organization, under Mr. Gericke, will give its second concert in Convention Hall. The Boston Orchestra is, in a sense, an expensive luxury since it costs so much to bring it so far from its home city. In the years it has been spreading its evangel of art, it has built up for itself a clientele so numerous and so loyal that it requires much to tempt it to stray far from its beaten path. Moreover, it is such a very expensive organization, by far the most expensive orchestra in the world, that figures which are attractive to younger orchestras mean loss to it. But so handsome has been the support given to the guarantors of these concerts that it is now fairly certain that two visits by the Boston Symphony will be a feature of every musical season in Buffalo.

Great pains have been taken by Mr. Gericke to make the program for this second concert as attractive as possible and there seems to be no doubt that he has succeeded. There will be two soloists, Miss Edyth Walker, first mezzo of the Metropolitan Opera Company, who comes through special arrangement with Mr. Conried, and Elsa Ruegger, the young Belgian 'cellist, who was the soloist with the orchestra at the Boston concerts of the 9th and 10th. There is a certain school of extremists, of which perhaps Mr. Felix Weingartner is the most distinguished disciple, which holds that the symmetry of an orchestral concert—or rather of a symphony concert—should not be broken by the presence of a soloist. But the public has as yet refused to endorse this idea in America, in England, or even in Germany, and it is, therefore, always the effort with program makers to get as attractive soloists as possible and yet have them fit perfectly into the program, the purpose of the soloist being chiefly to lend contrast to a program.

This will be accomplished tomorrow evening. Both Miss Walker and Miss Ruegger are artists of the first rank and their numbers have been most happily chosen. Miss Walker, who is a

MISS ELSA RUEGGER.
The gifted young 'cellist who will appear with the Boston Symphony Orchestra tomorrow evening.



MISS EDYTH WALKER.
Metropolitan singer who will appe with the Boston Symphony Orches tomorrow evening at Conventi Hall.

true exponent of the rapidly disappea ing "grand style" of singing, h chosen a rarely heard recitative a scene from Weber's "Euryanthe," a opera of which practically only t overture is now known to the concer going public. Big with dramatic co tent, full of the broad melody whi characterized the composer, it gives great singer with a great voice spl did opportunity to display her art. On such a singer dare attempt any of th great scenes of Weber with any ho of success. In the four songs Mi Walker will sing are four distin moods. Short as it is, the Beethov song mirrors profound religious beli The Schubert song is one of ecsta the Schumann, bright and homely, an the Brahms song is a superb expressio of passionate love.

Miss Ruegger will play Saint Saen concerto for violoncello in A minor, O 33, one of the most graceful works i the literature of that instrument. Whil it gives the executant ample opportun ity for the display of the dazzling tec nique of which she is capable, it is fu of melody which displays the fine qualities of the instrument.

The program in full is as follows:

Concert Overture, "In the Spring," A major, Op. 36. . Goldmar
Eglantine's Recitative and Aria from "Euryanthe," "Er konnte mich um sie verschmaeh'n" ..... Webe
Miss Edyth Walker.
Concerto in A minor, No. 1, for violoncello and orchestra, Op. 33 ..... Saint-Saens
1. Allegro non troppo.
2. Allegretto con moto.
3. Come prima.
Miss Elsa Ruegger.
Bacchanale from "Tannhauser," Act I. ..... Wagner
Songs with Pianoforte—
a. "Die Ehre Gottes in der Natur" ..... Beethoven
b. "An die Leier" ..... Schubert
c. "Roeselein" ..... Schumann
d. "Meine Liebe ist gruen" . Brahms
Miss Edyth Walker.
Symphony No. 4, in F minor, Op. 36 ..... Tschaikowsky
1. Andante sostenuto; moderato con anima in movimento di valse.
2. Andantino in modo di canzona.
3. Scherzo, "Pizzicato ostinato"; Allegro.
4. Finale: Allegro con fuoco.

Brine

ss ...

FEB 15 190

Miss Edyth Walker, the great mezzo who will make her debut in Buffalo with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Convention Hall on Monday evening next, will be heard in two phases of her art. Her first number will be Eglantine's great recitative and scena from Weber's "Euryanthe." For her second number she has chosen four songs with piano accompaniment—"Roeselein" and Brahm's "Meine Liebe ist grun." In these songs and in the aria practically the whole range of the dramatic soprano is displayed. The sale of seats is now in progress at the Denton, Cottier & Daniels music store.

188 aper Cutting Bureau in the W

TIMES
BUFFALO, N. Y.
FEB 15 1906

Miss Elsa Ruegger, who will be one of the soloists with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its concert in Convention Hall on next Monday evening is unquestionably the foremost woman 'cellist in the world today and as such ranks with the greatest masters of that instrument. She is a young and attractive girl, a Belgian, whose career has been one of uninterrupted success ever since she first began to play in public. This is her third visit to America. The seat sale for the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert is now in progress at Denton, Cottier & D... music store.

[176]

NEWS

FEB 16 1908

The Boston Symphony Orchestra a Big Attraction

The very bold experiment of bringing the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Buffalo twice in a season will find its ultimate justification tomorrow evening, when that famous organization, under Mr. Gericke, will give its second concert in Convention Hall. The Boston Orchestra is, in a sense, an expensive luxury, since it costs so much to bring it so far from its home city. In the years it has been spreading its evangel of art it has built up for itself a clientele so numerous and so loyal that it requires much to tempt it to stray far from its beaten path. Moreover, it is such a very expensive organization, by far the most expensive orchestra in the world, that figures which are attractive to younger orchestras mean loss to it. But so handsome has been the support given to the guarantors of these concerts that it is now fairly certain that two visits by the Boston Symphony will be a feature of every musical season in Buffalo.

Great pains has been taken by Mr. Gericke to make the program for this second concert as attractive as possible and there seems to be no doubt that he has succeeded. There will be two soloists, Miss Edyth Walker, first mezzo of the Metropolitan Opera Company, who comes through special arrangement with Mr. Conried, and Elsa Ruegger, the young Belgian 'cellist, who was the soloist with the orchestra at the Boston concerts of the 9th and 10th. There is a certain school of extremists which holds that the symmetry of an orchestral concert—or rather of a symphony concert—should not be broken by the presence of a soloist. But the public has as yet refused to endorse this idea in America, in England or even in Germany, and it is therefore always the effort with program makers to get as attractive soloists as possible and yet have them fit perfectly into the program, the purpose of the soloist being chiefly to lend contrast to a program.

This will be accomplished tomorrow evening. Both Miss Walker and Miss Ruegger are artists of the first rank and their numbers have been most happily chosen. Miss Walker, who is a true exponent of the rapidly disappearing "grand style" of singing has chosen a rarely heard recitative and scena from Weber's "Euryanthe," an opera of which practically only the overture is now known to the concert-going public. Big with dramatic content, full of the broad melody which characterized the composer, it gives a great singer with a great voice splendid opportunity to display her art. Only such a singer dare attempt any of these great scenes of Weber with any hope of success. In the four songs Miss Walker will sing are four distinct moods. Short as it is, the Beethoven song mirrors profound religious belief. The Schubert song is one of ecstasy; the Schumann, bright and homely; and the Brahms song is a superb expression of passionate love.

Miss Ruegger will play Saint-Saens' concerto for violoncello in A minor, Op. 33, one of the most grateful works in the literature of that instrument. While it gives the executant ample opportunity for the display of the dazzling technique of which she is capable, it is full of melody which displays the finest qualities of the instrument.

The orchestral numbers will be three. First will be Goldmark's overture "In the Spring," tuneful, bright and charming, full of the season whose moods it seeks to portray. The second orchestral number wil be the Bacchanale from the first act of the Paris version of "Tannhaeuser," that extraordinary ballet which turned the ballet forces of the grand opera topsy turvy and had not a little to do with the disorders which attended the fiasco of the opera when it was first produced in Paris in 1861. Of it may be said that it has inspired more minor poets to waste midnight oil than any other scene in any other opera.

The final number will be Tschaikowsky's fourth symphony in F minor, a work which to the day of his death was the composer's favorite, not merely because of the sentiment which surrounded its making, but because he felt that his inspiration was freshest and most spontaneous in it. Of his three great symphonies, this, the fifth and the sixth, this one is generally the least known although this year it has had more performances in New York than any other symphony, due probably to the extraordinary tribute paid to Mr. Gericke and the orchestra when they played it at their first concert in Carnegie Hall last November. After the entrancing third movement the applause was so long and so vociferous that Mr Gericke compelled the men in the orchestra to rise from their seats and acknowledge it. The program in full is as follows:

Goldmark—Concert Overture, "In the Spring," A major, Op. 36.

Weber—Eglantine's Recitative and Aria from "Euryanthe," "Er konnte mich um sie verschumaeh'n."

Miss Edyth Walker.

Saint-Saens—Concerto in A minor, No. 1, for Violoncello and Orchestra, Op. 33.

I. Allegro non troppo.
II. Allegretto con moto.
III. Come prima.

Miss Elsa Ruegger.

Wagner—Bacchanale from "Tannhaeuser," Act I.

Songs with Pianoforte—

I. Beethoven—Die Ehre Gottes in der Natur.
II. Schubert—An die Leier.
III. Schumann—Roeselein.
IV. Brahms—Meine Liebe ist gruen,

Miss Edyth Walker.

Tschaikowsky—Symphony, No. 4, in F minor, Op 36.

I. Andante sostenuto. Moderato con anima in movimento di valse.
II. Andantino in modo da canzona.
III. Scherzo, "Pizzicato ostinato;" Allegro.
IV. Finale—Allegro con fuoco.

ELSA RUEGGER.

'Cellist Who Comes to Buffalo This Week With the Boston Symphony.

ATED TIMES.

1908

IN THE MUSICAL WORLD

MISS ELSA RUEGGER.

The gifted young 'cellist who will appear with the Boston Symphony Orchestra tomorrow evening.

The very bold experiment of bringing the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Buffalo twice in a season will find its ultimate justification tomorrow evening when that famous organization, under Mr. Gericke, will give its second concert in Convention Hall. The Boston Orchestra is, in a sense, an expensive luxury since it costs so much to bring it so far from its home city. In the years it has been spreading its evangel of art, it has built up for itself a clientele so numerous and so loyal that it requires much to tempt it to stray far from its beaten path. Moreover, it is such a very expensive organization, by far the most expensive orchestra in the world, that figures which are attractive to younger orchestras mean loss to it. But so handsome has been the support given to the guarantors of these concerts that it is now fairly certain that two visits by the Boston Symphony will be a feature of every musical season in Buffalo.

Great pains have been taken by Mr. Gericke to make the program for this second concert as attractive as possible and there seems to be no doubt that he has succeeded. There will be two soloists, Miss Edyth Walker, first mezzo of the Metropolitan Opera Company, who comes through special arrangement with Mr. Conried, and Elsa Ruegger, the young Belgian 'cellist, who was the soloist with the orchestra at the Boston concerts of the 9th and 10th. There is a certain school of extremists, of which perhaps Mr. Felix Weingartner is the most distinguished disciple, which holds that the symmetry of an orchestral concert—or rather of a symphony concert—should not be broken by the presence of a soloist. But the public has as yet refused to endorse this idea in America, in England, or even in Germany, and it is, therefore, always the effort with program makers to get as attractive soloists as possible and yet have them fit perfectly into the program, the purpose of the soloist being chiefly to lend contrast to a program.

This will be accomplished tomorrow evening. Both Miss Walker and Miss Ruegger are artists of the first rank and their numbers have been most happily chosen. Miss Walker, who is a true exponent of the rapidly disappea ing "grand style" of singing, h chosen a rarely heard recitative a scene from Weber's "Euryanthe," a opera of which practically only t overture is now known to the concer going public. Big with dramatic co tent, full of the broad melody whic characterized the composer, it gives great singer with a great voice sple did opportunity to display her art. On such a singer dare attempt any of the great scenes of Weber with any ho of success. In the four songs Mi Walker will sing are four distin moods. Short as it is, the Beethov song mirrors profound religious belie The Schubert song is one of ecstas the Schumann, bright and homely, an the Brahms song is a superb expressio of passionate love.

MISS EDYTH WALKER.

Metropolitan singer who will appe with the Boston Symphony Orchest tomorrow evening at Conventi Hall.

Miss Ruegger will play Saint Saen concerto for violoncello in A minor, O 33, one of the most graceful works i the literature of that instrument. Whi it gives the executant ample opportun ity for the display of the dazzling tech nique of which she is capable, it is fu of melody which displays the fine qualities of the instrument.

The program in full is as follows:

Concert Overture, "In the Spring," A major, Op. 36...Goldmar
Eglantine's Recitative and Aria from "Euryanthe," "Er konnte mich um sie verschmaeh'n" ..... Webe
Miss Edyth Walker.
Concerto in A minor, No. 1, for violoncello and orchestra, Op. 33 ..... Saint-Saens
1. Allegro non troppo.
2. Allegretto con moto.
3. Come prima.
Miss Elsa Ruegger.
Bacchanale from "Tannhauser," Act I. ..... Wagner
Songs with Pianoforte—
a. "Die Ehre Gottes in der Natur" ..... Beethoven
b. "An die Leier".....Schubert
c. "Roeselein" ..... Schumann
d. "Meine Liebe ist gruen"..Brahms
Miss Edyth Walker.
Symphony No. 4, in F minor, Op. 36 .....Tschaikowsky
1. Andante sostenuto; moderato con anima in movimento di valse.
2. Andantino in modo di canzona.
3. Scherzo, "Pizzicato ostinato"; Allegro.
4. Finale: Allegro con fuoco.

ess .....

Miss Edyth Walker, the great mezzo who will make her debut in Buffalo with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Convention Hall on Monday evening next, will be heard in two phases of her art. Her first number will be Eglantine's great recitative and scena from Weber's "Euryanthe." For her second number she has chosen four songs with piano accompaniment—"Roeselein" and Brahm's "Meine Liebe Ist grun." In these songs and in the aria practically the whole range of the dramatic soprano is displayed. The sale of seats is now in progress at the Denton, Cottier & Daniels music store.

188 aper Cutting Bureau in the World

TIMES.

BUFFALO, N. Y.

FEB 15 1908

Miss Elsa Ruegger, who will be one of the soloists with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its concert in Convention Hall on next Monday evening, is unquestionably the foremost woman 'cellist in the world today and as such ranks with the greatest masters of that instrument. She is a young and attractive girl, a Belgian, whose career has been one of uninterrupted success ever since she first began to play in public. This is her third visit to America. The seat sale for the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert is now in progress at Denton, Cottier & Daniels' music store.

[76]

FEB 18 1906

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

University of Buffalo Concert—A Union of the allied Arts—Pinafore to be sung in May under Mr. Dempsey's Direction.

TWO GREAT ORCHESTRAL CONCERTS

bold experiment of bringing the Symphony Orchestra to Buffalo a season will find its justification tomorrow evening when that organization, under Mr. Gericke, will give its second concert in Convention Hall. The Boston orchestra is an exclusive luxury since it costs so much to bring it far from its home city. In years it has been spreading its fame of art, it has built up for itself a clientele so numerous and so loyal that it requires much to tempt it to go far from its beaten path. Moreover, it is such a very expensive organization, by far the most expensive orchestra in the world, that figures which are attractive to younger orchestras mean loss to it. But so handsome has been the support given to the guarantors of these concerts that it is now pretty certain that two visits by the Boston Symphony will be a feature of every musical season in Buffalo.

Mr. Gericke has taken great pains to make the programme for this second concert as attractive as possible. There will be two soloists, Miss Edyth Walker of the Metropolitan Opera Company, who comes through special arrangement with Mr. Conried, and Elsa Ruegger, the young Belgian 'cellist who was the solist with the orchestra at the Boston concerts of the ninth and tenth. There is a certain school of extremists, of which perhaps, Felix Weingartner is the most distinguished disciple, which holds that the symmetry of a symphony concert should not be broken by the presence of a soloist. But the public has refused to endorse this view in America, in England or even in Germany, and it is therefore always the effort of programme-makers to get as attractive soloists as possible and yet have them fit perfectly into the programme, the purpose of the soloist being chiefly to lend contrast to a programme.

This will be accomplished tomorrow evening. Both Miss Walker and Miss Ruegger are artists of the first rank and their numbers have been most happily chosen. Miss Walker, who is a true exponent of the grand style of singing, has chosen a rarely heard recitative and aria from Weber's Euryanthe, an opera of which practically only the overture is now known to the concert-going public. Big with dramatic contrast, full of the broad melody which characterized the composer, it gives to the great singer with a great voice splendid opportunity to display her art. Only such a singer dare attempt any of these great scenes of Weber with hope of success. In the four songs Miss Walker will sing, are four distinct moods. The Beethoven song mirrors profound religious belief; the Schubert song is one of fantasy; the Schumann, bright and melody, and the Brahms song is an expression of passionate love.

Miss Ruegger will play Saint-Saens's concerto for violoncello in A minor, op. 33, one of the most grateful works in the literature of that instrument. While it gives the executant ample opportunity for the display of her dazzling technique, it is also full of melody.

The orchestral numbers are three. Goldmark's overture In the Spring, tuneful, bright and charming, is of the season whose moods it seeks to portray. The second will be the Bacchanale from the first act of the Paris version of Tannhauser, that which introduced the ballet forces of the grand opera topsy-turvy and had not a little to do with the disorders which attended the production of the opera when it was first produced in Paris in 1861.

The final number will be Tschaikowsky's fourth Symphony in F minor, a work which, to the day of his death, was the composer's favorite. Of his three great symphonies this one is generally the least known, although this year it has had more performances in New York than any other, due probably to the extraordinary tribute paid to Mr. Gericke and the orchestra when they played it at their concert in Carnegie Hall last November. After the third movement the applause was so long and vociferous that Mr. Gericke compelled the men in the orchestra to rise and acknowledge it. The full programme follows:

Concert overture, In the Spring, A Major, Op. 36 ..... Goldmark

Eglantine's recitative and aria, from Euryanthe, Er konnte mich um sie verschmah'n ..... Weber

Miss Edyth Walker.

Concerto in A minor, No. 1, for violoncello and orchestra, op. 33 ..... Saint-Saens
(a) Allegro non troppe.
(b) Allegretto con moto.
(c) Come prima.

Miss Elsa Ruegger.

Bacchanale, from Tannhauseur, Act 1 ..... Wagner

Songs with pianoforte—
(a) Die Ehre Gottes in der Natur..Beethoven
(b) An die Leier ..... Schubert
(c) Roeselein ..... Schumann
(d) Meine Liebe ist gruen ..... Brahms

Miss Edyth Walker.

Symphony, No. 4, in F minor, Op. 36 ..... Tschaikowsky
(a) Andante sostenuto; Moderato con anima in movimento di valse.
(b) Andantino in modi di canzona.
(c) Scherzo, pizzicato ostinato; allegro.
(d) Finale, Allegro con fuoco.

COURIER
BUFFALO, N. Y.
FEB 19 1906

BOSTON'S GREAT ORCHESTRA HERE

Symphony Players Arrive by Special Train and Two Soloists Are Also Here—Conductor Gericke Due This Morning.

FINE PROGRAMME FOR THIS EVENING

Tonight at Convention Hall the Boston Symphony Orchestra gives its second and last concert for the season, and the indications are that Conductor Gericke and his men will appear before a capacity house. The orchestra gave a remarkably successful concert in New York on Saturday night, Mr. Gericke returning to Boston immediately after. He will arrive in Buffalo this morning.

Prof. Willy Hess, the concert meister, who was soloist at the October concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, came here yesterday morning. The two soloists, Miss Edyth Walker, the mezzo soprano prima donna of the Metropolitan Opera House, and Miss Elsa Ruegger, the Belgian 'cellist, also came yesterday.

ORCHESTRA HERE.

Accompaned by F. R. Comee, assistant manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the men came to Buffalo from New York yesterday by special train, reaching here late in the afternoon. Early tomorrow morning the orchestra will leave for Troy, giving a concert in Albany and then going back to Boston.

One of the most brilliant programmes ever presented in this city will be played tonight. It is made up almost entirely of modern music. The concert begins promptly at 8:15 o'clock, and ticket-buyers are asked to be in their seats promptly, as no one will be seated during the opening number. The seat sale for the concert continues through today at the music store of Denton, Cottier & Daniels.

COMMERCIAL.
BUFFALO, N. Y.
FEB 17 1906

...N SYMPHONY'S CONCERT.

...as been a large sale of seats for ... of the Boston Symphony Or... Convention Hall on Monday ... of the largest audi... is expected. ... director of the orches... ...s men, and the solo... Miss Edyth Walk... ...piano of ...

NEWS
BUFFALO, N. Y.
FEB 19 1906

FAMOUS PRIMA DONNA ARRIVES IN BUFFALO

Miss Edythe Walker, Sensation of the Season in Grand Opera in New York, to Sing Here Tonight.

WON FAME ABROAD

Seen This Morning, She Talks About Her Romantic Career and of the Kings and Queens She Has Charmed With Her Wonderful Voice.

Nothing succeeds like success, neither is anything so interesting. The story of Miss EdytheWalker's progress up the ladder of fame is full of romance and is at the same time a revelation of what pluck, work and determination can accomplish. Some one has cleverly said the power to get something in this world is only limited by the amount we want it, and one has only to come in contact with Miss Walker to feel conscious of her absolute absorption in her art, and her earnest and lofty attitude toward everything which pertains to her life work.

When seen this morning at the Iroquois Hotel, where she is staying during her short stay in Buffalo, she was just about to start for her first visit to the Falls. "Strange, isn't it, when I was born and brought up in Rome, N. Y.," she said laughing.

Miss Walker's splendid career has been meteoric and she is now at the zenith of her artistic eminence. Confident in the fullness of her wonderful powers, praised and honored by kings and princes, sought after by the most famous managers at home and abroad, this talented American girl is simple, gracious and sincere, talking about herself in the most delightfully frank manner, as if she were nothing more than the ambitious but obscure "conservatory girl" of her student days in Dresden, instead of one of the most brilliant stars on the operatic horizon.

WAS A POOR GIRL.

"I was only a poor girl, you know," Miss Walker began, in giving a sketch of her absorbing career, "and I borrowed the money to go abroad and study from a doctor in Rome, an old friend of my family's. After the hardest kind of work for two years, that gave out and I had to have more. I didn't know where in the world to get it either. The instructors at the conservatoire all said it was a crime for me to give up then, so I wrote to William K. Vanderbilt, explained the situation and inclosed letters from many eminent musicians. By return mail I received a check for $1000 which enabled me to finish my studies. All he asked in return was that I should promise to sing for him when I returned to America. Wasn't it magnificent?" The great singer's face glowed with enthusiasm and the little break in her melodious voice betrayed a wealth of gratitude and memories revived by the recital of her benefactor's munificance. Her large expressive eyes fairly danced as she continued. "The first thing I did when I returned to America after 12 years was to pay Mr. Vanderbilt with the first money I earned in this country and to arrange to sing for him. It was one of the happiest moments of my life."

Miss Walker talked of her court life and of the many royalties before whom she has sung. One occasion especially was of interest. It was at the marriage ceremonies of the Duke of Saxe-Weimar, when nearly all the crowned heads of Europe were present including the Czar and Czarina, Emperor and Empress of Germany and the ruling house of Austria. Miss Walker described the costume and dazzling jewels of the Czarina. "I shall never forget her as she looked that night, with her sad, pensive face, gentle manners and sweet voice, and ablaze with gems. Her gown was embroidered with silver thread and diamonds and the effect was literally scintillating, combined with the radiance of the graduated ropes of perfect solitaires which hung in festoons across her corsage."

LIKES POPULAR CONCERTS.

Miss Walker spoke of her intense enjoyment of the popular priced performances on Wednesday and Saturday at the Grand Opera House in New York. "It is then the real lovers of music are there and the whole cast feels their artistic appreciation. It is in the atmosphere and I love it."

Miss Walker goes abroad every summer for her vacation and her favorite diversion is climbing the snow-capped mountains of Switzerland. Her splendid physique, rosy cheeks and bright eyes were evidence of their health-giving possibilities. She chatted about her student life in Dresden, its joys and learn French and Italian. Quite which meant hard work, on top of all my regular studies. I used to hear all the operas, going in the fourth gallery for the large sum of a quarter." Though born and brought up in New York State Miss Walker betrays in her English accent the influence of her long residence abroad and together with an almost Latin viacity her conversation is delightful and her personality fascinating.

Upon being asked concerning the benefits and artistic advantages of American girls going abroad to study, Miss Walker was very emphatic. "It is not only the prestige attained, as some maintain," she said earnestly, "it is the whole atmosphere which is surcharged with art and instructive precedent. I love my country and always uphold its institutions but there is no use in pretending we have attained in half a century what exists over there as the result of many centuries of artistic culture. It would be only absurd affectation."

WON'T VISIT HER OLD HOME.

Miss Walker will not revisit her old home because she has no longer any family ties there, and she expects to return to her life in Dresden next summer, when her contract with Mr. Conried shall have expired. Just before coming to America this season she gave a concert tour through Germany, which added to her laurels and made the nation's demand for her return more emphatic. Her work at the Metropolitan Opera House has been so absorbing she has had no time for concert engagements in this country, and it was only with the greatest amount of diplomacy that the arrangements were made by which she could come to Buffalo with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Miss Walker's voice is one of the rarest purity and beauty. While she is classed among the mezzi soprani, her range in operatic roles extends from those which are truly contralto to purely soprano parts. Her "Brunhilde" was one of the great sensations of the recent seasons in New York.

Miss Walker's first appearance in Buffalo this evening, at Convention Hall, is a milestone in the city's musical history, and, as she is in splendid voice, her part in the carefully arranged program offered by the Boston Symphony will be both delightful to music lovers and full of profit to students who cannot afford to miss such an opportunity in their musical education.

NEWS
BUFFALO, N. Y.
FEB 19 1906

...NE PROGRAM FOR TONIGHT'S CONCERT BY ...SHEE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Concert Will Begin at 8:15 and Audience is Expected to Be in Seats at That Time.

The second and last concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Convention Hall tonight at 8:15 o'clock. The Orchestra left New York yesterday morning, arriving here at 5 o'clock in the afternoon. Prof. Hess, the concert-master, who was the soloist at the October concert, arrived yesterday morning, having left New York on the preceding evening after the matinee in Carnegie Hall. Mr. Gericke returned to Boston from New York and will arrive here today. Miss Walker and Miss Ruegger, the soloists, arrived yesterday. The Orchestra will leave Buffalo for Troy tomorrow morning.

The concert this evening will be a most brilliant affair, musically and socially. Convention Hall will be practically sold out, for the sale of tickets has been very large, larger by far than it was last fall, when the audience was almost a record one. The program is one of the best that has ever been given in this city. With the exception of the Weber aria, which is Miss Walker's first number, it is made up entirely of modern music, for the Beethoven, Schubert and Schumann songs which Miss Walker will sing are as modern as the day they were written. The program will be:

Goldmark's overture, "In the Spring," Eglantine's recitative and scene from Weber's "Euryanthe," Miss Walker; Saint-Saens' A minor concerto for the violoncello, Miss Ruegger; "The Bacchanale," from Wagner's "Tannhaeuser;" Beethoven's "Die Ehre Gottes in der Natur," Schubert's "An die Leier," Schumann's "Roeslein," and Brahms' "Meine Liebe ist gruen," Miss Walker, and Tschaikowski's symphony in F minor, No. 4.

Attention is called to the announcement that the concert is at 8:15, and the audience is asked to be in their seats by that time or earlier, as when Conductor Gericke begins the overture no one will be seated until the number is finished.

Sale of seats continues through today at the Denton, Cottier & Daniels music store.

[177]

BUFFALO, N. Y.
FEB 18 1906

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

University of Buffalo Concert—A Union of the allied Arts—Pinafore to be sung in May under Mr. Dempsey's Direction.

TWO GREAT ORCHESTRAL CONCERTS

The bold experiment of bringing the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Buffalo twice in a season will find its justification tomorrow evening when that famous organization, under Mr. Gericke, will give its second concert in Convention Hall. The Boston orchestra is an expensive luxury since it costs so much to bring it far from its home city. In the years it has been spreading its evangel of art, it has built up for itself a clientele so numerous and so loyal that it requires much to tempt it to stray far from its beaten path. Moreover, it is such a very expensive organization, by far the most expensive orchestra in the world, that figures which are attractive to younger orchestras mean loss to it. But so handsome has been the support given to the guarantors of these concerts that it is now fairly certain that two visits by the Boston Symphony will be a feature of every musical season in Buffalo.

Mr. Gericke has taken great pains to make the programme for this second concert as attractive as possible. There will be two soloists, Miss Edyth Walker of the Metropolitan Opera Company, who comes through special arrangement with Mr. Conried, and Elsa Ruegger, the young Belgian 'cellist who was the solist with the orchestra at the Boston concerts of the ninth and tenth. There is a certain school of extremists, of which, perhaps, Felix Weingartner is the most distinguished disciple, which holds that the symmetry of a symphony concert should not be broken by the presence of a soloist. But the public has refused to endorse this idea in America, in England or even in Germany, and it is therefore always the effort of programme-makers to get as attractive soloists as possible and yet have them fit perfectly into the programme, the purpose of the soloist being chiefly to lend contrast to a programme.

This will be accomplished tomorrow evening. Both Miss Walker and Miss Ruegger are artists of the first rank and their numbers have been most happily chosen. Miss Walker, who is a true exponent of the grand style of singing, has chosen a rarely heard recitative and scene from Weber's Euryanthe, an opera of which practically only the overture is now known to the concert-going public. Big with dramatic content, full of the broad melody which characterized the composer, it gives to a great singer with a great voice splendid opportunity to display her art. Only such a singer dare attempt any of these great scenes of Weber with hope of success. In the four songs Miss Walker will sing, are four distinct moods. The Beethoven song mirrors profound religious belief; the Schubert song is one of ecstasy; the Schumann, bright and homely, and the Brahms song is an expression of passionate love.

Miss Ruegger will play Saint-Saens's concerto for violoncello in A minor, op. 33, one of the most grateful works in the literature of that instrument. While it gives the executant ample opportunity for the display of her dazzling technique, it is also full of melody.

The orchestral numbers are three. First, Goldmark's overture In the Spring, tuneful, bright and charming, full of the season whose moods it seeks to portray. The second will be the Bacchanale from the first act of the Paris version of Tannhauser, that which turned the ballet forces of the grand opera topsy-turvy and had not a little to do with the disorders which attended the fiasco of the opera when it was first produced in Paris in 1861.

The final number will be Tschaikowsky's fourth Symphony in F minor, a work which, to the day of his death, was the composer's favorite. Of his three great symphonies this one is generally the least known, although this year it has had more performances in New York than any other, due probably to the extraordinary tribute paid to Mr. Gericke and the orchestra when they played it at their concert in Carnegie Hall last November. After the third movement the applause was so long and vociferous that Mr. Gericke compelled the men in the orchestra to rise and acknowledge it. The full programme follows:

Concert overture, In the Spring, A Major, Op. 36 ..... Goldmark
Eglantine's recitative and aria, from Euryanthe, Er konnte mich um sie verschmah'n ..... Weber
Miss Edyth Walker.
Concerto in A minor, No. 1, for violoncello and orchestra, op. 33 ..... Saint-Saens
(a) Allegro non troppe.
(b) Allegretto con moto.
(c) Come prima.
Miss Elsa Ruegger.
Bacchanale, from Tannhauseur, Act 1 ..... Wagner
Songs with pianoforte—
(a) Die Ehre Gottes in der Natur. Beethoven
(b) An die Leier ..... Schubert
(c) Roeselein ..... Schumann
(d) Meine Liebe ist gruen ..... Brahms
Miss Edyth Walker.
Symphony, No. 4, in F minor, Op. 36 ..... Tschaikowsky
(a) Andante sostenuto; Moderato con anima in movimento di valse.
(b) Andantino in modi di canzona.
(c) Scherzo, pizzicato ostinato; allegro.
(d) Finale, Allegro con fuoco.

COMMERCIAL.
BUFFALO, N. Y.
FEB 17 1906

BOSTON SYMPHONY'S CONCERT.

There has been a large sale of seats for the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Convention Hall on Monday evening next, and one of the largest audiences of the season is expected.

Wilhelm Gericke is director of the orchestra, which numbers 85 men, and the soloists for this concert are Miss Edyth Walker, the well-known mezzo-soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company, and Miss [illegible], the famous 'cellist. An excellent programme has been prepared, and the concert is worth hearing.

COURIER
m ress BUFFALO
te FEB 1906

BOSTON'S GREAT ORCHESTRA HERE

Symphony Players Arrive by Special Train and Two Soloists Are Also Here—Conductor Gericke Due This Morning.

FINE PROGRAMME FOR THIS EVENING

Tonight at Convention Hall the Boston Symphony Orchestra gives its second and last concert for the season, and the indications are that Conductor Gericke and his men will appear before a capacity house. The orchestra gave a remarkably successful concert in New York on Saturday night, Mr. Gericke returning to Boston immediately after. He will arrive in Buffalo this morning.

Prof. Willy Hess, the concert meister, who was soloist at the October concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, came here yesterday morning. The two soloists, Miss Edyth Walker, the mezzo soprano prima donna of the Metropolitan Opera House, and Miss Elsa Ruegger, the Belgian 'cellist, also came yesterday.

ORCHESTRA HERE.

Accompaned by F. R. Comee, assistant manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the men came to Buffalo from New York yesterday by special train, reaching here late in the afternoon. Early tomorrow morning the orchestra will leave for Troy, giving a concert in Albany and then going back to Boston.

One of the most brilliant programmes ever presented in this city will be played tonight. It is made up almost entirely of modern music. The concert begins promptly at 8:15 o'clock, and ticket-buyers are asked to be in their seats promptly, as no one will be seated during the opening number. The seat sale for the concert continues through today at the music store of Denton, Cottier & Daniels.

NEWS
ss
FEB 1906

FAMOUS PRIMA DONNA ARRIVES IN BUFFALO.

Miss Edythe Walker, Sensation of the Season in Grand Opera in New York, to Sing Here Tonight.

WON FAME ABROAD.

Seen This Morning, She Talks About Her Romantic Career and of the Kings and Queens She Has Charmed With Her Wonderful Voice.

Nothing succeeds like success, neither is anything so interesting. The story of Miss EdytheWalker's progress up the ladder of fame is full of romance and is at the same time a revelation of what pluck, work and determination can accomplish. Some one has cleverly said the power to get something in this world is only limited by the amount we want it, and one has only to come in contact with Miss Walker to feel conscious of her absolute absorption in her art, and her earnest and lofty attitude toward everything which pertains to her life work.

When seen this morning at the Iroquois Hotel, where she is staying during her short stay in Buffalo, she was just about to start for her first visit to the Falls. "Strange, isn't it, when I was born and brought up in Rome, N. Y.," she said laughing.

Miss Walker's splendid career has been meteoric and she is now at the zenith of her artistic eminence. Confident in the fullness of her wonderful powers, praised and honored by kings and princes, sought after by the most famous managers at home and abroad, this talented American girl is simple, gracious and sincere, talking about herself in the most delightfully frank manner, as if she were nothing more than the ambitious but obscure "conservatory girl" of her student days in Dresden, instead of one of the most brilliant stars on the operatic horizon.

WAS A POOR GIRL.

"I was only a poor girl, you know," Miss Walker began, in giving a sketch of her absorbing career, "and I borrowed the money to go abroad and study from a doctor in Rome, an old friend of my family's. After the hardest kind of work for two years, that gave out and I had to have more. I didn't know where in the world to get it either. The instructors at the conservatoire all said it was a crime for me to give up then, so I wrote to William K. Vanderbilt, explained the situation and inclosed letters from many eminent musicians. By return mail I received a check for $1000 which enabled me to finish my studies. All he asked in return was that I should promise to sing for him when I returned to America. Wasn't it magnificent?" The great singer's face glowed with enthusiasm and the little break in her melodious voice betrayed a wealth of gratitude and memories revived by the recital of her benefactor's munificance. Her large expressive eyes fairly danced as she continued. "The first thing I did when I returned to America after 12 years was to pay Mr. Vanderbilt with the first money I earned in this country and to arrange to sing for him. It was one of the happiest moments of my life."

Miss Walker talked of her court life and of the many royalties before whom she has sung. One occasion especially was of interest. It was at the marriage ceremonies of the Duke of Saxe-Weimar, when nearly all the crowned heads of Europe were present including the Czar and Czarina, Emperor and Empress of Germany and the ruling house of Austria. Miss Walker described the costume and dazzling jewels of the Czarina. "I shall never forget her as she looked that night, with her sad, pensive face, gentle manners and sweet voice, and ablaze with gems. Her gown was embroidered with silver thread and diamonds and the effect was literally scintillating, combined with the radiance of the graduated ropes of perfect solitaires which hung in festoons across her corsage."

LIKES POPULAR CONCERTS.

Miss Walker spoke of her intense enjoyment of the popular priced performances on Wednesday and Saturday at the Grand Opera House in New York. "It is then the real lovers of music are there and the whole cast feels their artistic appreciation. It is in the atmosphere and I love it."

Miss Walker goes abroad every summer for her vacation and her favorite diversion is climbing the snow-capped mountains of Switzerland. Her splendid physique, rosy cheeks and bright eyes were evidence of their health-giving possibilities. She chatted about her student life in Dresden, its joys and [illegible] paid $12 a month apiece—three in a room and the meals—they were often very, very bad. I did not mix with the American colony much on account of the language, which is was so important for me to master. Then I had to learn French and Italian there, too, which meant hard work, on top of all my regular studies. I used to hear all the operas, going in the fourth gallery for the large sum of a quarter." Though born and brought up in New York State Miss Walker betrays in her English accent the influence of her long residence abroad and together with an almost Latin viacity her conversation is delightful and her personality fascinating.

Upon being asked concerning the benefits and artistic advantages of American girls going abroad to study, Miss Walker was very emphatic. "It is not only the prestige attained, as some maintain," she said earnestly, "it is the whole atmosphere which is surcharged with art and instructive precedent. I love my country and always uphold its institutions but there is no use in pretending we have attained in half a century what exists over there as the result of many centuries of artistic culture. It would be only absurd affectation."

WON'T VISIT HER OLD HOME.

Miss Walker will not revisit her old home because she has no longer any family ties there, and she expects to return to her life in Dresden next summer, when her contract with Mr. Conried shall have expired. Just before coming to America this season she gave a concert tour through Germany, which added to her laurels and made the nation's demand for her return more emphatic. Her work at the Metropolitan Opera House has been so absorbing she has had no time for concert engagements in this country, and it was only with the greatest amount of diplomacy that the arrangements were made by which she could come to Buffalo with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Miss Walker's voice is one of the rarest purity and beauty. While she is classed among the mezzi soprani, her range in operatic roles extends from those which are truly contralto to purely soprano parts. Her "Brunnhilde" was one of the great sensations of the recent seasons in New York.

Miss Walker's first appearance in Buffalo this evening, at Convention Hall, is a milestone in the city's musical history, and, as she is in splendid voice, her part in the carefully arranged program offered by the Boston Symphony will be both delightful to music lovers and full of profit to students who cannot afford to miss such an opportunity in their musical education.

NEW
ss
[illegible]

NE PROGRAM FOR TONIGHT'S CONCERT BY SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

shed

Concert Will Begin at 8:15 and Audience is Expected to Be in Seats at That Time.

The second and last concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Convention Hall tonight at 8:15 o'clock. The Orchestra left New York yesterday morning, arriving here at 5 o'clock in the afternoon. Prof. Hess, the concert-master, who was the soloist at the October concert, arrived yesterday morning, having left New York on the preceding evening after the matinee in Carnegie Hall. Mr. Gericke returned to Boston from New York and will arrive here today. Miss Walker and Miss Ruegger, the soloists, arrived yesterday. The Orchestra will leave Buffalo for Troy tomorrow morning.

The concert this evening will be a most brilliant affair, musically and socially. Convention Hll will be practically sold out, for the sale of tickets has been very large, larger by far than it was last fall, when the audience was almost a record one. The program is one of the best that has ever been given in this city. With the exception of the Weber aria, which is Miss Walker's first number, it is made up entirely of modern music, for the Beethoven, Schubert and Schumann songs which Miss Walker will sing are as modern as the day they were written. The program will be:

Goldmark's overture, "In the Spring," Eglantine's recitative and scene from Weber's "Euryanthe," Miss Walker; Saint-Saens' A minor concerto for the violoncello, Miss Ruegger; "The Bacchanale," from Wagner's "Tannhaeuser;" Beethoven's "Die Ehre Gottes in der Natur," Schubert's "An die Leier," Schumann's "Roeslein," and Brahms' "Meine Liebe ist gruen," Miss Walker, and Tschaikowski's symphony in F minor, No. 4.

Attention is called to the announcement that the concert is at 8:15, and the audience is asked to be in their seats by that time or earlier, as when Conductor Gericke begins the overture no one will be seated until the number is finished.

Sale of seats continues through today at the Denton, Cottier & Daniels music store.

BUFFALO, N. Y.
FEB 19 1906

MISS EDYTH WALKER.
Metropolitan singer who will appear with the Boston Symphony Orchestra this evening at Convention Hall.

WON SUCCESS ON LOAN FROM VANDERBILT

MILLIONAIRE WAS A GOOD FRIEND TO EDYTH WALKER OF BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA IN HER EARLY CAREER.

Miss Edyth Walker, soloist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which gives its long-anticipated concert at Convention Hall tonight, had never seen Niagara Falls until today although a native of the Empire State.

Miss Walker was ready early in her apartments at the Iroquois for the journey, which she was most anxious to take. The rich tailored gown of exquisite plum shade showed to advantage her svelte figure and a picturesque creation of ermine, mink and blush roses crowned the handsome auburn tresses, which are one of the singer's many points of beauty.

"I feel strongly on the desecration of the falls," said the brilliant young artiste. "Hhe man who first thought of commercializing them really deserves hanging, I think. That is where we Americans have our besetting sin—too much devotion to the money god. Abroad, the government would interfere to prevent the spoliation."

Her Career a Fairy Tale.

The career of Edyth Walker is one of those fairy tales of real life which one often reads about but almost never sees realized.

It was in a little church in Rome, this State, that it was first discovered that she had a "voice." When the discovery was forced upon the young choir-singer, she borrowed $1,000 from a physician who had formerly known her father and mother, then dead, and went to Dresden to study, like many another American girl who could sing. Like many American girls, Edyth Walker won fame and laurels.

After two years of study at the conservatory, Miss Walker's money gave out. She had no relatives or friends to assist her; her masters, while promising great things for the future, could not encourage her for an immediate engagement, as her voice required further cultivation. Acting under the advice of a friend, the plucky girl wrote to William K. Vanderbilt, asking him to lend her the needed amount, accompanying the letter with credentials of the highest character. The request met with immediate response, Mr. Vanderbilt sending her $1,000 with the expressed wish that the ambitious young woman would sometime sing for him.

The money sufficed for two years' further instruction. Miss Walker lived with three young women in an apartment, paying for room and food the American equivalent for $12 per month.

"How was the food?" somebody asked Miss Walker.

"Well, it tasted like canno balls," laughed the beautiful prima donna, making a wry face at the recollection.

At the end of four years of the hardest kind of work, Miss Walker was called to Vienna to take that place—most difficult to fill—made vacant by Marianne Brandt. The eight years which followed with the Imperial Opera were one series of triumphs for the brave young American girl.

[illegible] dollars she was sent to Mr. Vanderbilt, with a letter telling of her success [illegible]

"At one court concert," said Miss Walker, "the Czar and Czarina were present. The Czarina wore the Russian cour tdiamonds—opes and ropes of them in graduated sizes. I remember how gorgeously attired she was—fairly scintillating with their brilliant light. Her gown was a magnificent affair of blue velvet with square-cut train and a triangular drop front, richly bocaded with silver and diamonds.

"The Czarina has a sweet face," continued Miss Walker.

"The saddest countenance amony royalty is that of Wilhelmina of Holland, the pale little queen o fthe broken heart. It moved me almost to tears to see her. She was present when I sang at the wedding of a grand duke near Hanover. The Emperor of Austria was also among the guests that night, and grand dukes and duchesses by the fifties. The Grand Duke of Saxe-Weimar, who was there, is passionately fond of music and is always an inspiration as a listener."

Miss Walker has sung in America two seasons previous to the present. Each summer she goe to Switzerland and don a short skirt for mountain-climbing, of which pursuit she is an enthusiastic devotee. "About 8,000 feet is my highest venture," answered Miss Walker to the question. "I do not try for greater heights from motives of caution."

Express
BUFFALO, N. Y.
FEB 19 1906

GREAT CONCERT TONIGHT

Boston Symphony Orchestra, with two splendid Soloists, will give Concert at Convention Hall.

This evening at 8.15 o'clock at Convention Hall the Boston Symphony Orchestra gives its second and last concert here for the present season. Beautiful as was the programme presented at the October concert, it is eclipsed by the brilliant one arranged by Conductor Wilhelm Gericke for tonight. In addition to the Boston Symphony Orchestra of 85 players, he has brought two eminent soloists, Miss Edyth Walker, the favorite mezzo-soprano prima donna of the Metropolitan Opera-house, who makes her Buffalo debut, and Miss Elsa Ruegger, the greatest woman 'cellist now before the public, who also appears in this city for the first time. The programme in its entirety was published yesterday in The Express.

Frederic R. Comee, assistant manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, arrived here late yesterday afternoon, coming with the orchestra by special train from New York, where a brilliantly successful concert was given on Saturday night.

Professor Willy Hess, concertmeister of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and soloist at the October concert, arrived in Buffalo yesterday morning. Mr. Gericke spent Sunday in Boston and is due here early this morning. Miss Walker and Miss Ruegger are already in Buffalo.

It will be a great musical night for this city, one long to be remembered.

Attention is called to the announcement that the concert will begin promptly at 8.15 o'clock. Those not in their seats at that time will not be seated until the opening number is over, for Mr. Gericke insists upon perfect quiet during his concerts and refuses to allow his audience to be disturbed by latecomers.

The seat sale for this evening's concert continues through today at the Denton, Cottier & Daniels music store.

TIMES
BUFFALO, N. Y.
FEB 19 1906

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA TONIGHT

Concert at Convention Tonight at 8.15 O'Clock.

The second and last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Convention Hall tonight at 8:15 o'clock. The orchestra left New York yesterday (Sunday) morning, arriving here at 5 o'clock in the afternoon. Prof. Hess, the concert master, who was the soloist at the October concert arrived in the city yesterday morning, having left New York on the preceding evening after the matinee in Carnegie Hall. Mr. Gericke returned to Boston from New York and will arrive here this (Monday) morning. Miss Walker and Miss Ruegger, the soloists, arrived yesterday. The orchestra will leave Buffalo for Troy tomorrow morning.

The concert this evening will be a most brilliant affair, musically and socially. Convention Hall will be practically sold out, for the sale of tickets has been very large, larger by far than it was last fall when the audience was almost a record one. Attention is called to the announcement that the concert is at 8:15, and the audience is asked to be in their seats at that time or earlier, as when Conductor Gericke begins the overture, no one will be seated until it is finished.

Sale of seats continues through today at the Denton, Cottier & Daniels' music store.

EXPRESS
BUFFALO, N. Y.
FEB 15 1906

Edyth Walker comes here with Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Miss Edyth Walker, the great mezzo who will make her debut in Buffalo with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Convention Hall next Monday evening, will be heard in two phases of her art. Her first number, Eglantine's great recitative and scene from Weber's Euryanthe, will discover her as an operatic singer, one possessed of the grand style which is so closely connected with the name of Lehmann, Materna, Brandt, Sucher, Tietjens and other famous women of the past. For her second number she has chosen four songs with piano accompaniment—Beethoven's Die Ehre Gottes in der Natur, Schubert's An die Leier, Schumann's Roeselein and Brahms's Meine Liebe ist grun. In these songs and in the aria, practically the whole range of the dramatic soprano is displayed.

The seat sale for the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert is now in progress at the music store of Denton, Cottier & Daniels.

First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World.

NEWS
BUFFALO, N. Y.
FEB 18 1906

A number of musical offerings for this week make the coming days very interesting. First and foremost will be the visit of the Boston Syphony Orchestra, Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, conductor, tomorrow, Monday evening, Feb. 19, at Convention Hall.

To have the Boston Symphony Orchestra come here is indeed an honor, and one that our musical people must appreciate. The Boston Orchestra is unsurpassed in the world and there are many musical people and authorities who believe it to be unrivaled.

NEWS
BUFFALO, N. Y.
FEB 15 1906

FOREMOST WOMAN 'CELLIST OF THE WORLD

Miss Elsa Ruegger, who will be one of the soloists with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its concert in Convention Hall on next Monday evening, is unquestionably the foremost woman 'cellist in the world today, and as such ranks with the greatest masters of that instrument. She is a young and attractive girl, a Belgian, whose career has been one of uninterrupted success ever since she first began to play in public. This is her third visit to America. Her playing is characterized not merely by a faultless technique but by a tone of peculiar richness, brilliancy and nobility. It seems strange that a slight girl can draw such a beautiful tone from her rather unwieldy instrument. Moreover, she is a musician of highest attainments and plays with musicianly taste and feeling. She will play Saint Saens' concerto in A minor. The soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Denton, Cottier & [illegible]

Boston Sunday Globe.
SUNDAY, FEB 25, 1906.

MUSICAL MATTERS

Sixteenth of Season's Symphony Concerts.

Tucker's Sunday Chamber Concerts—Operatic Society.

Hammerstein Grand Opera—Current Gossip.

Possibly Mr Gericke gave [illegible] interpretation yesterday [illegible] earlier performances, which [illegible] quite natural by reason [illegible] being more familiar with [illegible] but it did not appear to be [illegible] effective, the contrasts were [illegible] pronounced and the riot of [illegible] sounded about the same. It [illegible] "gigantic" work when revealed [illegible] weeks ago and a second hearing [illegible] presses the auditor with the sense [illegible] It will become one of the standard numbers in the repertory of big orchestras.

The scherzo and the first movement, the "Dead March," again appeared to give the greater satisfaction of the five divisions. The horn phrases in the first part were of beautiful tonality, a repetition, possibly improved a bit, of the former performances, and in the dainty scherzo the strings were notably good in the pizzicato measures. The necessary energy was displayed in the fortissimo passages to make them effective, yet the vagueness of the work remained despite the skill shown in its interpretation.

The soloist was Mr Ernest Hutcheson, a pianist, who is well and favorably known, his contribution being the piano part of Rubinstein's D minor concerto. Mr Hutcheson delivered the pompous opening phrases with impressive force and showed commendable finger dexterity in the long coda and cadenza. The poetic nature of the second movement was admirably indicated, and in the final movement there was plenty of dash and celerity, though lacking some in clarity, in his execution. His work was thoroughly pleasing and deserved the plaudits with which he was greeted at the close of his performance. The orchestra provided the usual reliable assistance, and in the Weber overture gave renewed evidence of its skill in ensemble work which made the familiar number very enjoyable.

Two novelties will be given at this week's concerts, Mr Frederick Converse's musical setting of Keats' ballade, "La Belle Dame Sans Merci," and Ernst Boehe's symphonic poem, "Odysseus Ausfahrt und Schriffbruch." The soloist will be Mr David Bispham, who will be heard in the Converse selection, an aria from Marschner's "Hans Heiling," and an old English song. Mendelssohn's overture, "The Fair Melusina," and the second symphony by Richard Strauss will complete the program.

THE LONGY CLUB.

The third and last of the season's concerts by the Longy club will be given in Potter hall tomorrow evening at 8 o'clock. The assisting artist will be Mr Emile Ferir, principal viola of the Symphony orchestra. Following is the program: Fritz Kauffmann, quintet (op 40) for flute, oboe, clarinet, horn and fagott; Klughardt, schilflieder, five fantasias after Lenau's poems, for piano, oboe and viola; Raff, sinfoniatta for two flutes, two oboes, two clarinets, two horns and two bassoons.

BOSTON SYMPHONY QUARTET.

Prof Willy Hess will present another novelty at the coming concert of the Boston Symphony quartet in Jordan hall one week from tomorrow night. It will be two movements from a new quartet by Christian Sinding, the distinguished Danish composer. The opus number of the quartet is 70, and the work is fresh from the publisher. The other works on the program are a piano trio by Arensky and Beethoven's quartet in E-flat, op 127, No. 12. Mr Carlo Buonamici will be the assisting artist.

The Boston Journal

LEADER GERICKE GETS AN OVATION

The warm and remarkably long-continued applause that greeted Mr. Gericke when he appeared upon the stage at Saturday evening's Symphony concert was testimony to the personal esteem in which he is held and to the general regret among music lovers that after a few more concerts he will be seen here no more. Conductors will come and go, but it is doubtful if any will ever head our orchestra who will "wear" better, month in and month out than Gericke.

The great event of the evening was the repetition of Mahler's Fifth Symphony, heard here for the first time only a few weeks ago. The colossal work compels no less of admiration than before. It is an astounding new voice in art, a magnificent outpouring of a great man's heart. It may be from music, for the most part, but the [illegible] is magnetized. One may deride [illegible] savage cacophony, call it the wild [illegible] burst of musical madness, but no one can fail to sit up and hear its message. Therein is its essential difference from the formally abstruse and supernatural [illegible] ly dull symphony of Vincent D'Indy over which so much Boston discussion has recently raged. This work [illegible] varieties of expression, from the [illegible] powering splendor of pathos in the movement to the supreme [illegible] its adagietto. The performance [illegible] again extraordinarily fine and compelling."

Webers "Freischutz" overture [illegible] played with supreme finish and [illegible] but it made little or no emotional effect. Mr. Ernest Hutcheson, the pianist, gave Rubinstein's D minor [illegible] forte concerto with brilliant [illegible] technique, although he lacked [illegible] thing in the more poetic [illegible] the noble work.

[178]

TIMES
BUFFALO, N. Y.
FEB 19 1906

MISS EDYTH WALKER.

Metropolitan singer who will appear with the Boston Symphony Orchestra this evening at Convention Hall.

WON SUCCESS ON LOAN FROM VANDERBILT

MILLIONAIRE WAS A GOOD FRIEND TO EDYTH WALKER OF BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA IN HER EARLY CAREER.

Miss Edyth Walker, soloist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which gives its long-anticipated concert at Convention Hall tonight, had never seen Niagara Falls until today although a native of the Empire State.

Miss Walker was ready early in her apartments at the Iroquois for the journey, which she was most anxious to take. The rich tailored gown of exquisite plum shade showed to advantage her svelte figure and a picturesque creation of ermine, mink and blush roses crowned the handsome auburn tresses, which are one of the singer's many points of beauty.

"I feel strongly on the desecration of the falls," said the brilliant young artiste. "Hhe man who first thought of commercializing them really deserves hanging, I think. That is where we Americans have our besetting sin—too much devotion to the money god. Abroad, the government would interfere to prevent the spoilation."

Her Career a Fairy Tale.

The career of Edyth Walker is one of those fairy tales of real life which one often reads about but almost never sees realized.

It was in a little church in Rome, this State, that it was first discovered that she had a "voice." When the discovery was forced upon the young choir-singer, she borrowed $1,000 from a physician who had formerly known her father and mother, then dead, and wentto Dresden to study, like many another American girl who could sing. Like many American girls, Edyth Walker won fame and laurels.

After two years of study at the conservatory, Miss Walker's money gave out. She had no relatives or friends to assist her; her masters, while promising great things for the future, could not encourage her for an immediate engagement, as her voice required further cultivation. Acting under the advice of a friend, the plucky girl wrote to William K. Vanderbilt, asking him to lend her the needed amount, accompanying the letter with credentials of the highest character. The request met with immediate response, Mr. Vanderbilt sending her $1,000 with the expressed wish that the ambitious young woman would sometime sing for him.

The money sufficed for two years' further instruction. Miss Walker lived with three young women in an apartment, paying for room and food the American equivalent for $12 per month.

"How was the food?" somebody asked Miss Walker.

"Well, it tasted like canno balls," laughed the beautiful prima donna, making a wry face at the recollection.

At the end of four years of the hardest kind of work, Miss Walker was called to Vienna to take that place—most difficult to fill—made vacant by Marianne Brandt. The eight years which followed with the Imperial Opera were one series of triumphs for the brave young American girl.

The first thousand dollars she was able to save was sent to Mr. Vanderbilt, who had made success possible. Later Miss Walker granted the millionaire's request to sing for him.

audiences are among the part of the struggling public which patronizes the popular concerts. "Nothing is too fine for the public," Miss Walker thinks, and she adds that the people in general have perhaps a more thorough appreciation of the compositions of the best masters than the dilettante.

"At one court concert," said Miss Walker, "the Czar and Czarina were present. The Czarina wore the Russian cour tdiamonds—opes and ropes of them in graduated sizes. I remember how gorgeously attired she was—fairly scintillating with their brilliant light. Her gown was a magnificent affair of blue velvet with square-cut train and a triangular drop front, richly bocaded with silver and diamonds.

"The Czarina has a sweet face," continued Miss Walker.

"The saddest countenance amony royalty is that of Wilhelmina of Holland, the pale little queen o fthe broken heart. It moved me almost to tears to see her. She was present when I sang at the wedding of a grand duke near Hanover. The Emperor of Austria was also among the guests that night, and grand dukes and duchesses by the fifties. The Grand Duke of Saxe-Weimar, who was there, is passionately fond of music and is always an inspiration as a listener."

Miss Walker has sung in America two seasons previous to the present. Each summer she goe to Switzerland and don a short skirt for mountain-climbing, of which pursuit she is an enthusiastic devotee. "About 8,000 feet is my highest venture,' 'answered Miss Walker to the question. "I do not try for greater heights from motives of caution."

BUFFALO, N. Y.
FEB 19 1906

GREAT CONCERT TONIGHT

Boston Symphony Orchestra, with two splendid Soloists, will give Concert at Convention Hall.

This evening at 8.15 o'clock at Convention Hall the Boston Symphony Orchestra gives its second and last concert here for the present season. Beautiful as was the programme presented at the October concert, it is eclipsed by the brilliant one arranged by Conductor Wilhelm Gericke for tonight. In addition to the Boston Symphony Orchestra of 85 players, he has brought two eminent soloists, Miss Edyth Walker, the favorite mezzo-soprano prima donna of the Metropolitan Opera-house, who makes her Buffalo debut, and Miss Elsa Ruegger, the greatest woman 'cellist now before the public, who also appears in this city for the first time. The programme in its entirety was published yesterday in The Express.

Frederic R. Comee, assistant manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, arrived here late yesterday afternoon, coming with the orchestra by special train from New York, where a brilliantly successful concert was given on Saturday night.

Professor Willy Hess, concertmeister of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and soloist at the October concert, arrived in Buffalo yesterday morning. Mr. Gericke spent Sunday in Boston and is due here early this morning. Miss Walker and Miss Ruegger are already in Buffalo.

It will be a great musical night for this city, one long to be remembered.

Attention is called to the announcement that the concert will begin promptly at 8.15 o'clock. Those not in their seats at that time will not be seated until the opening number is over, for Mr. Gericke insists upon perfect quiet during his concerts and refuses to allow his audience to be disturbed by latecomers.

The seat sale for this evening's concert continues through today at the Denton, Cottier & Daniels music store.

Altar Society gives Purse

NEWS
FEB 19 1906

FOREMOST WOMAN 'CELLIST OF THE WORLD.

Miss Elsa Ruegger, who will be one of the soloists with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its concert in Convention Hall on next Monday evening, is unquestionably the foremost woman 'cellist in the world today, and as such ranks with the greatest masters of that instrument. She is a young and attractive girl, a Belgian, whose career has been one of uninterrupted success ever since she first began to play in public. This is her third visit to America. Her playing is characterized not merely by a faultless technique but by a tone of peculiar richness, brilliancy and nobility. It seems strange that a slight girl can drew such a beautiful tone from her rather unwieldy instrument. Moreover, she is a musician of highest attainments and plays with musicianly taste and feeling. She will play Saint Saens' concerto in A minor. The seat sale for the Boston Symphony Orchestra is now in progress at the Denton, Cottier & Daniels' music store.

[178]

TIMES
BUFFALO, N. Y.
FEB 19 1906

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA TONIGHT

Concert at Convention Tonight at 8.15 O'Clock.

The second and last concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Convention Hall tonight at 8:15 o'clock.

The orchestra left New York yesterday (Sunday), morning, arriving here at 5 o'clock in the afternoon. Prof. Hess, the concert master, who was the soloist at the October concert arrived in the city yesterday morning, having left New York on the preceding evening after the matinee in Carnegie Hall. Mr. Gericke returned to Boston from New York and will arrive here this, (Monday), morning. Miss Walker and Miss Ruegger, the soloists, arrived yesterday. The orchestra will leave Buffalo for Troy tomorrow morning.

The concert this evening will be a most brilliant affair, musically and socially. Convention Hall will be practically sold out, for the sale of tickets has been very large, larger by far than it was last fall when the audience was almost a record one. Attention is called to the announcement that the concert is at 8:15, and the audience is asked to be in their seats at that time or earlier, as when Conductor Gericke begins the overture, no one will be seated until it is finished.

Sale of seats continues through today at the Denton, Cottier & Daniels' music store.

FEB 15 1906

Edyth Walker comes here with Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Miss Edyth Walker, the great mezzo who will make her debut in Buffalo with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Convention Hall next Monday evening, will be heard in two phases of her art. Her first number, Eglantine's great recitative and scene from Weber's Euryanthe, will discover her as an operatic singer, one possessed of the grand style which is so closely connected with the name of Lehmann, Materna, Brandt, Sucher, Tietjens and other famous women of the past. For her second number she has chosen four songs with piano accompaniment—Beethoven's Die Ehre Gottes in der Natur, Schubert's An die Leier, Schumann's Roeselein and Brahms's Meine Liebe ist grun. In these songs and in the aria, practically the whole range of the dramatic soprano is displayed.

The seat sale for the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert is now in progress at the music store of Denton, Cottier & Daniels.

First Established and Most Complete Paper Cutting Bureau in the World.

NEWS
FEB 18 1906

A number of musical offerings for this week make the coming days very interesting. First and foremost will be the visit of the Boston Syphony Orchestra, Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, conductor, tomorrow, Monday evening, Feb. 19, at Convention Hall.

To have the Boston Symphony Orchestra come here is indeed an honor, and one that our musical people must appreciate. The Boston Orchestra is unsurpassed in the world and there are many musical people and authorities who believe it to be unrivaled.

Boston Sunday Globe.
SUNDAY, FEB 25, 1906.

MUSICAL MATTERS

Sixteenth of Season's Symphony Concerts.

Tucker's Sunday Chamber Concerts—Operatic Society.

Hammerstein Grand Opera —Current Gossip.

For the program of the 16th Symphony rehearsal and concert Mr Gericke [illegible] Mahler was first heard here introduced the work there appears to be many minds about the meaning, importance and coherence of this form of musical utterance; the resulting criticisms being, as usual, widely at variance as a rule. As to the length, wealth of thematic material and skill in orchestration opinions are a unit; but aside from these points there is little unanimity shown in the notices of the performance.

Possibly Mr Gericke gave a smoother interpretation yesterday than at the earlier performances, which would be quite natural by reason of his now being more familiar with the score; but it did not appear to be any more effective, the contrasts were no more pronounced and the riot of dissonants sounded about the same. It was a "gigantic" work when revealed three weeks ago and a second hearing impresses the auditor with the sense that it will become one of the standard numbers in the repertory of big orchestras.

The scherzo and the first movement, the "Dead March," again appeared to give the greater satisfaction of the five divisions. The horn phrases in the first part were of beautiful tonality, a repetition, possibly improved a bit, of the former performances, and in the dainty scherzo the strings were notably good in the pizzicato measures. The necessary energy was displayed in the fortissimo passages to make them effective, yet the vagueness of the work remained despite the skill shown in its interpretation.

The soloist was Mr Ernest Hutcheson, a pianist, who is well and favorably known, his contribution being the piano part of Rubinstein's D minor concerto. Mr Hutcheson delivered the pompous opening phrases with impressive force and showed commendable finger dexterity in the long coda and cadenza. The poetic nature of the second movement was admirably indicated, and in the final movement there was plenty of dash and celerity, though lacking some in clarity, in his execution. His work was thoroughly pleasing and deserved the plaudits with which he was greeted at the close of his performance. The orchestra provided the usual reliable assistance, and in the Weber overture gave renewed evidence of its skill in ensemble work which made the familiar number very enjoyable.

Two novelties will be given at this week's concerts, Mr Frederick Converse's musical setting of Keats' ballade, "La Belle Dame Sans Merci," and Ernst Boehe's symphonic poem, "Odysseus Ausfahrt und Schriffbruch." The soloist will be Mr David Bispham, who will be heard in the Converse selection, an aria from Marschner's "Hans Heiling," and an old English song. Mendelssohn's overture, "The Fair Melusina," and the second symphony by Richard Strauss will complete the program.

THE LONGY CLUB.

The third and last of the season's concerts by the Longy club will be given in Potter hall tomorrow evening at 8 o'clock. The assisting artist will be Mr Emile Ferir, principal viola of the Symphony orchestra. Following is the program: Fritz Kauffmann, quintet (op 40) for flute, oboe, clarinet, horn and fagott; Klughardt, schilflieder, five fantasias after Lenau's poems, for piano, oboe and viola; Raff, sinfonietta for two flutes, two oboes, two clarinets, two horns and two bassoons.

BOSTON SYMPHONY QUARTET.

Prof Willy Hess will present another novelty at the coming concert of the Boston Symphony quartet in Jordan hall one week from tomorrow night. It will be two movements from a new quartet by Christian Sinding, the distinguished Danish composer. The opus number of the quartet is 70, and the work is fresh from the publisher. The other works on the program are a piano trio by Arensky and Beethoven's quartet in E-flat, op 127, No. 12. Mr Carlo Buonamici will be the assisting artist.

The Boston Journal

LEADER GERICKE GETS AN OVATION

The warm and remarkably long-continued applause that greeted Mr. Gericke when he appeared upon the stage at Saturday evening's Symphony concert was testimony to the personal esteem in which he is held and to the general regret among music lovers that after a few more concerts he will be seen here no more. Conductors will come and go, but it is doubtful if any will ever head our orchestra who will "wear" better, month in and month out than Gericke.

The great event of the evening was the repetition of Mahler's Fifth Symphony, heard here for the first time only a few weeks ago. The colossal work compels no less of admiration than before. It is an astounding new voice in art, a magnificent outpouring of a great man's heart. It may be iron music, for the most part, but the iron is magnetized. One may deride its savage cacophony, call it the wild outburst of musical madness, but no one can fail to sit up and hear its message. Therein is its essential difference from the formally abstruse and supernaturally dull symphony of Vincent D'Indy's, over which so much Boston discussion has recently raged. This work has all varieties of expression, from the overpowering splendor of pathos in its first movement to the supreme loveliness of its adagietto. The performance was again extraordinarily fine and compelling."

Webers "Freischutz" overture was played with supreme finish and care, but it made little or no emotional effect. Mr. Ernest Hutcheson, the soloist, gave Rubinstein's D minor pianoforte concerto with brilliant and fluent technique, although he lacked something in the more poetic passages of the noble work.

GERICKE RESIGNS AS CONDUCTOR OF THE SYMPHONY

Will Leave the Boston Orchestra at End of Present Season.

HAD BEEN OFFERED THE POST FOR 1906-7

Agreed Under Certain Conditions, Which Were Not Accepted.

WHO WILL SUCCEED HIM NOT ANNOUNCED

Mr. Gericke Says That He Is Planning to Return to Europe.

Mr. Wilhelm Gericke has resigned his position as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra. His resignation will take effect at the end of this season, the 25th of the organization. The last concert of the season will be on April 28.

There have been rumors of late, especially in New York, to the effect that the orchestra would have a new conductor next season, and a music journal of New York named not long ago Mr. Vincent d'Indy as the coming man. This prophecy fell on deaf ears, for Mr. d'Indy is not a conductor by profession; his time is devoted to composition and the supervision of the Schola Cantorum, in which he is much interested. He was invited to conduct certain concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra this season solely as a prominent representative of the modern French school, and not as a virtuoso or a routine conductor.

Inasmuch as these rumors, at first vague, began to assume a more definite shape, a reporter of The Herald called on Mr. Gericke yesterday afternoon at his home in Brookline. Mr. Gericke received the reporter and when he was asked whether there was any foundation for the reports concerning his resignation and his consequent return to Europe, he courteously gave the desired information.

It appears that Mr. Gericke was offered an engagement as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra for the season of 1906-1907. After due reflection he informed Maj. Henry L. Higginson that he would accept the offer on certain conditions, which he named. These conditions did not meet with Maj. Higginson's approval. Mr. Gericke therefore felt obliged to decline the offer. The correspondence between Maj. Higginson and Mr. Gericke was closed early this week.

The news of Mr. Gericke's resignation will be heard by the lovers of music in this city, and it is not too much to say throughout musical America, with sincere regret; but this is not the time to speak at length of his unwearying devotion to the duties of his position, of his high ideals, of his invaluable services to musical art.

Mr. Gericke, conductor of the court opera of Vienna and of the Gesellschaft's concerts of that city, was invited in 1884 to be conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra. He accepted the invitation, and began his duties in October of that year. He resigned his position in the spring of 1889. Then came Mr. Nikisch (1889-1893) and Mr. Paur (1893-1898). Mr. Gericke was again invited to be the conductor, and he has held the position since the fall of 1898. Thus at the end of this season he will have been the conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra for 13 years.

In answer to a question about his plans for the future, Mr. Gericke said that he should return to Europe. (The orchestra, at the end of this season, will have given at least 111 concerts.) Mr. Gericke had nothing to say about his successor, who he might be.

Wilhelm Gericke, Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra, Who Has Resigned

[Photo by Chickering.]

Boston Transcript
324 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON, MASS.
SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 24, 1906.

IN THE WORLD OF MUSIC

DOES BOSTON HAVE TOO MANY CONCERTS?

Some Curious Contrasts of the Current Season — A Possible Conclusion — Mr. Gericke Repeats Mahler's Symphony — Concerts of Next Week and Weeks to Come.

We are near enough to the end of our [illegible] season to look back discreetly upon [illegible] one of its aspects is already the [illegible] the concerts of the Symphony Orchestra every seat was sold at the auctions last October. The Symphony Quartet has played to audiences that have steadily increased. "The Kneisels" can depend upon a public that fills Potter Hall. Often every seat for the Sunday chamber concerts has been taken, and invariably Chickering Hall has been well filled. The choral concerts of the Handel and Haydn Society and of the Cecilia have attracted their usual audiences. All these concerts take place in series. They are the established things of our musical year. The foresighted in their expenditures upon concerts can anticipate them from the beginning. In all, without counting repetitions of the same programme, there are at least sixty-five of them.

On the other hand, occasional concerts and recitals have had, for the most part, exceptionally small audiences. Mme. Sembrich filled Symphony Hall for her song recital. So for miscellaneous concerts, with their companies, did Mme. Eames and Mme. Calvé. Yet Weingartner, one of the most justly celebrated of living conductors, appeared there for a first and only time in Boston to a beggarly audience. Kubelik, eminent virtuoso though he is, played to only a few hundred more. Mme. Gadski sang to half a house. Mr. Damrosch, his excellent orchestra and Mr. Joseffy attracted not even that In the smaller Jordan Hall, Bauer, Relsenauer, Pugno and Marie Hall, each duly heralded, each of acknowledged interest and worth, have played to only a sprinkling of listeners. Less distinguished pianists and violinists have found even fewer hearers awaiting them in Steinert Hall. Only Mme. Samaroff, the pianist, has been the exception. By common agreement of virtuosi, managers, reviewers and mere observers Boston for the time is indifferent to recitals and occasional concerts.

Explanations, which are largely conjectures, are more plentiful than persuasive. It is not fashionable this winter to go to recitals, say some. But they can discover no tangible sign of this social disdain beyond the empty benches, and these have been as numerous in the cheaper parts of the house as in the dearer. Those that once went to concerts now ride to and fro in their motor cars (say others) and have neither time nor taste for the hearing of music. But it is hard to see how a liking for automobiles need stifle a liking for music, if the two happen to exist in the same person. Others still hint that the prices for these occasional recitals and concerts are too high, but they follow a long-established scale, under which our halls were once well filled. The visiting virtuosi lack wide and conspicuous eminence, according to other inquirers, but not every winter can a Paderewski or Ysayë come to us, and the average this season has not fallen perceptibly below that of recent years. Most plausible explanation of all: our public is content to hear these virtuosi and singers at the regular series of concerts. It expects to find them there and it does in most instances. Indeed, having subscribed to one or two or three of these series, it has no money that it can prudently spend for more concerts, if it is to take any other pleasures.

Perhaps there is one other explanation to suggest, though it may be no more sound than the rest. No permanent orchestra in America gives so many concerts at home in a single season as does ours. Not even New York has so many regular chamber concerts that address themselves to the general musical public. Our choral societies interest a larger part of that public than do those of some other cities. In these three categories are sixty, seventy, even eighty concerts in the course of a season. Add to these the concerts and recitals of visiting and resident singers and virtuosi, and the whole number in proportion to our musical public becomes large, perhaps to surfeiting. For a concert, whether it is orchestral or choral, whether it is a piano or a violin or a song recital, is only one or another variation of a particular sort of musical entertainment, and of a particular form of musical pleasure. Change the sauce as we may, our musical diet in Boston has a fundamental sameness. Perhaps, even, it has become a little dry and severe We may not acknowledge in so many words that we are cloyed and that we should welcome more variety, but our actions this winter toward concerts that are not established institutions speak for us.

They have spoken as positively when that change and variety have come. A few weeks ago Mr. Converse had the courage to put an opera of his own writing on our stage. Local singers, unpractised in such work, sang in it. The band came from our own orchestra. The opera itself was unknown; the conditions under which it was performed were novel. Twice, at doubled prices, large audiences rewarded Mr. Converse. For the third performance that is soon to come at regular prices the audience promises to be still larger. The essential reason is clear: "The Pipe of Desire" gave us the warm, fresh pleasure of opera. It was the change our public in some measure craves to a less dry, cold and monotonous musical dietary. Go to the Meropolitan Opera House in New York at almost any performance, and a Bostonian of modest acquaintance is fairly sure to find other Bostonians in the audience. Last autumn Mr. Savage's company sang six or seven operas for a fortnight here. The shortcomings of the performances were obvious. The merits by no means always offset them. Yet usually the theatre was filled to the last row. Again we were receiving the pleasure of opera and welcoming it. Is it forcing a conclusion to suggest that, positively and negatively, the experience of the current season implies that we are cloyed with occasional concerts and alert for occasional opera? The oftener we have and welcome that occasional opera the nearer draws the time when it will be frequent. Then our musical life will be warmer, brighter, and of more varied and more sensuous pleasure than it is now. And we shall have the more joy of it.

H. T. P.

1/1+11

[179]

Symphony Concert

Mr. Gericke's audience paid him a compliment in the programme of the Symphony concert yesterday, and he could return it almost in kind. "By request," he repeated Mahler's fifth symphony, which he played for the first time three weeks ago. His hearers listened as intently as they had then, and applauded music and performance as heartily. Thus perhaps they were rewarding him for the most impressive new music of the year and for a still more impressive performance of it. He in turn might have congratulated them upon the musical intelligence, curiosity and sympathetic appreciation that had asked for a repetition at the first opportunity. It is good to play to such audiences. It is good also to have a conductor and a band who are capable of such unfolding of music that is not only new but in many respects strange of substance and expression.

It was the day of the announcement of Mr. Gericke's approaching retirement, and he was signalizing it almost ironically, as it seemed, with the most remarkable achievement of all his career here. Mahler's symphony is of huge design and proportions. Yet it is full of intricacies of counterpoint and modulation and of subtly or broadly significant instrumentation. Mr. Gericke shapes the large outlines largely, and within them unwinds intricacies and adjusts and sharpens details. The symphony could seem the fruit of insistent reflection, untiring labor and endless mastery of polyphony and instrumentation. Often Mr. Gericke makes it sound like the inevitable expression of deep thought and deeper feeling. The bigness and intensity of idea and of mood never escape him. Striving for fuller expression of them Mahler may often be, but Mr. Gericke and the band strive sympathetically side by side with him. The listener takes no thought of the virtuosity and the responsiveness of the orchestra or of the understanding, imagination and untiring zeal of the conductor that together accomplish all these things. They vanish in the seeming spontaneity, the fluent flexibility and the pervading intensity of the whole. Mahler's instrumental coloring is the glory of the symphony. The deepest hues, the delicatest half tints, the darkest shadows, the sharpest flashes and the subtlest gradations of that coloring are in Mr. Gericke's and the orchestra's playing of it. At moments you almost see the gesture of genius in the instrumentation.

And what, the curious hearer asks again, were the ideas and moods with which Mahler burned—no other word suits such intense music—as he imagined and wrote and which he would awaken responsively in his listeners? It becomes more and more impossible to take the symphony as music existing for its own sake, for the power and beauty of patterns of sound. The form, the development, the treatment of the music break through such limits. There is the ordered woe "as of a 'funeral train," of the first movement, yet halted and shaken by frenzies of grief. The second movement, which bears a rather close relation here and there to these outbursts, rises seemingly to a passion of revolt, impotence and despair. The glorified dance of the third movement follows, but often the music mocks ironically at the very dance which is its basis. In pleasure is there no comfort, no abiding joy, only vain diversion? The fourth movement is all musing melancholy and the beauty that is near to sadness. Yet it soothes. The fifth is the least understandable of all. What mood lies behind the fugue, the long climax, the choral-like melody? Is it resolution that is almost joyous because it frankly and heartedly accepts life and the world? Perhaps the symphony is a tonal panorama of such highly modern spiritual adventures. At the least it is music to which the thoughts and moods, the aspirations and the sorrows of this our sensitive and introspective generation respond as instantly and closely as they do to Strauss's. And just before, almost as if to emphasize this trait in Mahler's symphony, stood a concerto of Rubinstein, spared memorial as it sounds nowadays of another musical generation, past and gone. Yet it was modern in the seventies. Back of both to carry the contrast highest stood the overture to "Der Freischütz," all subjective music, all music of pure romance. That, happily, knows no generation and lasts.

Two or three years ago, Mr. Converse wrote music to Keats's ballad of "La Belle Dame Sans Merci," setting it for baritone and orchestra. At the next pair of Symphony concerts, on Friday and Saturday, it will be performed for the first time here, with Mr. Bispham singing the baritone part. For more new music the orchestra is to play "Ulysses's Voyage and Shipwreck," one of a series of tone-poems that the Odyssey has suggested to Erast Boehe, a young composer of Munich, none of whose music has yet been heard here. The other orchestral numbers are Mendelssohn's overture, "The Fair Melusina," and Richard Strauss's early and highly pictorial symphony, "In Italy." Mr. Bispham rounds out the programme with the familiar air from Marschner's "Hans Heiling," and an orchestral arrangement of his beloved "Drink to me only with thine eyes."

Mr. Longy's club of virtuosi from the wind choir of the Symphony Orchestra gives the last of its own series of concerts on Monday evening, at eight, in Potter Hall. The programme begins with Kauffmann's quartet for flute, oboe, clarinet, horn and bassoon; continues with five fantasias for piano, oboe and viola, by Klughardt, after Lenan's poems, "Schilflieder," and ends with a "little symphony" by Raff for the whole club of ten. In the middle number Mr. Ferir of the orchestra plays the viola and Mr. de Voto the piano.

REPEAT MAHLER FIFTH SYMPHONY

Orchestra Gives 16th Concert. Mr. Gericke Conductor — Brilliant Execution of Rubinstein Concerto.

MME. CALVE SINGS TO GREAT AUDIENCE

Songstress Awakens Enthusiasm of Her Hearers—Carl Baermann's Piano Recital in Jordan Hall.

The programme of the 16th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Gericke conductor, given last night in Symphony Hall, was as follows:

Overture to "Der Freischuetz".....Weber
Piano concerto in D minor, No. 4..Rubinstein
Symphony No. 5.....Mahler

Mr. Gericke was most warmly and affectionately greeted by the audience when he came forward to conduct the overture to "Der Freischuetz," and after the brilliant performance of it the applause was long continued and in the nature of a peculiarly personal tribute.

Rubinstein's piano concerto in D minor is now about 40 years old, an old age for a modern work of this kind. How many concertos for the piano much younger by the calendar are now dead or moribund! They had their little day; their interpreters were thanked for introducing them; the concertos themselves were described as "striking," "highly original," "remarkable works," and a long life was prophesied; yet where are they now?

When this concerto of Rubinstein was first played by the composer in London in 1867, the leading newspapers and the weekly critical journals abused roundly the music and the pianist. The Saturday Review was especially savage. The concerto was "chaotic, incomprehensible." Some found it without melody and charged with arrogant affectation. The pianist was likened to a rope dancer. He played to the gallery. He insulted the "good sense of an intelligent audience" by daring to play such music.

We have all heard this concerto and some in the audience last night remember Rubinstein's interpretation. Such abuse as was heaped on work and man in London in 1867 seems incredible to us. What will be said 40 years from now of the judgments pronounced today on contemporaneous works? Nevertheless, if we as reasonable beings respect the mature opinion of 1946 on works that are praised or blamed today, let us not stand in awe of the future and refuse to record personal impressions which may amuse some as yet unborn reader of dusty files.

The concerto may still be ranked among the great works of its class, and they are fewer than pianists are willing to admit. It has vital qualities: Elemental strength, poetic and emotional beauty, dramatic touches, imagination. Mr. Hutcheson's performance was thoughtfully considered, clear, logical and virile. It was effective throughout in many respects, and it was admirable in the first and last movements, in sense of proportion, rhythm and sure fleetness. When the music was purely lyrical, Mr. Hutcheson was not heard to such advantage, for his song was not always sustained and it was clear-cut and decided rather than romantic or sensuous. Indeed, at times his touch in the second movement was coolly academic and the music was without atmosphere.

Mahler's fifth symphony, played here for the first time three weeks ago, was repeated last night at the request of many. The Herald published on the Sunday after the performance a long review of the work, and it is not now necessary to speak at length. Another hearing confirmed and strengthened the impressions then made. No ordinary musician of fluent technique and routine experience could have composed it.

The symphony has great and significant qualities. The music now stirs, now leads to meditation. It incites thoughts on life and death. Its melancholy is heroically tragic; there is no whimpering or peevish pessimism. Its complexity is as spontaneous and natural as its simplicity. No orchestral poseur could have imagined the music. The interest is marvellously sustained until the finale, when the contrapuntal measures of what The Herald characterized as the anticipation of some great catastrophe or overwhelming revelation are repeated at so great length that the climax is too long deferred, and when it comes it does not fully satisfy the expectation.

Some have asked concerning this symphony, "What does it mean? What does the composer wish to convey?" For there are some who ask this question concerning any great work of art; they delight in the purely anecdotical. To them nature itself is dull, for she refuses to explain herself. Others rejoice in the fact that Mahler gives no argument, no programme. In such music the hearer must meet the composer at least half way; he must first of all be receptive and willing to listen before he begins to criticise.

The performance of the symphony was again a triumph of orchestral virtuosity due to the indefatigable pains and the sympathetic spirit of Mr. Gericke, who made the band of artists the instrument of his will.

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.

Weber.....Overture to "Der Freischutz"
Rubinstein.....Concerto in D minor, Op. 70
Soloist, Mr. Ernest Hutcheson.
Mahler.....Symphony in C sharp minor, No. 5

When Mr. Gericke came forward to begin the concert there was applause so continuous and prolonged that it seemed as if every auditor wished to impress him that Boston is sorry for the fact that he is going away. At the end of the overture also the plaudits were so emphatic that it was evidently another personal tribute. This is but just, yet we feel that Boston will not fully recognize what it loses until some time in the future.

Some time ago Mr. Gericke confidentially informed the present writer that this would probably be his last Boston season, and we have therefore watched, for the last four months, with especial care, to note whether this was because of failing power or the great fatigue caused by the fearful exigencies of the modern school. We have found our conductor not only vigorous and active, but greater than at any previous epoch in his career.

His programmes have been anything but conservative, and the most difficult of modern works have been interpreted with as much effect as those classical numbers which appeal more especially to Mr. Gericke's taste. The discipline and technique of the orchestra (due to Mr. Gericke more than to any other) have never been better than at present.

Among the names prominently spoken of in connection with the future conductorship are Fritz Steinbach and Gustav Mahler. The position of the latter, in Austria, has recently become rather shaky. Yet we do not believe that the Vienna musical despot would be tolerated in Boston for a single season.

As regards the reading of the overture it was not so exaggerated as the Weingartner interpretation of a few weeks ago, yet it was amply dramatic and struck us as being decidedly more effective. One cannot distort Weber's theatrical touches into anything like the dramatic force of a Berlioz or Strauss, and any effort to do so is wasted.

One can cordially praise the interpretation which Mr. Hutcheson gave of Rubinstein's fourth piano concerto. There was a lack of emotional power in the slow movement, but this was amply atoned for by the excellent ensemble, the careful shading and the perfect surety of other portions of the work. Mr. Hutcheson was recalled several times and he fully earned the popular verdict. That the piano was often prominently in the foreground must be charged to Rubinstein rather than to his interpreter.

The work is unequal and ranges from inspiration to padding. Its first movement is strong enough in spite of its great length, and its great climax in the coda of double octaves was most brilliantly given by Mr. Hutcheson. This exhibits the leonine quality which was in Rubinstein when at his best.

The slow movement is but a thinly disguised piano solo, but, if one does not demand the true concerto structure and effect, it is popular and melodic. The finale exhibits Rubinstein at his worst, for it is wholly manufactured and artificial music. It is the master of routine work making a deliberate display of his wares. But, after all, this is not the only prominent concerto which falls off in its third movement. Even Beethoven managed to fade out somewhat in topping off with such an energetic rondo.

And we had Mahler again! We shudder to think of the possibility of some of the modern works being played to us until we understand them. We cannot say that the work gained on a second hearing. The element of surprise had worn off and the fierce contrasts and sudden "sforzandi" did not seem more effective than at the first performance. We again felt (spite of Mahler's avowed opposition to definite programme-music) that such theatrical music demands an explanation, requires a definite story.

The first movement, the Adagietto (of which the "etto" is a misnomer) and the superbly contrapuntal finale are the best parts of the work, and if Mahler had broken the four-movement rule on the side of brevity instead of prolixity (there are five movements), and had called his work a "Festival Symphony," it might be a welcome addition to the standard repertoire.

We cannot quite appreciate the need of choking off every melody in its infancy, in the manner which is pursued by Mahler. Nor can we quite discover the "raison d'etre" of such overwhelming difficulties as the ultra-moderns insist upon peppering their works with. We have had this fact borne in upon us by a recent examination of the piano score of Strauss' "Salome," which sets a new stunt for the acrobats of the present to surpass. To illustrate where Music, hellish hag (certainly no longer "Heavenly Maid"), has arrived, we may give a few points of the work, which Mahler, Reger and others must now try to surpass.

The chromatics in "Salome" begin with the second note of the score. At times we find the bass in a flat key and the other harmonies in sharps (not in enharmonic unity either), so that the Scriptural precept—"Let not thy right hand know what thy left hand doeth,"—is given a new meaning. All rhythms are interwoven, with a strong predilection for 5-4 and 7-4.

As regards tonality, it has gone so far that it is utterly unnecessary for Strauss to give any key signature to his music, although he still follows the old custom in this.

It is impossible to know whether one is playing true or false, and any misprints could not be detected by any known musical rule. The libretto is a compound of Lust, stifling perfumes and blood, and cannot be read by any woman or fully understood by any one but a physician. Kundry's pleadings with Parsifal, which we once thought rather too strong for decency, are icy and chaste in comparison path is wrong and no one seems to stop long enough to ask—"Whither?" There will be no questioning, but Mahler will sit down at his desk and see if he cannot out-Herod Herod, or rather out-Salome Salome. He has already got a new effect by beating kettle drums with red instead of drumsticks, and in the symphony of Saturday we heard the xylophone, with which Mr. Gericke was forced to replace the striking of blocks of wood which Mahler suggested.

Meanwhile Wagner's "Music of the Future" has become the music of the past, and he is much too simple for the modern neurotic. The new flat is—"In the sweat of thy brow shalt thou hear thy Music!"—and the perspiration of the auditor is much less than that of the conductor and the musicians.

Louis C. Elson.

THE LONGY CLUB CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.

Kauffmann. Wind Quintette.
Klughardt. Schilflieder. Five Fantasies, for Piano, Oboe and Viola.
Raff. Sinfonietta for wind instruments.

In the second of the above numbers Mr. Ferir, the excellent artist of our orchestra, was the viola player, Mr. Longy, the prince of oboe players, performed on the wind instrument, and Mr. De Voto was the pianist. It is a sign of the waning season that we are coming to the last concerts of various series. The Longy Club ends with this concert, the Kneisels end next Tuesday, and one by one the different series will now withdraw. Not one of all these has done better work than the Longy Club. It has been the Kneisel quartette among wind instruments.

Probably the most interesting number of the entire programme was the set of "Schilflieder" by Klughardt, in which Mr. Ferir, Mr. De Voto, and Mr. Longy won a triumph. The tender pensiveness of these five fantasies was very attractive. The melancholy of the viola blended well with the plaintive tone color of the oboe, and the piano formed an adequate support to both. It was pleasant to hear the viola in a prominent role. This instrument is the Cinderella among the strings, a sort of poor relation to the violin and violoncello, and yet it has effects which neither of them can produce.

Mr. Ferir made the most of these, and in the fourth of the set the oboe playing was superb. The first, third and fourth seemed the best movements of this beautiful suite.

Raff had a fatal facility. He could toss off a composition in any form without disturbing his emotional nature a particle. It was said of him that if he desired to write a string quartette he would compose half-a-dozen as experiments and then dash off his composition. No man was a greater master of routine than he.

We find something of this deceptive ease in the sinfonietta which ended this programme. It was suave, flowing, and utterly without effort; but utterly without passion or great emotion as well. It is a dangerous thing to be the Chesterfield of Music. Yet the perfect leading of the voices, the sweet fluency of each movement, had its peculiar charm. Raff had a full comprehension of the tone-colors with which he was dealing, and won the effects that he aimed at. The performance was admirable in its ensemble. It is many years since Boston last heard this pretty Sinfonietta.

The Kauffmann quintette was ingenious rather than inspired. It had some good figure treatment, especially on the bassoon, in the first movement.

There was a good-sized audience present at this concert, in Potter Hall, and the applause showed hearty appreciation of the performance.

Louis C. Elson.

The Longy [illegible] gave the [illegible] concert of this, its sixth [illegible] ing at Potter Hall, and the [illegible] gramme was presented:

Quintet, op. 40, for flute, oboe, [illegible] and bassoon .....
Schilflieder, five fantasias, for [illegible] and viola .....
Sinfonietta, op. 188, for two flutes, oboes, two clarinets, two horns and [illegible] bassoons .....

The first number was pleasing, [illegible] cially in the second movement, a [illegible] that showed much cleverness in the [illegible] ment of the various instruments. [illegible] whole is a work that, while not especially original in ideas, is one that will have value among the limited number of compositions for wind instruments. Klughardt's five little fantasias, suggested by poems of Lenau, are highly interesting and show much originality in treating the unusual combination of viola, oboe and piano. All of these were greatly enjoyed, and Messrs. Longy, Ferir and De Voto were much applauded and recalled.

Raff's sinfonietta is effective in every way, strict in forms, yet melodic in themes which are worked out with a master hand. Raff suffered from too much popularity in his lifetime and thus most of his numerous compositions are now neglected. But there are many of them that have lasting value, and of these the sinfonietta is a conspicuous example. The performance of the work was ideal in every way. The audience was of fair size and always appreciative. Mr. Longy and his associates are to be congratulated for the artistic success of their three concerts this season, which were unique of their kind.

PUBLIC LEDGER
[illegible]
PHILA., PA.
ress
FEB 24 1906
e

[illegible] Philadelphia Opera.

GERICKE TO QUIT ORCHESTRA

Refuses to Continue Next Season as Conductor of Boston Symphony

BOSTON, Feb. 23.—Wilhelm Gericke has resigned as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, his resignation to take effect at the end of the present season. Mr. Gericke was offered the position for next season, and informed Major H. L. Higginson, the head of the organization, that he would accept under certain conditions. Major Higginson did not approve them, and Mr. Gericke declined the offer. He says that he will return to Europe.

Mr. Gericke has been conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for thirteen of the twenty-five years since it was founded, in 1881, by Henry L. Higginson, a Boston banker, who has maintained it ever since as his personal charge.

The first conductor was Georg Henschel, under whom the weekly concerts in Music Hall were established. He went abroad after three years, and was succeeded by Gericke, who had been an assistant conductor at Vienna under Richter and Brahms, and succeeded the latter as leader of the Gesellschaftsconcerte and of the Singverein. Gericke practically reorganized the orchestra, bringing a large number of musicians from Europe, and in five years had brought it to a high perfection of ensemble. He then returned to Vienna, and was succeeded by Arthur Nikisch, who conducted the orchestra for four years, resigning to return to Leipsic, where he has since remained, though constantly in request as a virtuoso conductor at all the musical centres of Europe.

Nikisch was followed at Boston by Emil Paur, from 1893 to 1898, when Mr. Higginson recalled Gericke, who served one five-year term and is now more than half way through another.

Mr. Gericke is a native of Gratz, in Styria, and is now in his sixty-first year. He is a sound musician, widely read in the literature of the orchestra and familiar with its traditions, and while without much individuality of temperament, as a drill master he probably has no superior.

Boston Daily Globe.
TUESDAY, FEB 27, 1906.

LONGY CLUB.

Final Concert of the Season Given in Potter Hall Last Evening.

The final concert of the present season of the Longy club took place last night before a good-sized audience in Potter hall. Fritz Kauffmann Klughardt and Raff were the composers sampled in the program, and it proved a fitting instrumental close to the choice little trio of concerts. Mr Ferir was the assisting artist, playing the resonant viola part for the five quaint "Shilfilieder," taken from Lenau's poems. In this A. de Voto played the by no means easy piano score with sympathetic feeling, and with due appreciation of the "fantasia" atmosphere with which the whole group was invested. Such a simple theme as four notes, for example, may produce, was given a great variety of expression in each of the opening parts of the Klughardt number; the chief interest being found in the curious rhythmical shapes which these skilled musicians can call forth from so imaginative a score. This "solo number" was heartily applauded.

The four-movement Raff "sinfonietta" was delightful, calling for the club's full strength (minus the piano) of 10 instruments. A lovely flute theme and another for the principal clarinet in the allegro movement were features of beauty in this; and the brilliant vivace finale was worthy of the high standard set by the club in all its performances. There was double meaning in the recall of the club after the last number; for it meant not only praise for the season's "swan-song," but it perhaps as plainly said that the Longy club has reached in this sixth season a plane of [illegible], a balance of tone, and general [illegible] it has never

---

INQUIRER
[illegible] PA. ss
FEB 24 1906

CONDUCTOR GERICKE RESIGNS

Popular Leader of Boston Symphony Orchestra to Return to Europe

BOSTON, Feb. 23.—Wilhelm Gericke has resigned as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, his resignation to take effect at the end of the present season.

Mr. Gericke was offered the position for the season of 1906-07, and informed Major H. L. Higginson, the head of the organization, that he would accept under certain conditions. Major Higginson did not approve them, and Mr. Gericke declined the offer. He says he will return to Europe.

Mr. Gericke was conductor of the Symphony Orchestra from 1884 to 1889 and from 1898 until the present time.

REPEAT MAHLER FIFTH SYMPHONY

Orchestra Gives 16th Concert, Mr. Gericke Conductor—Brilliant Execution of Rubinstein Concerto.

MME. CALVE SINGS TO GREAT AUDIENCE

Songstress Awakens Enthusiasm of Her Hearers—Carl Baermann's Piano Recital in Jordan Hall.

The programme of the 16th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Gericke conductor, given last night in Symphony Hall, was as follows:

Overture to "Der Freischuetz".....Weber
Piano concerto in D minor, No. 4..Rubinstein
Symphony No. 5.....Mahler

Mr. Gericke was most warmly and affectionately greeted by the audience when he came forward to conduct the overture to "Der Freischuetz," and after the brilliant performance of it the applause was long continued and in the nature of a peculiarly personal tribute.

Rubinstein's piano concerto in D minor is now about 40 years old, an old age for a modern work of this kind. How many concertos for the piano much younger by the calendar are now dead or moribund! They had their little day; their interpreters were thanked for introducing them; the concertos themselves were described as "striking," "highly original," "remarkable works," and a long life was prophesied; yet where are they now?

When this concerto of Rubinstein was first played by the composer in London in 1867, the leading newspapers and the weekly critical journals abused roundly the music and the pianist. The Saturday Review was especially savage. The concerto was "chaotic, incomprehensible." Some found it without melody and charged with arrogant affectation. The pianist was likened to a rope dancer. He played to the gallery. He insulted the "good sense of an intelligent audience" by daring to play such music.

We have all heard this concerto and some in the audience last night remember Rubinstein's interpretation. Such abuse as was heaped on work and man in London in 1867 seems incredible to us. What will be said 40 years from now of the judgments pronounced today on contemporaneous works? Nevertheless, if we as reasonable beings respect the mature opinion of 1946 on works that are praised or blamed today, let us not stand in awe of the future and refuse to record personal impressions which may amuse some as yet unborn reader of dusty files.

The concerto may still be ranked among the great works of its class, and they are fewer than pianists are willing to admit. It has vital qualities: Elemental strength, poetic and emotional beauty, dramatic touches, imagination. Mr. Hutcheson's performance was thoughtfully considered, clear, logical and virile. It was effective throughout in many respects, and it was admirable in the first and last movements, in sense of proportion, rhythm and sure fleetness. When the music was purely lyrical, Mr. Hutcheson was not heard to such advantage, for his song was not always sustained and it was clear-cut and decided rather than romantic or sensuous. Indeed, at times his touch in the second movement was coolly academic and the music was without atmosphere.

Mahler's fifth symphony, played here for the first time three weeks ago, was repeated last night at the request of many. The Herald published on the Sunday after the performance a long review of the work, and it is not now necessary to speak at length. Another hearing confirmed and strengthened the impressions then made. No ordinary musician of fluent technique and routine experience could have composed it.

The symphony has great and significant qualities. The music now stirs, now leads to meditation. It incites thoughts on life and death. Its melancholy is heroically tragic; there is no whimpering or peevish pessimism. Its complexity is as spontaneous and natural as its simplicity. No orchestral poseur could have imagined the music. The interest is marvellously sustained until the finale, when the contrapuntal measures of what The Herald characterized as the anticipation of some great catastrophe or overwhelming revelation are repeated at so great length that the climax is too long deferred, and when it comes it does not fully satisfy the expectation.

Some have asked concerning this symphony, "What does it mean? What does the composer wish to convey?" For there are some who ask this question concerning any great work of art; they delight in the purely anecdotical. To them nature itself is dull, for she refuses to explain herself. Others rejoice in the fact that Mahler gives no argument, no programme. In such music the hearer must meet the composer at least half way; he must first of all be receptive and willing to listen before he begins to criticise.

The performance of the symphony was again a triumph of orchestral virtuosity due to the indefatigable pains and the sympathetic spirit of Mr. Gericke, who made the band of artists the instrument of his will.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
Established 1813.

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.

Weber.....Overture to "Der Freischutz"
Rubinstein.....Concerto in D minor, Op. 70
Soloist, Mr. Ernest Hutcheson.
Mahler.....Symphony in C sharp minor, No. 5

When Mr. Gericke came forward to begin the concert there was applause so continuous and prolonged that it seemed as if every auditor wished to impress him that Boston is sorry for the fact that he is going away. At the end of the overture also the plaudits were so emphatic that it was evidently another personal tribute. This is but just, yet we feel that Boston will not fully recognize what it loses until some time in the future.

Some time ago Mr. Gericke confidentially informed the present writer that this would probably be his last Boston season, and we have therefore watched, for the last four months, with especial care, to note whether this was because of failing power or the great fatigue caused by the fearful exigencies of the modern school. We have found our conductor not only vigorous and active, but greater than at any previous epoch in his career.

His programmes have been anything but conservative, and the most difficult of modern works have been interpreted with as much effect as those classical numbers which appeal more especially to Mr. Gericke's taste. The discipline and technique of the orchestra (due to Mr. Gericke more than to any other) have never been better than at present.

Among the names prominently spoken of in connection with the future conductorship are Fritz Steinbach and Gustav Mahler. The position of the latter, in Austria, has recently become rather shaky. Yet we do not believe that the Vienna musical despot would be tolerated in Boston for a single season.

As regards the reading of the overture it was not so exaggerated as the Weingartner interpretation of a few weeks ago, yet it was amply dramatic and struck us as being decidedly more effective. One cannot distort Weber's theatrical touches into anything like the dramatic force of a Berlioz or Strauss, and any effort to do so is wasted.

One can cordially praise the interpretation which Mr. Hutcheson gave of Rubinstein's fourth piano concerto. There was a lack of emotional power in the slow movement, but this was amply atoned for by the excellent ensemble, the careful shading and the perfect surety of other portions of the work. Mr. Hutcheson was recalled several times and he fully earned the popular verdict. That the piano was often prominently in the foreground must be charged to Rubinstein rather than to his interpreter.

The work is unequal and ranges from inspiration to padding. Its first movement is strong enough in spite of its great length, and its great climax in the coda of double octaves was most brilliantly given by Mr. Hutcheson. This exhibits the leonine quality which was in Rubinstein when at his best.

The slow movement is but a thinly disguised piano solo, but, if one does not demand the true concerto structure and effect, it is popular and melodic. The finale exhibits Rubinstein at his worst, for it is wholly manufactured and artificial music. It is the master of routine work making a deliberate display of his wares. But, after all, this is not the only prominent concerto which falls off in its third movement. Even Beethoven managed to fade out somewhat in topping off with such an energetic rondo.

And we had Mahler again! We shudder to think of the possibility of some of the modern works being played to us until we understand them. We cannot say that the work gained on a second hearing. The element of surprise had worn off and the fierce contrasts and sudden "sforzandi" did not seem more effective than at the first performance. We again felt (spite of Mahler's avowed opposition to definite programme-music) that such theatrical music demands an explanation, requires a definite story.

The first movement, the Adagietto (of which the "etto" is a misnomer) and the superbly contrapuntal finale are the best parts of the work, and if Mahler had broken the four-movement rule on the side of brevity instead of prolixity (there are five movements), and had called his work a "Festival Symphony," it might be a welcome addition to the standard repertoire.

We cannot quite appreciate the need of choking off every melody in its infancy, in the manner which is pursued by Mahler. Nor can we quite discover the "raison d'etre" of such overwhelming difficulties as the ultra-moderns insist upon peppering their works with. We have had this fact borne in upon us by a recent examination of the piano score of Strauss' "Salome," which sets a new stunt for the acrobats of the present to surpass. To illustrate where Music, hellish hag (certainly no longer "Heavenly Maid"), has arrived, we may give a few points of the work, which Mahler, Reger and others must now try to surpass.

The chromatics in "Salome" begin with the second note of the score. At times we find the bass in a flat key and the other harmonies in sharps (not in enharmonic unity either), so that the Scriptural precept—"Let not thy right hand know what thy left hand doeth,"—is given a new meaning. All rhythms are interwoven, with a strong predilection for 5-4 and 7-4.

As regards tonality, it has gone so far that it is utterly unnecessary for Strauss to give any key signature to his music, although he still follows the old custom in this.

It is impossible to know whether one is playing true or false, and any misprints could not be detected by any known musical rule. The libretto is a compound of Lust, stifling perfumes and blood, and cannot be read by any woman or fully understood by any one but a physician. Kundry's pleadings with Parsifal, which we once thought rather too strong for decency, are icy and chaste in comparison with the love-making of Salome.

...of Jochanaan, the scrubbing dispute of the five Jews with their conflicting dogmas, the dramatic figure treatment, the inflexible reiteration of Salome,—"Ich will den Kopf des Jochanaan!"—and the wonderful Dance of the Seven Veils, which we will undoubtedly soon hear in our symphony concerts, these are all lightning flashes of the musical Jupiter Tonans.

But the path is wrong and no one seems to step long enough to ask—"Whither?" There will be no questioning, but Mahler will sit down at his desk and see if he cannot out-Herod Herod, or rather out-Salome Salome. He has already got a new effect by beating kettle drums with reds instead of drumsticks, and in the symphony of Saturday we heard the xylophone, with which Mr. Gericke was forced to replace the striking of blocks of wood which Mahler suggested.

Meanwhile Wagner's "Music of the Future" has become the music of the past, and he is much too simple for the modern neurotic. The new fiat is—"In the sweat of thy brow shalt thou hear thy Music!"—and the perspiration of the auditor is much less than that of the conductor and the musicians.

Louis C. Elson.

THE LONGY CLUB CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.

Kauffmann. Wind Quintette.
Klughardt. Schilflieder. Five Fantasies, for Piano, Oboe and Viola.
Raff. Sinfonietta for wind instruments.

In the second of the above numbers Mr. Ferir, the excellent artist of our orchestra, was the viola player, Mr. Longy, the prince of oboe players, performed on the wind instrument, and Mr. De Voto was the pianist. It is a sign of the waning season that we are coming to the last concerts of various series. The Longy Club ends with this concert, the Kneisels end next Tuesday, and one by one the different series will now withdraw. Not one of all these has done better work than the Longy Club. It has been the Kneisel quartette among wind instruments.

Probably the most interesting number of the entire programme was the set of "Schilflieder" by Klughardt, in which Mr. Ferir, Mr. De Voto, and Mr. Longy won a triumph. The tender pensiveness of these five fantasies was very attractive. The melancholy of the viola blended well with the plaintive tone color of the oboe, and the piano formed an adequate support to both. It was pleasant to hear the viola in a prominent role. This instrument is the Cinderella among the strings, a sort of poor relation to the violin and violoncello, and yet it has effects which neither of them can produce.

Mr. Ferir made the most of these, and in the fourth of the set the oboe playing was superb. The first, third and fourth seemed the best movements of this beautiful suite.

Raff had a fatal facility. He could toss off a composition in any form without disturbing his emotional nature a particle. It was said of him that if he desired to write a string quartette he would compose half-a-dozen as experiments and then dash off his composition. No man was a greater master of routine than he.

We find something of this deceptive ease in the sinfonietta which ended this programme. It was suave, flowing, and utterly without effort; but utterly without passion or great emotion as well. It is a dangerous thing to be the Chesterfield of Music. Yet the perfect leading of the voices, the sweet fluency of each movement, had its peculiar charm. Raff had a full comprehension of the tone-colors with which he was dealing, and won the effects that he aimed at. The performance was admirable in its ensemble. It is many years since Boston last heard this pretty Sinfonietta.

The Kauffmann quintette was ingenious rather than inspired. It had some good figure treatment, especially on the bassoon, in the first movement.

There was a good-sized audience present at this concert, in Potter Hall, and the applause showed hearty appreciation of the performance.

Louis C. Elson.

Boston Daily Globe.

TUESDAY, FEB 27, 1906.

LONGY CLUB.

Final Concert of the Season Given in Potter Hall Last Evening.

The final concert of the present season of the Longy club took place last night before a good-sized audience in Potter hall. Fritz Kauffmann Klughardt and Raff were the composers sampled in the program, and it proved a fitting instrumental close to the choice little trio of concerts. Mr Ferir was the assisting artist, playing the resonant viola part for the five quaint "Shilflieder," taken from Lenau's poems. In this A. de Voto played the by no means easy piano score with sympathetic feeling, and with due appreciation of the "fantasia" atmosphere with which the whole group was invested. Such a simple theme as four notes, for example, may produce, was given a great variety of expression in each of the opening parts of the Klughardt number; the chief interest being found in the curious rhythmical shapes which these skilled musicians can call forth from so imaginative a score. This "solo number" was heartily applauded.

The four-movement Raff "sinfonietta" was delightful, calling for the club's full strength (minus the piano) of 10 instruments. A lovely flute theme and an other for the principal clarinet in the allegro movement were features of beauty in this; and the brilliant vivace finale was worthy of the high standard set by the club in all its performances. There was double meaning in the recall of the club after the last number; for it meant not only praise for the season's "swan-song," but it perhaps as plainly said that the Longy club has reached in this sixth season a plane of solidity, a balance of tone, and general polish of style it has never shown before.

The Boston Post
The Representative Democratic Paper of New England

Issued daily by Post Publishing Co.
FEBRUARY 27, 1906. NO. 50; VOL. 132
Office, 259 Washington st., Boston, Mass.

LONGY CLUB CONCERT

The Longy Club, assisted by Emile Ferir, viola, gave the third and final concert of this, its sixth season, last evening at Potter Hall, and the following programme was presented:

Quintet, op. 40, for flute, oboe, clarinet, horn and bassoon.....Kauffmann
Schilflieder, five fantasias, for piano, oboe and viola.....Klughardt
Sinfonietta, op. 188, for two flutes, two oboes, two clarinets, two horns and two bassoons.....Raff

The first number was pleasing, especially in the second movement, a scherzo that showed much cleverness in the treatment of the various instruments. The whole is a work that, while not especially original in ideas, is one that will have a value among the limited number of compositions for wind instruments. Klughardt's five little fantasias, suggested by poems of Lenau, are highly interesting, and show much originality in treating the unusual combination of viola, oboe and piano. All of these were greatly enjoyed, and Messrs. Longy, Ferir and De Voto were much applauded and recalled.

Raff's sinfonietta is effective in every way, strict in forms, yet melodic in themes, which are worked out with a master hand. Raff suffered from too much popularity in his lifetime and thus most of his numerous compositions are now neglected. But there are many of them that have lasting value, and of these the sinfonietta is a conspicuous example. The performance of the work was ideal in every way. The audience was of fair size and always appreciative. Mr. Longy and his associates are to be congratulated for the artistic success of their three concerts this season, which were unique of their kind.

PUBLIC LEDGER
n.....
ess.....
e.....
FEB 24 1906

...to the Philadelphia opera.

GERICKE TO QUIT ORCHESTRA

Refuses to Continue Next Season as Conductor of Boston Symphony

BOSTON, Feb. 23.—Wilhelm Gericke has resigned as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, his resignation to take effect at the end of the present season. Mr. Gericke was offered the position for next season, and informed Major H. L. Higginson, the head of the organization, that he would accept under certain conditions. Major Higginson did not approve them, and Mr. Gericke declined the offer. He says that he will return to Europe.

Mr. Gericke has been conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for thirteen of the twenty-five years since it was founded, in 1881, by Henry L. Higginson, a Boston banker, who has maintained it ever since as his personal charge.

The first conductor was Georg Henschel, under whom the weekly concerts in Music Hall were established. He went abroad after three years, and was succeeded by Gericke, who had been an assistant conductor at Vienna under Richter and Brahms, and succeeded the latter as leader of the Gesellschaftsconcerte and of the Singverein. Gericke practically reorganized the orchestra, bringing a large number of musicians from Europe, and in five years had brought it to a high perfection of ensemble. He then returned to Vienna, and was succeeded by Arthur Nikisch, who conducted the orchestra for four years, resigning to return to Leipsic, where he has since remained, though constantly in request as a virtuoso conductor at all the musical centres of Europe.

Nikisch was followed at Boston by Emil Paur, from 1893 to 1898, when Mr. Higginson recalled Gericke, who served one five-year term and is now more than half way through another.

Mr. Gericke is a native of Gratz, in Styria, and is now in his sixty-first year. He is a sound musician, widely read in the literature of the orchestra and familiar with its traditions, and while without much individuality of temperament, as a drill master he probably has no superior.

INQUIRER
...s.....
FEB 24 1906

CONDUCTOR GERICKE RESIGNS

Popular Leader of Boston Symphony Orchestra to Return to Europe

BOSTON, Feb. 23.—Wilhelm Gericke has resigned as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, his resignation to take effect at the end of the present season.

Mr. Gericke was offered the position for the season of 1906-07, and informed Major H. L. Higginson, the head of the organization, that he would accept under certain conditions. Major Higginson did not approve them, and Mr. Gericke declined the offer. He says he will return to Europe.

Mr. Gericke was conductor of the Symphony Orchestra from 1884 to 1889 and from 1898 until the present time.

[180]

...ding Bureau in the World
North AMERICAN
PHILA., PA.
FEB 24 1906

...PHONY LEADER TO QUIT

...ON, Feb. 23.—Wilhelm Gericke has ... as conductor of the Boston Sym... Orchestra, his resignation to take ... at the end of the present season. ... Gericke was offered the position for ... season of 1906-07, and informed Major ... L. Higginson, the head of the organi... tion, that he would accept under cer... conditions. ... ...gginson declined to approve the ... Mr. Gericke says he will re... He was conductor of the ... Orchestra from 1884 to 1889 and ... until the present time.

New York Time
FEB 24 1906

GERICKE WILL LEAVE THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Conductor Resigns Because of Refusal of His Conditions.

WEINGARTNER IS APPROACHED

Col. Higginson and Mr. Gericke Refuse to Tell Anything About Their Differences.

Special to The New York Times.

BOSTON, Feb. 23.—Wilhelm Gericke has resigned as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, his resignation to take effect at the end of the present season, on April 28.

The place was offered to him for the season of 1906-7. He informed Major H. L. Higginson, the head of the organization, that he would accept under certain conditions. Major Higginson did not approve of these conditions and Mr. Gericke thereupon declined the offer. He says he will return to Europe at the close of the season.

Neither Major Higginson nor Director Gericke will talk about the matter. It is declared that Mr. Gericke's determination to leave has been known to his intimates all Winter. Attempts have been made recently to change his decision.

Mr. Gericke was invited in 1884 to be conductor of the orchestra. He accepted the invitation, and began his duties in October of that year. He resigned in the spring of 1889. Then came Mr. Nikisch and Mr. Paur. Mr. Gericke was again invited to be the conductor, and he has held the position since the Autumn of 1898. Thus at the end of his season he will have been the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for thirteen years.

It is said that Felix Weingartner has been approached with an offer to be his successor and has agreed to consider the matter carefully. Mr. Weingartner while in New York recently, however, declared he would not care to live in

...N. Y. EVG. STAATSZEITUNG
...ess
FEB 23 1906

Gericke resignirt.

...irigent Wilhelm Gericke.

...23. Februar. Wilhelm Ge... bewährte Dirigent des Bostoner ... Orchesters, wird am Schlusse ... Saison, am 24. April, von ... seitigen Posten zurücktreten. ... auch für die Spielzeit ... die Leitung des Orchesters von ... Vorstand der Orchester-Orga... Major H. L. Higginson, ange... hatte Dirigent Gericke ... den gewissen Bedingungen ... auf welche Major Hig... sollte, und Gericke's ... Folge. Der verdiente ... am Schlusse der ... zurücktreten.

...m N. Y. TRIBUNE,
...ress
FEB 24 1906
...te

CONDUCTORS' SALARIES.

A dispatch from Boston brings the information of an impending change in the conductorship of the Symphony Orchestra of that city. Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, who is just completing thirteen years of service with that organization, will retire at the end of the present season, leave the field to a newcomer, concerning whom there seems to be a plentiful lack of knowledge, and return to Europe to live out his allotment of days in peace. That he has honorably earned a rest will scarcely be questioned by any honest student of his activities. When he came to America in 1884 he was not quite forty years old, in the prime of his life and at the height of his powers. He worked five years with the Boston Orchestra, and, declining re-engagement, went home to Austria with his nervous system badly shattered. But he was too young to cease work, and so he took up again the leadership of the Gesellschaft Concerte, which he had laid down to accept the Boston engagement. After a European sojourn of nine years, for four of which Mr. Nikisch had filled the Boston post and for five Mr. Paur, he came back to the orchestra which, more through his efforts than those of any other man, had become one of the foremost concert institutions in the world, and he is now completing eight more years of more strenuous labor than he was called on to perform during the formative period of the organization. He has conducted over one hundred concerts each year, more than one-half of them outside of Boston.

When Mr. Gericke came to America his salary was looked upon in some circles as princely, and there were few conductors in Europe who did not envy him his position. But a great change has taken place since then. Conductors have become "star" performers in the eyes of the public, and Mr. Nikisch, who was Mr. Gericke's immediate successor in Boston, is now earning in Europe more than twice the sum each year that Mr. Higginson paid him. The policy of engaging a different conductor for each concert, which was followed for a time in Berlin, and has now become the rule in Vienna, London and other capitals, as well as New-York, has tended to increase the importance of the men who could catch popular attention, not only in the eyes of the directors of concert organizations, but also in their own, and the demands of the "stars" have gone up proportionately. As an illustration, it is reported that Mr. Safonoff has set his figure as conductor of the Philharmonic Society of this city at $20,000 a year, with a set term of three years. Mr. Weingartner has finished the first portion of an engagement for three terms with the New-York Symphony Orchestra and an auxiliary committee, for which he is paid $12,000 for conducting sixteen concerts. It is said that Mr. Mengelberg, of Amsterdam; Mr. Fiedler, of Hamburg; Mr. Schuch, of Dresden, and other European celebrities, when consulted on the subject of an American engagement, all mentioned figures as an annual salary, for which the best of their predecessors much less than a generation ago would have gladly worked for nearly a decade.

We do not know that the question of salary had anything to do with the retirement of Mr. Gericke, though the reference to demands which Mr. Higginson refused to entertain would seem to indicate that monetary as well as other considerations have played a part in the negotiations which have come to nought. They will certainly have much to do with the question of who shall be Mr. Gericke's successor. Mr. Gericke's salary, we believe, was $12,000 a year. If he has asked an advance on this sum proportionate with the demands of Mr. Weingartner or Mr. Safonoff, he must have demanded $75,000 a year at least. The matter does not concern us, except in so far as it has a bearing on the future of orchestral concerts in this city and in all the other cities of America which are laboring to maintain high class orchestral music. With all its prestige and success in its native city and here, the Boston Orchestra is not a money making institution. It cannot be one under existing conditions. The orchestras of Philadelphia, Chicago and Cincinnati and the New-York Symphony Orchestra, with its Weingartner attachment, live only because of large contributions by enthusiastic admirers of orchestral music, the personality of the imported conductor or the cities in which they live. The policy successfully carried out for three years by the Philharmonic Society is also dependent upon the public spirit of a few rich men. But this thing cannot go on. Orchestras cannot count on such benefactions forever. The Pittsburg orchestra seems to be in the throes of dissolution. Under the best of conditions as they have prevailed with reasonable salaries no orchestra has been self-supporting except the Philharmonic Society, whose members do not depend upon their concerts for a living, but take the proceeds in payment of their services, whether they be $25 or $200 each for the season.

It is not likely that any of the permanent orchestras in the cities mentioned will ever be freed from the danger of collapse until they become really permanent through the operation of generous and permanent endowments. To meet the growing demands of the "star" conductors will only hasten the time of dissolution. A conductor, like every other artist, is worth what he can draw. The time is not come as yet when any one of them can take the place in popular admiration of the solo singer and instrumentalist who provides the variety in concert schemes that audiences still crave. This has been demonstrated in New-York this season. If the successor of Mr. Gericke, who earned every cent of his salary, is to be a high priced "star," days like those of Mr. Higginson's early trials will return to that generous and artistic minded gentleman.

H. E. K.

...ORK HERALD
...ess
FEB 24 1906

Mr. Gericke Resigns Leadership.

BOSTON, Mass., Friday.—The resignation of Mr. Wilhelm Gericke from the leadership of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been announced to take effect April 28 next, the date of the last concert of the season.

...W YORK ...
FEB 2R 1906

SONGS AND SINGERS.

Though report has had it for several months that this season would be Wilhelm Gericke's last as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra the confirmation of that town-talk last week by Gericke himself stirred musical circles not only in the Hub but in every city within the Boston orchestra's concert route, and New York in particular. Much as the German conductor's temperamental shortcomings have been decried by those who derive more satisfaction from an interpretation that reflects the essential spirit of a work (though the performance lacks something in euphony and unanimity) than from one in which the emotional content is sacrificed in a measure for technical perfection, Gericke has gained steadily in esteem throughout the musical world of America. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with which his name has become associated almost inseparably, is considered by many whose word carries weight to be the finest body of instrumentalists in the world. So sweeping an opinion can be impugned readily, but it may be accepted as indisputable that Colonel Higginson's band of players is in the front rank of the world's orchestras, and for that every American citizen who takes an interest in the musical standard maintained in his country, irrespective of locality, may feel proud. That Gericke is in great part responsible for the present high standard of the orchestra hardly can be questioned. Conservative in his ideas, scholarly—pedantic, if you will—he hardly enters fully into the spirit of the modern composer. Even Wagner's music, through Gericke's fastidious spectacles, is reduced to classical distinctness of outline, with a corresponding loss of emotional verve and pulse. But the expert musicianship of this man, his keen penetration into detail, his sense of tone-balance and euphony, coupled with his unusual powers as a drill-master, his infinite patience and conscientiousness, have made the Boston Orchestra what it is now—an aggregation of artists whose virtuosity hardly can be surpassed.

Gericke, it seems, received an offer of the post of conductor for the Boston Orchestra for another season. He was unwilling to accept, however, save under certain conditions, to which Henry L. Higginson would not agree. It is Gericke's purpose now to return to Vienna, where formerly he was one of the conductors of the court opera, and directed the Geselschaft concerts. In 1884 Gericke accepted his first call to Boston and held the conductorship of the symphony orchestra until 1889, when he resigned. His successor was Nikisch, who remained in charge until 1893. Nikisch was followed by Emil Paur, now conductor of the Pittsburg orchestra. When Paur's time expired, in 1898, Gericke's services again were enlisted. He has kept his position ever since, thus devoting in all thirteen years of his life to perfecting the ensemble of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and spreading the gospel of music, classic and modern, through many a city and town of the East. The scope of his influence may be judged by examining this season's itinerary. The traveling schedule of the Boston Symphony Orchestra comprises the following places, besides Boston and New York: Montreal, Toronto, Buffalo, Albany, Poughkeepsie, Detroit, Washington, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Brooklyn, Bridgeport, New Haven, Hartford, Springfield, Northampton, Cambridge, Worcester, Providence and Portland. Now that Gericke's departure seems assured, there is speculation as to his successor. No official statement has come from Boston. Gericke himself, when asked for an opinion, had nothing to say. Two men have been suggested—Vincent D'Indy, the French composer, who led the Boston orchestra this year in a set of concerts devoted to his own works, and Felix Weingartner. D'Indy, however, does not make a profession of conducting and his time is occupied fully at home in composing and teaching. Weingartner would seem an ideal man for the Boston Orchestra, combining, as he does, the highest technical powers with fine poetic insight and manly vigor. But for two reasons his engagement seems out of the question. First, he is under contract with Walter Damrosch and the New York Symphony Orchestra for the next two seasons. To be sure, this contract is only for a month's visit to America, but a clause binds Weingartner from appearing with any other American orchestra. Second, it is doubtful whether he would accept Gericke's position (even if he were absolved from his contract with Damrosch), for the simple reason that the salary attached to this post hardly would satisfy a man whose demands are well nigh as exorbitant as those of Richard Strauss. We cannot quote figures; but it is exceedingly doubtful whether Gericke's salary for a long season's work represents as large a sum as that which Damrosch has agreed to pay to Weingartner for a brief concert tour. Higginson's choice, whatever it may be, will be awaited with interest. Richard Strauss seems out of the question. He, too, is an expensive luxury. Gustav Mahler of Vienna? That seems more plausible. Or will the Boston band, perhaps, fall back on Emil Paur? Until the decision is made the musical atmosphere will be pregnant with rumors.

NEW YORK SUN
FEB 24 1906

QUITS BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Gericke, the Famous Conductor, Will Return to Vienna at Close of Season.

BOSTON, Feb. 23.—Wilhelm Gericke will leave the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of the current season, when his contract expires. Major Higginson proposed to him to renew it for the season of 1906-07 on the existing terms, but Mr. Gericke declined. He will return to Vienna. For thirteen years Mr. Gericke has been the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra. He came from the Opera [illegible]

...NEW YORK CITY
FEB 23 1906

GERICKE TO QUIT BOSTON SYMPHON

Conductor Resigns to Take Effect at Season's End—Hammerstein's Opera Scheme—Calve and Others.

That Wilhelm Gericke would not conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra after this season has been informally known for some time. The following Associated Press dispatch from Boston makes it an official matter:

Boston, Feb. 23.—William Gericke has resigned as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, his resignation to take effect at the end of the present season, on April 28. Mr. Gericke was offered the position for the season of 1906-07, and informed Major H. L. Higginson, the head of the organization, that he would accept under certain conditions.

Major Higginson did not approve of these conditions and Mr. Gericke thereupon declined the offer. He says he will return to Europe at the close of the season.

Mr. Gericke was conductor of the Symphony Orchestra from 1884 to 1889 and from 1898 until the present time.

The credit of placing the Boston Symphony Orchestra on the highest level of technical proficiency undoubtedly belongs to Mr. Gericke. He is a drill master unexcelled and he is an authoritative and admirable interpreter of many classic composers, such as Mozart and Schubert, and of certain moderns, Brahms among them. He has been a patient and faithful seeker for what is worth experimenting with, in nearly all the contemporary schools, and he is the most scholarly conductor that New York has known in the past twenty years.

Mr. Gericke's temperamental limitations have been often remarked upon here. He lacks the fire and heat New York music lovers deem essential in Wagner, Tschaikowsky, some of Beethoven's music, and in many romantic and ultra-modern compositions. The occasional swagger needed for Dvorak's "New World" symphony is remote from Mr. Gericke's judicial and gracious soul, and in general, he inclines toward conservatism of personal bent, though in making programmes he has unselfishly gone outside of the area of his own likings.

It is an open secret that Mr. Gericke's methods in rehearsal have proved irksome to the orchestra; he has been called a schoolmaster, but he has nevertheless brought the band's playing to something very near technical perfection.

In short, Mr. Gericke has done much for which no words of praise are too great, but from the public's selfish point of view, it may be that he has given all that he can give, and that it is time for a younger man, a more intense personality, a set of qualities more in sympathy with the American life in which they must make a place.

...m
...ORK HERALD
...ress
FEB 25 1906
...e

Theatrical Jottings.

Mr. Walter Damrosch said yesterday there is no truth in a report that Mr. Felix Weingartner may succeed Mr. Wilhelm Gericke as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He said Mr. Weingartner is under contract with him to conduct concerts with the New York Symphony Orchestra the next two seasons and could not appear with any other American orchestra.

...blished: London, ...

From ...EW YORK PRESS
Address ...
FEB 4 190...

GERICKE TO DROP HIS BATON

Boston Orchestra Leader Will Quit at End of This Season.

Special to The Press.

BOSTON, Feb. 23.—Trouble about contract terms (not necessarily financial ones, but other points) has caused Wilhelm Gericke to resign as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The resignation will take effect at the end of the present season, on April 28. An offer of the position for the season of 1906-07 was made to Gericke recently, and he informed Colonel H. L. Higginson, head of the organization, that he would accept under certain conditions.

Higginson did not approve these conditions, and Gericke thereupon declined the offer. He says he will return to Europe at the close of the season. [illegible] of the Symphony [illegible] returned in 1898 and [illegible] since.

[illegible]

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World
NORTH AMERICAN
FEB 24 1906

SYMPHONY LEADER TO QUIT

BOSTON, Feb. 23.—Wilhelm Gericke has resigned as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, his resignation to take effect at the end of the present season.

Mr. Gericke was offered the position for the season of 1906-07, and informed Major H. L. Higginson, the head of the organization, that he would accept under certain conditions.

Major Higginson declined to approve the stipulation. Mr. Gericke says he will return to Europe. He was conductor of the symphony orchestra from 1884 to 1889 and from 1898 until the present time.

New York Times
FEB 24 1906

GERICKE WILL LEAVE THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Conductor Resigns Because of Refusal of His Conditions.

WEINGARTNER IS APPROACHED

Col. Higginson and Mr. Gericke Refuse to Tell Anything About Their Differences.

Special to The New York Times.

BOSTON, Feb. 23.—Wilhelm Gericke has resigned as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, his resignation to take effect at the end of the present season, on April 28.

The place was offered to him for the season of 1906-7. He informed Major H. L. Higginson, the head of the organization, that he would accept under certain conditions. Major Higginson did not approve of these conditions and Mr. Gericke thereupon declined the offer. He says he will return to Europe at the close of the season.

Neither Major Higginson nor Director Gericke will talk about the matter. It is declared that Mr. Gericke's determination to leave has been known to his intimates all Winter. Attempts have been made recently to change his decision.

Mr. Gericke was invited in 1884 to be conductor of the orchestra. He accepted the invitation, and began his duties in October of that year. He resigned in the Spring of 1889. Then came Mr. Nikisch and Mr. Paur. Mr. Gericke was again invited to be the conductor, and he has held the position since the Autumn of 1898. Thus at the end of his season he will have been the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for thirteen years.

It is said that Felix Weingartner has been approached with an offer to be his successor and has agreed to consider the matter carefully. Mr. Weingartner while in New York recently, however, declared he would not care to live in America.

N. Y. STAATSZEITUNG
FEB 25 1906

Gericke resignirt.

Der verdiente Dirigent des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters tritt im April zurück.

Dirigent Wilhelm Gericke.

Boston, 23. Februar. Wilhelm Gericke, der bewährte Dirigent des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters, wird am Schlusse der jetzigen Saison, am 24. April, von seinem schwierigen Posten zurücktreten. Wohl war ihm auch für die Spielzeit 1906/07 die Leitung des Orchesters von dem Finanzvorstand der Orchester-Organisation, Major H. L. Higginson, angeboten worden, doch hatte Dirigent Gericke seine Annahme von gewissen Bedingungen abhängig gemacht, auf welche Major Higginson nicht eingehen wollte, und Gericke's Resignation war die Folge. Der verdiente Dirigent beabsichtigt, am Schlusse der Saison nach Deutschland zurückzukehren. Die Leitung des berühmten Bostoner Orchesters führte Gericke in [illegible] und hatte

N. Y. TRIBUNE.
FEB 24 1906

CONDUCTORS' SALARIES.

A dispatch from Boston brings the information of an impending change in the conductorship of the Symphony Orchestra of that city. Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, who is just completing thirteen years of service with that organization, will retire at the end of the present season, leave the field to a newcomer, concerning whom there seems to be a plentiful lack of knowledge, and return to Europe to live out his allotment of days in peace. That he has honorably earned a rest will scarcely be questioned by any honest student of his activities. When he came to America in 1884 he was not quite forty years old, in the prime of his life and at the height of his powers. He worked five years with the Boston Orchestra, and, declining re-engagement, went home to Austria with his nervous system badly shattered. But he was too young to cease work, and so he took up again the leadership of the Gesellschaft Concerte, which he had laid down to accept the Boston engagement. After a European sojourn of nine years, for four of which Mr. Nikisch had filled the Boston post and for five Mr. Paur, he came back to the orchestra which, more through his efforts than those of any other man, had become one of the foremost concert institutions in the world, and he is now completing eight more years of more strenuous labor than he was called on to perform during the formative period of the organization. He has conducted over one hundred concerts each year, more than one-half of them outside of Boston.

When Mr. Gericke came to America his salary was looked upon in some circles as princely, and there were few conductors in Europe who did not envy him his position. But a great change has taken place since then. Conductors have become "star" performers in the eyes of the public, and Mr. Nikisch, who was Mr. Gericke's immediate successor in Boston, is now earning in Europe more than twice the sum each year that Mr. Higginson paid him. The policy of engaging a different conductor for each concert, which was followed for a time in Berlin, and has now become the rule in Vienna, London and other capitals, as well as New-York, has tended to increase the importance of the men who could catch popular attention, not only in the eyes of the directors of concert organizations, but also in their own, and the demands of the "stars" have gone up proportionately. As an illustration, it is reported that Mr. Safonoff has set his figure as conductor of the Philharmonic Society of this city at $20,000 a year, with a set term of three years. Mr. Weingartner has finished the first portion of an engagement for three terms with the New-York Symphony Orchestra and an auxiliary committee, for which he is paid $12,000 for conducting sixteen concerts. It is said that Mr. Mengelberg, of Amsterdam; Mr. Fiedler, of Hamburg; Mr. Schuch, of Dresden, and other European celebrities, when consulted on the subject of an American engagement, all mentioned figures as an annual salary, for which the best of their predecessors much less than a generation ago would have gladly worked for nearly a decade.

We do not know that the question of salary had anything to do with the retirement of Mr. Gericke, though the reference to demands which Mr. Higginson refused to entertain would seem to indicate that monetary as well as other considerations have played a part in the negotiations which have come to nought. They will certainly have much to do with the question of who shall be Mr. Gericke's successor. Mr. Gericke's salary, we believe, was $12,000 a year. If he has asked an advance on this sum proportionate with the demands of Mr. Weingartner or Mr. Safonoff, he must have demanded $75,000 a year at least. The matter does not concern us, except in so far as it has a bearing on the future of orchestral concerts in this city and in all the other cities of America which are laboring to maintain high class orchestral music. With all its prestige and success in its native city and here, the Boston Orchestra is not a money making institution. It cannot be one under existing conditions. The orchestras of Philadelphia, Chicago and Cincinnati and the New-York Symphony Orchestra, with its Weingartner attachment, live only because of large contributions by enthusiastic admirers of orchestral music, the personality of the imported conductor or the cities in which they live. The policy successfully carried out for three years by the Philharmonic Society is also dependent upon the public spirit of a few rich men. But this thing cannot go on. Orchestras cannot count on such benefactions forever. The Pittsburg orchestra seems to be in the throes of dissolution. Under the best of conditions as they have prevailed with reasonable salaries no orchestra has been self-supporting except the Philharmonic Society, whose members do not depend upon their concerts for a living, but take the proceeds in payment of their services, whether they be $25 or $200 each for the season.

It is not likely that any of the permanent orchestras in the cities mentioned will ever be freed from the danger of collapse until they become really permanent through the operation of generous and permanent endowments. To meet the growing demands of the "star" conductors will only hasten the time of dissolution. A conductor, like every other artist, is worth what he can draw. The time is not come as yet when any one of them can take the place in popular admiration of the solo singer and instrumentalist who provides the variety in concert schemes that audiences still crave. This has been demonstrated in New-York this season. If the successor of Mr. Gericke, who earned every cent of his salary, is to be a high priced "star," days like those of Mr. Higginson's early trials will return to that generous and artistic minded gentleman.

H. E. K.

FEB 24 1906

Mr. Gericke Resigns Leadership.

BOSTON, Mass., Friday.—The resignation of Mr. Wilhelm Gericke from the leadership of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been announced to take effect April 2[illegible] next, the date of the last concert of the season.

FEB 26 1906

SONGS AND SINGERS.

Though report has had it for several months that this season would be Wilhelm Gericke's last as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra the confirmation of that town-talk last week by Gericke himself stirred musical circles not only in the Hub but in every city within the Boston orchestra's concert route, and New York in particular. Much as the German conductor's temperamental shortcomings have been decried by those who derive more satisfaction from an interpretation that reflects the essential spirit of a work (though the performance lacks something in euphony and unanimity) than from one in which the emotional content is sacrificed in a measure for technical perfection, Gericke has gained steadily in esteem throughout the musical world of America. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with which his name has become associated almost inseparably, is considered by many whose word carries weight to be the finest body of instrumentalists in the world. So sweeping an opinion can be impugned readily, but it may be accepted as indisputable that Colonel Higginson's band of players is in the front rank of the world's orchestras, and for that every American citizen who takes an interest in the musical standard maintained in his country, irrespective of locality, may feel proud. That Gericke is in great part responsible for the present high standard of the orchestra hardly can be questioned. Conservative in his ideas, scholarly—pedantic, if you will—he hardly enters fully into the spirit of the modern composer. Even Wagner's music, through Gericke's fastidious spectacles, is reduced to classical distinctness of outline, with a corresponding loss of emotional verve and pulse. But the expert musicianship of this man, his keen penetration into detail, his sense of tone-balance and euphony, coupled with his unusual powers as a drill-master, his infinite patience and conscientiousness, have made the Boston Orchestra what it is now—an aggregation of artists whose virtuosity hardly can be surpassed.

Gericke, it seems, received an offer of the post of conductor for the Boston Orchestra for another season. He was unwilling to accept, however, save under certain conditions, to which Henry L. Higginson would not agree. It is Gericke's purpose now to return to Vienna, where formerly he was one of the conductors of the court opera and directed the Geselschaft concerts. In 1884 Gericke accepted his first call to Boston and held the conductorship of the symphony orchestra until 1889, when he resigned. His successor was Nikisch, who remained in charge until 1893. Nikisch was followed by Emil Paur, now conductor of the Pittsburg orchestra. When Paur's time expired, in 1898, Gericke's services again were enlisted. He has kept his position ever since, thus devoting in all thirteen years of his life to perfecting the ensemble of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and spreading the gospel of music, classic and modern, through many a city and town of the East. The scope of his influence may be judged by examining this season's itinerary. The traveling schedule of the Boston Symphony Orchestra comprises the following places, besides Boston and New York: Montreal, Toronto, Buffalo, Albany, Poughkeepsie, Detroit, Washington, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Brooklyn, Bridgeport, New Haven, Hartford, Springfield, Northampton, Cambridge, Worcester, Providence and Portland. Now that Gericke's departure seems assured, there is speculation as to his successor. No official statement has come from Boston. Gericke himself, when asked for an opinion, had nothing to say. Two men have been suggested—Vincent D'Indy, the French composer, who led the Boston orchestra this year in a set of concerts devoted to his own works, and Felix Weingartner. D'Indy, however, does not make a profession of conducting and his time is occupied fully at home in composing and teaching. Weingartner would seem an ideal man for the Boston Orchestra, combining, as he does, the highest technical powers with fine poetic insight and manly vigor. But for two reasons his engagement seems out of the question. First, he is under contract with Walter Damrosch and the New York Symphony Orchestra for the next two seasons. To be sure, this contract is only for a month's visit to America, but a clause binds Weingartner from appearing with any other American orchestra. Second, it is doubtful whether he would accept Gericke's position (even if he were absolved from his contract with Damrosch), for the simple reason that the salary attached to this post hardly would satisfy a man whose demands are well nigh as exorbitant as those of Richard Strauss. We cannot quote figures; but it is exceedingly doubtful whether Gericke's salary for a long season's work represents as large a sum as that which Damrosch has agreed to pay to Weingartner for a brief concert tour. Higginson's choice, whatever it may be, will be awaited with interest. Richard Strauss seems out of the question. He, too, is an expensive luxury. Gustav Mahler of Vienna? That seems more plausible. Or will the Boston band, perhaps, fall back on Emil Paur? Until the decision is made the musical atmosphere will be pregnant with rumors.

NEW YORK SUN
FEB 24 1906

QUITS BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Gericke, the Famous Conductor, Will Return to Vienna at Close of Season.

BOSTON, Feb. 23.—Wilhelm Gericke will leave the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of the current season, when his contract expires. Major Higginson proposed to him to renew it for the season of 1906-07 on the existing terms, but Mr. Gericke declined. He will return to Vienna. For thirteen years Mr. Gericke has been the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra. He came from the Opera House in Vienna.

MAIL
FEB 23 1906

GERICKE TO QUIT BOSTON SYMPHONY

Conductor Resigns to Take Effect at Season's End—Hammerstein's Opera Scheme—Calve and Others.

That Wilhelm Gericke would not conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra after this season has been informally known for some time. The following Associated Press dispatch from Boston makes it an official matter:

Boston, Feb. 23.—William Gericke has resigned as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, his resignation to take effect at the end of the present season, on April 28. Mr. Gericke was offered the position for the season of 1906-07, and informed Major H. L. Higginson, the head of the organization, that he would accept under certain conditions.

Major Higginson did not approve of these conditions and Mr. Gericke thereupon declined the offer. He says he will return to Europe at the close of the season.

Mr. Gericke was conductor of the Symphony Orchestra from 1884 to 1889 and from 1898 until the present time.

The credit of placing the Boston Symphony Orchestra on the highest level of technical proficiency undoubtedly belongs to Mr. Gericke. He is a drill master unexcelled and he is an authoritative and admirable interpreter of many classic composers, such as Mozart and Schubert, and of certain moderns, Brahms among them. He has been a patient and faithful seeker for what is worth experimenting with, in nearly all the contemporary schools, and he is the most scholarly conductor that New York has known in the past twenty years.

Mr. Gericke's temperamental limitations have been often remarked upon here. He lacks the fire and heat New York music lovers deem essential in Wagner, Tschaikowsky, some of Beethoven's music, and in many romantic and ultra-modern compositions. The occasional swagger needed for Dvorak's "New World" symphony is remote from Mr. Gericke's judicial and gracious soul, and in general, he inclines toward conservatism of personal bent, though in making programmes he has unselfishly gone outside of the area of his own likings.

It is an open secret that Mr. Gericke's methods in rehearsal have proved irksome to the orchestra; he has been called a schoolmaster, but he has nevertheless brought the band's playing to something very near technical perfection.

In short, Mr. Gericke has done much for which no words of praise are too great, but from the public's selfish point of view, it may be that he has given all that he can give, and that it is time for a younger man, a more intense personality, a set of qualities more in sympathy with the American life in which they must make a place.

Theatrical Jottings.

Mr. Walter Damrosch said yesterday there is no truth in a report that Mr. Felix Weingartner may succeed Mr. Wilhelm Gericke as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He said Mr. Weingartner is under contract with him to conduct concerts with the New York Symphony Orchestra the next two seasons and could not appear with any other American orchestra.

Published: [illegible]

From

Address

GERICKE TO DROP HIS BATON

Boston Orchestra Leader Will Quit at End of This Season.

Special to The Press.

BOSTON, Feb. 23.—Trouble about contract terms (not necessarily financial ones, but other points) has caused Wilhelm Gericke to resign as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The resignation will take effect at the end of the present season, on April 28. An offer of the position for the season of 1906-07 was made to Gericke recently, and he informed Colonel H. L. Higginson, head of the organization, that he would accept under certain conditions.

Higginson did not approve these conditions, and Gericke thereupon declined the offer. He says he will return to Europe at the close of the season. He was conductor of the Symphony Orchestra from 1884 to 1889, returned in 1898 and has been in charge ever since.

[181]

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
INDEPENDENT.
NEW YORK CITY
FEB 22 1906

The Boston Orchestra and a New Symphony

The first performance of the latest symphony thus far given to the world by Gustav Mahler was given last month in New York by the Boston Symphony. Mahler today occupies a position almost unique among living composers as an avowed and persistent writer of symphonies—most of his fellow musicians are casting their creations in other forms than that of the symphony. He was born in Kalischt, Bohemia, in 1860, and was a pupil of Anton Brückner. He is director and also conductor of the Vienna Opera. He has been known for several years as one of the ablest musicians of his time and as a man of remarkably strong individuality. Thruout the music loving and music practicing countries of Central Europe he is regarded today as standing in the forefront of living composers, beside Richard Strauss (whom, by the way, he considers not as a rival but as a pioneer and leader who has opened a path for him and his colleagues).

The symphony brought to our attention by Mr. Gericke last week is Mahler's fifth, in C sharp minor. It is a work of vast dimension, lasting a full hour in performance. It displays the composer's command of all the resources of modern orchestral writing, and it divulges his skill as a symphonist much better than did his fourth symphony, the only one heretofore heard in New York. Mr. Gericke is to be thanked for bringing it to performance, and it is to be hoped that he will repeat it at no distant day.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
THE MORNING TELEGRAPH
NEW YORK CITY.
FEB 24 1906

GERICKE TO LEAVE BOSTON SYMPHONY

Mr. William Gericke has resigned from the Boston Symphony Orchestra. His resignation will take effect at the end of the present season. Mr. Gericke was ready to undertake the duties for another year, provided Henry L. Higginson, who is the chief support of the orchestra, could have been persuaded to accept certain of Mr. Gericke's conditions. Mr. Higginson did not agree to these conditions, and Mr. Gericke's resignation has become effective. Under Mr. Gericke's direction the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has become unrivalled in its capacity for a musical execution almost perfect. He is scholarly, accurate and musicianly, and his rendering of the works of earlier composers has invariably been on a plane of singular sweetness and beauty.

He lacked perhaps that explosive romnticism which so many deem necessary to a conductor of Wagnerian works. Nevertheless his Wagnerian selections have always been played with an exquisite scholarship, which at times threw a new and clearer light upon their meaning and their poetry.

Mr. Gericke is a disciplinarian, and his severe, but nevertheless effective rehearsal methods have given "offence" to the musical mechanics he has succeeded in drilling into one of the most excellent musical organisations of the day. It is persistently rumored that his successor will not be Vincent d'Indy, who is a composer and not a conductor, but Herr Doctor Muck, of Berlin, who is one of the few conductors of eminence at present open to an engagement.

N. Y. EV'G WORLD
FEB 23 1906

Leaves Boston Symphony.

BOSTON, FEB. 23.—Wilhelm Gericke has resigned as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, his resignation to take effect at the end of the present season, on April 28. Mr. Gericke has been connected with the orchestra from its organization in 1884 to 1889 and from 1898 until the present time. He will return to Europe.

REVUE
NEW YORK CITY.
FEB 25 1906

Der musikalische Dirigent des Bostoner Symphonieorchesters, Herr Wilhelm Gericke, dessen Bild der Leser an anderer Stelle des Blattes findet, wird seine Stellung mit Schluß der Saison niederlegen und sich dauernd in Wien niederlassen. Gericke hatte die Stellung zuerst in den Jahren 1884—89 dann wiederum seit 1898 als Nachfolger Paur's inne. Seine Verdienste als kenntnißreicher Musiker und Orchesterleiter sind unbestritten. Aus konservativer Schulung hervorgegangen, versagte sein Interesse doch auch der modernen Richtung gegenüber nicht. Allerdings vermochte sein ausgeprägter Sinn für Korrektheit und Ausfeilung nicht ganz den stärkeren neuzeitlichen Impulsen gerecht zu werden. Die hohe Stufe seiner Ausbildung verdankt das Bostoner Orchester der peinlich gewissenhaften Arbeit Gericke's zum großen Theil.

In Verbindung mit der Nachfolge Gericke's wird Felix Weingartner genannt. Doch ist, selbst wenn ihm die Stellung angeboten worden ist, seine Annahme kaum wahrscheinlich. Weingartner hat noch für zwei weitere Jahre einen Gastspielvertrag mit Walther Damrosch und wird sich nicht bereit finden, ganz nach Amerika zu übersiedeln.

Auch Vincent d'Indy ist genannt worden. Da aber d'Indy eigentlich nicht Dirigent von Fach ist, wird die Bemühung einiger sonderbarer Bostoner Schwärmer noch nicht ausreichen, ihm den Posten zu sichern.

Man geht kaum fehl in der Annahme, daß auch Dr. Kunwald sich Hoffnung auf die Stellung gemacht und sein hiesiges Gastspiel als Probedirigiren für dieselbe betrachtet hat.

GERMAN HERC
NEW YORK CITY.
FEB 23 1906

Gericke tritt zurück.

Der Leiter des Boston Symphonie-Orchesters verläßt die Bohnenstadt.

Boston, 28. Febr. Wilhelm Gericke tritt von der Leitung des Boston Symphonie-Orchesters zurück; die Resignation wird am Ende der Saison, das auf den 28. April fällt, in Kraft treten. Man hatte Herrn Gericke die Stellung auch für die Saison 1906—07 angeboten und Major H. L. Higginson war als das Haupt der Organisation informirt worden, daß er sie unter bestimmten Bedingungen annehmen werde. Major Higginson wollte diese Bedingungen nicht annehmen und so wies Herr Gericke das Anerbieten ab. Er will nach Europa zurückkehren, wenn die Saison vorbei ist.

Herr Gericke war Dirigent des Boston Symphonie-Orchesters von 1884—89 und von 1898 bis zur gegenwärtigen Zeit.

NEW YORK CITY
FEB 24 1906

Who will succeed Wilhelm Gericke as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra? The man most conspicuously fitted for the post probably would refuse it if offered. That man is Felix Weingartner, whose love of a more leisurely life than this position allows is well known.

After Weingartner, who? There have been rumors of some young leader from abroad, who is comparatively unknown here. At any rate, there will be no lack of applicants for what is undoubtedly the leading orchestral post in America.

FEB 24 1906

Dirigent Gericke resignirt.

Boston, Mass., 23. Februar. Wilhelm Gericke, Dirigent des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters, wird am Schlusse der jetzigen Saison, am 24. April, von seinem Posten zurücktreten. Wohl war ihm auch für die Spielzeit 1906/07 die Leitung des Orchesters von dem Finanzvorstand der Orchester-Organisation, Major H. L. Higginson, angeboten worden, doch hatte Dirigent Gericke seine Annahme von gewissen Bedingungen abhängig gemacht, auf welche Major Higginson nicht eingehen wollte, und Gericke's Resignation war die Folge. Herr Gericke beabsichtigt, am Schlusse der Saison nach Deutschland zu übersiedeln. Die Leitung des berühmten Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters [illegible]

From
NEW YORK CITY.
Address
FEB 24 1906
Date

Mahler's Fifth Symphony Heard in New York

The performance of the fifth Symphony by Mahler at the Boston Symphony concert on February fifteenth was an event of great interest to musicians—as it was its first performance in New York.

The Symphony is a big work containing many themes skillfully handled, some of which are beautiful. It is a strong work, requiring a large orchestra, which the composer treats with skill and authority, but it is not always a convincing work, as one of a great genius. The performance of the symphony takes one hour, and, throughout, the audience was most attentive and interested. The opening number of the programme was the beautiful "Egmont" Overture by Beethoven, which was played with great finish, but without much dramatic coloring. The Schumann Concerto in A Minor was played by Harold Bauer, with charm and grace, but it lacked somewhat in depth of feeling. It was, however, thoroughly artistic.

Miss Marie Hall was the violinist at the concert on February seventeenth playing the beautiful Mendelssohn concerto with great beauty of tone and artistic finish. Especially well and sympathetically played was the second movement. Mr. Heinrich Gebhard played the piano in the D'Indy Symphony for piano with orchestra which was recently heard at a New York Symphony concert with the assistance of Mr. Pugno. Mr. Gebbard's work was that of a musician, and his recitals in the near future will be heard with interest. The Hayden Symphony was played with all of the freshness and charm which are peculiar to that composer.

m
N. Y. TRIBUNE.
Address
FEB 24 1906
Date

MUSIC.

RETIREMENT OF MR. GERICKE.

[By Telegraph to The Tribune.]

Boston, Feb. 23.—Negotiations which have been pending for several weeks between Mr. Higginson and Mr. Gericke are at an end, and next year will see a new conductor at the head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Who the successor of Mr. Gericke will be seems to be known only to that successor himself and Mr. Higginson, if indeed it is known to any one. There has been a great deal of speculation ever since it began to be bruited about that Mr. Gericke would not return to the position which he has held so long. Each of the conductors who have come to America to conduct concerts of the Philharmonic Society in New-York has been mentioned in turn, and gossip has also dallied with the names of Muck, of Berlin; Schuch, of Dresden, and d'Indy, of Paris. While this speculation was in progress, however, Mr. Higginson was negotiating with Mr. Gericke for his return next autumn, and a decision does not seem to have been reached till the return of the orchestra from a visit to Buffalo in the early part of this week. It now develops that Mr. Gericke made demands which Mr. Higginson was unwilling to concede, and that the conductor has signified his intention of retiring from active work and making his home in his native Austria.

It was reported here to-night that Felix Weingartner might succeed Mr. Gericke.

TIMES
FEB 20 1906

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA CONCERT A RARE TREAT

The concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Convention Hall, last night, under the direction of Wilhelm Gericke, was conceded by the large audience present to be one of the principal musical events of the season. Convention Hall was packed to the doors with a representative audience and to say that those there simply enjoyed the performance would be offering a ridiculously poor impression of the musical talent of that musical body. The audience was enraptured by the beautiful strains from the sweet toned instruments. At the conclusion of each selection the audience applauded for several successive minutes.

The program opened with Goldmark's beautiful Spring overture. This particular piece taxed the merits of the orchestra to the utmost but the result was declared perfect. The other numbers included Tannhauser's Bacchanale, as played on the Paris Opera House stage; the rarely heard fourth symphony in F minor. The three works contain a richness of variety and coloring and the contrast between the three pieces is wide.

The delightful voice of Miss Edyth Walker, mezzo-soprano of the Metropolitan Opera House, and the accomplished 'cello playing of Miss Elsa Ruegger, were features of the splendid performance.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
REVUE
NEW YORK CITY.
FEB 25 1906

Weingartner bei Damrosch.

Contract schließt die Uebernahme des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters aus.

Walter Damrosch äußerte sich gestern anläßlich des auch in unseren Musikspalten registrirten Gerüchts, daß vielleicht Felix Weingartner als Nachfolger von Wilhelm Gericke Dirigent des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters werden würde, Herr Weingartner stehe mit ihm unter Contrakt während der Saisons 1905-6, 1906-7 und 1907-8, auf je einen Monat nach den Ver. Staaten zu kommen, um Concerte des New Yorker Symphonie-Orchesters zu dirigiren, und unter diesem Contrakte könne er so lange mit keinem anderen amerikanischen Orchester auftreten. Herr Weingartner ist bekanntlich nach Erfüllung seines diesjährigen Engagements am 17. Februar wieder nach Europa abgereist.

m
THE MORNING TELEGRAPH
ress
NEW YORK CITY.
e
FEB 25 1906

UNDER BOND TO DAMROSCH

Weingartner Says New York Conductor Cannot Take Gericke's Place.

Walter Damrosch said yesterday, regarding the rumor that Felix Weingartner might succeeded Wilhelm Gericke as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, that Mr. Weingartner was under contract with him to spend one month in the United States during the seasons of 1905-1906, 1906-1907 and 1907-1908, and to conduct concerts with the New York Symphony Orchestra, and that according to this contract he could not appear with any other American orchestra.

Mr. Weingartner sailed for Europe on February 17, after completing his engagement for the present season.

N. Y. EV'G SUN
FEB 23 19

GERICKE RESIGNS,

Boston Symphony Orchestra to Have a New Conductor.

BOSTON, Feb. 23.—Wilhelm Gericke has resigned his post as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra. [illegible] nation will take effect at the end of the season, the twenty-fifth of the [illegible] The last concert of the season [illegible] April 28.

There have been rumors of [illegible] in New York, to the effect that [illegible] would have a new conductor at [illegible] and a music journal of [illegible] not long ago, Mr. Vincent [illegible] coming year. This [illegible] cern for Mr. D'Indy [illegible] occasion. He [illegible]

[182]

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
THE MORNING TELEGRAPH
NEW YORK CITY
FEB 24 1906

The Boston Orchestra and a New Symphony

The first performance of the latest symphony thus far given to the world by Gustav Mahler was given last month in New York by the Boston Symphony. Mahler today occupies a position almost unique among living composers as an avowed and persistent writer of symphonies—most of his fellow musicians are casting their creations in other forms than that of the symphony. He was born in Kalischt, Bohemia, in 1860, and was a pupil of Anton Brückner. He is director and also conductor of the Vienna Opera. He has been known for several years as one of the ablest musicians of his time and as a man of remarkably strong individuality. Thruout the music loving and music practicing countries of Central Europe he is regarded today as standing in the forefront of living composers, beside Richard Strauss (whom, by the way, he considers not as a rival but as a pioneer and leader who has opened a path for him and his colleagues).

The symphony brought to our attention by Mr. Gericke last week is Mahler's fifth, in C sharp minor. It is a work of vast dimension, lasting a full hour in performance. It displays the composer's command of all the resources of modern orchestral writing, and it divulges his skill as a symphonist much better than did his fourth symphony, the only one heretofore heard in New York. Mr. Gericke is to be thanked for bringing it to performance, and it is to be hoped that he will repeat it at no distant day.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
THE MORNING TELEGRAPH
NEW YORK CITY
FEB 24 1906

GERICKE TO LEAVE BOSTON SYMPHONY

Mr. William Gericke has resigned from the Boston Symphony Orchestra. His resignation will take effect at the end of the present season. Mr. Gericke was ready to undertake the duties for another year, provided Henry L. Higginson, who is the chief support of the orchestra, could have been persuaded to accept certain of Mr. Gericke's conditions. Mr. Higginson did not agree to these conditions, and Mr. Gericke's resignation has become effective. Under Mr. Gericke's direction the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has become unrivalled in its capacity for a musical execution almost perfect. He is scholarly, accurate and musicianly, and his rendering of the works of earlier composers has invariably been on a plane of singular sweetness and beauty.

He lacked perhaps that explosive romnticism which so many deem necessary to a conductor of Wagnerian works. Nevertheless his Wagnerian selections have always been played with an exquisite scholarship, which at times threw a new and clearer light upon their meaning and their poetry.

Mr. Gericke is a disciplinarian, and his severe, but nevertheless effective rehearsal methods have given "offence" to the musical mechanics he has succeeded in drilling into one of the most excellent musical organizations of the day. It is persistently rumored that his successor will not be Vincent d'Indy, who is a composer and not a conductor, but Herr Doctor Muck, of Berlin, who is one of the few conductors of eminence at present open to an engagement.

N. Y. EV'G WORLD
FEB 23 1906

Leaves Boston Symphony.

BOSTON, FEB. 23.—Wilhelm Gericke has resigned as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, his resignation to take effect at the end of the present season, on April 28. Mr. Gericke was conductor of the orchestra from 1884 to 1889 and from 1898 until the present time. He will return to Europe.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
REVUE
NEW YORK CITY.
FEB 5 1906

Der ausgezeichnete Dirigent des Bostoner Symphonieorchesters, Herr Wilhelm Gericke, dessen Bild der Leser an anderer Stelle des Blattes findet, wird seine Stellung mit Schluß der Saison niederlegen und sich dauernd in Wien niederlassen. Gericke hatte die Stellung zuerst in den Jahren 1884—89, dann wiederum seit 1898 als Nachfolger Paur's inne. Seine Verdienste als kenntnißreicher Musiker und Orchesterleiter sind unbestritten. Aus konservativer Schulung hervorgegangen, versagte sein Interesse doch auch der modernen Richtung gegenüber nicht. Allerdings vermochte sein ausgeprägter Sinn für Korrektheit und Ausfeilung nicht ganz den stärkeren neuzeitlichen Impulsen gerecht zu werden. Die hohe Stufe seiner Ausbildung verdankt das Bostoner Orchester der peinlich gewissenhaften Arbeit Gericke's zum großen Theil.

In Verbindung mit der Nachfolge Gericke's wird Felix Weingartner genannt. Doch ist, selbst wenn ihm die Stellung angeboten worden ist, seine Annahme kaum wahrscheinlich. Weingartner hat noch für zwei weitere Jahre einen Gastspielvortrag mit Walther Damrosch und wird sich nicht bereit finden, ganz nach Amerika zu übersiedeln.

Auch Vincent d'Indy ist genannt worden. Da aber d'Indy eigentlich nicht Dirigent von Fach ist, wird die Bemühung einiger sonderbarer Bostoner Schwärmer noch nicht ausreichen, ihm den Posten zu sichern.

Man geht kaum fehl in der Annahme, daß auch Dr. Kunwald sich Hoffnung auf die Stellung gemacht und sein hiesiges Gastspiel als Probedirigiren für dieselbe betrachtet hat.

GERMAN HERALD
FEB 3 1906

Gericke tritt zurück.

Der Leiter des Boston Symphonie-Orchesters verläßt die Bohnenstadt.

Boston, 23. Febr. Wilhelm Gericke tritt von der Leitung des Boston Symphonie-Orchesters zurück; die Resignation wird am Ende der Saison, das auf den 28. April fällt, in Kraft treten. Man hatte Herrn Gericke die Stellung auch für die Saison 1906—07 angeboten und Major H. L. Higginson war als das Haupt der Organisation informirt worden, daß er sie unter bestimmten Bedingungen annehmen werde. Major Higginson wollte diese Bedingungen nicht annehmen und so wies Herr Gericke das Anerbieten ab. Er will nach Europa zurückkehren, wenn die Saison vorbei ist.

Herr Gericke war Dirigent des Boston Symphonie-Orchesters von 1884—89 und von 1898 bis zur gegenwärtigen Zeit.

MAIL
CITY.

Who will succeed Wilhelm Gericke as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra? The man most conspicuously fitted for the post probably would refuse it if offered. That man is Felix Weingartner, whose love of a more leisurely life than this position allows is well known.

After Weingartner, who? There have been rumors of some young leader from abroad, who is comparatively unknown here. At any rate, there will be no lack of applicants for what is undoubtedly the leading orchestral post in America.

FEB 24 1906

Dirigent Gericke resignirt.

Boston, Mass., 23. Februar. Wilhelm Gericke, Dirigent des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters, wird am Schlusse der jetzigen Saison, am 24. April, von seinem Posten zurücktreten. Wohl war ihm auch für die Spielzeit 1906/07 die Leitung des Orchesters von dem Finanzvorstand der Orchester-Organisation, Major H. L. Higginson, angeboten worden, doch hatte Dirigent Gericke seine Annahme von gewissen Bedingungen abhängig gemacht, auf welche Major Higginson nicht eingehen wollte, und Gericke's Resignation war die Folge. Herr Gericke beabsichtigt, am Schlusse der Saison nach Deutschland zurückzukehren. Die Leitung des berühmten Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters führte Gericke in den Jahren 1884 bis 1889 und dann wiederum von 1898 bis zur jetzigen Zeit.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
TOWN & COUNTRY
NEW YORK CITY
FEB 24 1906

Mahler's Fifth Symphony Heard in New York

The performance of the fifth Symphony by Mahler at the Boston Symphony concert on February fifteenth was an event of great interest to musicians—as it was its first performance in New York.

The Symphony is a big work containing many themes skillfully handled, some of which are beautiful. It is a strong work, requiring a large orchestra, which the composer treats with skill and authority, but it is not always a convincing work, as one of a great genius. The performance of the symphony takes one hour, and, throughout, the audience was most attentive and interested. The opening number of the programme was the beautiful "Egmont" Overture by Beethoven, which was played with great finish, but without much dramatic coloring. The Schumann Concerto in A Minor was played by Harold Bauer, with charm and grace, but it lacked somewhat in depth of feeling. It was, however, thoroughly artistic.

Miss Marie Hall was the violinist at the concert on February seventeenth playing the beautiful Mendelssohn concerto with great beauty of tone and artistic finish. Especially well and sympathetically played was the second movement. Mr. Heinrich Gebhard played the piano in the D'Indy Symphony for piano with orchestra which was recently heard at a New York Symphony concert with the assistance of Mr. Pugno. Mr. Gebbard's work was that of a musician, and his recitals in the near future will be heard with interest. The Hayden Symphony was played with all of the freshness and charm which are peculiar to that composer.

FEB 24 1906

MUSIC.

RETIREMENT OF MR. GERICKE.

[By Telegraph to The Tribune.]

Boston, Feb. 23.—Negotiations which have been pending for several weeks between Mr. Higginson and Mr. Gericke are at an end, and next year will see a new conductor at the head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Who the successor of Mr. Gericke will be seems to be known only to that successor himself and Mr. Higginson, if indeed it is known to any one. There has been a great deal of speculation ever since it began to be bruited about that Mr. Gericke would not return to the position which he has held so long. Each of the conductors who have come to America to conduct concerts of the Philharmonic Society in New-York has been mentioned in turn, and gossip has also dallied with the names of Muck, of Berlin; Schuch, of Dresden, and d'Indy, of Paris. While this speculation was in progress, however, Mr. Higginson was negotiating with Mr. Gericke for his return next autumn, and a decision does not seem to have been reached till the return of the orchestra from a visit to Buffalo in the early part of this week. It now develops that Mr. Gericke made demands which Mr. Higginson was unwilling to concede, and that the conductor has signified his intention of retiring from active work and making his home in his native Austria.

It was reported here to-night that Felix Weingartner might succeed Mr. Gericke.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
REVUE
FEB 5 1906

Weingartner bei Damrosch.

Contract schließt die Uebernahme des Bostoner Symphonie Orchesters aus.

Walter Damrosch äußerte sich gestern anläßlich des auch in unseren Musikspalten registrirten Gerüchts, daß vielleicht Felix Weingartner als Nachfolger von Wilhelm Gericke Dirigent des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters werden würde, Herr Weingartner stehe mit ihm unter Contrakt während der Saisons 1905-6, 1906-7 und 1907-8, auf je einen Monat nach den Ver. Staaten zu kommen, um Concerte des New Yorker Symphonie-Orchesters zu dirigiren, und unter diesem Contrakte könne er so lange mit keinem anderen amerikanischen Orchester auftreten. Herr Weingartner ist bekanntlich nach Erfüllung seines diesjährigen Engagements am 17. Februar wieder nach Europa abgereist.

NEW YORK CITY.
FEB 25 1906

UNDER BOND TO DAMROSCH

Weingartner Says New York Conductor Cannot Take Gericke's Place.

Walter Damrosch said yesterday, regarding the rumor that Felix Weingartner might succeeded Wilhelm Gericke as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, that Mr. Weingartner was under contract with him to spend one month in the United States during the seasons of 1905-1906, 1906-1907 and 1907-1908, and to conduct concerts with the New York Symphony Orchestra, and that according to this contract he could not appear with any other American orchestra.

Mr. Weingartner sailed for Europe on February 17, after completing his engagement for the present season.

N. Y. EV'G SUN
FEB 23 19

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA CONCERT A RARE TREAT

The concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Convention Hall, last night, under the direction of Wilhelm Gericke, was conceded by the large audience present to be one of the principal musical events of the season. Convention Hall was packed to the doors with a representative audience and to say that those there simply enjoyed the performance would be offering a ridiculously poor impression of the musical talent of that musical body. The audience was enraptured by the beautiful strains from the sweet toned instruments. At the conclusion of each selection the audience applauded for several successive minutes.

The program opened with Goldmark's beautiful Spring overture. This particular piece taxed the merits of the orchestra to the utmost but the result was declared perfect. The other numbers included Tannhauser's Bacchanale, as played on the Paris Opera House stage; the rarely heard fourth symphony in F minor. The three works contain a richness of variety and coloring and the contrast between the three pieces is wide.

The delightful voice of Miss Edyth Walker, mezzo-soprano of the Metropolitan Opera House, and the accomplished 'cello playing of Miss Elsa Ruegger, were features of the splendid performance.

N. Y. EV'G SUN
FEB 23 19

GERICKE RESIGNS,

Boston Symphony Orchestra to Have a New Conductor.

BOSTON, Feb. 23.—Wilhelm Gericke has resigned his post as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra. His resignation will take effect at the end of this season, the twenty-fifth of the organization. The last concert of the season will be on April 28.

There have been rumors of late, especially in New York, to the effect that the orchestra would have a new conductor next season, and a music journal of New York named, not long ago, Mr. Vincent D'Indy as the coming man. This prophecy fell on deaf ears, for Mr. D'Indy is not a conductor by profession. His time is devoted to composition.

[182]

N. Y. AMERICAN

FEB 24 1906

BOSTON SYMPHONY'S CONDUCTOR RESIGNS

Wilhelm Gericke Named Conditions Which Major Higginson Refused.

Boston, Feb. 23.—Wilhelm Gericke has resigned as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, his resignation to take effect at the end of the present season, on April 28. Mr. Gericke was offered the position for the season of 1906-'07, and informed Major H. L. Higginson, the head of the organization, that he would accept under certain conditions. Major Higginson did not approve of these conditions and Mr. Gericke thereupon declined the offer. He says he will return to Europe at the close of the season. Mr. Gericke was conductor of the symphony orchestra from 1884 to 1889 and from 1898 to the present time.

NEW YORK STAATS ZEITUNG

FEB 25 1906

Ein Dementi.

Herr Walter Damrosch erklärte gestern, man ihn befrug, was er von dem Gerücht halte, daß Felix Weingartner Nachfolger Wilhelm Gericke's im Amte des Dirigenten des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters werden würde, Herr Weingartner habe für die beiden kommenden Winter auf einen Monat kontraktlich verpflichtet, Konzerte des New Yorker Symphonie-Orchesters zu dirigiren, und dem Kontrakte gemäß könne Herr Weingartner kein anderes amerikanisches Orchester dirigiren. Herr Weingartner ist bekanntlich am 17. dieses Monat nach Beendigung seines diesjährigen Kontraktes nach Europa abgereist.

GERMAN HERALD

NEW YORK CITY

FEB 24 1906

Weingartner nach Boston?

Soll angeblich Gericke's Nachfolger werden.

Boston, 24. Februar. Es heißt hier, daß die Verwaltung des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters in Unterhandlungen mit Felix Weingartner, um ihn zu veranlassen, an die Spitze des Unternehmens zu treten. Das hauptsächlichste Hinderniß bei den Unterhandlungen ist Weingartner's Abneigung, länger als zwei Monate in Amerika zu leben. Er möchte nach kurzen Touren nach hier kommen. Den intimeren Bekannten des Herrn Gericke war es übrigens schon längere Zeit bekannt, daß er beabsichtige, nach Deutschland zurückzukehren.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World from Truth

address BUFFALO, N. Y.

date FEB 24 1906

* * *

The delightful and soul-satisfying concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Convention Hall on Tuesday evening, will not soon be forgotten, and the immense audience present testified their appreciation of the splendid program. Miss Walker's glorious voice was heard to the best advantage, and her charming personality and great dramatic gifts all combine to make her the wonderful artist she is. Miss Elsa Rugger, the young 'cello player, displayed remarkable talent.

Among those in the audience were Mrs. Cary, Mr. George Cary, Mr. and Mrs. W. Harry Gratwick, Mr. Gibson T. Williams, Mr. and Mrs. W. B. Hoyt, Mrs. George E. Matthews, Miss Matthews, Mr. and Mrs. Carleton Sprague, Mr. and Mrs. Porter Norton, Miss Katharine Jordan, Mr. John Jordan, Mr. Thomas W. Jordan, Mr. Peter Conners, Miss Evelyn Fisk, Mr. Walter Dunham, Mr. Trueman G. Avery, Miss Lavinia Avery, Mrs. James E. Terry, Mrs. M. M. Mixer, Mr. F. K. Mixer, Mr. and Mrs. Robert K. Root, Mrs. Townsend Davis, Mr. and Mrs. Horace Reed, Mr. and Mrs. Henry L. Lyon, Mr. and Mrs. W. H. Anderson, Mr. William Waith, Miss Stainton, Mrs. David S. Taylor, Prof. F. A. Vogt, Mr. and Mrs. Edwin Bell, Mrs. Laurence Allen, Miss Marion Mann, Dr. Walter S. Goodale, Miss Mary Burke, Mrs. Held, Mr. Edward Held, Rev. John Ward, Mrs. W. J. Sidway, Mr. Dashiels, Mr. Ambrose Butler, Mr. George Tilden, Mr. and Mrs. Henry Ware Sprague, Mrs. John Noyes, Mr. and Mrs. Roderick Potter, Mr. and Mrs. Willis K. Morgan.

CITIZEN

Brooklyn, N. Y.

FEB 24 1906

MR. GERICKE RESIGNS.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Leader Going to Europe.

BOSTON, Feb. 23.—Wilhelm Gericke has resigned as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, his resignation to take effect at the end of the present season, on April 28.

The place was offered to him for the season of 1906-7. He informed Major H. L. Higginson, the leader of the organization, that he would accept under certain conditions. Major Higginson did not approve of these conditions and Mr. Gericke thereupon declined the offer. He says he will return to Europe at the close of the season. It is rumored that Felix Weingartner has been approached to succeed Mr. Gericke.

from EAGLE

address Brooklyn, N. Y.

date FEB 25 1906

Walter Damrosch said last evening, when questioned regarding the rumor that Felix Weingartner might succeed Wilhelm Gericke as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, that Mr. Weingartner was under contract with him to spend one month in the United States during the seasons of 1905-1906, 1906-1907 and 1907-1908, and to conduct concerts with the New York Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Weingartner, according to this contract, Mr. Damrosch declared, could not appear with any other American orchestra. Mr. Weingartner sailed for Europe on February 17, after completing his engagement for the present season.

COMMERCIAL

BUFFALO, N. Y.

ess

FEB 19 1906

SYMPHONY CONCERT THIS EVENING

Famous Boston Symphony Orchestra at Convention Hall.

One of the musical treats of the season will be the second and last concert which is to be given at Convention Hall this evening by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. With the exception of the concert given last October, this is the first time that the famous organization of musicians has been in Buffalo in twelve years, and the sale of seats indicates that Convention Hall will be filled.

Miss Edyth Walker, the popular mezzo-soprano prima donna of the Metropolitan Opera Company, and Miss Elsa Ruegger, the greatest woman 'cellist in the country, are the eminent soloists for this evening's concert. Wilhelm Gericke, director of the orchestra, has 85 members of the organization with him, and the program which has been arranged for this evening's concert is an excellent one.

Miss Walker, Miss Ruegger and the members of the orchestra arrived in Buffalo last evening, coming directly from New York, but Director Gericke went to Boston after Saturday evening's concert in New York, and did not arrive until this morning. Frederic R. Comee, assistant manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, had charge of the trip from New York, and also spent today looking after the interests of the soloists and the musicians.

Miss Walker was seen by a Commercial representative this morning at the Iroquois Hotel, where she is staying while in Buffalo. Miss Walker was just about to depart for Niagara Falls, which she had never seen.

"No, I have never seen the Falls," said Miss Walker to the Commercial representative, "That is almost a crime, too, for an American, is it not? I was born in Rome in this state, but this is my first appearance in Buffalo.

"Even though I have never seen the Falls, I am sufficiently aware of its beauty and its world-wide interesting features to deplore the threatened ruin of the beauty of this latter-day commercialism."

Miss Walker hastened away with William H. Brennan, the well-known former Buffalo man, who is advance manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Comee chatted entertainingly with the Commercial representative, after Miss Walker and her friends had departed. Mr. Comee stated that this evening's concert would be the 2,301th concert in the history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, extending over a period of a quarter of a century.

"Of that number," said Mr. Comee, "1,221 were held in Boston, 197 at Harvard University in Cambridge, 135 in [illegible], 133 in New York, 100 in [illegible], 100 in [illegible], in

from address

date

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Wilhelm Gericke conductor, gave the second of the season's two Buffalo concerts last evening in Convention Hall.

The superiority of the organization, the beauty of the program, the excellence of the soloists, were more than enough to excite the highest interest of music lovers.

Convention Hall held an immense audience last evening, an audience that was thrilled and enchanted by an orchestral performance the like of which we will not hear again in Buffalo until the next visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The playing of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is a triumph of art, of skill, of virtuosity. It represents a perfection of accomplishment which is the admiration of the musical world.

More than that, the Boston Symphony Orchestra stands for musical and artistic integrity, and its patrons know that to ability, effort, knowledge of a pre-eminent order, is added a due respect for the wishes of the composer in all details; and, for example, if a work is scored for 75 or 80 men, it will not be presented to a discriminating audience by 55 men.

The orchestral numbers were Goldmark's "In the Spring" overture, the Bacchanale from Wagner's "Tannhaeuser," and Tschaikowsky's fourth Symphony. The overture is a fresh, bouyant, brilliant work with a dramatic code that supplies some of the expected Goldmark "color." The "Bacchanale" was ideal in its interpretation. This gorgeous piece of writing was delivered with unerring artistice effect.

The first movement of the symphony presented several moods in its graceful, undulating waltz theme, its rythmic peculiarities, the elaborate working of its themes.

The second movement, with its clever, haunting melodies so effectively contrasted; the third movement in which the pizzicati of the strings, the staccati of the woodwinds and brasses played hide-and-seek with each other, and entranced the ear with the delicious play; and the fourth movement! When that was finished, the moral had been so well pointed that few were present who would not have been glad to have listened immediately to a repetition of the whole symphony, to have enjoyed again its beauties.

Two soloists contributed to the attraction of the concert. Both are celebrities. Miss Edyth Walker, whose glorious mezzo soprano voice, dramatic temperament and achieved ambitions have made her an important figure among the best-known singers of the day, sang an aria from Weber's "Euryanthe" and songs by Beethoven, Schubert, Schumann and Brahms. Miss Walker's voice is a great organ, beautiful in its lower registers and remarkably flexible.

In her songs she had the advantage of exceptionally fine piano accompaniments played by Max Zach.

Miss Elsa Ruegger has played in Buffalo before, and proved that she is a thoroughly artistic executant on her chosen instrument, the cello. Her dainty, elegant playing of the Saint-Saens' concerto was delightful. Both soloists were repeatedly recalled.

The probability that the Boston Symphony Orchestra will visit Buffalo again next season makes the anticipation of next year a pleasurable one. Such beauty of performance, accuracy, smoothness, loveliness of tone as the Boston Symphony shows under Mr. Gericke's masterly direction, are more than a passing pleasure. They are an illumination!

NEW

BUFFALO, N. Y.

s

FEB 20 1906

DELIGHTFUL EVENING FOR MUSIC LOVERS.

Second Concert of Boston Symphony Orchestra an Artistic Success.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Wilhelm Gericke conductor, gave the second of the season's two Buffalo concerts last evening in Convention Hall.

The superiority of the organization, the beauty of the program, the excellence of the soloists, were more than enough to excite the highest interest of music lovers.

Convention Hall held an immense audience last evening, an audience that was thrilled and enchanted by an orchestral performance the like of which we will not hear again in Buffalo until the next visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The playing of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is a triumph of art, of skill, of virtuosity. It represents a perfection of accomplishment which is the admiration of the musical world.

More than that, the Boston Symphony Orchestra stands for musical and artistic integrity, and its patrons know that to ability, effort, knowledge of a pre-eminent order, is added a due respect for the wishes of the composer in all details; and, for example, if a work is scored for 75 or 80 men, it will not be presented to a discriminating audience by 55 men.

The orchestral numbers were Goldmark's "In the Spring" overture, the Bacchanale from Wagner's "Tannhaeuser," and Tschaikowsky's fourth Symphony. The overture is a fresh, bouyant, brilliant work with a dramatic code that supplies some of the expected Goldmark "color." The "Bacchanale" was ideal in its interpretation. This gorgeous piece of writing was delivered with unerring artistice effect.

The first movement of the symphony presented several moods in its graceful, undulating waltz theme, its rythmic peculiarities, the elaborate working of its themes.

The second movement, with its clever, haunting melodies so effectively contrasted; the third movement in which the pizzicati of the strings, the staccati of the woodwinds and brasses played hide-and-seek with each other, and entranced the ear with the delicious play; and the fourth movement! When that was finished, the moral had been so well pointed that few were present who would not have been glad to have listened immediately to a repetition of the whole symphony, to have enjoyed again its beauties.

Two soloists contributed to the attraction of the concert. Both are celebrities. Miss Edyth Walker, whose glorious mezzo soprano voice, dramatic temperament and achieved ambitions have made her an important figure among the best-known singers of the day, sang an aria from Weber's "Euryanthe" and songs by Beethoven, Schubert, Schumann and Brahms. Miss Walker's voice is a great organ, beautiful in its lower registers and remarkably flexible.

In her songs she had the advantage of exceptionally fine piano accompaniments played by Max Zach.

Miss Elsa Ruegger has played in Buffalo before, and proved that she is a thoroughly artistic executant on her chosen instrument, the cello. Her dainty, elegant playing of the Saint-Saens' concerto was delightful. Both soloists were repeatedly recalled.

The probability that the Boston Symphony Orchestra will visit Buffalo again next season makes the anticipation of next year a pleasurable one. Such beauty of performance, accuracy, smoothness, loveliness of tone as the Boston Symphony shows under Mr. Gericke's masterly direction, are more than a passing pleasure. They are an illumination!

EXPRESS

BUFFALO, N. Y.

FEB 20 1906

MAGIC WAND OF MASTER MUSICIAN

Wielded by Conductor Gericke and Artists of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

A MESSAGE OF BEAUTY

Programme of wide Contrasts presented—Work of Soloists was superb and perfectly finished.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Wilhelm Gericke, conductor, gave its second and last concert of this season in Buffalo last evening at Convention Hall. The performance was heard by one of the largest and most representative audiences ever seen at a concert in this city. Mr. Gericke and his players seemed on their mettle, and a more splendid presentation of the scores could not be desired.

The listeners sat as if under the spell of a magic wand, every movement of which played upon the heart strings of men. The message of musical beauty prepared for those who came, found eloquent utterance by the orchestra, and in addition there was the delight of hearing two great artists in solo work.

Mr. Gericke is a fine programme-maker. Opening with Goldmark's fresh and buoyant Spring overture, the orchestra numbers included the Bacchanale from Tannhauser, as played on the Paris Opera-house stage, and the rarely heard fourth symphony in F minor, by Tschaikowsky. No wider contrast could be secured than between these three works, all of which were played with a richness and variety of coloring, a regard for detail, an authority and enthusiasm which made their performance an all-satisfying one. Mr. Gericke has marvelous skill in building up gradually a gorgeous edifice of sound, and then in equally gradual fashion pulling it down till but a faint shadow of tone is left. His power to grade the dynamics of his orchestra is admirable.

The Goldmark overture was delightful in its daintiness and crispness, the Bacchanale was a wild orgy of riotous sound, a thing of fire and whirlwind, but it was in the symphony that the full capabilities of the orchestra were revealed. In this untamed music of the great Russian, filled with portent freighted with melancholy, ready to burst forth at any moment in the wild passion and frenzy which seems ever to underlie it, the playing of the orchestra took the hearers by storm. The scherzo, especially, with its technical demands upon the players, and its exquisite delivery, aroused the warmest kind of approval.

Miss Edyth Walker, mezzo-soprano of the Metropolitan Opera-house, and Miss Elsa Ruegger, 'cellist, were the soloists, Miss Walker sang Eglantine's great scene and aria, from the first act of Weber's opera, Euryanthe. This number is one of the sparkling gems in a work of which Schumann said: "It is his heart's blood, the very best of which he is capable." Certainly no better opportunity could be afforded an artist equal to its demands than this splendid aria.

Miss Walker has a noble voice. It is simply opulent in volume and range, and of unquestioned beauty. She has it under absolute control, a medium for the expression of her sincere dramatic feeling and superabundant temperament. Her singing of the Weber excerpt, as well as the four songs by Beethoven, Schumann, Schubert and Brahms, with piano accompaniment, was beyond criticism, and a stirring piece of musical work.

Miss Ruegger, who was heard in Buffalo several years ago in recital, played Saint-Saens's A minor concerto for violoncello. She has broadened in her art. Her playing, while always intelligent and musical, shows gain in technical facility, in artistic phrasing and in sensuous warmth of tone. She was very cordially recalled several times, as was Miss Walker, and in the case of both, the audience would perhaps have obtained an additional number were it not for Mr. Gericke's inflexible rule as to encores, which destroy the unity of a programme, in his opinion.

It goes without saying that the orchestral accompaniments were no less perfect than the rest of the playing. It is a great pleasure to anticipate next season the return to Buffalo of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Mr. Gericke for at least a couple of concerts.

[183]

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

N. Y. AMERICAN

FEB 24 1906

BOSTON SYMPHONY'S CONDUCTOR RESIGNS

Wilhelm Gericke Named Conditions Which Major Higginson Refused.

Boston, Feb. 23.—Wilhelm Gericke has resigned as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, his resignation to take effect at the end of the present season, on April 28. Mr. Gericke was offered the position for the season of 1906-'07, and informed Major H. L. Higginson, the head of the organization, that he would accept under certain conditions.

Major Higginson did not approve of these conditions and Mr. Gericke thereupon declined the offer. He says he will return to Europe at the close of the season. Mr. Gericke was conductor of the symphony orchestra from 1884 to 1889 and from 1898 until the present time.

CITIZEN

FEB 25 1906

MR. GERICKE RESIGNS.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Leader Going to Europe.

BOSTON, Feb. 23.—Wilhelm Gericke has resigned as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, his resignation to take effect at the end of the present season, on April 28.

The place was offered to him for the season of 1906-7. He informed Major H. L. Higginson, the leader of the organization, that he would accept under certain conditions. Major Higginson did not approve of these conditions and Mr. Gericke thereupon declined the offer. He says he will return to Europe at the close of the season. It is rumored that Felix Weingartner has been approached to succeed Mr. Gericke.

NEW YORK STAATS ZEITUNG

FEB 5 1906

Ein Dementi.

Herr Walter Damrosch erklärte gestern, als man ihn befrug, was er von dem Gerücht halte, daß Felix Weingartner Nachfolger Wilhelm Gericke's im Amte des Dirigenten des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters werden würde, Herr Weingartner sei für die beiden kommenden Winter auf je einen Monat kontraktlich verpflichtet, Konzerte des New Yorker Symphonie-Orchesters zu dirigiren, und dem Kontrakte gemäß könne Herr Weingartner kein anderes amerikanisches Orchester dirigiren. Herr Weingartner ist bekanntlich am 17. Februar nach Beendigung seines diesjährigen Kontraktes nach Europa abgereist.

COMMERCIAL

FEB 25 1906

Walter Damrosch said last evening, when questioned regarding the rumor that Felix Weingartner might succeed Wilhelm Gericke as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, that Mr. Weingartner was under contract with him to spend one month in the United States during the seasons of 1905-1906, 1906-1907 and 1907-1908, and to conduct concerts with the New York Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Weingartner, according to this contract, Mr. Damrosch declared, could not appear with any other American orchestra. Mr. Weingartner sailed for Europe on February 17, after completing his engagement for the present season.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

FEB 4 1906

Weingartner nach Boston?

Er soll angeblich Gericke's Nachfolger werden.

Boston, 24. Februar. Es heißt hier, daß die Verwaltung des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters in Unterhandlungen stehe mit Felix Weingartner, um ihn zu bewegen, an die Spitze des Unternehmens zu treten. Das hauptsächlichste Hinderniß bei den Unterhandlungen ist Herrn Weingartner's Abneigung, längere Zeit in Amerika zu leben. Er möchte nur zu kurzen Touren nach hier kommen.

Den intimeren Bekannten des Herrn Gericke war es übrigens schon längere Zeit bekannt, daß er beabsichtige, nach Deutschland zurückzukehren.

* * *

The delightful and soul-satisfying concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Convention Hall on Tuesday evening, will not soon be forgotten, and the immense audience present testified their appreciation of the splendid program. Miss Walker's glorious voice was heard to the best advantage, and her charming personality and great dramatic gifts all combine to make her the wonderful artist she is. Miss Elsa Rugger, the young 'cello player, displayed remarkable talent.

Among those in the audience were Mrs. Cary, Mr. George Cary, Mr. and Mrs. W. Harry Gratwick, Mr. Gibson T. Williams, Mr. and Mrs. W. B. Hoyt, Mrs. George E. Matthews, Miss Matthews, Mr. and Mrs. Carleton Sprague, Mr. and Mrs. Porter Norton, Miss Katharine Jordan, Mr. John Jordan, Mr. Thomas W. Jordan, Mr. Peter Conners, Miss Evelyn Fisk, Mr. Walter Dunham, Mr. Trueman G. Avery, Miss Lavinia Avery, Mrs. James E. Terry, Mrs. M. M. Mixer, Mr. F. K. Mixer, Mr. and Mrs. Robert K. Root, Mrs. Townsend Davis, Mr. and Mrs. Horace Reed, Mr. and Mrs. Henry L. Lyon, Mr. and Mrs. W. H. Anderson, Mr. William Waith, Miss Stainton, Mrs. David S. Taylor, Prof. F. A. Vogt, Mr. and Mrs. Edwin Bell, Mrs. Laurence Allen, Miss Marion Mann, Dr. Walter S. Goodale, Miss Mary Burke, Mrs. Held, Mr. Edward Held, Rev. John Ward, Mrs. W. J. Sidway, Mr. Dashiels, Mr. Ambrose Butler, Mr. George Tilden, Mr. and Mrs. Henry Ware Sprague, Mrs. John Noyes, Mr. and Mrs. Roderick Potter, Mr. and Mrs. Willis K. Morgan.

SYMPHONY CONCERT THIS EVENING

Famous Boston Symphony Orchestra at Convention Hall.

One of the musical treats of the season will be the second and last concert which is to be given at Convention Hall this evening by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. With the exception of the concert given last October, this is the first time that the famous organization of musicians has been in Buffalo in twelve years, and the sale of seats indicates that Convention Hall will be filled.

Miss Edyth Walker, the popular mezzo-soprano prima donna of the Metropolitan Opera Company, and Miss Elsa Ruegger, the greatest woman 'cellist in the country, are the eminent soloists for this evening's concert. Wilhelm Gericke, director of the orchestra, has 85 members of the organization with him, and the program which has been arranged for this evening's concert is an excellent one.

Miss Walker, Miss Ruegger and the members of the orchestra arrived in Buffalo last evening, coming directly from New York, but Director Gericke went to Boston after Saturday evening's concert in New York, and did not arrive until this morning. Frederic R. Comee, assistant manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, had charge of the trip from New York, and also spent today looking after the interests of the soloists and the musicians.

Miss Walker was seen by a Commercial representative this morning at the Iroquois Hotel, where she is staying while in Buffalo. Miss Walker was just about to depart for Niagara Falls, which she had never seen.

"No, I have never seen the Falls," said Miss Walker to the Commercial representative. "That is almost a crime, too, for an American, is it not? I was born in Rome in this state, but this is my first appearance in Buffalo.

"Even though I have never seen the Falls, I am sufficiently aware of its beauty and its world-wide interesting features to deplore the threatened ruin of the beauty of this latter-day commercialism."

Miss Walker hastened away with William H. Brennan, the well-known former Buffalo man, who is advance manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Comee chatted entertainingly with the Commercial representative, after Miss Walker and her friends had departed. Mr. Comee stated that this evening's concert would be the 2,364th concert in the history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, extending over a period of a quarter of a century.

"Of that number," said Mr. Comee, "1,221 were held in Boston, 197 at Harvard University in Cambridge, 135 in Philadelphia, 133 in New York city, 100 in Brooklyn, 100 in Providence, 87 in Baltimore, 61 in Washington and the [illegible] cities.

Twenty-five years ago George Henschel was the first director of the orchestra and he served for three years. He was followed by Wilhelm Gericke for five years, Arthur Nikisch for four years, Emil Paur for five years, and Mr. Gericke has again been director for eight years. Buffalonians may be interested in learning that the orchestra was brought to Buffalo twelve years ago largely through the efforts of Hobart Weed, who still maintains his interest in securing the great musical attractions for your city."

Mr. Comee has been assistant manager of the orchestra for the past 20 years.

The program for this evening's concert is one of the best ever prepared. With the exception of the Weber aria, which is Miss Walker's first number, it is made up entirely of modern music, for the Beethoven, Schubert and Schumann songs which Miss Walker will sing are as modern as the day they were written. The program will be: Goldmark's concert overture, "In the Spring"; Eglantine's recitative and scena from Weber's "Euryanthe" (Miss Walker); Saint-Saens's A minor concerto for the violoncello (Miss Ruegger); the Bacchanale from Wagner's "Tannhauser"; Beethoven's "Die Ehre Gottes in der Natur"; Schubert's "An die Leier"; Schumann's "Roselein," and Brahms's "Meine Liebe ist grun" (Miss Walker); and Tschaikowsky's symphony in F minor, No. 4.

Attention is called to the announcement that the concert is to begin at 8.15 o'clock. When Conductor Gericke begins the overture no one will be seated until the number is finished.

NEW

DELIGHTFUL EVENING FOR MUSIC LOVERS.

Second Concert of Boston Symphony Orchestra an Artistic Success.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Wilhelm Gericke conductor, gave the second of the season's two Buffalo concerts last evening in Convention Hall.

The superiority of the organization, the beauty of the program, the excellence of the soloists, were more than enough to excite the highest interest of music lovers.

Convention Hall held an immense audience last evening, an audience that was thrilled and enchanted by an orchestral performance the like of which we will not hear again in Buffalo until the next visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The playing of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is a triumph of art, of skill, of virtuosity. It represents a perfection of accomplishment which is the admiration of the musical world.

More than that, the Boston Symphony Orchestra stands for musical and artistic integrity, and its patrons know that to ability, effort, knowledge of a pre-eminent order, is added a due respect for the wishes of the composer in all details; and, for example, if a work is scored for 75 or 80 men, it will not be presented to a discriminating audience by 55 men.

The orchestral numbers were Goldmark's "In the Spring" overture, the Bacchanale from Wagner's "Tannhaeuser," and Tschaikowsky's fourth Symphony. The overture is a fresh, bouyant, brilliant work with a dramatic code that supplies some of the expected Goldmark "color." The "Bacchanale" was ideal in its interpretation. This gorgeous piece of writing was delivered with unerring artistice effect.

The first movement of the symphony presented several moods in its graceful, undulating waltz theme, its rythmic peculiarities, the elaborate working of its themes.

The second movement, with its clever, haunting melodies so effectively contrasted; the third movement in which the pizzicati of the strings, the staccati of the woodwinds and brasses played hide-and-seek with each other, and entranced the ear with the delicious play; and the fourth movement! When that was finished, the moral had been so well pointed that few were present who would not have been glad to have listened immediately to a repetition of the whole symphony, to have enjoyed again its beauties.

Two soloists contributed to the attraction of the concert. Both are celebrities. Miss Edyth Walker, whose glorious mezzo soprano voice, dramatic temperament and achieved ambitions have made her an important figure among the best-known singers of the day, sang an aria from Weber's "Euryanthe" and songs by Beethoven, Schubert, Schumann and Brahms. Miss Walker's voice is a great organ, beautiful in its lower registers and remarkably flexible.

In her songs she had the advantage of exceptionally fine piano accompaniments played by Max Zach.

Miss Elsa Ruegger has played in Buffalo before, and proved that she is a thoroughly artistic executant on her chosen instrument, the cello. Her dainty, elegant playing of the Saint-Saens' concerto was delightful. Both soloists were repeatedly recalled.

The probability that the Boston Symphony Orchestra will visit Buffalo again next season makes the anticipation of next year a pleasurable one. Such beauty of performance, accuracy, smoothness, loveliness of tone as the Boston Symphony shows under Mr. Gericke's masterly direction, are more than a passing pleasure. They are an illumination!

EXPRESS

FEB 20 1906

MAGIC WAND OF MASTER MUSICIAN

Wielded by Conductor Gericke and Artists of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

A MESSAGE OF BEAUTY

Programme of wide Contrasts presented—Work of Soloists was superb and perfectly finished.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Wilhelm Gericke, conductor, gave its second and last concert of this season in Buffalo last evening at Convention Hall. The performance was heard by one of the largest and most representative audiences ever seen at a concert in this city. Mr. Gericke and his players seemed on their mettle, and a more splendid presentation of the scores could not be desired.

The listeners sat as if under the spell of a magic wand, every movement of which played upon the heart strings of men. The message of musical beauty prepared for those who came, found eloquent utterance by the orchestra, and in addition there was the delight of hearing two great artists in solo work.

Mr. Gericke is a fine programme-maker. Opening with Goldmark's fresh and buoyant Spring overture, the orchestra numbers included the Bacchanale from Tannhauser, as played on the Paris Opera-house stage, and the rarely heard fourth symphony in F minor, by Tschaikowsky. No wider contrast could be secured than between these three works, all of which were played with a richness and variety of coloring, a regard for detail, an authority and enthusiasm which made their performance an all-satisfying one. Mr. Gericke has marvelous skill in building up gradually a gorgeous edifice of sound, and then in equally gradual fashion pulling it down till but a faint shadow of tone is left. His power to grade the dynamics of his orchestra is admirable.

The Goldmark overture was delightful in its daintiness and crispness, the Bacchanale was a wild orgy of riotous sound, a thing of fire and whirlwind, but it was in the symphony that the full capabilities of the orchestra were revealed. In this untamed music of the great Russian, filled with portent freighted with melancholy, ready to burst forth at any moment in the wild passion and frenzy which seems ever to underlie it, the playing of the orchestra took the hearers by storm. The scherzo, especially, with its technical demands upon the players, and its exquisite delivery, aroused the warmest kind of approval.

Miss Edyth Walker, mezzo-soprano of the Metropolitan Opera-house, and Miss Elsa Ruegger, 'cellist, were the soloists, Miss Walker sang Eglantine's great scene and aria, from the first act of Weber's opera, Euryanthe. This number is one of the sparkling gems in a work of which Schumann said: "It is his heart's blood, the very best of which he is capable." Certainly no better opportunity could be afforded an artist equal to its demands. than this splendid aria.

Miss Walker has a noble voice. It is simply opulent in volume and range, and of unquestioned beauty. She has it under absolute control, a medium for the expression of her sincere dramatic feeling and superabundant temperament. Her singing of the Weber excerpt, as well as the four songs by Beethoven, Schumann, Schubert and Brahms, with piano accompaniment, was beyond criticism, and a stirring piece of musical work.

Miss Ruegger, who was heard in Buffalo several years ago in recital, played Saint-Saens's A minor cooncerto for violoncello. She has broadened in her art. Her playing, while always intelligent and musical, shows gain in technical facility, in artistic phrasing and in sensuous warmth of tone. She was very cordially recalled several times, as was Miss Walker, and in the case of both, the audience would perhaps have obtained an additional number were it not for Mr. Gericke's inflexible rule as to encores, which destroy the unity of a programme, in his opinion.

It goes without saying that the orchestral accompaniments were no less perfect than the rest of the playing. It is a great pleasure to anticipate next season the return to Buffalo of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Mr. Gericke for at least a couple of concerts.

PISO'S CURE FOR PILES.

EAGLE

Brooklyn, N. Y.

FEB 25 1906

A New Leader for the Boston Symphony

The announcement that the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the largest and finest musical organization in the world is to lose its present leader does not come precisely as news, for the intimations of change have been made already this season, though not to the public. Mr. Gericke has served the orchestra and music faithfully, and his retirement will be an occasion of regret to many, for he has given concerts in the leading cities of the East, and in Boston, where the finest music hall in America has been created for his band, he is better known than the mayor, and as much esteemed as the governor. He gives over a hundred concerts a year, and lucky Boston has more than half of them. Here in Brooklyn we manage to have barely five. Still, Brooklyn has Coney Island, and Boston has not.

Mr. Gericke has filled more than a dozen years with the great orchestra. It has had only three other leaders: Henschel, Nikisch and Paur. He is getting on in years, and he is entitled to the rest he seeks in his native Austria. Doubtless, too, he has laid aside what in that country will be an ample fortune, for it is understood that he has received $12,000 a season, and he is not a man of extravagances, and beside he was a conductor of note and in receipt of a generous income before he came to this country. His successor is not named, but there is a hope that it will be Felix Weingartner. This is the most promising candidate—if he consents to be one—that we have before the country to-day. He is young, earnest, of capacious memory, that enables him to conduct many great works without scores, he is commanding, magnetic, his readings are full of contrast, life, dramatic force, while Mr. Gericke has grown dry, cautious, slow and academic. The time is ripe for change, and Weingartner is the man who should be chosen.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From ...

Address ...

Date FEB 24 1906

BUFFALO LOVES MUSIC

After the magnificent support given the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert on Monday evening, Buffalo should be forever freed from the stigma of being an unmusical town. Buffalonians owe much to Mr. Hobart Weed for his unselfish efforts to bring these splendid musical attractions here, considering the great expense of such a concert as that of Monday night. There can be nothing in it for him except the mere satisfaction it may give him.

BULLETIN

PHILA. PA.

FEB 23 1906

and then he stepped out of the limelight.

WILLIAM GERICKE RESIGNS

Gives Up Leadership of Boston Orchestra and Will Go to Europe.

Boston, Feb. 23.—Wilhelm Gericke has resigned as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, his resignation to take effect at the end of the present season. Mr. Gericke was offered the position for the season of 1906-07, and informed Major H. L. Higginson, the head of the organization, that he would accept under certain conditions.

Major Higginson did not approve them and Mr. Gericke declined the offer. He says he will return to Europe. Mr. Gericke was conductor of the Symphony Orchestra from 1884 to 1889 and from 1898 until the present time.

Wilhelm Gericke is a native of Gratz, Styria, but has lived for many years in this country. He was educated at Gratz and Vienna, and his first work as conductor was in theatres in different cities from 1865 to 1874. He became conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra first in 1884, but returned to Europe in 1889 because of impaired health. Returning to America in 1898 he again became conductor of the Boston Orchestra and has held the position since that time. He has become a well-known figure in Philadelphia during the many appearances of the orchestra here. He is the author of many songs, choruses and orchestral works.

PRESS

PHILA., PA.

FEB 25 1906

WILHELM GERICKE

Who retires from the leadership of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of the season.

One of the most interesting bits of musical news printed for some time is the announcement from Boston that Wilhelm Gericke has resigned as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, his resignation to take effect at the end of the present season. Mr. Gericke was offered the position for next season, and informed Major H. L. Higginson, the head of the organization, that he would accept under certain conditions. Major Higginson did not approve these conditions, and consequently Mr. Gericke declined the offer. He says he will return to Europe.

Mr. Gericke has been conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for thirteen of the twenty-five years since it was founded, in 1881, by Henry L. Higginson, a Boston banker, who has maintained it ever since as his personal charge.

The first conductor was Georg Henschel, under whom the weekly concerts in Music Hall were established. He went abroad after three years, and was succeeded by Gericke, who had been an assistant conductor at Vienna under Richter and Brahms, and succeeded the latter as leader of the Gesellschaftsconcerte and of the Singverein. Gericke practically reorganized the orchestra, bringing a large number of musicians from Europe, and in five years had brought it to a high perfection of ensemble. He then returned to Vienna, and was succeeded by Arthur Nikisch, who conducted the orchestra for four years, resigning to return to Leipsic, where he has since remained, though constantly in request as a virtuoso conductor at all the musical centers of Europe.

Nikisch was followed at Boston by Emil Paur, from 1893 to 1898, when Mr. Higginson recalled Gericke, who served one five-year term and is now more than half way through another.

Mr. Gericke is a native of Gratz, in Styria, and is now in his 51st year. He is a sound musician, widely read in the literature of the orchestra and familiar with its traditions, and while very classical in his tastes and composed as a conductor, as a drillmaster he probably has no superior.

NEWS

FEB 25

Mr. Gericke Resigns From Boston Symphony Orchestra

One of the most important musical announcements of the season was made yesterday when it was stated that Mr. Wilhelm Gericke will resign from the directorship of the Boston symphony orchestra at the close of this season. Mr. Gericke is just completing his thirteen years of service with the Boston orchestra. He came to America in 1884 directing the Boston orchestra for five years.

Then declining a reengagement he returned to Europe for a rest. After a European sojourn of nine years he was again engaged for the Boston Symphony orchestra. His work with the Boston orchestra has been most artistic and to him is credited the merit of having brought this orchestra to its present high state of perfection.

It is reported that the money question has had something to do with Mr. Gericke's resignation. He received about $12,000 a year salary which was really but a bagatelle compared with what some of the other foreign conductors want. Safonoff has asked the New York Philharmonic Society $20,000 a year and a contract for three years. The New York Tribune says that if Mr. Gericke has asked an advance on his salary proportionate with the demands of Mr. Weingartner or Mr. Safonoff, he must have demanded $75,000 at least.

His successor with the Boston orchestra is not known yet.

Buffalonians who heard the superb concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra last Monday will remember it with particular satisfaction and be glad that they heard the orchestra under Mr. Gericke's direction. It was a great musical event.

NEWS

BALTIMORE, MD.

FEB 23 1906

Whose resignation as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is announced today. He will return to Europe.

PRESS

PHILA., PA.

FEB 25 1906

THE MUSICAL OUTLOOK.

What with Mr. Paur reported to be in disgust because Pittsburg society is said to prefer "bridge" whist to Brahms, and with Mr. Gericke leaving the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the next musical season is likely to see many changes in the higher ranks. It is fortunate with this unrest elsewhere that things locally are in very good shape, so that the outlook here is most favorable in every way.

There are, of course, it is true, the usual end-of-the-season rumors as to new opera projects and what not, but there is nothing in these efforts to affect the impossible, and what is wanted is a better working out along practical lines, both in the matter of the orchestra and the opera. Naturally, in all these projects one of the refractory factors is the Academy of Music. Built in 1857, the Academy will be fifty years old next year, and it is sadly in need of a general overhauling in its auditorium and on the stage. The seats in galleries and parquet are out of date and very uncomfortable, and the whole get-up is most shabby. Then the unnecessary projection of the stage into the auditorium eats up space that, with a remodeled stage, could be used to increase the seating capacity of the house, and so allow a greater return to any musical enterprise.

It is perhaps hopeless to expect reforms of the Academy owners, and yet every local orchestral or operatic scheme is more or less affected by the inability to secure changes in this [illegible] temple of the muses. If those who really wish to enlarge the musical horizon in Philadelphia would buy up the Academy, remodel it, and, as is quite possible, develop some of its waste spaces, such as the foyer, into a chamber concert room, they would accomplish more and spend less money than in building an entirely new auditorium, which fills the dreams of so many who long for changes.

Changes are all very well, but let us conserve what we have. Let us develop the orchestra through hearty support, secure opera on the most practicable conditions, insure the presence of famous artists, and no one can complain of the musical outlook. It will easily

SUN

BALTIMORE, MD.

FEB 24 1906

LEADER GERICKE RESIGNS

Conductor Of Boston Symphony Going Back To Europe.

HIS CONDITIONS NOT ACCEPTED

Proposed Certain Things Of Which Maj. Higginson Did Not Approve. Made The Organization Famous.

Boston, Feb. 23.—Wilhelm Gericke has resigned as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, his resignation to take effect at the end of the present season.

Mr. Gericke was offered the position for the season of 1906-07 and informed Major H. L. Higginson, the head of the organization, that he would accept under certain conditions. Major Higginson did not approve them and Mr. Gericke declined the offer. He says he will return to Europe.

WELL KNOWN IN BALTIMORE

Mr. Gericke's Masterful Leadership Recognized By Music Lovers.

In Baltimore Mr. Gericke's popularity and prominence were second to none of the great conductors and musicians who have visited here in recent years, and this popularity greatly increased, if such a thing were possible, during the present season when the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its several concerts here with such marked success.

As a director Mr. Gericke stands upon an eminence with the greatest directors in the world. His unassuming personality, his utter absence of affectation when directing and, withal, his magnetic individuality, that has proved, no doubt, an important element in the remarkable artistic successes achieved by the organization of which he has been the leader, are the most prominent characteristics of the man.

Mr. Gericke always has been inclined to reserve and reticence when the question of personal publicity was involved, although he was ever ready to speak in the highest and most enthusiastic terms of the artists whom he directed.

Recently, when M. d'Indy, the French composer, directed the orchestra while one of his symphonies was included upon the program given, Mr. Gericke temporarily relaxed charge of the organization.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the PRESS

PHILA., PA.

FEB 25 1906

Wilhelm Gericke has resigned ... ductor of the Boston Symphony ... tra, his resignation to take effect ... end of the present season. He ... turn to Europe. Mr. Gericke ... or of the Symphony Or... to 1889, and from ... time

[184]

EAGLE
Brooklyn N Y
FEB 25 1906

A New Leader for the Boston Symphony

The announcement that the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the largest and finest musical organization in the world is to lose its present leader does not come precisely as news, for the intimations of change have been made already this season, though not to the public. Mr. Gericke has served the orchestra and music faithfully, and his retirement will be an occasion of regret to many, for he has given concerts in the leading cities of the East, and in Boston, where the finest music hall in America has been created for his band, he is better known than the mayor, and as much esteemed as the governor. He gives over a hundred concerts a year, and lucky Boston has more than half of them. Here in Brooklyn we manage to have barely five. Still, Brooklyn has Coney Island, and Boston has not.

Mr. Gericke has filled more than a dozen years with the great orchestra. It has had only three other leaders: Henschel, Nikisch and Paur. He is getting on in years, and he is entitled to the rest he seeks in his native Austria. Doubtless, too, he has laid aside what in that country will be an ample fortune, for it is understood that he has received $12,000 a season, and he is not a man of extravagances, and beside he was a conductor of note and in receipt of a generous income before he came to this country. His successor is not named, but there is a hope that it will be Felix Weingartner. This is the most promising candidate—if he consents to be one—that we have before the country to-day. He is young, earnest, of capacious memory, that enables him to conduct many great works without scores, he is commanding, magnetic, his readings are full of contrast, life, dramatic force, while Mr. Gericke has grown dry, cautious, slow and academic. The time is ripe for change, and Weingartner is the man who should be chosen.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From
Address
Date FEB 24 1906

BUFFALO LOVES MUSIC

After the magnificent support given the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert on Monday evening, Buffalo should be forever freed from the stigma of being an unmusical town. Buffalonians owe much to Mr. Hobart Weed for his unselfish efforts to bring these splendid musical attractions here, considering the great expense of such a concert as that of Monday night. There can be nothing in it for him except the mere satisfaction it may give him.

BULLETIN
Ess
FEB 23 1906

England. Later they patched up [illegible] and then he stepped out of the limelight.

WILLIAM GERICKE RESIGNS

Gives Up Leadership of Boston Orchestra and Will Go to Europe.

Boston, Feb. 23.—Wilhelm Gericke has resigned as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, his resignation to take effect at the end of the present season. Mr. Gericke was offered the position for the season of 1906-07, and informed Major H. L. Higginson, the head of the organization, that he would accept under certain conditions.

Major Higginson did not approve them and Mr. Gericke declined the offer. He says he will return to Europe. Mr. Gericke was conductor of the Symphony Orchestra from 1884 to 1889 and from 1898 until the present time.

Wilhelm Gericke is a native of Gratz, Styria, but has lived for many years in this country. He was educated at Gratz and Vienna, and his first work as conductor was in theatres in different cities from 1865 to 1874. He became conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra first in 1884, but returned to Europe in 1889 because of impaired health. Returning to America in 1898 he again became conductor of the Boston Orchestra and has held the position since that time. He has become a well-known figure in Philadelphia during the many appearances of the orchestra here. He is the author of many songs, choruses and orchestral works.

PRESS
PHILA., PA.
FEB 25 1906

WILHELM GERICKE

Who retires from the leadership of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of the season.

certo for two violins was rendered by Mrs.

One of the most interesting bits of musical news printed for some time is the announcement from Boston that Wilhelm Gericke has resigned as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, his resignation to take effect at the end of the present season. Mr. Gericke was offered the position for next season, and informed Major H. L. Higginson, the head of the organization, that he would accept under certain conditions. Major Higginson did not approve these conditions, and consequently Mr. Gericke declined the offer. He says he will return to Europe.

Mr. Gericke has been conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for thirteen of the twenty-five years since it was founded, in 1881, by Henry L. Higginson, a Boston banker, who has maintained it ever since as his personal charge.

The first conductor was Georg Henschel, under whom the weekly concerts in Music Hall were established. He went abroad after three years, and was succeeded by Gericke, who had been an assistant conductor at Vienna under Richter and Brahms, and succeeded the latter as leader of the Gesellschaftsconcerte and of the Singverein. Gericke practically reorganized the orchestra, bringing a large number of musicians from Europe, and in five years had brought it to a high perfection of ensemble. He then returned to Vienna, and was succeeded by Arthur Nikisch, who conducted the orchestra for four years, resigning to return to Leipsic, where he has since remained, though constantly in request as a virtuoso conductor at all the musical centers of Europe.

Nikisch was followed at Boston by Emil Paur, from 1893 to 1898, when Mr. Higginson recalled Gericke, who served one five-year term and is now more than half way through another.

Mr. Gericke is a native of Gratz, in Styria, and is now in his 61st year. He is a sound musician, widely read in the literature of the orchestra and familiar with its traditions, and while very classical in his tastes and composed as a conductor, as a drillmaster he probably has no superior.

* * *

NEWS
FEB 25 1906

Mr. Gericke Resigns From Boston Symphony Orchestra

One of the most important musical announcements of the season was made yesterday when it was stated that Mr. Wilhelm Gericke will resign from the directorship of the Boston symphony orchestra at the close of this season. Mr. Gericke is just completing his thirteen years of service with the Boston orchestra. He came to America in 1884 directing the Boston orchestra for five years.

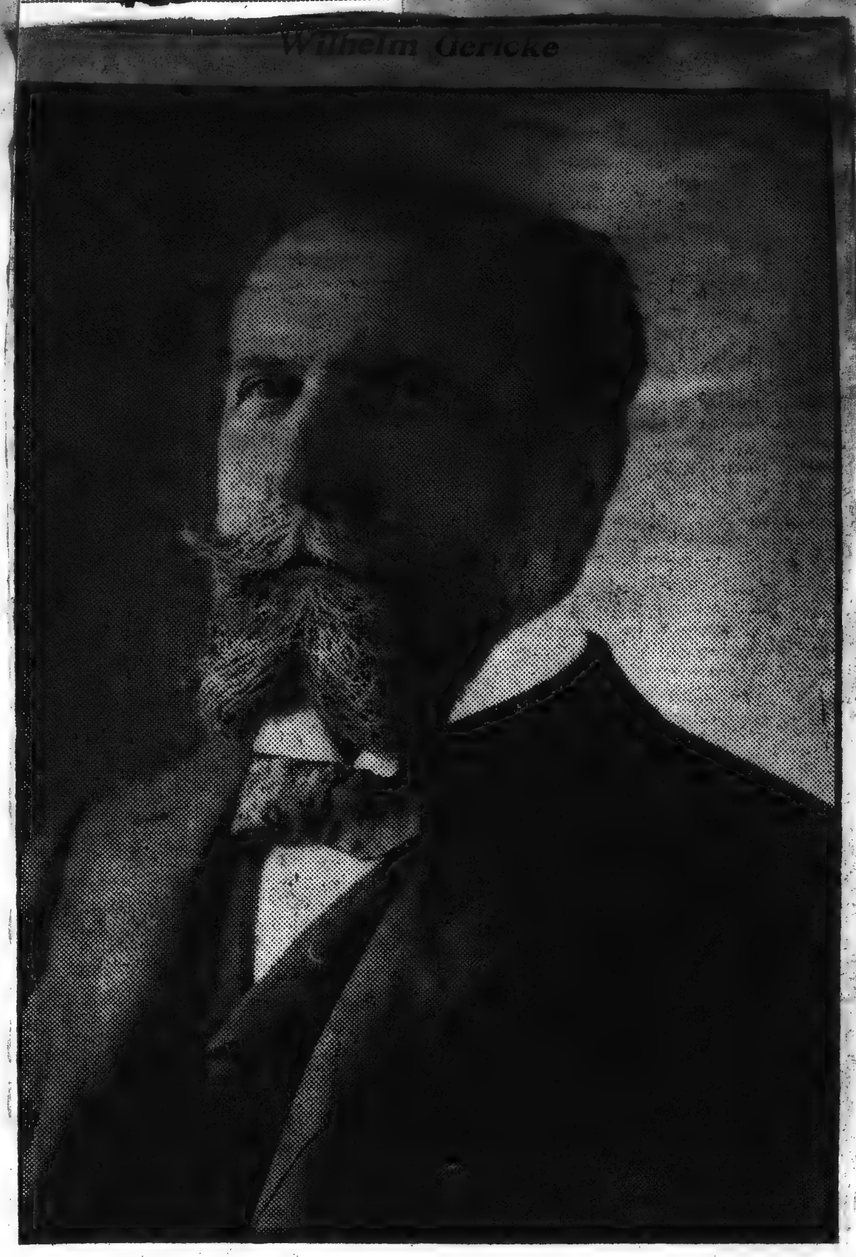
Then declining a reengagement he returned to Europe for a rest. After a European sojourn of nine years he was again engaged for the Boston Symphony orchestra. His work with the Boston orchestra has been most artistic and to him is credited the merit of having brought this orchestra to its present high state of perfection.

It is reported that the money question has had something to do with Mr. Gericke's resignation. He received about $12,000 a year salary which was really but a bagatelle compared with what some of the other foreign conductors want. Safonoff has asked the New York Philharmonic Society $20,000 a year and a contract for three years. The New York Tribune says that if Mr. Gericke has asked an advance on his salary proportionate with the demands of Mr. Weingartner or Mr. Safonoff, he must have demanded $75,000 at least.

His successor with the Boston orchestra is not known yet.

Buffalonians who heard the superb concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra last Monday will remember it with particular satisfaction and be glad that they heard the orchestra under Mr. Gericke's direction. It was a great musical event.

NEWS
BALTIMORE, MD.
FEB 23 1906



Whose resignation as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is announced today. He will return to Europe.

SUN
ess PHILA, PA
ess FEB 24 1906

THE MUSICAL OUTLOOK.

What with Mr. Paur reported to be in disgust because Pittsburg society is said to prefer "bridge" whist to Brahms, and with Mr. Gericke leaving the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the next musical season is likely to see many changes in the higher ranks. It is fortunate with this unrest elsewhere that things locally are in very good shape, so that the outlook here is most favorable in every way.

There are, of course, it is true, the usual end-of-the-season rumors as to new opera projects and what not, but there is nothing in these efforts to effect the impossible, and what is wanted is a better working out along practical lines, both in the matter of the orchestra and the opera. Naturally, in all these projects one of the refractory factors is the Academy of Music. Built in 1857, the Academy will be fifty years old next year, and it is sadly in need of a general overhauling in its auditorium and on the stage. The seats in galleries and parquet are out of date and very uncomfortable, and the whole get-up is most shabby. Then the unnecessary projection of the stage into the auditorium eats up space that, with a remodeled stage, could be used to increase the seating capacity of the house, and so allow a greater return to any musical enterprise.

It is perhaps hopeless to expect reforms of the Academy owners, and yet every local orchestral or operatic scheme is more or less affected by the inability to secure changes in this [illegible] temple of the muses. If those who really wish to enlarge the musical horizon in Philadelphia would buy up the Academy, remodel it, and, as is quite possible, develop some of its waste spaces, such as the foyer, into a chamber concert room, they would accomplish more and spend less money than in building an entirely new auditorium, which fills the dreams of so many who long for changes.

Changes are all very well, but let us conserve what we have. Let us develop the orchestra through hearty support, secure opera on the most practicable conditions, insure the presence of famous artists, and no one can complain of the musical outlook. It will easily take care of itself.

LEADER GERICKE RESIGNS

Conductor Of Boston Symphony Going Back To Europe.

HIS CONDITIONS NOT ACCEPTED

Proposed Certain Things Of Which Maj. Higginson Did Not Approve. Made The Organization Famous.

Boston, Feb. 23.—Wilhelm Gericke has resigned as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, his resignation to take effect at the end of the present season.

Mr. Gericke was offered the position for the season of 1906-07 and informed Major H. L. Higginson, the head of the organization, that he would accept under certain conditions. Major Higginson did not approve them and Mr. Gericke declined the offer. He says he will return to Europe.

WELL KNOWN IN BALTIMORE

Mr. Gericke's Masterful Leadership Recognized By Music Lovers.

In Baltimore Mr. Gericke's popularity and prominence were second to none of the great conductors and musicians who have visited here in recent years, and this popularity greatly increased, if such a thing were possible, during the present season when the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its several concerts here with such marked success.

As a director Mr. Gericke stands upon an eminence with the greatest directors in the world. His unassuming personality, his utter absence of affectation when directing and, withal, his magnetic individuality, that has proved, no doubt, an important element in the remarkable artistic successes achieved by the organization of which he has been the leader, are the most prominent characteristics of the man.

Mr. Gericke always has been inclined to reserve and reticence when the question of personal publicity was involved, although he was ever ready to speak in the highest and most enthusiastic terms of the artists whom he directed.

Recently, when M. d'Indy, the French composer, directed the orchestra while one of his symphonies was included upon the program given, Mr. Gericke temporarily relaxed charge of the organization.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the PRESS
PHILA., PA.
FEB 25 1906

—Wilhelm Gericke has resigned as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, his resignation to take effect at the end of the present season. He will return to Europe. Mr. Gericke was conductor of the Symphony Orchestra from 1884 to 1889, and from 1898 until the present time.

n _____ ress Brooklyn

e _____

FEB 5

RETIREMENT OF MR. GERICKE.

The announcement from Boston of the resignation of Wilhelm Gericke as conductor of the Symphony Orchestra of that city comes as a surprise to admirers of this organization, and creates a topic of unusual interest for discussion in musical circles. Mr. Gericke's connection with this orchestra has been so intimately associated with its development and prestige, that his well-founded reputation forestalled the anticipation of any severance of the relation, and the public had reason to presume that he would continue indefinitely to direct the work of his fine band.

No reason is mentioned for Mr. Gericke's resignation, further than what is contained in the statement that he had stipulated conditions to which the management could not accede. The nature of these conditions may only be surmised by those not in the confidence of the parties directly concerned. There is ground for the assumption, however, that either he wished more salary, in keeping with the advancing prestige of conductors of his standing, or that he was not willing to change his conservative policy as to methods of conducting to meet any desire the management might have to cater to the feeling of the time for an attractive display of personality in the art of conducting.

It is not known that Mr. Higginson, who founded and maintains the orchestra, wished for any such thing, but Mr. Gericke's ideas of artistic consistency, as he has made them known through his work, would hardly be in accord with any plan to exploit the conductor after the manner of a solo performer, or to make what he would consider unwarranted repetitions in his programmes in order to gratify the popular wish to hear pet pieces. It is understood that Mr. Gericke has been receiving an annual salary of $12,000, and it may be he has asked for more, in view of what visiting European conductors have been getting for a brief visit to this country.

But whatever the reason for the discontinuance of Mr. Gericke's service with the Boston Orchestra at the close of the present season, the fact will be regretted by all who can appreciate the great value of his work in behalf of the orchestra which has long held the first place among organizations of its class.

The Providence Journal.

Published by the Providence Journal Co.
Journal Building, 203 Westminster St.,
Providence, R. I.

FRIDAY, MARCH 2, 1906.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A Fine Programme and the Largest Audience of the Season.

The concert given last evening in Infantry Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra drew out an unusually large audience. For the first time this season the hall presented an appearance something like that seen during the two years that the concerts were managed by a local committee of guarantors, whose vigorous and effective missionary work filled the house at each performance. Several things combined to attract the people last night. It was the last opportunity to hear the orchestra during the present season; a programme of unusually fresh and varied interest was provided; two soloists appeared, one of whom, Mr. David Bispham, is always a drawing card here; and it was the farewell to Providence of the veteran conductor, Mr. Gericke. The audience was not only a large one but enthusiastic as well, the greeting to Mr. Gericke and Mr. Bispham being of especial warmth. The players responded to the mood of the audience with a spirited and brilliant performance of the following programme:

Overture to Goethe's "Egmont," Op. 84.....Beethoven
Ballade for bariton and Orchestra...F. Converse (First time in Providence.)
Unfinished Symphonny in D-minor.....Schubert
Aria, "Hans Heiling".....Marschner
Symphony on a Mountain Air, for orchestra and pianoforte, Op. 25.....Vincent d'Indy

The three orchestral numbers offered a pleasant variety and some interesting points of contrast. The overture written by Beethoven for Goethe's play, one of the very few ventures of that composer in the field of "programme music," is singularly unlike his usual style, but none the less a powerful and interesting work. It was performed superbly, the fine body of strings—wherein the Boston orchestra so conspicuously excels every other—distinguishing themselves by the remarkable unanimity, smoothness and telling vigor of their playing. The delightful unfinished symphony of Schubert also received an adequate and highly artistic rendering. The main point of interest, however, centred in the final number, the symphony by the talented and original French composer, d'Indy, whose recent visit to this country has drawn particular attention to his works at the present time.

M. d'Indy belongs to the ultra-modern school of composers, a school that to the conservatives is nothing short of revolutionary. The very foundations of music are unsettled, we are told, if the work of D'Indy and his fellow conspirators is to be taken seriously. Form, tonality, the whole laboriously erected system of harmony, are all thrown to the winds by these iconoclasts in their mad search for an unprofitable originality, say many critics. These things are not discoverable in the work of M. d'Indy's played last night. True, it is not built just on the lines followed by the older "classical" composers, but it does not sound quite like the tocsin of musical anarchy. In form it is no more free than is the case with the works of many composers who are [illegible] respectable society. There is [illegible] liberal use of [illegible] these things to say in just what proportion the bitter is to be mingled with the sweet? No one certainly, but the composer. If M. d'Indy offers a dish too highly spiced for anyone's taste there is other fare in plenty. And it is not to be denied that in his "symphony on a mountain air" there is much that is pleasing and comparatively little to be discovered of the revolutionary processes of which we have heard so much.

Another interesting feature of the programme was the ballade by Frederick Converse, a young American composer, whose works, already considerable in number, have attracted wide attention and favorable comment. Mr. Converse, too, belongs to the moderns, but his style is very different from that of M. d'Indy. For that matter, it might be said that, while the Frenchman has an original and fully developed style, the American does not seem to have quite found himself. He has not as yet discovered the value of conciseness in utterance, the telling force of simplicity. He overloads his orchestration; he grows eloquent over unimportant matters; he loses the force of a climax by introducing it too frequently. This is not to say that Mr. Converse is unworthy of a hearing. On the contrary, he has fine gifts and a high degree of skill. These are sufficiently manifested in his ballade to justify the encouragement already extended to his work and to offer a reasonable hope that he will become a factor worth recognizing in the slowly growing American school of music.

Mr. Bispham sang the rather trying part assigned to the baritone in this work with the intelligence, sympathy, splendid diction and skilful management of the voice that are always features in his singing. Later he contributed a brilliant rendering of the great air from Marschner's opera and for both performances was wildly applauded and recalled over and over again.

Mr. Gebhard, who played the piano part in DIndy's symphony, although oppvery pleasant impression, although opportunity to achieve any very pronounced effect is not provided in the score. Clarity, smoothness and fine musical feeling were plainly evidenced in his playing.

The concert was, upon the whole, a most agreeable one and made a brilliant finish to the orchestra's 25th season in this city. Even Mr. Gericke seemed influenced by the contagious enthusiasm of the audience, and was unusually demonstrative in his manner of conducting. If his object was to leave behind a pleasant memory of this, his last appearance here, the effort was certainly a successful one.

SUNDAY HERALD

Published Every Day in the Year.
VOL. CXIX., NO. 63.

SUNDAY, MARCH 4, 1906.

LEGENDS TOLD ON VIOL STRINGS

Landscape Also Shares Programme of Seventeenth Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

NEW WORKS HEARD FROM TWO COMPOSERS

Numbers by Converse and Boehe Presented by Conductor Gericke—Rudolph Ganz to Be Heard.

The programme of the 17th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Gericke conductor, given last night in Symphony Hall, was as follows:

Overture to "The Fair Melusina"..Mendelssohn
La Belle Dame Sans Merci, ballad for baritone and orchestra.....F. S. Converse Ulysses' Departure and Shipwreck.....Boehe
Aria from "Hans Heiling".....Marschner
"From Italy," symphonic fantasia..R. Strauss

The music of this concert was illustrative of landscape and legend. Mendelssohn, the charming landscapist, is not so poetical in the "Melusina" overture as in the "Fingal's Cave," yet there are delightful glimpses of the water in which the mermaid-woman disported herself, and there is the suggestion, as Schumann put it, of "fables of the life far down in the watery abyss," of treasure which the sea has snatched from land-dwellers, of submarine castles and strange rulers and women for whom mortals pine and waste away if by chance they see them.

Mr. Converse wrote his music to Keats' "La Belle Dame Sans Merci," about four years ago. He himself describes it as in the nature of a symphonic poem with voice part: "there are extended orchestral interludes expressive of the moods of the text." The ballade was first performed in public last Thursday night at Providence, R. I., with Mr. Bispham, baritone, at a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Perhaps it would have been better if Mr. Converse had written a ballade or symphonic poem without a voice part, and left the hearer to his own imagination, aided by the remembrance of the poem. There are verses of such haunting beauty and exquisite melody that any deliberate addition of music, note against syllable, does not enhance the glory of the text, which serenely bids defiance to the composer, who, if he unites an orchestral piece of surpassing power and wild imagination and entitles it "Kubla Khan," or "La Belle Dame Sans Merci," does not apparently attempt to vie with the poet after the manner of an ingenius interlinear translator. It is hard to imagine music for the voice that would express even approximately the spirit or the form of Shelley's famous lines to the skylark or of some of Swinburne's early poems and ballads.

purely orchestral ballade, "La Belle Dame Sans Merci," but who remembers five measures of it, although it has been played twice at these concerts? Sir Alexander Mackenzie is a sound musician, a man of parts, yet who instinctively associates his name with that of Keats? We can think of only one line that must irresistibly have appealed to Mackenzie, as a thrifty Scot: "The squirrel's granary is full."

Furthermore Mr. Converse is happier in writing for the orchestra than for the human voice. He has shown this in his "Pipe of Desire." He makes his effects easier with orchestral instruments; his orchestral diction is more expressive and dramatic.

Now there is much that is truly poetic in Mr. Converse's ballade. The fairy music, the measures that suggest the appearance and the wiles of the Lady met in the Meads, is often finely imaginative; for instance the treatment of the orchestra in the verse beginning: "She took me to her eifingrot." On the other hand the music of the dream, in which the knight saw the pale and warning kings, and princes too does not fully express the horror of the scene; there is not blood-chilling spectral quality. The mood of the poem is well established at the beginning; the ending is effective, but in the love music there might well be more sensuousness. John Keats was a sensuous being. If his poems do not give ample proof of this, his letters show it and at times unpleasantly, for the expression of this sensuousness is that of prying Cherubino rather than that of a strong man.

The strength of Mr. Converse's ballade is in its orchestral thought, and the voice part, although Mr. Bispham last night declaimed it with evident feeling, does not contribute materially to the expression of the poet's mood or to the description of the detail.

Mr. Bispham revived the old air dear to all honest and dishonest German baritones. The music is now as old-fashioned as is the text itself. Yet Marschner in his day was reckoned an advanced romanticist and there is no doubt but that Wagner borrowed sundry ideas and formulas for his "Lohengrin from Marschner's "Templer und die Juedin." Mr. Bispham sang the air as we have often heard it sung in Germany, i. e., chiefly with gusto.

Ernest Boehe, whose "Departure and Shipwreck of Ulysses" was played here for the first time, is a young gentleman of Munich. His father, an army officer, naturally thought that his son would follow his example; instead of which, as Judge Boompointer would say, with a noble disregard of logical sequence and grammatical construction, the wretched youth deliberately turned musician. Boehe three or four years ago wrote this piece, the first of four orchestral episodes based on incidents in the adventurous life of the wily and much enduring Ulysses. It was his first important work, although among the preceding songs two with orchestra had attracted some attention. It is said that the prevailing mood of the majority of his songs is one of sadness and that he sought for verses that drip melancholy. Meditating an orchestral work he bethought himself of Ulysses, the hero of many long forgotten operas and also of Bungert's operatic tetralogy. The cycle is now complete: "Departure and Shipwreck of Ulysses," "Circe's Isle," "Nausicaa's Lament," "Ulysses' Home-Coming."

These episodes—at least two of them—have been played in many German concert halls, and the composer is looked on by some as a coming man, if he has not actually arrived. It is hard to see why the episode performed here last night should make either a sensation or his reputation. It is perhaps surprising that a man of 23 years should show an intimate knowledge or orchestral resources. Passages in this work sound exceedingly well, as far as mere sound is concerned. When the musical thought itself is examined it does not stand even a moderate test. The themes are common, without any marked individuality, and their treatment is seldom harmonically or contrapuntally effective. The themes have been labelled carefully by Boehe's first teacher, Dr. Louis, but Ulysses in this music is a sorry hero, and his companions march to a brass band as firemen at a country muster. Penelope, or—to speak by the card—the thought of Penelope, is not an appealing theme.

If there is talk about musical portraiture of the sea, Mr. Boehe might study to advantage the score of Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade" and "Sadko," or that of Paul Gilson's remarkable work, or that of Debussy's third nocturne. Old Neptune may blow lustily on all the trombones at once in Boehe's music; the ocean in its fury is hardly suggested. Without the programme published in the score for concert use, there would be little thought of angry wave and cruel expectant rocks. The music is all on the surface. Its brilliance is cheap veneer. Yet something might be expected from this young orchestral technician if he had exposed original ideas, even if they were extravagant and alive with the reckless enthusiasm of youth.

Richard Strauss, conservative, became associated with von Buelow and Alexander Ritter, and he wrote "From Italy" after he had listened to their urgent and radical words; but there is little of the Strauss of today in this music composed about 20 years ago. He says that through Ritter he came to understand Liszt and Wagner: but his acquired knowledge is shown only timidly and at long intervals in this fantasia. The third movement is pleasantly pictorial. And in the finale the well known tune of Denza does yeoman's service. But compare for a moment this work with "Don Juan," which came soon after. With "Don Juan," "Macbeth"—which has not been performed here—and "Death and Transfiguration"—the true Strauss came into the world to stir up strife and dissension, to win his way by mighty thoughts audaciously expressed. "Educational" or "historical" concerts are as a rule boresome; yet it might serve a purpose if extracts from Strauss' Symphony in F minor and "From Italy," and the symphonic poems "Death and Transfiguration" and "Heldenleben" were played in one concert.

Who knows whether Boehe, now chiefly concerned in decoration, and perhaps led by the daily sight of the Glyptothek and the Pinakothek, those lonely temples shivering in a Munich fog, to set music to Grecian legends, may not in time evolve musical thoughts strong, beautiful, and his own? Wagner had done nothing at 23 years of age to be compared with this music of Boehe, and if it be said that Boehe is fortunate in coming after Wagner, it should not be forgotten that Beethoven and Berlioz had done much before "Rienzi" came into the mind of Wagner.

The performance of the orchestra was most excellent throughout. Mr. Gericke was warmly greeted; the new works and Mr. Bispham were applauded with more than perfunctory courtesy.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.

Mendelssohn—Overture to the Legend of "The Fair Melusina," op. 12.
F. S. Converse—Ballade for Baritone Solo and Orchestra, op. 12, "La Belle Dame sans Merci. (After the poem by Keats.) (First time at these concerts.)
Soloist, Mr. David Bispham.
Ernst Boehe—The First of Four Episodes for Orchestra. "Ulysses' Departure and Shipwreck," from "The Voyage of Ulysses," op. 6. (First time at these concerts.)
Marschner—Aria for Baritone, "Upon that Day," from "Hans Heiling."
Mr. Bispham.
Richard Strauss—Symphonic Fantasia, op. 16. "From Italy."

It was rather an unmelodic concert; one that caused the auditor to knit his brows and try to unravel matters rather than to enjoy himself. Therefore we were doubly grateful for any tuneful morsels that were vouchsafed to us. Mendelssohn's "Fair Melusina" is beautiful melody from beginning to end, and there still exist a few depraved persons who enjoy that kind of thing. This band of musical degenerates applauded the work heartily.

Mr. Converse's setting of Keats' poem may be described as an orchestral tone-poem with voice "obbligato." It is a most thankless task for the singer, who merely declaims the plot while the details are worked out by the instruments. Mr. Bispham struggled manfully with the vocal part and gave dramatic power to his words and sufficiently clear enunciation for the auditors to follow without burying themselves in their programme-books.

Mr. Bispham was twice recalled and the number was loudly applauded, yet we cannot think Mr. Converse nearly as successful in vocal as in orchestral work. In the latter he has excellent command of tone-colors and a good dramatic instinct, but in his voice parts there is little effect and less singability. He is, however, not an apostle of cacophony, as so many of his modern brethren are, and all of his compositions are among the best of our native school, even though Mr. Krehbiel did not think him worthy of a place in Grove's Dictionary of Immortals.

Then came more water music, but of a very different kind from Mendelssohn's "Melusina." The young German, Boehe, may yet become a second Richard Strauss; for certainly the latter had not achieved more at 23 than the Bavarian. By coincidence the Strauss work given at this concert was composed at the same age as that at which Boehe brought forth his "Shipwreck of Ulysses," and certainly the Odyssian picture is not less great than the Italian one.

But it would be wrong to regard either work as a masterpiece. Both are great promises, and the promise of "From Italy" has been fulfilled; may Boehe have the same success in taking up his promissory notes. But there is prolixity in this voyage of Ulysses. These moderns require as much room as a Cunarder to turn round in, and when they launch an idea they demand a whole ocean of space. The Shipwreck of Ulysses was a fine exhibition of routine work. It proved Boehe a master of the modern orchestra, a good assimilator of latter-day modes of figure-treatment, and a man well able to work up climaxes and make strong contrasts.

But not all the pounding of the kettle-drums or thumping of the gong could cause any such shivers of emotion as we felt when we first heard some sea-music entitled "The Flying Dutchman," by the man who was the first cause of all these recent efforts.

Then came a return to the old style of fustian and melodrama. Even Mr. Bispham cannot revivify Marschner's operatic music. Yet in its day it was considered great and even inspired the young Wagner, who copied some of it in his "Fairies."

Berlioz, Mendelssohn, Charpentier, and Strauss, all bought round-trip tickets to Italy and return, and each had some musical sketches in his trunk on the home tour. Strauss, however, remained a German spectator of Italian scenery, even in the most inspired parts of his symphony. The first movement is beautiful and gives some premonition of the master that is to come in orchestral music. There is an impressive monotony in this opening Allegro that evinces power and poetic inspiration, since it most fitly pictures the loveliness of the Campagna.

Then comes prolixity, and the picture of the Roman ruins might do quite as well as a portrayal of the Yellowstone Park. There was a little more water-music in the third movement, but not nearly as suggestive as that in the overture of Mendelssohn. Perhaps the "Melusina" chief theme would fit as well as anything to picture the beautiful shores of Sorrento. But there is nothing in music that will picture the haggling boatmen, the steep cliffs or the still steeper hotel bills of that earthly paradise.

Strauss thought that Denza's song of "Funicoli" (celebrating the railway up Vesuvius) was an Italian folk-song, and therefore incorporated it in his finale. It is treated in the most Teutonic manner. It is no more Italian in this symphony than the German beer-saloon in the Galleria Umberto is Italian. Mendelssohn's Saltarella in his Italian symphony finale is a deal more Neapolitan than this heavy-handed treatment of "Bella Napoli." Yet Naples could make a tonal picture well worth while.

George Gissing, the English novelist, once said to the present writer: "There is everything in Naples, from galety to starvation; it is the most characteristic part of Italy." But we doubt whether any foreigner can ever hope to picture it in music. Mendelssohn, the most assimilative of natures, was able to catch some of its spirit, as he was also the only German to reproduce the Scottish flavor in tones, but we shall have to wait until some successor of Sgambati, some real Italian, a true Neapolitan preferably, gives to the world a picture of the most interesting city and life in the world.

Louis C. Elson.

Boston Sunday Globe.
SUNDAY, MARCH 4, 1906.

MUSICAL MATTERS

David Bispham Heard at the Symphony.

Concerts by the Kneisel and Symphony Quartets.

"The Pipe of Desire" Again —Harmonic Happenings.

The American composed, Mr F. S. Converse, was represented on the 17th Symphony program by his ballade for baritone solo and orchestra, op 12, which is a musical setting for Keats' poem, "La Belle Dame Sans Merci." Mr David Bispham, the soloist, also sang the baritone aria, "Upon That Day," from Marschner's opera, "Hans Heiling." The remaining numbers were Mendelssohn's overture to "The Fair Melusina," the first of four episodes for orchestra, from "The Voyage of Ulysses," first time here, and Richard Strauss' symphonic fantasia, "From Italy." In selecting the Keats poem for musical illustration Mr Converse chose a lyric full of emotional contrasts and one that evidently appealed to his imagination as a combination of the earthly and mysterious to which he could give vivid expression through instrumentation that would suggest the various ideas set down in the ballad. This he has succeeded in accomplishing in a way that shows him to be gifted with the art of musical language in a broad sense, for within the past three or four years his compositions have been frequently heard in this city and their value has been indorsed by Mr Gericke and other prominent musicians.

Although the vocal portion is consistently a part of Mr Converse's scheme the orchestration is so full that the omission of the solo would scarcely be noticed, especially if the program supplied the words. The story of the fairies and the unfortunate knight is told in vigorous style, Mr Converse showing the moods of the text quite convincingly, though at times the chaotic episodes appear to be carried to excess, as if the composer took delight in cross modulations and peculiar combinations in progression.

But it is splendidly scored, and although Mr Bispham did not quite do justice, musically, to the vocal part, he sang with great expression and dramatic warmth, and the work was greeted with many signs of appreciation. Mr Bispham's voice sounded husky. Probably it has been overtaxed this season, and, aside from the display of his usual skill in tonal coloring, his singing was not up to his past standard. He was more satisfactory in the Marschner aria than in the Converse music.

Boehe's "Ulysses" number, played here for the first time, is one of those seething, tempestuous and anon tranquil sea pictures of a subject that has often been used, and in this instance, at least, handled with considerable skill. The orchestra in this and the Converse work showed ensemble playing of the highest order and responded perfectly to Mr Gerike's baton, when the slightest uncertainty in attack would have turned a smooth performance into one of disastrous results, the nature of the pieces being so largely inharmonic.

The Mendelssohn overture opened the program in a delightful manner. The Strauss fantasia, which shows the fiery Richard in his youthful and gentler vein, went well. The third movement was a triumph for the strings, and the final movement was given with splendid sonority and brilliancy.

The French violinist, Henri Marteau, will be the soloist this week. He will play for the first time here a C minor concerto for violin and orchestra by Jaques-Dalcroze, a Swiss composer. The orchestra numbers will be the overture to "Sakuntala," Goldmark; Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun" and Schubert's C major symphony.

BOSTON SYMPHONY QUARTET.

The fifth concert of the Boston Symphony quartet will be given in Jordan hall tomorrow evening. The assisting artist, Mr Carlo Buonamici, with Prof Willy Hess and Mr Heinrich Warnke, will play a trio for piano, violin and 'cello in D minor, Op 32, by the Russian, Arensky. The second number on the program will be a novelty, two movements from a new string quartet by Christian Sinding, the Danish composer. The movements which will be played are the second and third. The final number will be one of the less familiar late quartets of Beethoven, that in E flat major, Op 127, No. 12. The last concert will be given Monday evening, April 9.

Boston Herald.
324 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON, MASS.
SATURDAY, MARCH 3, 1906

IN THE WORLD OF MUSIC

A SYMPHONY CONCERT OF MANY LEGENDS

Mr. Converse's New Ballad—Boehe and Homer Make a Tone Poem—A Week of Chamber Concerts—The Musical Calendar—"The Pipe of Desire" Again

The first phrases of Mendelssohn's overture, "The Fair Melusina," with which Mr. Gericke began yesterday, seemed to foreshadow the warm, clear, untaxing pleasure the Symphony concert was to give to the end. They were imagined with felicity and developed with grace. The mermaid-Melusina, enticing to mortal lovers when her silver-gray scales are hidden, swam through them. They had Mendelssohn's concise elegance, his euphony, and his transparent nicety of feeling. They charmed spontaneously. Of course he soon began to fall away. Try as he may, he seldom keeps his best level for long. By the time the amorous count was wooing the mermaid, the music ceased to touch the fancy so brightly. Mendelssohnian commonplace a little shadowed it; there were patches of elegance only. But Mendelssohn was quick to recover himself. Time and again the charm returned not only of the music as music, but of legend gently told and even of Melusina's watery, wavy elfland.

So Mendelssohn in the thirties wove his music about mediæval legends. Next Mr. Converse wove his of 1906 about another mediæval tale. Keats retold it, even before Mendelssohn discovered the Fair Melusina—the tale of the haggard knight who walked by the withered sedge on the songless lake, who had ridden with the wild-eyed lady of "the kisses four" and seen the wan pageant of her ghostly lovers—the fair woman who is merciless. There is an introduction, melancholy of mood, wan of tonal color, hollow of tonal substance—like the thin clear light of a gray autumn afternoon. There are ominous drum taps. Then the singer begins the ballad. His tones, the piping oboe, and the pale insistent strings summon the picture of lake and knight. The singer's voice tells his tale. The orchestra keeps it a tale of phantoms—vague, remote, emptied. The wailing oboe, the hollow woodwinds, the darkening strings, the faint high tinkle of the harp make atmosphere. But human once was one of the phantoms and human was his passion. The orchestra evokes it, now in warm, undulating, enticing climax, now with a grewsome shrillness, then in restless modulations, again in broken splinters of tone. Steadily the music clings equally to the large mood and the vivid details of the verse. There is an elfin flicker, for example. The train of ghostly lovers passes swift and wan—phantoms again of passion. There is the chill sharp awakening. And the knight walks again by the melancholy lake in the thin light.

Oftenest Mr. Converse seems to treat the singer as one more instrument added to his orchestra. His tones narrate and give the clew, while the instruments impart the mood, bring the atmosphere and color the imagined picture. Throughout the ballad is vivid music. The contour and contents of melodies, modulations and rhythms; instrumental combinations and tints serve the single purpose of expression. Behind is the understanding that chooses wisely what music may express and heighten, and the imagination that kindles to the matter and the means until it fuses botn into one whole. The large mood and the pregnant detail are equally within Mr. Converse's grasp. His command of his orchestra—explicit, supple, suggestive—steadily serves some imaginative purpose. He is developing an instinct for the incisive and the persuasive phrase. And the range of his imagination and of his power of expression widens. Here with Keats's ballad he is writing the music of phantoms that once were warm with passion. The listener feels both. The ghosts tell in tones their own wan tragedy, and the music is at once picture and speech, a little tone-poem side by side with Keats's, rather than "after" it.

Then the mediæval legends yielded to Greek. Ernst Boehe is a young composer of Munich who is hardly twenty-five years old and who was not that when he wrote his four "episodes for orchestra" out of Ulysses's voyages as the Odyssey tells them. Homer may yet be the fashion among German composers. Bungert has made a whole cycle of operas out of that same Odyssey, though only in Dresden do audiences take much and abiding joy of them. Now Boehe reads it, thinks of his orchestra and quickly sets pen to music paper. Perhaps he has read as a boy reads—it is the only way to read Homer. Only a young imagination would send the victorious Greeks clattering, clumping, shouting, up to the walls of Troy as Boehe does in his music, or start them so lustily on their homeward voyage. Reading Homer has long been a perilous pastime for young poets. It makes them wish to say similar things of their own. Perhaps it will soon be as dangerous for young composers.

Boehe, however, is writing a tone-poem. There must be what the analysts sometimes call "a slow section." There it is in a trice—Ulysses musing upon Penelope awaiting him in the lordly house at Ithaca, longing, constant. Better still, when his ship goes to wreck that melody of Penelope shall be as a musical life-preserver, and float Ulysses through tumultuous seas of tone. Being young, which is no reproach, and also modern, Boehe asks a very large orchestra, and he scores for it with what in these days of youthful orchestral virtuosi, we shall soon be calling academic brilliance. Sometimes he succeeds in making his "tone-picture." He has even his moments of individuality in his tonal-coloring, but not so often in his melodies. Yet the fresh wind of youth does blow through the music, and that is the breath of the Odyssey—and the mere eagerness of it is buoyof creatures of earth and elfland. The one behind Marschner's moribund opera "Hans Heiling," the gnome king who loved the princess, and from it Mr. Bispham sang that air, beloved of baritones, in which Hans with a pretty suavity likens the love that is burning in him to the tortures of hell and similar distressing things. It is operatic agony of an elder day, intended to be sung agreeably with more heed of the audience in front than of any legend (or torture) behind. It is fair to take it for what it is and to say that Mr. Bispham sang with what little sensuous quality remains in his voice, with admirably clear enunciation, keen understanding and expression and as rounded phrases as a certain stiffness of tone permitted. It was as unsensuous singing in tonal quality as it was intelligent and imaginative in everything else. Of such, too, was his singing of Mr. Converse's ballad, but there he had short phrases oftener than a flowing melody. As for the orchestra, it had been as a perfect instrument that was human besides. It continued so through Richard Strauss's "Italian" fantasia; but that and other music of Italian inspiration deserves a little article to itself.

Henri Marteau, the most distinguished, with Kreisler, of the younger violinists, reappears in Boston at the eighteenth pair of Symphony concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, and by all accounts with his old fire tempered by a larger understanding and refined by a more delicate artistry. He is to play a concerto by a Swiss composer, Dalcroze, for the first time in America. For the rest, the programme comprises, Goldmark's glowing overture, "Sakuntala"; Debussy's tonal kaleidoscope, "The Afternoon of a Faun," which the orchestra played marvellously under Mr. d'Indy in New York, last December; and Schubert's seventh symphony (1818) in C major. The following week the orchestra makes the last of its trips for the current season. It will be notable for Mr. Gericke's final appearances in New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington.

The fifth of the orchestra's series of concerts in Cambridge takes place on Thursday evening at eight, in Sanders Theatre. Schubert's unfinished symphony, Vieuxemps's concerto in A minor for violin, Goldmark's overture, "Sakuntala," and an air and a group of songs to be announced make the programme. Mr. Adolf Bak of the first violins of the orchestra is the violinist, and Mr. Myron W. Whitney, Jr., the singer.

Two movements—an andante and a scherzo—from a new string quartet by Sinding, the Danish composer, will be played for the first time here at the concert of the Boston Symphony Quartet on Monday evening, at eight, in Jordan Hall. Mr. Hess, Mr Warnke and Mr. Buonamici, the excellent pianist, begin the programme with Arensky's trio in D minor for piano, violin and 'cello. For ending comes one of the less familiar of Beethoven's heavily charged quartets that he wrote in deafness and advancing years, that in E-flat major, opus 127.

SUNDAY HERALD
Published Every Day in the Year.
VOL. CXIX., NO. 70.
SUNDAY, MARCH 11, 1906.

MUSIC TRICKERY MARKS CONCERTO

Unusual Orchestral Combinations in Accompaniment to Henri Marteau's New Violin Offering.

HEARD AT EIGHTEENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT

Goldmark's "Sakuntala" Also on the Programme—Mr. Stojowski's Piano Recital in Steinert Hall.

The 18th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Gericke, conductor, was given last night in Symphony Hall. The programme was as follows:

Overture to "Sakuntala".....Goldmark
Concerto in C minor for violin.....Jacques-Dalcroze
Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun,".....Debussy
Symphony in C major.....Schubert

When the overture to "Sakuntala" was first played in Boston, it became immediately popular, as the story goes; it was heard often and with delight, and it seemed as though it would take the place of the overture to "William Tell," though we have not been able to find the record of any performance of "Sakuntala" on the organ. There was much talk here as in Europe about its oriental sultriness, languor, and sensuousness, its swooning harmonies and lush orchestration.

Smells of all the sunburnt south,
Strange spice and flower, strange savor of crushed fruit,
And perfume the swart kings tread underfoot
For pleasure when their minds wax amorous, [illegible] and grated sandalroot.

it is not unlikely that [illegible] to carry down the [illegible] safely through many years of the present century. For there is more "local color" in this music. "Local color" may or may not be a musical illusion. Weber, the critic some years ago of the Temps in Paris, boldly declared there was no such thing in itself. He went too far; but how does a New Englander know what oriental color in music really is if he has not heard the music of the east in the east, and surely he would not be reminded if he sojourned in India of Goldmark's music by the music he head there. We have been taught to believe that the employment of certain scales and harmonies and rhythms and instrumental combinations give oriental color, and when we hear music written according to this formula we say decisively: "Ah! How oriental!" And a native of India hearing the same music might say in reply: "Not a bit like it."

But Goldmark's overture is sensuous and dramatic, well constructed and original. The sensuousness and dramatic force are contagious.

Mr. Marteau has not been heard at these concerts since 1893. He was then in his 19th year, and he won all hearts by the charm of his youthfulness and the warmth and the enthusiasm of his performance. He has since visited the city from time to time, and the constant development of his art has been apparent.

Last night he played a concerto unknown here, except possibly to violinists, who may have wondered at its difficulties. Jaques-Dalcrose, a Swiss, born at Vienna, composed it and dedicated it to him. The concerto is inherently a virtuoso work, a show piece. Its form is free and unconventional, free to the verge of recklessness. That the composer has technic and also a vivid sense of orchestration is indisputable, but in composing it his aim seems chiefly to have been to provide a formidable task for the violinist and to make the audience sit up. With the exception of a beautiful song-episode just before the introduction of the fugal section in the first movement—this song-episode is repeated—and the second, an idyllic movement, which has delightful moments and true mood, the concerto for effect depends on orchestral trickery.

Unusual and surprising combinations of instruments certainly keep the hearer's attention diverted. Sudden contrasts in rhythm and emotion keep him on the jump. But there is little inherent strength or beauty of thought in the work with the exception of the passages above named. The work as pure music seems rambling, disjointed, inconsequential. We doubt whether a second hearing would change this impression, for an audience is surprised only once. When the surprise is known in advance, there is then opportunity for examining carefully the cheap cause of the surprise. The combination of a snare drum and a fiddle, for example, is not necessarily heroic or beautiful.

Mr. Marteau gave a remarkable virtuoso performance of this virtuoso concerto. The task was a most difficult one, and it is not surprising that the violinist's intonation, especially in the first movement, was occasionally impure. It would be ungracious to insist on this point, for as a whole Mr. Marteau's playing was one of extraordinary merit, one characterized by the finest technical and aesthetic qualities. His tone is not so luscious as when he first visited us, but it has a virility and a breadth that have come with the years, and he now displays a maturity and authority of conception and interpretation that, with his virtuoso ability, rank him among the great violinists.

It would have been better for the balance of the programme if the exquisite prelude of Debussy had come after a more solid and substantial work. On the other hand the performance of the prelude showed the difference between a true and rare artist, a man with the most poetic thoughts, a composer of unusual imagination, with an equally uncommon gift of expression, and a musician with a knack at orchestration, an experimenter with instrumental combinations and contrasts. How logical, how inevitable was this music of Debussy after that of Jacques-Dalcroze! Why should we not now be as familiar with Debussy's "Nocturnes" as with the prelude to "The Afternoon of a Fawn"? The third nocturne does not necessarily require a female chorus. Then there is a still later work, "The Sea," which should be heard here.

The concert ended with the performance of Schubert's symphony, which is still among those that are truly great. The work of the orchestra was excellent last evening. Mr. Gericke's masterly reading of the symphony is well known; Goldmark's overture was performed superbly, and Debussy's prelude was read and played with the indispensable grace and poesy.

[186]

Boston Transcript
324 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON, MASS.
SATURDAY, MARCH 10, 1906

IN THE WORLD OF MUSIC

MARTEAU REAPPEARS AT THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

A New Concerto by Dalcroze and a Symphony of Schubert—Few Concerts Next Week—The Musical Calendar—News of the Day

By all accounts that courtly mind, that genial and polished imagination that lived as Addison, was never much or pleasantly stirred by music. If only it had been, and if the days of its activity were these days of ours, the concert of yesterday afternoon would have set it to a new account of "The Pleasures of the Imagination," and we should have the acute and expert sympathy needed to describe to us how perfect was the pleasure that was given to us who heard the music of yesterday afternoon.

For there some hundreds of us, fleeing from a wet and dreary world without, had hurried in to warmth and cheer and music. And if never before had it been set forth what music is really for, then there it was most plainly put before any that chose to remark it—in the rush of enchanting sound within, and its two hours of grateful interruption to the rush of wind and snow outside. Outside, the cold and pelting elements; inside, Debussy with his quiet wood and faun, and the sunshine of Schubert. Outside, the cold hard world that we find with our raw feelings every day, that beats us and baffles us, that is filled with haggling competitors, uses us ill and deprives us of all that we want. Inside, the world of make-believe, where yearning sees itself satisfied, where joy is celebrated and fun is real, wnere the ills of the world are at least in fancy righted and we who have suffered them are soothed in their imagined banishment. That is what music is for—to set our imagination on horseback, as it were, that for a too brief hour or two it may gallop away from the vexed world of reality and arrive at whatever heaven it selects.

For such retreat yesterday Mr. Gericke had prepared one of those programmes with which of late months he has been regularly astonishing his followers. They have searched the literature for orchestra, have found the new thing of eternal worth, have found things new among the eternal old, have mixed all these so that contrast should add light to their shining. Yesterday there was Goldmark with busy strings, businesslike horns and drums, a collection of irreproachable platitudes to deliver, and a general tendency to illustrate that famous line in one of Milton's famous sonnets. And why, till we have made seemly disposal of hat and coat and have safely put the hard world behind us, should there not be some honest maker of music who also shall serve though he only stand and wait? Goldmark went to prepare a way for Debussy.

And a remarkable performance we had of Debussy's faun music, sunny, sylvan, dreamy, full of indefinable yearning, and worthy the sacrifice of anything needed to prepare its way. Of misty pool it sings, and of the thrill that misty pool gives one who suddenly and excitedly discovers it on mounting a little hill. Of quiet, subdued sunset and evening stillness Debussy discourses, and of the mystery they spread over the mind. But most he can convey that ineffable longing that has settled over everything human at some time or other. It may come at any time—in the night, when the imagination is horribly alone with itself. It may come when you are caught in the thickest of crowds. Haply it is faltering and comes but seldom. But most it steals upon you out of green woods or gray sky—a yearning vague as the sky, a wish of the vexed imagination to be larger than itself, to occupy a lot larger than the human—and for the rest indescribable, except as Debussy describes it. Flute and Mr. Gericke, orchestra and Debussy, sang that yesterday till wood and sky were there, and the faun and his pipe, to personate you and all that you felt and would say if you could. It was a notable performance.

For ending to the programme there was Schubert's unending great symphony in C, whose length is heavenly, said Schumann, and whose themes are like heavenly guests. Themes of ravishing beauty Schubert has there put upon the paper, certainly, and in inexhaustible bounty, and arranged in a pattern that has symmetry along with its largeness, coherence along with bulk. Its design is immense. There is but one thing this is like in the effect it gives. Your man who walks along the street is accumstomed to the quick rhythms of street sounds—the swift click of the street-car wheel on its rail, the rapid striking of a clock, the tattoo of his own heels on the flags. Set him a lubber on an outgoing ship and he gets a tremendous impression as the vessel leaves the harbor, and there begins to come the long, slow, regular, steady heave of the waves against the side. The second one brings him to notice. The third establishes the rhythm, and his whole system of thought has to accommodate itself to this new pulse, slow, agonizingly slow, that staggers him with his first sense of the immensity of things and the irresistible force of their procession. There is something of the same sense of largeness and majesty in Schubert's symphony. It moves with a Jove-like, stately leisure. It looks out upon the world and speaks with the repose and contentment of a god, for whom time does not exist and who speaks and does as he wills. It takes all the time it chooses to its charming, and half the wonderful spell that it exerts is the very deliberateness of the exertion. Mr. Gericke in playing it played it with perfect yielding to its first exaction—he gave it design. He made it what it is, an Alhambra melted into music—a structure of vastness, overlaid with delicately and endlessly graceful detail.

These things made large enjoyment, and yet salient in them stood the appearance of Mr. Marteau, to fiddle with our orchestra for the first time since 1893. So long an absence made him important before he made himself charming. The charm he created for himself, moreover, by the force of his personality and his art, and without great aid from the music of Mr. Jaques-Dalcrose, whose concerto he had brought along to play. Jaques-Dalcrose, the information goes, is interesting because he is Swiss—the first of his country to make much music. Of Swiss extraction he is, but of Viennese birth. And the Alps, it must be said, have lost much height in going down into Austria. How much of the charm of the Helvetian's tunes were Marteau and how much Jaques-Dalcrose makes a delicate point in metaphysics—which will be neglected to nobody's sorrow. For the rest, the concerto seems, at least on first hearing, made up of some fustian, much honest buckram and patches of real cloth-of-gold. For much of the time it kept Mr. Marteau from being Marteau. It busied him with very careful and delicate and amazing execution of sixths and thirds and octaves that left the eye dry and the hearer's throat unchoked by sobs. It kept Mr. Marteau, much of the time, mounting Alpine steeps of arpeggios, icy cold. But the mountain song did break forth, and then we heard Mr. Marteau.

And the tone of Marteau! Kubelik's violin has the hard, glittering voice of success. Always from youth it has had the easy way of the wonder-child, and its tone sings that—a calm acceptance of the rapture stirred by its wonder, and a feeling and a comprehension for nothing else. Outside its feeling and comprehension the world goes on, occasionally busy with other things than wonder-children, full of people who toil and fail, full of other people who pity failure and lift it up. And all that and more is in Marteau's tone. And if you want to hear your immediate world, that gives you a struggle to live, that baffles you and hurts you and yet gives you friends and sunsets and all the rest of life—if you want to hear all that reduced to the single voice of a violin, go and hear Marteau play.

B. K.

MUSICAL MISCELLANY

MORE AND JUST PRAISE FOR GERICKE

Le Gallienne Turns Wagner Into Poetry—The Philadelphia Orchestra Polls Its Audience for a Final Programme—Some Interesting Results—Another Operatic Rebellion—Musical News

Next week, on the final "trip" of our orchestra for the current season, Mr. Gericke will be making his last appearances as conductor in New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and Brooklyn. The audiences at the monthly concerts in these cities are as steadfast in attendance and almost as intimate with conductor and band as are ours, each week, at home. They have been so for years, except in Washington, and they are the flower of the musical public of each city. There is every sign that they will show their regard for Mr. Gericke as they take leave of him, and from Baltimore come reports of a more substantial token of it than applause and wreaths. Meanwhile, since his approaching retirement became known, the musical reviewers of these cities have been writing warm and just praise of him. None has been so sincere and so discriminating toward both the conductor and his men as has Mr. Aldrich of the New York Times. He wrote there last Sunday:

"What the Boston Orchestra is Mr. Gericke has made it. The character it has had as an artistic instrument and the style of its performance are as they are because they have been moulded exactly by his ideals and methods. High ideals and strenuous methods they have been. He has never spared his men any of the pains and labor that he considered requisite to obtain the exact effect he was aiming at in any work, in any passage, in any single bit of orchestral color or phrase or adjustment of tonal balance. But neither has he spared himself. A 'passion for perfection,' it has been well said, has been at the foundation of Mr. Gericke's work as an orchestral conductor, and he has wreaked himself upon the Boston Orchestra to make it what he would have it. Greater technical perfection in the playing of an orchestra it is vain to seek, but there is something finer, subtler, more elusive than technical finish in orchestral performance that Mr. Gericke has given the Boston Orchestra; the perfect euphony, the perfect balance, the exact adjustment of the color and quality of every phrase, so that there shall be just so much of one instrumental color, just so much of another, and the resultant mixture shall be the precise one that belongs to the harmony of the whole.

"Mr. Gericke has been charged with sacrificing spirit, breadth, and the fiercer sonorities of modern orchestral music in his anxiety to keep this sort of quality. Whatever it may have been once, it is now an unjust charge. Especially in the later years of his work here, he has shown a continually increasing sympathy with compositions of the modern schools of music, has played them frequently, and with fine enthusiasm and devotion. Who will not say that Mr. Gericke's performance of Strauss's 'Don Quixote,' for instance, for the first time in New York, was not superior in almost every respect to the performance the composer himself gave of it not long afterward? Besides all its other excellencies, it had the very important one that the orchestra did not break down in the middle. This is something, and it is something that has always been felt to belong to the Boston Orchestra under Mr. Gericke—its absolute certainty, its unquestioned perfection of preparation. When it plays a piece it is able to do it as Mr. Gericke intends, and until it is able to, this piece is not played.

"It has been said, also, that Mr. Gericke has exhausted his men and overburdened and worried them with rehearsals, with endless repetitions and stoppings. Perhaps; but the result of it has been that these same men have played as scarcely another body of the kind in the world can play; that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is absolutely perfect in its way. And that, too, is something. Another conductor would have done differently, would have got other kinds of effects, would have accomplished another order of results; but—to return to the original proposition—as it is now, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is the product precisely of Mr. Gericke's strenuous, unwearied activities. Those who are grateful for its achievements must express their gratitude first of all to him."

Boston Sunday Globe.
SUNDAY, MARCH 11, 1906.

MUSICAL MATTERS

Henri Marteau, Soloist at Symphony Concert.

Plays for the First Time Here Dalcroze's Violin Concerto.

Piano Recital by Arthur Rubinstein—Gossip.

The novelty of the 18th Symphony program was Dalcroze's C minor concerto for violin and orchestra which Mr Henri Marteau played for the first time in this city, the original performance having been given by the same artist about five years ago in Geneva. The work is dedicated to Mr Marteau, and both he and Dalcroze are connected with the conservatory at that place. The other selections chosen by Mr Gericke were Goldmark's overture to "Sakuntala," Debussy's prelude to Mallarme's "Afternoon of a Faun," and Schubert's grand C major symphony. A very long program, and many in the audience left before the close of the concert and missed the wonderful finale of the Schubert number. Dalcroze's concerto is in three movements, the orchestration fairly bristles with difficulties for the soloist as well as the band, and the boldness of some of the instrumental combinations and the fullness of the solo score, in which also are found unusual melodic forms, makes the work very interesting. With such a performance as that given by Mr Marteau and the orchestra all the merits of the composition received due recognition. The interpretation was one long to be remembered with pleasure.

Although Mr Marteau has not been heard with the Symphony orchestra for a dozen years his frequent appearances here in concerts and recitals have shown him to be a virtuoso of high rank and his fame in this country and abroad is well deserved. He has made the concert going public acquainted with many violin compositions by musicians comparatively unknown and his repertory probably covers as wide a field in musical literature as any contemporary artist. In the Dalcroze concerto Mr Marteau shows about every phase of violin mastery that is known. In the first movement, and part of the third, the chord phrases are so numerous that the physical demand, aside from the bowing, is very taxing. In the second part there are contrasting theme episodes that require double finger work of the most facile nature and the "stumbling blocks" in the last movement only permit surmounting by an artist of Mr Marteau's skill.

Mr Marteau's performance was singularly effective and sympathetic as soon as he "got into the mood," which mood was not apparent for the first few minutes. Then he gave an exhibition of virtuosity that was nearly flawless. Whether it was the rather novel character of the work, the splendid playing of the soloist and the orchestra, or the combinations of the three, that aroused the enthusiasm of the audience it would be difficult to determine; but whatever the cause the result was an outburst of applause that indicated warm appreciation of a spirited and artistic interpretation of a meritorious work. Mr Martean was recalled and rcalled to the platform.

Under the direction of Mr Hess the orchestral support in the concerto was inspiring and wholly adequate in every way in its companionship with the solo artist. Mr Gericke led the other selections; and very satisfactory was the "Sakuntala" overture and the dainty and fantastic Debussy prelude. Of the interpretation of the magnificent seventh symphony by Schubert general praise is due.

The orchestra will be away this week on its fifth trip. The program for the 19th rehearsal and concert will include the overture to "Tasse," D'Harcourt; Liszt's E flat piano concert, Mr Rudolph Ganz soloist; E. A. Mac Dowell's symphonic poem, "Lancelot and Elaine" and Beethoven's eighth symphony.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.

Goldmark—Overture to "Sakuntala."
Jaques-Dalcroze—Violin Concerto, C minor.
Soloist, M. Henri Marteau.
Debussy—"The Afternoon of a Faun."
Schubert—Symphony in C major.

And a mighty long programme it was! It began brilliantly with the Goldmark overture, which was applauded to the echo. Again and again Mr. Gericke was obliged to bow his acknowledgements. We imagine, however, that this exceptional enthusiasm was in part a personal tribute to Mr. Gericke. The public seem to delight in showing him their appreciation of his past services. It may be added that these services were never more thorough than at present; he seems in the very zenith of his powers.

Mr. Hess deserves especial praise for the manner in which he interpreted the new Swiss concerto. It was a difficult composition to conduct and it received adequate performance both in the orchestral and the solo parts. Mr. Henri Marteau has broadened in style since we last heard him and his performance was praiseworthy in the highest degree.

Such massive G-string work, such perfect double-stopping, such pure harmonics (in the finale of the slow movement) one can seldom hear. The audience went into frenzies of delight and recalled the great artist over and over again at the end of the composition. And this triumph was the more remarkable when one considers that the work itself was not of a popular sort.

In fact this new violin concerto is another of those bizarre attempts to wake up weary critics by unheard-of combinations. No one may object to liberty of form in a concerto.

After all, the concerto is the freest expression of the sonata-form, and even the precise Mozart, who founded the classical form of concerto, made occasional deviations, while Liszt led the concerto into the rhapsodical vein almost a half century ago. Therefore M. Jaques-Dalcroze has "carte blanche" to use any form he wishes in concerto-writing. But the oddity of the orchestration, the strange progressions, the fearfully abrupt contrasts, made the composition one of the modern music puzzles.

It was marked "First time at these concerts," and a witty auditor remarked that he would be happier if it had stated "Last time at these concerts." Yet we suspect that there is more to the work than at first sight appears. We should be glad to hear it again if only to solve our doubts.

While the first, general impression was unfavorable, we found some points of remarkable beauty and skill in the concerto. The gloomy, portentous, restless fugue, in the first movement, beginning on the bassoons and running through the wood-wind and the brasses until it permeates the whole orchestra, was one strong point. The beauty of the passages on the muted strings was another. The contrasts of the slow movement were effective, and so was the clumsy "brusquerie" of parts of the finale.

And there was very much figure treatment. Let no one suppose that our ultra-modern school lacks intellectuality. On the contrary, the mental exercise is pushed as far as it was in the 15th and 16th centuries, when Music and Mathematics were twin sisters. Figure treatment is constantly in evidence in this concerto, as it is in the works of D'Indy, Mahler, Reger, "ed id genus omne."

Yet we cannot say that this "Marteau" hit the nail on the head by making his "rentree" with this work, for it has all the prolixity of the long-winded latter-day composers. Nowadays a Sinfonietta takes an hour in performance, and a full-blooded symphony or concerto extends into infinity.

The grace of Debussy made a good foil to the pleasant sour of this violin work, and we yielded more to its romantic charm than ever before. Yet this forlorn Faun ought not to have appeared on this particular programme. Its "afternoon" extended too far into the evening. Even without this interesting zoological specimen the programme would have been an hour and three-quarters in length.

Finally Schubert like a poultice came to heal the blows of Jaques-Dalcroze. To think that once upon a time Vienna rejected this C major symphony as being too intricate to understand and too difficult to be played! Mahler is avenging Schubert by giving Vienna symphonies that are twice as hard and not half as melodious. We wonder if tune-writing were again obligatory in Music whether the most prominent of our living composers could compete with Schubert.

It is seldom that one witnesses an exodus during a performance of a Schubert work, but on this occasion the prolixity had been extreme and for once Schubert's "divine length" seemed excessive, wherefore there was a long procession towards the doors at the end of the Andante, and the grand finale, with its development of that powerful figure of four ponderous knocks, was listened to by only the faithful old guard which may be bored but never surrenders. The performance of the symphony was an especially fine one.

Louis C. Elson.

TELEGRAPH
PHILA., PA
FEB 23 1906

GERICKE RESIGNS FROM THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Insists on Conditions That Major Higginson Did Not Approve.

Boston, Feb. 23.—William Gericke has resigned as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, his resignation to take effect at the end of the present season.

Mr. Gericke was offered the position for the season of 1906-7 and informed Major H. L. Higginson, the founder of the organization, that he would accept under certain conditions. Major Higginson did not approve them and Mr. Gericke declined the offer. He says he will return to Europe.

Mr. Gericke was conductor of the Symphony Orchestra from 1884 to 1889 and from 1898 until the present time.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
TELEGRAPH
PHILA., PA.
MAR 3 - 1906

Wilhelm Gericke, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and long a favorite in this city, will bid farewell to Philadelphia when the orchestra gives the last concert of the season at the Academy of Music on March 12. Mr. Gericke, as has already been announced, will sever his connection with the Boston organization at the close of this year and will return to Vienna to rest after nearly forty years of continuous work. As a consequence, this concert will have a sentimental as well as a musical interest.

The programme will include the Bach D Major suite, Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun," and Beethoven's Eroica symphony. Henri Marteau, violinist, who will be the soloist, will introduce an unknown concerto by Emile Jaques-Dalcrose, a Swiss composer.

---

om PUBLIC LEDGER
PHILA., PA
ddress
ate MAR 8 - 1906

MAY LEAD BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Steinbach's Voyage Here Said to Be to Succeed Gericke.

BOSTON, March 7.—Fritz Steinbach, conductor of the Symphony Orchestra at Cologne, sailed from Liverpool today for Boston, and report has it that he is to succeed Mr. Gericke as leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

There is, however, authority for saying that no negotiations have been held with him, and, furthermore, that his name has not yet been seriously considered.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau
PRESS
PHILA., PA.
dress
te MAR 11 1906

The last Boston Symphony concert of the season will be given in the Academy of Music to-morrow evening. It will also be the last appearance in Philadelphia of Mr. Gericke as conductor of the orchestra, for, as he announced recently, it is his intention to retire at the end of the present season, his last concerts in Boston coming on April 27 and 28. There will be, therefore, a sentimental interest connected with this concert, since, with the exception of the nine years when Messrs. Nikisch and Paur were the conductors, Mr. Gericke has been with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at all of its concerts in this city. In that time he has made many friends and admirers here and unquestionably they will turn out in large numbers to-morrow evening to bid him farewell. His long years of service as a conductor—they are nearly forty—have earned for him the rest he is about to take and he will carry from this country the well-deserved fame of having constructed and maintained an orchestra which is probably without its equal in the world.

The program for to-morrow night's concert is decidedly a conservative one, beginning with Bach and ending with Beethoven. Between these come the names of two moderns, Emile Jaques-Dalcroze, who is the professor of harmony of the Conservatory of Geneva, and Claude Debussy, by many regarded as the most talented of the modern Frenchmen.

Jaques-Dalcroze will be represented by a new concerto for the violin which he wrote for and dedicated to Henri Marteau, who will be the soloist. It has never been heard in Philadelphia. Debussy is represented by his exquisite tone-picture "L'Apres-Midi d'un Faun." Of Bach the Suite in D major, No. 3 (which contains the well-known "air") will be played, and of Beethoven the "Eroica" Symphony.

The program in full is as follows:

Bach..Suite for Orchestra in D Major, No. 3
Jaques-Dalcroze,
Concerto for Violin (First Time)
Debussy.....L'Apres-Midi d'un Faun"
Beethoven,
Symphony, No. 3, in E Flat Major, Op. 55

BULLETIN
PHILA., PA
MAR 8 - 1906

May Lead Boston Orchestra

Boston, March 8.—Fritz Steinbach, conductor of the Symphony Orchestra at Cologne, has sailed from Liverpool for Boston, and report has it that he is to succeed William Gericke as leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. There is, however, authority for saying that no negotiations have been held with him, and, furthermore, that his name has not yet been seriously considered.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
INQUIRER
PHILA., PA. MAR 11 1906

The last Boston Symphony Concert of the season will be given in the Academy of Music to-morrow evening at 8.15 o'clock. It will also be the last appearance in Philadelphia of Mr. Gericke as conductor of the orchestra, for, as he announced recently, it is his intention to retire at the end of the present season, his last concerts in Boston coming on April 27 and 28. There will be, therefore, a sentimental interest connected with this concert, since, with the exception of the nine years when Messrs. Nikisch and Paur were the conductors, Mr. Gericke has been with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at all of its concerts in this city. In that time he has made many friends and admirers here, and unquestionably they will turn out in large numbers to-morrow evening to bid him farewell and God speed. His long years of service as a conductor, they are nearly forty, have earned for him the rest he is about to take, and he will carry from this country the well-deserved fame of having constructed and maintained an orchestra which is probably without its equal in the world.

The program for to-morrow night's concert is decidedly a conservative one, beginning with Bach and ending with Beethoven. Between these come the names of two moderns. Emile Jaques-Dalcroze, who is the professor of harmony of the Conservatory of Geneva, and Claude Debussy, by many regarded as the most talented of the modern Frenchmen.

Jaques-Dalcroze will be represented by a new concerto for the violin which he wrote for and dedicated to Henri Marteau, who will be the soloist. It has never been heard in Philadelphia. Debussy is represented by his exquisite tone-picture "L'Apres-Midi d'un Faun." Of Bach the Suite in D major, No. 3 (which contains the well-known "air") will be played, and of Beethoven the "Eroica" Symphony.

The program in full is as follows:

Bach..Suite for Orchestra in D Major, No. 3
Jaques-Dalcroze,
Concerto for Violin (First Time)
Debussy.....L'Apres-Midi d'un Faun"
Beethoven,
Symphony, No. 3, in E Flat Major, Op. 55

188

PUBLIC LEDGER
PHILA., PA
MAR 11 1906

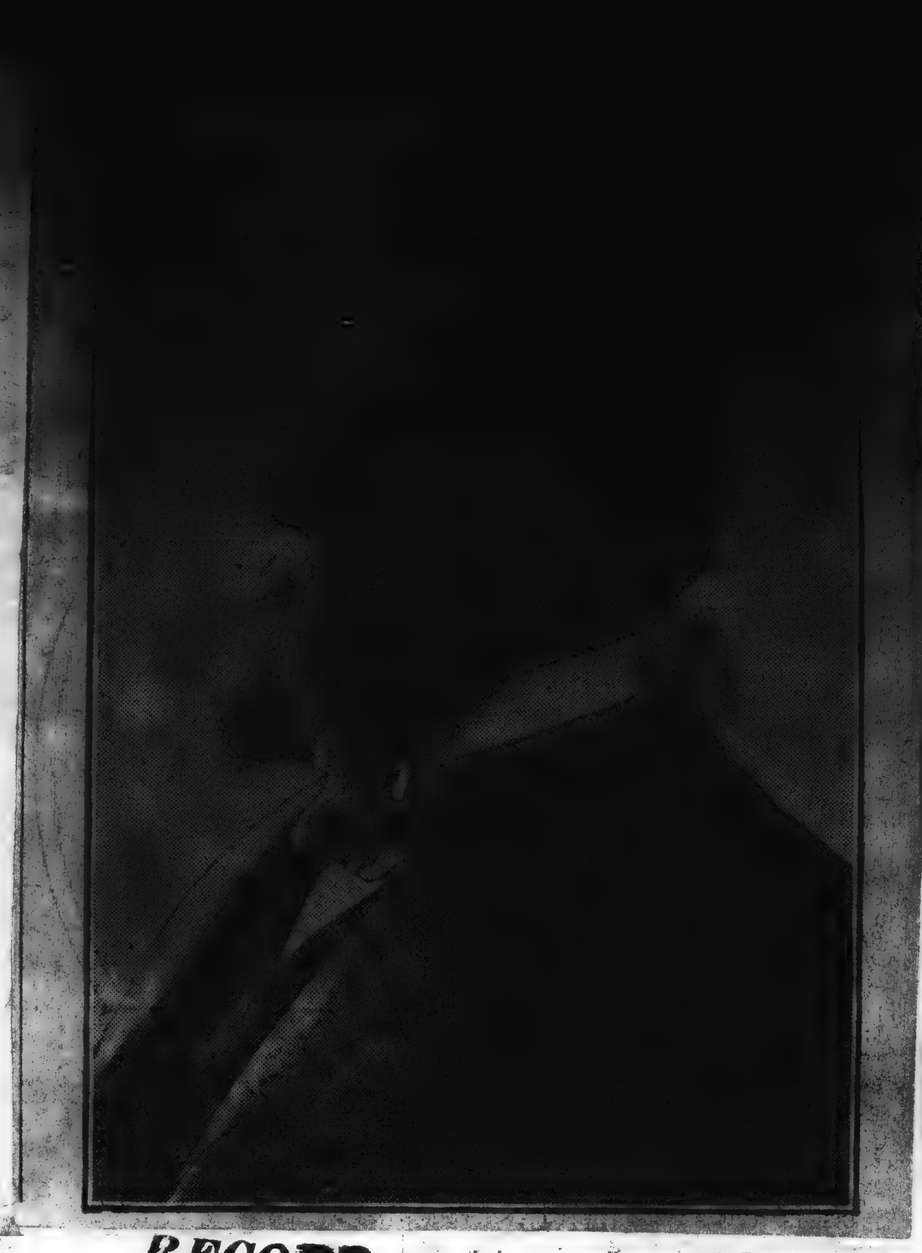
Mr. Gericke's appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra tomorrow night in the Academy of Music will not be his final concert in America, but it will constitute his farewell to a Philadelphia audience. He will remain in this country until after his Boston concerts on April 27 and 28. During his long years of service Mr. Gericke has won for himself here and elsewhere many warm friends and admirers who will greatly regret his departure. The programme of the farewell concert is equally divided between the extreme classic and the extremely modern. Henri Marteau, an artist high in the favor of American concert-goers, will carry the solo part in a new concerto, written especially for and dedicated to him by Emile Jacques-Dalcroze, the professor of harmony of the Conservatory of Geneva. The exquisite little love-picture, "L'Apres-Midi d'un Faun," represents Claude Debussy, regarded by many as the most talented among the newer French writers. The programme, however, gives precedence over these two to the Bach D Major suite, and reserves Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony as a triumphant climax to the concert.

ITEM
PHILA., PA
MAR 11 1906

There are circumstances which, put together, would seem to indicate that the next conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be Fritz Steinbach, who is coming from Cologne to conduct the last concert this season of the Philharmonic Society.

Steinbach is music director general at Cologne, and his services there are arduous. So are those of the Boston conductor, but American salaries are considerably larger than those paid even to music directors general, and it may be that Mr. Higginson, who refused to give Theodore Thomas $14,000 a year when he went to Chicago, will now be willing to put up that amount or something like it to secure the services of as well known a conductor as Steinbach.

In America he would have to conduct over one hundred concerts, but in Cologne the music director general has the direction of two musical institutions, the Conservatory [illegible] concerts, [illegible] of the leading society and [illegible]



RECORD
PHILA., PA
MAR 11 1906

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Concluding Concert and Farewell of Conductor Wilhelm Gericke.

Wilhelm Gericke, who at the end of this season will retire from the leadership of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will make his farewell appearance in this city to-morrow night, when the orchestra will be heard at the Academy of Music. The music-loving people of the city will no doubt crowd the Academy, and the event will have a sentimental interest.

With the exception of the nine years when Nikisch and Paur were the conductors, Gericke has been with the Boston Symphony at all the concerts here. For nearly 40 years he has lent his services to the cause of music, and it is his purpose now to seek repose in a quiet spot in Europe.

The program arranged for the concluding concert to-morrow evening has Bach and Beethoven and the two moderns, Emile Jaques-Dalcroze, professor of harmony at the Conservatory of Geneva, and Claude Debussy, the talented French composer, as the features. Jaques-Dalcroze will be represented by a new concerto for the violin, dedicated to Henri Marteau, the soloist of the concert. This concerto has never been heard here. The selection from Debussy is a tone-picture, "L'Apres-Midi d'un Faun," while the Bach suite in D major, No. 3, and the Beethoven "Eroica" symphony are the other numbers.

AMERICAN
PHILA., PA
MAR 11 1906

BOSTON ORCHE SEASON

By William R. Lester

CONDUCTOR WILHELM GERICKE will make his last appearance here at the head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra tomorrow evening at the Academy of Music—the final concert of the organization's local series for this season.

The symphony is to be Beethoven's No. 3 (Eroica). Other orchestral numbers are Bach's Suite No. 3, in D major, and Claude Debussy's charming tonal fantasy, "L'Apres-Midi d'un Faun."

Henri Marteau, violinist, is to be the soloist, playing a new concerto, which has not yet been heard in Philadelphia. It was written for and dedicated to M. Marteau by Emile Jacques-Delcroze, professor of harmony at the Conservatory of Geneva.

Mr. Gericke will conduct the Boston Orchestra for the last time in Boston on April 28 next, and shortly thereafter will proceed to Vienna to enjoy a well-earned rest. His career is probably unique in the annals of music, for he has been conducting orchestras for nearly forty-one years, and has never engaged in any other avocation. During all those years none ever challenged his authority; he has been supreme and autocratic, a blanc and beneficent despot in his chosen sphere of effort.

It will be difficult to select a fitting successor to [illegible] the direction of Colonel Higginson's [illegible] and in [illegible] instrument [illegible] in Europe [illegible]

BULLETIN
PHILA., PA
MAR 10 1906

The season's final concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to occur at the Academy of Music next Monday. The event will also mark the last appearance here, as conductor, of Wilhelm Gericke, who at the end of this season, will retire and return to Vienna. The program includes Bach's suite for orchestra, in D major, No. 3; "L'Apres d'un Faun," Debussy; Beethoven's third symphony, the "Eroica," and a new concerto for violin and orchestra, by Jaques Dalcroze, with Henri Marteau, the French violinist, as soloist.

TELEGRAPH
PHILA., PA
MAR 10 1906

The "big" part of the season will end next week. Monday night the Boston Symphony's last visit, and Thursday night the Mendelssohn Club, and after that the less sensational affairs.

To Monday night will be attached a special sentimental interest. Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, for so long leader of the Boston Orchestra, closely identified with the development of musical taste here, and one of the paviors of the way for our own Orchestra, will say farewell to the Philadelphia public. After forty years of continuous labor he goes to spend the remainder of his days in Europe. The good work that he has done for this city deserves an unmistakable evidence of the esteem in which he is held here. The programme which he will conduct at this final concert will be a conservative one, the orchestral numbers being Bach's suite No. 3, containing the well-known "air," Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun," and Beethoven's Eroica Symphony. Henri Marteau, the soloist, will play a new violin concerto by Jaques-Dalcroze.

RECORD
ss PHILA., PA
MAR 4 - 1907

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Conductor Wilhelm Gericke's Farewell Appearance.

The next Boston Symphony Concert in nthe Academy of Music on Monday evening, March 12, will not only be the last of the present season's series but will mark Wilhelm Gericke's farewell appearance in Philadelphia, for at the end of the present season he will retire from the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which post he has held in all for thirteen years, and will return to Vienna to rest after nearly forty years of continuous work. The concert will, consequently, have a sentimental as well as musical interest. A most admirable program has been prepared for this last concert, the orchestral numbers being Bach's suite in D major, Debussy's exquisite "Apres Midi d'un Faun" and Beethoven's "Eroica."

The soloist will be that admirable violinist, Henri Marteau. He will introduce an unfamiliar concerto for violin by Emile Jaques-Dalcroze, a Swiss com[illegible]

[188]

TELEGRAPH
PHILA. PA.
FEB 23 1906

GERICKE RESIGNS FROM THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Insists on Conditions That Major Higginson Did Not Approve.

Boston, Feb. 23.—Wilhelm Gericke has resigned as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, his resignation to take effect at the end of the present season.

Mr. Gericke was offered the position for the season of 1906-7, and informed Major H. L. Higginson, the founder of the organization, that he would accept under certain conditions. Major Higginson did not approve them and Mr. Gericke declined the offer. He says he will return to Europe.

Mr. Gericke was conductor of the Symphony Orchestra from 1884 to 1889 and from 1898 until the present time.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

TELEGRAPH
PHILA. PA.
MAR 8 1906

Wilhelm Gericke, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and long a favorite in this city, will bid farewell to Philadelphia when the orchestra gives the last concert of the season at the Academy of Music on March 12. Mr. Gericke, as has already been announced, will sever his connection with the Boston organization at the close of this year and will return to Vienna to rest after nearly forty years of continuous work. As a consequence, this concert will have a sentimental as well as a musical interest.

The programme will include the Bach D Major suite, Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun," and Beethoven's Eroica symphony. Henri Marteau, violinist, who will be the soloist, will introduce an unknown concerto by Emile Jaques-Dalcroze, a Swiss composer.

om LEDGER
dress
ate MAR 8 - 1906

MAY LEAD BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Steinbach's Voyage Here Said to Be to Succeed Gericke.

BOSTON, March 7.—Fritz Steinbach, conductor of the Symphony Orchestra at Cologne, sailed from Liverpool today for Boston, and report has it that he is to succeed Mr. Gericke as leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

There is, however, authority for saying that no negotiations have been held with him, and, furthermore, that his name has not yet been seriously considered.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the
RECORD
m dress
te 1906

The last Boston Symphony concert of the season will be given in the Academy of Music to-morrow evening. It will also be the last appearance in Philadelphia of Mr. Gericke as conductor of the orchestra, for, as he announced recently, it is his intention to retire at the end of the present season, his last concerts in Boston coming on April 27 and 28. There will be, therefore, a sentimental interest connected with this concert, since, with the exception of the nine years when Messrs. Nikisch and Paur were the conductors, Mr. Gericke has been with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at all of its concerts in this city. In that time he has made many friends and admirers here and unquestionably they will turn out in large numbers to-morrow evening to bid him farewell. His long years of service as a conductor—they are nearly forty—have earned for him the rest he is about to take and he will carry from this country the well-deserved fame of having constructed and maintained an orchestra which is probably without its equal in the world.

The program for to-morrow night's concert is decidedly a conservative one, beginning with Bach and ending with Beethoven. Between these come the names of two moderns, Emile Jaques-Dalcroze, who is the professor of harmony of the Conservatory of Geneva, and Claude Debussy, by many regarded as the most talented of the modern Frenchmen.

Jaques-Dalcroze will be represented by a new concerto for the violin which he wrote for and dedicated to Henri Marteau, who will be the soloist. It has never been heard in Philadelphia. Debussy is represented by his exquisite tone-picture "L'Apres-Midi d'un Faun." Of Bach the suite in D major, No. 3 (which contains the well-known "air") will be played, and of Beethoven, the "Eroica" symphony.

BULLETIN
PHILA. PA.
MAR 8 - 1906

May Lead Boston Orchestra.

Boston, March 8.—Fritz Steinbach, conductor of the Symphony Orchestra at Cologne, has sailed from Liverpool for Boston, and report has it that he is to succeed William Gericke as leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. There is, however, authority for saying that no negotiations have been held with him, and, furthermore, that his name has not yet been seriously considered.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
ENQUIRER
s
MAR 11 1906

The last Boston Symphony Concert of the season will be given in the Academy of Music to-morrow evening at 8.15 o'clock. It will also be the last appearance in Philadelphia of Mr. Gericke as conductor of the orchestra, for, as he announced recently, it is his intention to retire at the end of the present season, his last concerts in Boston coming on April 27 and 28. There will be, therefore, a sentimental interest connected with this concert, since, with the exception of the nine years when Messrs. Nikisch and Paur were the conductors, Mr. Gericke has been with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at all of its concerts in this city. In that time he has made many friends and admirers here, and unquestionably they will turn out in large numbers to-morrow evening to bid him farewell and God speed. His long years of service as a conductor, they are nearly forty, have earned for him the rest he is about to take, and he will carry from this country the well-deserved fame of having constructed and maintained an orchestra which is probably without its equal in the world.

The program for to-morrow night's concert is decidedly a conservative one, beginning with Bach and ending with Beethoven. Between these come the names of two moderns. Emile Jaques-Dalcroze, who is the professor of harmony of the Conservatory of Geneva, and Claude Debussy, by many regarded as the most talented of the modern Frenchmen.

Jaques-Dalcroze will be represented by a new concerto for the violin which he wrote for and dedicated to Henri Marteau, who will be the soloist. It has never been heard in Philadelphia. Debussy is represented by his exquisite tone-picture "L'Apres-Midi d'un Faun." Of Bach the Suite in D major, No. 3 (which contains the well-known "air") will be played, and of Beethoven the "Eroica" Symphony.

The program in full is as follows:

Bach..Suite for Orchestra in D Major, No. 3
Jaques-Dalcroze, Concerto for Violin (First Time)
Debussy.....''L'Apres-Midi d'un Faun''
Beethoven, Symphony, No. 3, in E Flat Major, Op. 55

188

PUBLIC LEDGER
PHILA. PA.
MAR 11 1906

* * *

Mr. Gericke's appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra tomorrow night in the Academy of Music will not be his final concert in America, but it will constitute his farewell to a Philadelphia audience. He will remain in this country until after his Boston concerts on April 27 and 28. During his long years of service Mr. Gericke has won for himself here and elsewhere many warm friends and admirers who will greatly regret his departure. The programme of the farewell concert is equally divided between the extreme classic and the extremely modern. Henri Marteau, an artist high in the favor of American concert-goers, will carry the solo part in a new concerto, written especially for and dedicated to him by Emile Jacques-Dalcroze, the professor of harmony of the Conservatory of Geneva. The exquisite little love-picture, "L'Apres-Midi d'un Faun," represents Claude Debussy, regarded by many as the most talented among the newer French writers. The programme, however, gives precedence over these two to the Bach D Major suite, and reserves Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony as a triumphant climax to the concert.

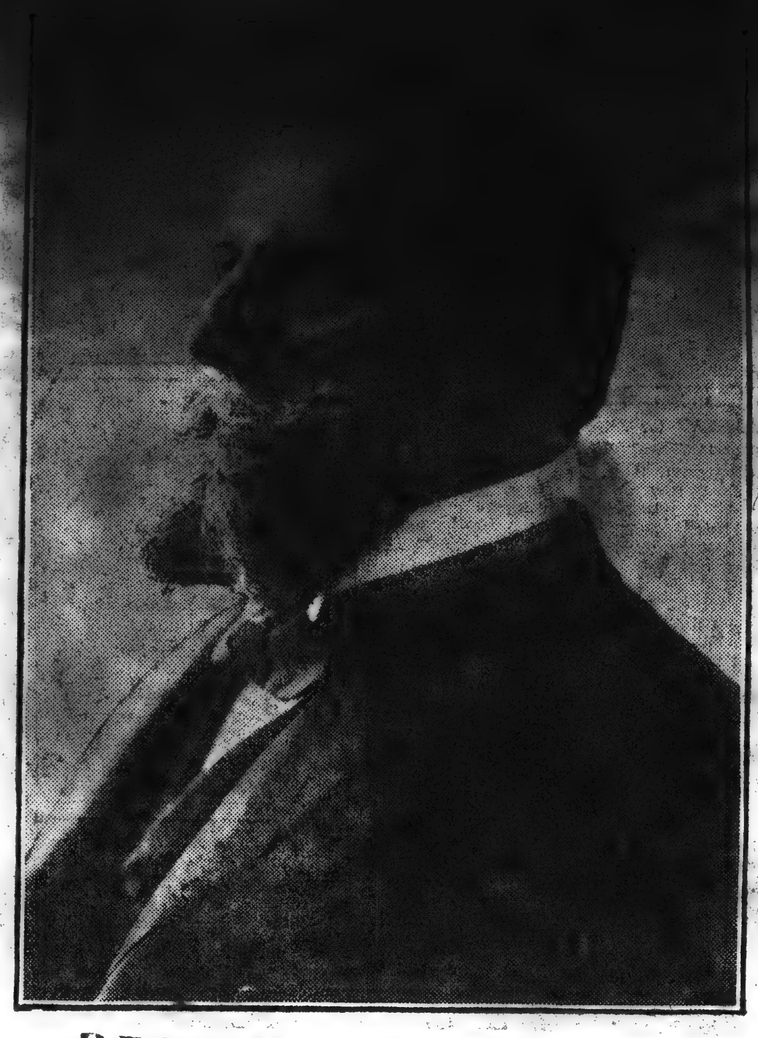
* * *

ITEM
PHILA. PA.
MAR 11 1906

There are circumstances which, put together, would seem to indicate that the next conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be Fritz Steinbach, who is coming from Cologne to conduct the last concert this season of the Philharmonic Society.

Steinbach is music director general at Cologne, and his services there are arduous. So are those of the Boston conductor, but American salaries are considerably larger than those paid even to music directors general, and it may be that Mr. Higginson, who refused to give Theodore Thomas $14,000 a year when he went to Chicago, will now be willing to put up that amount or something like it to secure the services of as well known a conductor as Steinbach.

In America he would have to conduct over one hundred concerts, but in Cologne the music director general has the direction of two municipal institutions, the Conservatory and the Gurzenich concerts, has to conduct a singing society and miscellaneous concerts, and is generally responsible for



RECORD
PHILA. PA.
MAR 11 1906

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Concluding Concert and Farewell of Conductor Wilhelm Gericke.

Wilhelm Gericke, who at the end of this season will retire from the leadership of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will make his farewell appearance in this city to-morrow night, when the orchestra will be heard at the Academy of Music. The music-loving people of the city will no doubt crowd the Academy, and the event will have a sentimental interest.

With the exception of the nine years when Nikisch and Paur were the conductors, Gericke has been with the Boston Symphony at all the concerts here. For nearly 40 years he has lent his services to the cause of music, and it is his purpose now to seek repose in a quiet spot in Europe.

The program arranged for the concluding concert to-morrow evening has Bach and Beethoven and the two moderns, Emile Jaques-Dalcroze, professor of harmony at the Conservatory of Geneva, and Claude Debussy, the talented French composer, as the features. Jaques-Dalcroze will be represented by a new concerto for the violin, dedicated to Henri Marteau, the soloist of the concert. This concerto has never been heard here. The selection from Debussy is a tone-picture, "L'Apres-Midi d'un Faun," while the Bach suite in D major, No. 3, and the Beethoven "Eroica" symphony are the other numbers.

AMERICAN
PHILA. PA.
MAR 11 1906

BOSTON ORCHE SEASON

By William R. Lester

CONDUCTOR WILHELM GERICKE will make his last appearance here at the head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra tomorrow evening at the Academy of Music—the final concert of the organization's local series for this season.

The symphony is to be Beethoven's No. 3 (Eroica). Other orchestral numbers are Bach's Suite No. 3, in D major, and Claude Debussy's charming tonal fantasy, "L'Apres-Midi d'un Faun."

Henri Marteau, violinist, is to be the soloist, playing a new concerto, which has not yet been heard in Philadelphia. It was written for and dedicated to M. Marteau by Emile Jacques-Delcroze, professor of harmony at the Conservatory of Geneva.

Mr. Gericke will conduct the Boston Orchestra for the last time in Boston on April 28 next, and shortly thereafter will proceed to Vienna to enjoy a well-earned rest. His career is probably unique in the annals of music, for he has been conducting orchestras for nearly forty-one years, and has never engaged in any other avocation. During all those years none ever challenged his authority; he has been supreme and autocratic, a bland and beneficent despot in his chosen sphere of effort.

It will be difficult to select a fitting successor to Mr. Gericke in the direction of Colonel Higginson's great band of instrumentalists. In default of a European star, Franz Kneisel might take up the [188]

BULLETIN
PHILA. PA.
MAR 10 1906

The season's final concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to occur at the Academy of Music next Monday. The event will also mark the last appearance here, as conductor, of Wilhelm Gericke, who at the end of this season, will retire and return to Vienna. The program includes Bach's suite for orchestra, in D major, No. 3; "L'Apres d'un Faun," Debussy; Beethoven's third symphony, the "Eroica," and a new concerto for violin and orchestra, by Jaques Dalcroze, with Henri Marteau, the French violinist, as soloist.

TELEGRAPH
PHILA. PA.
MAR 10 1906

The "big" part of the season will end next week. Monday night the Boston Symphony's last visit, and Thursday night the Mendelssohn Club, and after that the less sensational affairs.

To Monday night will be attached a special sentimental interest. Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, for so long leader of the Boston Orchestra, closely identified with the development of musical taste here, and one of the paviors of the way for our own Orchestra, will say farewell to the Philadelphia public. After forty years of continuous labor he goes to spend the remainder of his days in Europe. The good work that he has done for this city deserves an unmistakable evidence of the esteem in which he is held here. The programme which he will conduct at this final concert will be a conservative one, the orchestral numbers being Bach's suite No. 3, containing the well-known "air," Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun," and Beethoven's Eroica Symphony. Henri Marteau, the soloist, will play a new violin concerto by Jaques-Dalcroze.

RECORD
ss
MAR 4 - 1907

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Conductor Wilhelm Gericke's Farewell Appearance.

The next Boston Symphony Concert in nthe Academy of Music on Monday evening, March 12, will not only be the last of the present season's series but will mark Wilhelm Gericke's farewell appearance in Philadelphia, for at the end of the present season he will retire from the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which post he has held in all for thirteen years, and will return to Vienna to rest after nearly forty years of continuous work. The concert will, consequently, have a sentimental as well as musical interest. A most admirable program has been prepared for this last concert, the orchestral numbers being Bach's suite in D major, Debussy's exquisite "Apres Midi d'un Faun" and Beethoven's "Eroica."

The soloist will be that admirable violinist, Henri Marteau. He will introduce an unfamiliar concerto for violin, by Emile Jaques-Dalcroze, a Swiss composer

NORTH AMERICA
PHILA., PA
MAR 4- 1906

Gericke's Last Concert.

[illegible] concert by the Boston Orchestra at the Academy of Music, on Monday evening, will not only be the last of the present season's series, but will also mark Conductor Wilhelm Gericke's farewell appearance in Philadelphia. At the end of the present season Mr. Gericke will retire from the musical direction of the [illegible] organization, a post he has held [illegible] for thirteen years. He will return to Vienna, where he expects to rest after nearly forty years of continuous work. Consequently this concert the orchestral numbers will be Bach's Suite in D major, Debussy's exquisite "Apres Midi d'un Faun" and Beethoven's "Eroica." The soloist will be the excellent violinist, Henri Marteau, who will introduce on this occasion a new concerto for violin, by Emile Jaques-Dalcroze, a Swiss composer.

A New Sternberg Testimonial.

INQUIRER
PHILA., PA
MAR 4- 1906

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The next Boston Symphony concert in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, March 5, will not only be the last of the present season's series, but will mark Mr. Wilhelm Gericke's farewell appearance in Philadelphia, for at the end of the present season he will retire from the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which post he has held for thirteen years, and will return to Vienna, where he expects rest after nearly forty years of continuous work. Consequently the concert will have a sentimental interest, as well as musical. A most admirable program has been prepared for this last concert, the orchestral numbers being Bach's Suite in D major, Debussy's exquisite "Apres Midi d'un Faun" and Beethoven's "Eroica." The soloist will be that admirable violinist, Mr. Henri Marteau, who will introduce an unknown concerto for violin by Emile Jaques-Dalcroze, a Swiss composer.

PUBLIC LEDGER
PHILA., PA
MAR 4- 1906

In addition to the last concerts of the Philadelphia Orchestra, comes the announcement of the last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for this season, and also the last appearance with that notable organization of the conductor, Wilhelm Gericke. After thirteen years' work with the Boston Orchestra and forty years' labor in music, Mr. Gericke will retire to take a well-earned rest, returning to Vienna to live. An admirable programme has been arranged for this last concert, representing the extremes of the classic and the modern modes. Beethoven's "Eroica" will be the symphony, the other orchestra numbers being Bach's Suite in D major, and the exquisite "Apres Midi d'un Faun," by Debussy. Henri Marteau will be the soloist, playing an unknown concerto by a Swiss composer, Emile Jacques-Dalcroze.

TELEGRAPH
PHILA., PA
MAR 13 1906

In the Field of Music.

Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, for so many years leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, bade farewell to Philadelphia last night, and in so doing scored a personal triumph that must have shown him unmistakably the very high esteem in which Philadelphians hold his services to the cause of music in this city. Time and again after the concert was over he was called to the front of the stage and the audience was unwilling to let him go without hearing from him a few words of farewell. His greeting as he came on to conduct the third number of the programme showed immediately the mood of his hearers, and it was very evident that they realized with peculiar feelings of sorrow that it was the last symphony that they would ever hear him conduct. His choice of numbers for this final programme was most appropriate, for with Bach and Beethoven on the list Mr. Gericke could give play to those clearly defined ideals of pure classicism upon which he has built his fame, and as exponent of which he stands without a peer. But not only did it give Mr. Gericke a chance to bid his best adieu; it revealed more strongly than any modern work could do the marvelous perfection of the great organization which he leads and especially the glorious beauty of the work of the strings. These have been too frequently dwelt upon to need much further comment, but it is doubtful if they have ever been heard as they were last night in the Bach suite. The leader and his men rendered the great Eroica Symphony along their own broad and dignified lines, and the delicate "Afternoon of a Faun," one of the most beautiful of the modern French school, was given with a rarely fine sense of its poetic atmosphere.

Mr. Marteau, the French violinist, was heard for the first time here. He introduced for the first time a concerto by a young Swiss composer, Jacques-Dalcroze, and an intensely interesting and tremendously difficult work it proved to be. M. Marteau's technique was equal to all emergencies, but his intonation at times is absolutely painful. To the difficulties of the first and last movements of this concerto are such that there is very little chance for good judgment of the beautiful largo second movement. Mr. Marteau made up for his shortcomings in a charmingly unaffected manner. His undoubted mastery of the violin well deserved the applause which he received at the close of last season's Boston

PRESS
PHILA., PA
MAR 13 1906

LEADER GERICKE BIDS FAREWELL

Last Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy Prior to the Conductor's Return to Europe.

188

The last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the Academy of Music last evening assumed a peculiar interest in that it was the farewell concert of Mr. William Gericke, who has been thirteen years' service at the conductor's stand of this great orchestra.

This year is the twenty-first season of the Boston Orchestra in Philadelphia.

It was Mr. Gericke, who, succeeding Mr. Georg Henschel, after the latter had started the new orchestra on its way, introduced his band to Philadelphians in the season of 1884-1885. After five years of hard work he went back to Europe to be succeeded by Nikisch, who, in turn gave way to Paur, and then came Mr. Gericke's turn again, in the season of 1898-1899, and since to show what he could do with an organization now become a group of amazing virtuosos.

Curiously enough it happens that Mr. Henschel, who led the infant steps of the orchestra is now in Philadelphia, and will conduct his own beautiful requiem at the Mendelssohn Club's concert on Thursday night. It must be a source of gratification to him to see the wonderful advance of America in orchestral matters since those far-off days of the early 80's and certainly Mr. Gericke can return to Europe with nothing but regret for the musical circles in America which have made the four great orchestras the Boston, Chicago, Pittsburg and Philadelphia, possible, while on the other hand, his own work will ever be gratefully acknowledged.

Tribute to Gericke.

Mr. Henry E. Krehbiel, the dean of American musical critics, has voiced our obligations to Mr. Gericke in a manner worth quoting. Says Mr. Krehbiel:—

The departure of Mr. Wilhelm Gericke from the musical life of America is a matter of profound regret. Most of the qualities which are looked upon as admirable in the Boston Symphony Orchestra are of his creation. For thirteen years he has set an example of devotion and zeal to a high conception that is quite without parallel.

His conception has not been so wide as that of some of his colleagues, who seem to think that fresh ink is a sign of excellence, but neither has it been so unstable, and all that

WILHELM GERICKE

Who made his farewell Philadelphia appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night.

lay within it he presented to the observation and comprehension of the public with marvelous clearness and inviting graciousness.

If the ears of the lovers of orchestral music are still familiar with euphony; if the orchestral voice still exerts that elemental charm which lies in beauty of tone-quality and justness of intonation; if we are still able to recognize the fact that there is a difference between musical sonority and noise; if we are not all given over to the belief that passion is most eloquent when it is torn to tatters; if we are still skeptical toward the belief that the ugly is a fit object of artistic pursuit for its own sake—the credit is largely due to Mr. Gericke and the ideals which he has upheld without a moment's defection during the thirteen years of his labor in America.

It is much to be hoped that the hysteria which has seized upon the promoters of orchestral enterprises will soon pass away. Orchestral concerts are the worst of all vehicles for musical sensationalism. Sensationalism in music is the most deplorable of manifestations in art, and orchestral concerts are the worst of all vehicles for its propagation.

When once all the old standards of beauty are abandoned, there will be an end of music in the sense that has obtained since the ecclesiastical art culminated in Palestrina, the symphonic in Beethoven and the dramatic in Wagner.

Last Night's Concert.

Mr. Gericke revealed all his familiar methods last night in the program which ran as follows:—

Johann Sebastian Bach.....Suite in D major
Jaques-Dalcroze, Concerto in C minor, for Violin and Orchestra, Op. 50. First time here.
Henry Marteau, soloist:
Debussy. Prelude to Stephane Mallarme's Eclogue, "The Afternoon of a Faun."
Beethoven, Symphony No. 3, in E flat major, "Eroica," Op. 55.

Mr. Gericke could certainly not be accused of too much partiality for the classics in his selections and the result was a beautiful concert, a fitting close to his ministry, as it were. The house was large and very enthusiastic and at the close Mr. Gericke was called out again and again, so that he finally responded in an acknowledgment of a few brief words expressing his appreciation of the very warm feeling evidenced by his admirers. As was to be expected, the strings distinguished themselves gloriously in the Bach suite and the audience compelled them to acknowledge the almost frantic applause, while in the "Eroica" the tone quality, the general effect of the whole orchestra was superb and uplifting.

The Marteau concerto which Hens

BULLETIN
PHILA., PA
MAR 13 1906

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Season's Last Concert and Mr. Gericke's Farewell as Conductor.

The fifth and last concert of this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the Academy of Music, last evening, had an unusual interest of a somewhat sentimental sort in the fact that it marked the farewell appearance of Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, as conductor of the famous organization. At the close of the orchestra's present season Mr. Gericke intends to retire from active life and return to his former home in Vienna.

The program last evening was of itself more than usually interesting, with its best numbers coming first and last. They were the D Major suite of Bach, and Beethoven's No. 3, or "Eroica," symphony. Bach does not lose his dignity, even in the series of dances comprising this suite, one of the four which he composed, it is thought, while chapel-master to Prince Leopold, of Anhalt-Cothen-1717-23. The suite, or "ouverture," as Bach himself called it, is in five parts, of which the second, lento, is most attractive to a modern audience. This second movement is a marvelous piece of melody for strings only, familiar through many transcriptions. It was one of the best things of last night's concert, played so perfectly as to call forth applause that caused Mr. Gericke to have the entire orchestra rise and acknowledge it.

As an example of modern music of the fanciful French school, Debussy's Prelude to Stephane Mallarme's Eclogue, "The Afternoon of a Faun," proved worthy of a place on the program because of its colorful beauty. Idyllic in nature, the composition makes an appeal to the poetic imagination. The flute and the harp have prominent voices, with the mellowed tones of the horns as a background, and it is all languorous, tender and shaded with melancholy, but in no wise depressing. It was worth while as Mr. Gericke interpreted it, even if it is not the music of the future, and more to be admired for sweetness and poetic charm than for real impressiveness.

The great Napoleonic symphony, the "Eroica," is Beethoven in his grandest mood. It is not so melodious, perhaps, as his favorite Fifth, but is gigantic in every way—one of the world's great masterpieces of music. While rather heavy and somewhat too long to come at the last on a program which had already been nearly the usual concert length, the symphony was after all the feature of the program, and at its conclusion Mr. Gericke was several times recalled.

The soloist was Henri Marteau, the French violinist, who offered a concerto in C minor, which is dedicated to him by its composer, Emile Jacques-Dalcroze. The work is immensely difficult, and gives Marteau an opportunity to show how well he has mastered his instrument. The second movement, largo, is the most attractive because more melodious than the others, and it is in this style of music that Marteau excels. In the bizarre first movement and the fantastic finale he was impressive, but would doubtless have been more successful in pleasing his audience had he chosen a composition of greater sympathetic charm.

INQUIRER
PHILA., PA
MAR 13 1906

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Its Closing Concert for the Season at the Academy of Music Last Evening

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, who then made what will probably be his last appearance in this city, gave its closing concert for the season at the Academy of Music last evening in the presence of a large audience, which was rendered more than usually enthusiastic by the special nature of the occasion.

An excellent program was presented. It began with Bach's suite in D major No. 3, it included Dubussy's exquisite "Afternoon of a Faun" and it ended with the noble "Eroica" symphony of Beethoven. Each of these numbers was admirably played, the Bach suite with just that crispness and clarity and precision which its adequate interpretation demands, the beautiful music of Dubussy with the utmost delicacy of sentiment and refinement of execution, and the Beethoven symphony with power and breadth and dignity, with a consummate mastery of its detail and a fine apprehension of its significance.

Mr. Henri Marteau, the young French violinist, was the assisting artist. He was heard in a concerto by Jacques-Delcroze, a composition which had not previously been given here and which proved to be so interesting that it would be a pleasure to hear it again. It exhibits the characteristics of the modern school, but with less incoherence and a greater affluence of melody than are found in some of its more conspicuous examples. It was brilliantly performed, with superb spirit and appreciative emotion, and the applause which it evoked left no doubt of the favorable nature of the impression which it had produced.

And so, with one of the best concerts it has comprised, the symphony season was brought to a satisfying and memorable end.

RECORD
PHILA., PA
MAR 13 1906

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Old and New Music Constitute Last Concert of Series.

The old classics and the works of the intensely modern composers both figured on the program of the Boston Symphony's concert—the fifth and last of the series—at the Academy of Music last evening, the occasion also of Wilhelm Gericke's last appearance here as conductor of that magnificent musical organization. Bach and Beethoven stood for the classicists, Debussy and Jacques-Delcroze for the moderns.

The novelties of the evening were the Prelude to Stephane Mallarme's Ecologue, "The Afternoon of a Faun," a piece of music which appears to be very popular at Paris at the present writing, but which has been played only on one or two occasions in this country; and a Concerto in C minor for violin and orchestra by Jacques-Delcroze. The Debussy selection is in the characteristic vein of that French composer—descriptive, limpid in harmony, yet somewhat vague and unsatisfying. The Concerto has more virility. It (the Concerto) seems a rather peculiar bit of music from its first hearing. It is in three movements, and the beginning of its opening movement (allegro con ritardo) is decidedly unpromising, with its unexpected dynamics and close harmonies. Before the movement ends, however, it develops many musical beauties, and the second movement (largo) is an exquisite example of musical composition. The third movement serves rather to exploit the virtuosity of the soloist than anything else. This Concerto is dedicated to Henry Marteau, the violinist, who played it last evening in masterly fashion as the soloist of the evening.

As for the playing of the orchestra, it was never better, which is saying much when one knows the high standard it has set for itself.

PUBLIC LEDGER
PHILA., PA
MAR 13 1906

GOOD-BY TO MR. GERICKE

His Last Appearance at the Boston Orchestra's Closing Concert

188

The closing concert of the local orchestra season at the Academy of Music on Saturday was followed last evening by the final concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, whose monthly visits have long been an important feature of musical interest. Particular importance attached to this concert as the last appearance here of Wilhelm Gericke, who has conducted the Boston Orchestra for thirteen of the twenty-five years of its existence, and is now about to retire.

By an interesting coincidence, its first conductor, Georg Henschel, also will be in Philadelphia this week, and will conduct his own most important composition at the Academy tomorrow night. Mr. Henschel originally formed the orchestra in Boston and instituted the weekly concerts there in 1881. In 1884 he went to England, and was succeeded by Mr. Gericke, who rebuilt the organization on its present lines and brought it to that high state of efficiency that has been everywhere recognized.

Mr. Gericke brought the orchestra to Philadelphia for the first time for a single concert in the spring of 1886, just twenty years ago. Since that time its concerts have been given here regularly each season. After five years Mr. Gericke was succeeded by Arthur Nikisch, who conducted the orchestra for three years, giving it an elasticity it had not had before. He was followed by Emil Paur for five years, and Mr. Gericke then returned and has conducted the orchestra since, bringing it again very completely to his own ideals of purity of tone and precision in execution.

These dominating qualities of the orchestra were advantageously displayed in the two classic numbers on last night's programme—the Bach suite in D major, played with entire clarity and with a smooth, even tone that was altogether lovely, and the great "Eroica" symphony, to which was given a dignified presentation, with precision of movement and a noble volume of sound. The suave work of the violins in the Bach number commanded especial recognition, and the finale of the symphony rose to a fine eloquence.

Of more modern interest was the lovely little poem, "L'Apres-mide d'un Faun" of Dubressy, the most delicate and subtle of the contemporary Frenchmen. This is an elusive atmospheric picture, expressed with gossamerlike delicacy. It is not the least of our objections to Mr. Gericke that he has made known to us so much of the modern French music, even when it has not appeared to appeal warmly to his imaginative sympathy.

The novelty of the programme was a violin concerto by Jacques Dalcroze, the Swiss composer, played by Henri Marteau. It is a composition extremely vague in form, which seemed to derive most of its interest from the executant. The first movement is mainly an extremely difficult if not impossible solo in the high octave against a recondite counterpoint. The slow movement, which has a quite lovely melody, is more conventional in treatment. The finale is a return to mere bravura, with an accompaniment of freakish modern orchestration. The work is dedicated to Marteau, and it is not probable that any one else will dispute it with him.

The symphony closed the concert, and at its conclusion Mr. Gericke was several times recalled to bow his farewell to Philadelphia.

[189]

NORTH AMERICA

ss

MAR 4- 1906

Mr. Gericke's Last Concert.

The next concert by the Boston Orchestra, in the Academy of Music, on Monday, March 12, will not only be the last of the present season's series, but will also mark Conductor Wilhelm Gericke's farewell appearance in Philadelphia. At the end of the present season Mr. Gericke will retire from the musical direction of the Boston organization, a post he has held in all for thirteen years. He will return to Vienna, where he expects to rest after nearly forty years of continuous work.

For this concert the orchestral numbers are Bach's Suite in D major, Debussy's exquisite "Apres Midi d'un Faun" and Beethoven's "Eroica." The soloist will be that excellent violinist, Henri Marteau, who will introduce on this occasion a new concerto for violin, by Emile Jaques-Dalcroze, a Swiss composer.

A Von Sternberg Testimonial.

INQUIRER

MAR 4- 1906

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The next Boston Symphony concert in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, March 12, will not only be the last of the present season's series, but will mark Mr. Wilhelm Gericke's farewell appearance in Philadelphia. At the end of the present season he will retire from the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which post he has held in all for thirteen years, and will return to Vienna, where he expects rest after nearly forty years of continuous work. Consequently the concert will have a sentimental interest, as well as musical. A most admirable program has been prepared for this last concert, the orchestral numbers being Bach's Suite in D major, Debussy's exquisite "Apres Midi d'un Faun" and Beethoven's "Eroica."

The soloist will be that admirable violinist, Mr. Henri Marteau, who will introduce an unknown concerto for violin by Emile Jaques-Dalcroze, a Swiss composer.

PUBLIC LEDGER

MAR 4- 1906

* * *

In addition to the last concerts of the Philadelphia Orchestra, comes the announcement of the last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for this season, and also the last appearance with that notable organization of the conductor, Wilhelm Gericke. After thirteen years' work with the Boston Orchestra and forty years' labor in music, Mr. Gericke will retire to take a well-earned rest, returning to Vienna to live. An admirable programme has been arranged for this last concert, representing the extremes of the classic and the modern modes. Beethoven's "Eroica" will be the symphony, the other orchestra numbers being Bach's Suite in D major, and the exquisite "Apres Midi d'un Faun," by Debussy. Henri Marteau will be the soloist, playing an unknown concerto by a Swiss composer, Emile Jacques-Dalcroze.

ess

MAR 12 1906

In the Field of Music.

Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, for so many years leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, bade farewell to Philadelphia last night, and in so doing scored a personal triumph that must have shown him unmistakably the very high esteem in which Philadelphians hold his services to the cause of music in this city. Time and again after the concert was over he was called to the front of the stage and the audience was unwilling to let him go without hearing from him a few words of farewell. His greeting as he came on to conduct the final number of the programme showed immediately the mood of his hearers, and it was very evident that they realized with peculiar feelings of sorrow that it was the last symphony that they would ever hear him conduct. His choice of numbers for this final programme was most appropriate, for with Bach and Beethoven on the list Mr. Gericke could give play to those clearly defined ideals of pure classicism upon which he has built his fame, and as exponent of which he stands without a peer. But not only did it give Mr. Gericke a chance to bid his best adieu; it revealed more strongly than any modern work could do the marvellous perfection of the great organization which he leads and especially the flawless beauty of the work of the strings. These have been too frequently dwelt upon to need much further comment, but it is doubtful if they have ever been heard as they were last night in the Bach suite No. 3. The leader and his men rendered the great Eroica Symphony along their familiar broad and dignified lines, and the Debussy "Afternoon of a Faun," one of the most beautiful of the modern French works, was given with a rarely fine sense of its poetic atmosphere.

Henri Marteau, the French violinist, was the soloist. He introduced for the first time a concerto by a young Swiss composer, Jacques-Dalcroze, and an intensely interesting and tremendously difficult work it proved to be. M. Marteau's technique is equal to all emergencies, but his intonation at times is absolutely painful. To be sure, the difficulties of the first and third movements of this concerto are such that they leave very little chance for good tone, and in the beautiful largo second movement M. Marteau made up for his deficiencies. He is a charmingly unaffected player, with an undoubted mastery of his instrument, and he well deserved the enthusiastic reception which he received.

[illegible] was the last of this season's Boston

PRESS

ess

APR 1 8 190

LEADER GERICKE BIDS FAREWELL

Last Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy Prior to the Conductor's Return to Europe.

188

The last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the Acedemy of Music last evening assumed a peculiar interest in that it was the farewell concert of Mr. William Gericke, who has seen thirteen years' service at the conducductor's stand of this great orchestra.

This year is the twenty-first season of the Boston Orchestra in Philadelphia.

It was Mr. Gericke, who, succeeding Mr. Georg Henschel, after the latter had started the new orchestra on its way, introduced his band to Philadelphians in the season of 1884-1885. After five years of hard work he went back to Europe to be succeeded by Nikisch, who, in turn gave way to Paur, and then came Mr. Gericke's turn again, in the season of 1898-1899, and since to show what he could do with an organization now become a group of amazing virtuosos.

Curiously enough it happens that Mr. Henschel, who led the infant steps of the orchestra is now in Philadelphia, and will conduct his own beautiful requiem at the Mendelssohn Club's concert on Thursday night. It must be a source of gratification to him to see the wonderful advance of America in orchestral matters since those far-off days of the early 80's and certainly Mr. Gericke can return to Europe with nothing but regret for the musical circles in America which have made the four great orchestras the Boston, Chicago, Pittsburg and Philadelphia, possible, while on the other hand, his own work will ever be gratefully acknowledged.

Tribute to Gericke.

Mr. Henry E. Krehbiel, the dean of American musical critics, has voiced our obligations to Mr. Gericke in a manner worth quoting. Says Mr. Krehbiel:—

The departure of Mr. Wilhelm Gericke from the musical life of America is a matter of profound regret. Most of the qualities which are looked upon as admirable in the Boston Symphony Orchestra are of his creation. For thirteen years he has set an example of devotion and zeal to a high conception that is quite without parallel.

His conception has not been so wide as that of some of his colleagues, who seem to think that fresh ink is a sign of excellence, but neither has it been so unstable, and all that lay within it he presented to the observation and comprehension of the public with marvelous clearness and inviting graciousness.

If the ears of the lovers of orchestral music are still familiar with euphony; if the orchestral voice still exerts that elemental charm which lies in beauty of tone-quality and justness of intonation; if we are still able to recoguize the fact that there is a difference between musical sonority and noise; if we are not all given over to the belief that passion is most eloquent when it is torn to tatters; if we are still skeptical toward the belief that the ugly is a fit object of artistic pursuit for its own sake—the credit is largely due to Mr. Gericke and the ideals which he has upheld without a moment's defection during the thirteen years of his labor in America.

It is much to be hoped that the hysteria which has seized upon the promoters of orchestral enterprises will soon pass away. Orchestral concerts are the worst of all vehicles for musical sensationalism. Sensationalism in music is the most deplorable of manifestations in art, and orchestral concerts are the worst of all vehicles for its propagation.

When once all the old standards of beauty are abandoned, there will be an end of music in the sense that has obtained since the ecclesiastical art culminated in Palestrina, the symphonic in Beethoven and the dramatic in Wagner.

WILHELM GERICKE

Who made his farewell Philadelphia appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night.

Last Night's Concert.

Mr. Gericke revealed all his familiar methods last night in the program which ran as follows:—

Johann Sebastian Bach.....Suite in D major
Jaques-Dalcroze, Concerto in C minor, for Violin and Orchestra, Op. 50. First time here.
Henry Marteau, soloist.
Debussy, Prelude to Stephane Mallarme's Eclogue, "The Afternoon of a Faun."
Beethoven, Symphony No. 3, in E flat major, "Eroica," Op. 55.

Mr. Gericke could certainly not be accused of too much partiality for the classics in his selections and the result was a beautiful concert, a fitting close to his ministry, as it were. The house was large and very enthusiastic and at the close Mr. Gericke was called out again and again, so that he finally responded in an acknowledgment of a few brief words expressing his appreciation of the very warm feeling evidenced by his admirers. As was to be expected, the strings distinguished themselves gloriously in the Bach suite and the audience compelled them to acknowledge the almost frantic applause, while in the "Eroica" the tone quality, the general effect of the whole orchestra was superb and uplifting.

Marteau in the concerto which Hess conducted excellently, made a charming effect, as only an artist of his caliber could do. The composition is along the modern lines, very exquisite and expressive, with the orchestra given plenty to do. The program was long, but the [illegible] had the air of being a re[illegible]

BULLETIN

PHILA. PA

1906

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Season's Last Concert and Mr. Gericke's Farewell as Conductor.

The fifth and last concert of this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the Academy of Music, last evening, had an unusual interest of a somewhat sentimental sort in the fact that it marked the farewell appearance of Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, as conductor of the famous organization. At the close of the orchestra's present season Mr. Gericke intends to retire from active life and return to his former home in Vienna.

The program last evening was of itself more than usually interesting, with its best numbers coming first and last. They were the D Major suite of Bach, and Beethoven's No. 3, or "Eroica," symphony. Bach does not lose his dignity, even in the series of dances comprising this suite, one of the four which he composed, it is thought, while chapel-master to Prince Leopold, of Anhalt-Cothen-1717-23. The suite, or "ouverture," as Bach himself called it, is in five parts, of which the second, lento, is most attractive to a modern audience. This second movement is a marvelous piece of melody for strings only, familiar through many transcriptions. It was one of the best things of last night's concert, played so perfectly as to call forth applause that caused Mr. Gericke to have the entire orchestra rise and acknowledge it.

As an example of modern music of the fanciful French school, Debussy's Prelude to Stephane Mallarme's Eclogue, "The Afternoon of a Faun," proved worthy of a place on the program because of its colorful beauty. Idyllic in nature, the composition makes an appeal to the poetic imagination. The flute and the harp have prominent voices, with the mellowed tones of the horns as a background, and it is all languorous, tender and shaded with melancholy, but in no wise depressing. It was worth while as Mr. Gericke interpreted it, even if it is not the music of the future, and more to be admired for sweetness and poetic charm than for real impressiveness.

The great Napoleonic symphony, the "Eroica," is Beethoven in his grandest mood. It is not so melodious, perhaps, as his favorite Fifth, but is gigantic in every way—one of the world's great masterpieces of music. While rather heavy and somewhat too long to come at the last on a program which had already been nearly the usual concert length, the symphony was after all the feature of the program, and at its conclusion Mr. Gericke was several times recalled.

The soloist was Henri Marteau, the French violinist, who offered a concerto in C minor, which is dedicated to him by its composer, Emile Jacques-Dalcroze. The work is immensely difficult, and gives Marteau an opportunity to show how well he has mastered his instrument. The second movement, largo, is the most attractive because more melodious than the others, and it is in this style of music that Marteau excels. In the bizarre first movement and the fantastic finale he was impressive, but would doubtless have been more successful in pleasing his audience had he chosen a composition of greater sympathetic charm.

INQUIRER

m

ress

e

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Its Closing Concert for the Season at the Academy of Music Last Evening

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, who then made what will probably be his last appearance in this city, gave its closing concert for the season at the Academy of Music last evening in the presence of a large audience, which was rendered more than usually enthusiastic by the special nature of the occasion.

An excellent program was presented. It began with Bach's suite in D major No. 3, it included Dubussy's exquisite "Afternoon of a Faun" and it ended with the noble "Eroica" symphony of Beethoven. Each of these numbers was admirably played, the Bach suite with just that crispness and clarity and precision which its adequate interpretation demands, the beautiful music of Dubussy with the utmost delicacy of sentiment and refinement of execution, and the Beethoven symphony with power and breadth and dignity, with a consummate mastery of its detail and a fine apprehension of its significance.

Mr. Henri Marteau, the young French violinist, was the assisting artist. He was heard in a concerto by Jacques-Delcroze, a composition which had not previously been given here and which proved to be so interesting that it would be a pleasure to hear it again. It exhibits the characteristics of the modern school, but with less incoherence and a greater affluence of melody than are found in some of its more conspicuous examples. It was brilliantly performed, with superb spirit and appreciative emotion, and the applause which it evoked left no doubt of the favorable nature of the impression which it had produced.

And so, with one of the best concerts it has comprised, the symphony season was brought to a satisfying and memorable end.

RECORD

PA

MAR 13 1906

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Old and New Music Constitute Last Concert of Series.

The old classics and the works of the intensely modern composers both figured on the program of the Boston Symphony's concert—the fifth and last of the series—at the Academy of Music last evening, the occasion also of Wilhelm Gericke's last appearance here as conductor of that magnificent musical organization. Bach and Beethoven stood for the classicists, Debussy and Jacques-Delcroze for the moderns.

The novelties of the evening were the Prelude to Stephane Mallarme's Ecologue, "The Afternoon of a Faun," a piece of music which appears to be very popular at Paris at the present writing, but which has been played only on one or two occasions in this country; and a Concerto in C minor for violin and orchestra by Jacques-Delcroze. The Debussy selection is in the characteristic vein of that French composer—descriptive, limpid in harmony, yet somewhat vague and unsatisfying. The Concerto has more virility. It (the Concerto) seems a rather peculiar bit of music from its first hearing. It is in three movements, and the beginning of its opening movement (allegro con ritardo) is decidedly unpromising, with its unexpected dynamics and close harmonies. Before the movement ends, however, it develops many musical beauties, and the second movement (largo) is an exquisite example of musical composition. The third movement serves rather to exploit the virtuosity of the soloist than anything else. This Concerto is dedicated to Henry Marteau, the violinist, who played it last evening in masterly fashion as the soloist of the evening.

As for the playing of the orchestra, it was never better, which is saying much when one knows the high standard it has set for itself.

om PUBLIC LEDGER

ldress

te

GOOD-BY TO MR. GERICKE

His Last Appearance at the Boston Orchestra's Closing Concert

The closing concert of the local orchestra season at the Academy of Music on Saturday was followed last evening by the final concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, whose monthly visits have long been an important feature of musical interest. Particular importance attached to this concert as the last appearance here of Wilhelm Gericke, who has conducted the Boston Orchestra for thirteen of the twenty-five years of its existence, and is now about to retire.

188

By an interesting coincidence, its first conductor, Georg Henschel, also will be in Philadelphia this week, and will conduct his own most important composition at the Academy tomorrow night. Mr. Henschel originally formed the orchestra in Boston and instituted the weekly concerts there in 1881. In 1884 he went to England, and was succeeded by Mr. Gericke, who rebuilt the organization on its present lines and brought it to that high state of efficiency that has been everywhere recognized.

Mr. Gericke brought the orchestra to Philadelphia for the first time for a single concert in the spring of 1886, just twenty years ago. Since that time its concerts have been given here regularly each season. After five years Mr. Gericke was succeeded by Arthur Nikisch, who conducted the orchestra for three years, giving it an elasticity it had not had before. He was followed by Emil Paur for five years, and Mr. Gericke then returned and has conducted the orchestra since, bringing it again very completely to his own ideals of purity of tone and precision in execution.

These dominating qualities of the orchestra were advantageously displayed in the two classic numbers on last night's programme—the Bach suite in D major, played with entire clarity and with a smooth, even tone that was altogether lovely, and the great "Eroica" symphony, to which was given a dignified presentation, with precision of movement and a noble volume of sound. The suave work of the violins in the Bach number commanded especial recognition, and the finale of the symphony rose to a fine eloquence.

Of more modern interest was the lovely little poem, "L'Apres-mide d'un Faun" of Dubressy, the most delicate and subtle of the contemporary Frenchmen. This is an elusive atmospheric picture, expressed with gossamerlike delicacy. It is not the least of our objections to Mr. Gericke that he has made known to us so much of the modern French music, even when it has not appeared to appeal warmly to his imaginative sympathy.

The novelty of the programme was a violin concerto by Jacques Dalcroze, the Swiss composer, played by Henri Marteau. It is a composition extremely vague in form, which seemed to derive most of its interest from the executant. The first movement is mainly an extremely difficult if not impossible solo in the high octave against a recondite counterpoint. The slow movement, which has a quite lovely melody, is more conventional in treatment. The finale is a return to mere bravura, with an accompaniment of freakish modern orchestration. The work is dedicated to Marteau, and it is not probable that any one else will dispute it with him.

The symphony closed the concert, and, at its conclusion Mr. Gericke was several times recalled to bow his farewell to Philadelphia.

[189]

PRESS
PHILA., PA.
MAR 14 1906

HONOR FOR GERICKE

Baltimoreans to Give Retiring Orchestra Leader Punch Bowl.

Special Despatch to "The Press."

Baltimore, March 13.—Music lovers and admirers of Mr. Gericke, the retiring director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, have responded generously to the opportunity offered them to contribute towards a substantial testimonial of appreciation to be presented to him to-morrow evening at his last appearance in Baltimore as the leader of the organization.

The committee in charge has purchased a handsome repousse silver salver punch-bowl and ladle, with the following inscription on the bowl:—

To
WILLIAM GERICKE, in token of appreciation from his admirers in Baltimore.
March 14, 1906.

The gift will be presented by Mr. Harold Randolph, director of the Peabody Conservatory of Music, during the intermission at the concert. Mr. Gericke is the most popular leader with Baltimoreans the orchestra has ever had.

Roosevelts at Symphony Concert.

Washington, March 13.—President and Mrs. Roosevelt and Mr. and Mrs. Longworth to-day attended the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the National Theater.

PUBLIC LEDGER
PHILA., PA.
MAR 18 1906

The concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Monday evening gave opportunity for a farewell appreciation of Mr. Gericke, the retiring conductor of that admirable organization. It was pleasant to observe the cordial recognition he received from the audience on this occasion. He is not a conductor of assertive personality, and the frequenters of these concerts have often appeared to take the conductor for granted, without perceiving how completely the work of the orchestra reflected Mr. Gericke's musical ideals. The PUBLIC LEDGER'S notice of the concert was meant to be unreservedly appreciative. Both the Bach and the Beethoven were eminently characteristic in the manner of performance, and the bit of Debugoy gave occasion to say that among our many obligations to Mr. Gericke must be recalled his early recognition of the younger French school. The intention of the writer, however, was sadly perverted when the word "obligations" appeared in print as our "objections" to Mr. Gericke. The misprint was not less exasperating because so absurd.

PUBLIC LEDGER
PHILA., PA.
MAR 19 1906

SYMPHONY CONCERT SEATS

To the Editor of Public Ledger:

It would indeed be a great boon if the top gallery were reserved for the Philadelphia and Boston Symphony concerts, either for the whole season or for separate concerts. It would save time and temper in the box office, and time, colds and pneumonia for those waiting in the streets. I am a lover of music, and it is a great trial to be debarred from the concerts, but I am not strong enough to stand, and I cannot afford the price of the present reserved seats. I trust that before next season arrangements will be made which will enable those who, though unfortunately poor, are musical to reserve the twenty-five cent seats.

F. A. G.

Philadelphia, March 15, 1906.

PUBLIC LEDGER
PHILA., PA.
MAR 15 1906

MUSIC FOR THE RICH ONLY

To the Editor of Public Ledger:

The symphony concerts of the Philadelphia and Boston Orchestras, as well as the opera, having ceased for the season, I think it time to make a protest for those who must go to the amphitheatre. In Paris at the Grand Opera House you can have the two franc, three franc and five franc reserved seats; in Brussels you can have a reserved seat for 10 cents. Why should then it not be arranged that the people should not have to stand for hours in storm and rain, not counting the loss of time to busy people? It is bad enough to have to mount so many stairs.

Places of amusement should be supplied with elevators to the top. Poor and old people enjoy music, but you never see any older than fifty at the top of the house. Trusting a new regime may be inaugurated in the future, I am, CHARLOTTE M. MAWSON.

1811 Walnut st., Phila., March 13, 1906.

TELEGRAPH
PHILA., PA.
MAR 14 1906

Washington Society Notes.

REPRESENTATIVE AND MRS. LONGWORTH will leave Washington tomorrow for a few days' visit to Cincinnati, where Mr. Longworth will make a speech at a St. Patrick's Day banquet on Saturday.

THE PRESIDENT had luncheon informally with him at the White House yesterday the Russian Ambassador to Japan and Mme. Bakhemetieff, together with Representative and Mrs. Longworth.

THE PRESIDENT AND MRS. ROOSEVELT and Representative and Mrs. Nicholas Longworth occupied a box at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert on Tuesday afternoon. Mrs. Roosevelt wore a pale blue cloth costume, with a black hat trimmed with pink roses and blue wings. Mrs. Longworth was gowned in tan broadcloth, with a large hat of the same color with a longe cerise plume.

TIMES
WASHINGTON, D. C.
FEB 25 1906

MATTERS OF INTEREST TO ALL MUSIC LOVERS

The resignation of William Gericke as director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was heard with genuine regret by music-lovers at Washington. Just what led to the disagreement between the director and Mr. Higginson remains a matter of conjecture. But be that what it may the occurrence is a regretable one in every sense.

There is no denying that the Boston Symphony Orchestra can make good under any able director, that is, to a certain extent, but it is the master mind with the baton that infuses the necessary melodic instinct, and puts on the thematic polish.

Three directors of the Boston have stood out pre-eminent. First, Gericke; then Nickisch; then Paur; again Nickisch, and then again Gericke. All men of harmonic verve, yet so different in contrapuntal temperament as to make their therapeutics in harmony musical medicine for even the layman.

With Gericke it is the deep repose of Beethoven and Brahms; Nickisch the impetuosity of Wagner and the somber vivacity of Tchaikowsky; and Paur, a blending of the theories mentioned, to which is added a deep study of Schumannesque sentiment, and yet it has all along seemed that Gericke's musicianship and orchestral influence brought to the fore a more far-reaching effect.

Who his successor will be is not yet definitely decided. Paur is the logical reach, unless Weingartner can be induced to stay. Yet there is a hope that Gericke and Higginson will come to an agreement and the director will stay.

Gericke was born at Graz, Styria, on April 18, 1845. He was educated at the Real School, Graz, and at the Vienna Conservatorium, for composition, under Dessoff. He spent the years 1862-65 at the latter school. Then, from 1865 to 1874 he was a conductor of theaters in various cities, devoting himself at the same time to composition.

In 1874 Gericke assumed the leadership of that famed organization, the Vienna Hofoper. For the last four years of his conductorship in Vienna, which place he held for ten years, he was conductor also of the Gesellschaft's Concerte.

In 1884 he gave up his work in Vienna to come to America as the leader of the Boston Orchestra. Since Gericke assumed the baton the Symphony Orchestra has become the head of the American orchestral organizations.

In 1889, because of impaired health, Gericke gave over the Boston conductorship and returned to Europe. In 1893 he returned to his old position and the famous orchestra under his superior leadership won fresh laurels.

TIMES
WASHINGTON, D. C.
MAR 11 1906

...end of the Boston Symphony season in Washington will come on next Tuesday afternoon, when the last concert of the series will be given in the New National Theater, at 4:30 o'clock. It has been a season full of gratification for the patrons and the orchestra. The former have had a series of concerts such as Washington has not known since the Boston Symphony Orchestra left the city out of its route, eight years ago. The orchestra has had more generous and loyal patronage than it ever expected, and Washington has more than justified the promises made last spring, when the project of bringing the orchestra back again was first broached.

Next year the orchestra must bring another conductor, for Mr. Gericke has announced his intention of retiring from active life at the end of the present season. Consequently next Tuesday will mark his last appearance in this city as the conductor of the orchestra.

The concert will offer another attractive programme. The soloist will be Henri Marteau, one of the greatest of living violinists, and he will play a work unknown to most connoisseurs, a concerto for the violin written by the Swiss, Emile Jaques-Dalcroze, which is dedicated to Mr. Marteau. It is said to be a most effective work. Its composer is the professor of harmony of the Conservatory of C——, of which Mr. Marteau is the head.

In response to many requests, Mr. Gericke has placed on the programme a Beethoven and Wagner number. The former will be the second symphony in D Major, a work which, although not so well known as the "Eroica" and C Minor, is easily one of the most beautiful in symphonic literature. The Wagner number will be the gorgeously brilliant Bacchanale, from the first act of "Tannhaeuser" (Paris Version). It was written for the first Paris performance of Opera in 18681, it then being a rule of the grand opera that all works presented there must have a ballet. Such a ballet as this was never written before, nor since, and Wagner's ideals of the dance have never been realized. Yet the work itself remains one of the most captivating pieces of dance music ever written. The full programme is as follows:

Beethoven—Symphony No. 2, in D Major.
Jaques-Dalcroze—Concerto for Violin (First Time).
Wagner—Bacchanale, from "Tannhauser," Act 1 (Paris Version).
Von Weber—Overture to "Der Freischuetz."
Solo Artist—M. Henri Marteau.

TIMES
WASHINGTON, D. C.
MAR 11 1906

National—Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The end of the Boston Symphony season in Washington will come on next Tuesday afternoon, when the last concert of the series will be given in the New National Theater at 4:30 o'clock.

Next Tuesday will mark the last appearance in this city of Gericke as the conductor of the orchestra. In his former visits here he made many friends and admirers, and this year his splendid concerts and admirable programs have increased their number greatly. There will undoubtedly be a great outpouring of them to bid him good-by.

The concert will offer another attractive program. The soloist will be Henri Marteau, one of the greatest of living violinists, and he will play a work unknown to most connoisseurs, a concerto for the violin, written by the Swiss Emile Jaques-Dalcroze, which is dedicated to Mr. Marteau.

In response to many requests that have been made by the Washington patrons of these concerts, Mr. Gericke has placed on the program a Beethoven and Wagner number. The former will be the second symphony in D major, a work which, although not so well known as the "Eroica" and C minor, is easily one of the most beautiful in symphonic literature. The Wagner number will be the gorgeously brilliant Bacchanale from the first act of "Tannhauser" (Paris version).

WASHINGTON, D. C.
MAR 11 1906

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will play the fifth and last of its concerts in this city Tuesday afternoon, at the Columbia Theater. The programme will be as follows: Weber, overture, "Trieshutz;" Jacquez Dalcroze, Concerto for Violin; Goldmark, overture, "Sakuntala;" Richard Strauss, Symphonic Fantasie, "From Italy."

The soloist will be Henry Marteau, violinist. Mr. Gericke will direct the orchestra for the last time in Washington as he is about to retire from his position with the organization.

Mr. Gericke came to this country in 1884, and was conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for five years, when he returned to Austria for his health, staying nine years. During that time the orchestra was conducted by Arthur Nikisch and Emil Paur. The present director returned to Boston in 1898, and has been at the head of the organization up to the present time. His present salary is $12,500 per year, and it is understood that Mr. Gericke requested of Mr. Higginson, the generous patron of the orchestra, an increase to $15,000 and an arrangement of the work to permit him a brief rest in midwinter. Mr. Weingartner has been mentioned for the position, but will probably not accept it, if offered. Messrs. Muck, of Berlin; Schuch, of Dresden, and Mindy, of Paris, are also men... Fritzsch School, director of the Philharmonic Orchestra, is said to be satisfied... and will finally leave...

STAR
WASHINGTON, D. C.
MAR 11 1906

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The end of the Boston Symphony season in Washington will come on next Tuesday afternoon, when the last concert of the series will be given in the New National Theater at 4:30 o'clock. It was not without some misgivings that arrangements were made for this series of five concerts, but with a season ticket, which meant a crowded house at each concert. Washington has more than justified the promises made last spring when the project of bringing the orchestra back again was first broached.

Next year the orchestra must bring another conductor, for Mr. Gericke has announced his intention of retiring from active life at the end of the present season. Consequently next Tuesday will mark his last appearance in this city as the conductor of the orchestra. The soloist on Tuesday will be Henri Marteau, who will play a concerto for the violin written by the Swiss, Emile Jaques-Dalcroze, which is dedicated to Mr. Marteau. Its composer is the professor of harmony of the Conservatory of Geneva, of which Mr. Marteau is the head.

In response to many requests that have been made by the Washington patrons of these concerts, Mr. Gericke has placed on the program a Beethoven and Wagner number. The former will be the second symphony in D major. The Wagner number will be the brilliant bacchanale from the first act of "Tannhaeuser" (Paris version). It was written for the first Paris performance of opera in 1861, it then being a rule of the grand opera that all works presented there must have a ballet.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
TIMES
WASHINGTON, D. C.
MAR 8 -

National—Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The next concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the New National Theater, Tuesday afternoon, March 13, will be the last of this season's concerts, and additional interest will be lent, it being Mr. Gericke's last appearance as conductor of the orchestra, as he will return to Austria at the close of the season. The soloist of this concert is Henri Marteau, the greatest French violinist, and one of the greatest artists now before the public. In response to many requests, Mr. Gericke has been persuaded to give a number by Beethoven and one by Wagner, and the program will include:

Symphony, No. 2, in D. Major, Beethoven; Concerto in C. Minor, for violin and orchestra, Jaques-Dalcroze; Bacchanale from "Tannhaeuser," Wagner; Overture to "Der Freischuetz," Weber.

PU...
...ASHINGTON, D. C.
MAR 4 - 1906

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The coming concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the New National Theater on Tuesday afternoon, March 13, will be the last of this season's series, and additional interest will be lent it by the fact that it will be the last appearance in this city of Mr. Gericke as conductor of the orchestra. As recently announced, Mr. Gericke will retire from this post which he has held with such honor for altogether thirteen years, at the end of the present season, returning to his native Austria to enjoy the rest his forty years of continuous work have earned for him. The soloist at his concert will be Henri Marteau, the greatest of French violinists, and one of the greatest artists now before the public. He will play a new violin concerto by Emile Jaques-Dalcroze, a Swiss. The remainder of the programme will comprise Weber's overture to "Der Freischuetz," Goldmark's overture "Sakuntala," and Richard Strauss' symphonic fantasia, "From Italy." Seats now on sale at T. Arthur Smith's, 1327 F street.

STAR
WASHINGTON, D. C.
MAR 7 - 1906

Boston Symphony Concert.

The next concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the National Theater, Tuesday afternoon, March 13, will be the last of this season's series. This will be Mr. Gericke's last appearance as conductor of the orchestra, as he will return to Austria at the end of the season. The soloist of this concert will be Mr. Henri Marteau, the greatest of French violinists and one of the greatest artists now before the public. In response to many resquests Mr. Gericke has been persuaded to give a number by Beethoven and one by Wagner, and the program will include symphony No. 2 in D major, Beethoven; concerto in C minor for violin and orchestra, Jacques-Dalcroze; Bacchanale from "Tannhaeuser," Wagner; overture to "Der Freischutz," Weber.

ORIGIN...

STAR
WASHINGTON, D. C.
MAR 4 - 1906

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The coming concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the New National Theater on Tuesday afternoon, March 13, will be the last of this season's series, and additional interest will be lent it by the fact that it will be the last appearance in this city of Mr. Gericke as conductor of the orchestra. As recently announced, Mr. Gericke will retire from this post which he has held with such honor for altogether thirteen years, at the end of the present season returning to his native Austria to enjoy the rest his forty years of continuous work have earned for him.

The soloist at this concert will be Henri Marteau, the great French violinist. He will play a new violin concerto by Emile Jaques-Dalcroze, a Swiss. The remainder of the program will comprise Weber's overture to "Der Freischuetz," Goldmark's overture "Sakuntala," and Richard Strauss' symphonic fantasia, "From Italy." Seats now on sale at T. Arthur Smith's, 1327 F street.

[190

PRESS

MAR 14 1906

HONOR FOR GERICKE

Baltimoreans to Give Retiring Orchestra Leader Punch Bowl.

Special Despatch to "The Press."

Baltimore, March 13.—Music lovers and admirers of Mr. Gericke, the retiring director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, have responded generously to the opportunity offered them to contribute towards a substantial testimonial of appreciation to be presented to him to-morrow evening at his last appearance in Baltimore as the leader of the organization.

The committee in charge has purchased a handsome repousse silver salver punch-bowl and ladle, with the following inscription on the bowl:—

To
WILLIAM GERICKE,
In token of appreciation from his admirers in Baltimore.
March 14, 1906.

The gift will be presented by Mr. Harold Randolph, director of the Peabody Conservatory of Music, during the intermission at the concert. Mr. Gericke is the most popular leader with Baltimoreans the orchestra has ever had.

Roosevelts at Symphony Concert.

Washington, March 13.—President and Mrs. Roosevelt and Mr. and Mrs. Longworth to-day attended the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the National Theater.

PUBLIC LEDGER

The concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Monday evening gave opportunity for a farewell appreciation of Mr. Gericke, the retiring conductor of that admirable organization. It was pleasant to observe the cordial recognition he received from the audience on this occasion. He is not a conductor of assertive personality, and the frequenters of these concerts have often appeared to take the conductor for granted, without perceiving how completely the work of the orchestra reflected Mr. Gericke's musical ideals. The PUBLIC LEDGER'S notice of the concert was meant to be unreservedly appreciative. Both the Bach and the Beethoven were eminently characteristic in the manner of performance, and the bit of Debugoy gave occasion to say that among our many obligations to Mr. Gericke must be recalled his early recognition of the younger French school. The intention of the writer, however, was sadly perverted when the word "obligations" appeared in print as our "objections" to Mr. Gericke. The misprint was not less exasperating because so absurd.

* * *

PUBLIC LEDGER

SYMPHONY CONCERT SEATS

To the Editor of Public Ledger:

It would indeed be a great boon if the top gallery were reserved for the Philadelphia and Boston Symphony concerts, either for the whole season or for separate concerts. It would save time and temper in the box office, and time, colds and pneumonia for those waiting in the streets. I am a lover of music, and it is a great trial to be debarred from the concerts, but I am not strong enough to stand, and I cannot afford the price of the present reserved seats. I trust that before next season arrangements will be made which will enable those who, though unfortunately poor, are musical to reserve the twenty-five cent seats.

F. A. G.

Philadelphia, March 15, 1906.

PUBLIC LEDGER

MUSIC FOR THE RICH ONLY

To the Editor of Public Ledger:

The symphony concerts of the Philadelphia and Boston Orchestras, as well as the opera, having ceased for the season, I think it time to make a protest for those who must go to the amphitheatre. In Paris at the Grand Opera House you can have the two franc, three franc and five franc reserved seats; in Brussels you can have a reserved seat for 10 cents. Why should then it not be arranged that the people should not have to stand for hours in storm and rain, not counting the loss of time to busy people? It is bad enough to have to mount so many stairs.

Places of amusement should be supplied with elevators to the top. Poor and old people enjoy music, but you never see any older than fifty at the top of the house. Trusting a new regime may be inaugurated in the future, I am,

CHARLOTTE M. MAWSON.

1311 Walnut st., Phila., March 13, 1906.

TELEGRAPH.
PHILA., PA.

MAR 14 1906

Washington Society Notes.

REPRESENTATIVE AND MRS. LONGWORTH will leave Washington tomorrow for a few days' visit to Cincinnati, where Mr. Longworth will make a speech at a St. Patrick's Day banquet on Saturday.

THE PRESIDENT had lunching informally with him at the White House yesterday the Russian Ambassador to Japan and Mme. Bakhemetieff, together with Representative and Mrs. Longworth.

THE PRESIDENT AND MRS. ROOSEVELT and Representative and Mrs. Nicholas Longworth occupied a box at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert on Tuesday afternoon. Mrs. Roosevelt wore a pale blue cloth costume, with a black hat trimmed with pink roses and blue wings. Mrs. Longworth was gowned in tan broadcloth, with a large hat of the same color with a longe cerise plume.

MRS. FORAKER returned from Cincinnati.

TIMES

MATTERS OF INTEREST TO ALL MUSIC LOVERS

The resignation of William Gericke as director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was heard with genuine regret by music-lovers at Washington. Just what led to the disagreement between the director and Mr. Higginson remains a matter of conjecture. But be that what it may the occurrence is a regretable one in every sense.

There is no denying that the Boston Symphony Orchestra can make good under any able director, that is, to a certain extent, but it is the master mind with the baton that infuses the necessary melodic instinct, and puts on the thematic polish.

Three directors of the Boston have stood out pre-eminent. First, Gericke; then Nickisch; then Paur; again Nickisch, and then again Gericke. All men of harmonic verve, yet so different in contrapuntal temperament as to make their therapeutics in harmony musical medicine for even the layman.

With Gericke it is the deep repose of Beethoven and Brahms; Nickisch the impetuosity of Wagner and the somber vivacity of Tchaikowsky; and Paur, a blending of the theories mentioned, to which is added a deep study of Schumannesque sentiment, and yet it has all along seemed that Gericke's musicianship and orchestral influence brought to the fore a more far-reaching effect.

Who his successor will be is not yet definitely decided. Paur is the logical reach, unless Weingartner can be induced to stay. Yet there is a hope that Gericke and Higginson will come to an agreement and the director will stay.

Gericke was born at Graz, Styria, on April 18, 1845. He was educated at the Real School, Graz, and at the Vienna Conservatorium, for composition, under Dessoff. He spent the years 1862-65 at the latter school. Then, from 1865 to 1874 he was a conductor of theaters in various cities, devoting himself at the same time to composition.

In 1874 Gericke assumed the leadership of that famed organization, the Vienna Hofoper. For the last four years of his conductorship in Vienna, which place he held for ten years, he was conductor also of the Gesellschaft's Concerte.

In 1884 he gave up his work in Vienna to come to America as the leader of the Boston Orchestra. Since Gericke assumed the baton the Symphony Orchestra has become the head of the American orchestral organizations.

In 1889, because of impaired health, Gericke gave over the Boston conductorship and returned to Europe. In 1898 he returned to his old position and the famous orchestra under his superior leadership won fresh laurels.

WASHINGTON, D. C.

MAR 11 1906

Boston Symphony Orchestra at National Theater Tuesday Afternoon.

The end of the Boston Symphony season in Washington will come on next Tuesday afternoon, when the last concert of the series will be given in the New National Theater, at 4:30 o'clock. It has been a season full of gratification for the patrons and the orchestra. The former have had a series of concerts such as Washington has not known since the Boston Symphony Orchestra left this city out of its route, eight years ago. The orchestra has had more generous and loyal patronage than it ever expected, and Washington has more than justified the promises made last spring, when the project of bringing the orchestra back again was first broached.

Next year the orchestra must bring another conductor, for Mr. Gericke has announced his intention of retiring from active life at the end of the present season. Consequently, next Tuesday will mark his last appearance in this city as the conductor of the orchestra.

The concert will offer another attractive programme. The soloist will be Henri Marteau, one of the greatest of living violinists, and he will play a work unknown to most connoisseurs, a concerto for the violin written by the Swiss, Emile Jaques-Dalcroze, which is dedicated to Mr. Marteau. It is said to be a most effective work. Its composer is the professor of harmony of the Conservatory of Geneva, of which Mr. Marteau is the head.

In response to many requests, Mr. Gericke has placed on the programme a Beethoven and Wagner number. The former will be the second symphony in D Major, a work which, although not so well known as the "Eroica" and C Minor, is easily one of the most beautiful in symphonic literature. The Wagner number will be the gorgeously brilliant Bacchanale, from the first act of "Tannhaeuser" (Paris Version). It was written for the first Paris performance of Opera in 18681, it then being a rule of the grand opera that all works presented there must have a ballet. Such a ballet as this was never written before, nor since, and Wagner's ideals of the dance have never been realized. Yet the work itself remains one of the most captivating pieces of dance music ever written. The full programme is as follows:

Beethoven—Symphony No. 2, in D Major.
Jaques-Daleroze—Concerto for Violin (First Time).
Wagner—Bacchanale, from "Tannhauser," Act 1 (Paris Version).
Von Weber—Overture to "Der Freischuetz."
Solo Artist—M. Henri Marteau.

WASHINGTON, D. C.

National—Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The end of the Boston Symphony season in Washington will come on next Tuesday afternoon, when the last concert of the series will be given in the New National Theater at 4:30 o'clock. Next Tuesday will mark the last appearance in this city of Gericke as the conductor of the orchestra. In his former visits here he made many friends and admirers, and this year his splendid concerts and admirable programs have increased their number greatly. There will undoubtedly be a great outpouring of them to bid him good-by.

The concert will offer another attractive program. The soloist will be Henri Marteau, one of the greatest of living violinists, and he will play a work unknown to most connoisseurs, a concerto for the violin, written by the Swiss Emile Jaques-Dalcroze, which is dedicated to Mr. Marteau.

In response to many requests that have been made by the Washington patrons of these concerts, Mr. Gericke has placed on the program a Beethoven and Wagner number. The former will be the second symphony in D major, a work which, although not so well known as the "Eroica" and C minor, is easily one of the most beautiful in symphonic literature. The Wagner number will be the gorgeously brilliant Bacchanale from the first act of "Tannhauser" (Paris version).

WASHINGTON, D. C.

MAR 11 1906

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will play the fifth and last of its concerts in this city Tuesday afternoon, at the Columbia Theater. The programme will be as follows: Weber, overture, "Trieshutz;" Jacquez Dalcroze, Concerto for Violin; Goldmark, overture, "Sakuntala;" Richard Strauss, Symphonic Fantasie, "From Italy."

The soloist will be Henry Marteau, violinist. Mr. Gericke will direct the orchestra for the last time in Washington, as he is about to retire from his position with the organization.

Mr. Gericke came to this country in 1884, and was conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for five years, when he returned to Austria for his health, staying nine years. During that time the orchestra was conducted by Arthur Nikisch and Emil Paur. The present director returned to Boston in 1898, and has been at the head of the organization up to the present time. His present salary is $12,500 per year, and it is understood that Mr. Gericke requested of Mr. Higginson, the generous patron of the orchestra, an increase to $15,000 and an arrangement of the work to permit him a brief rest in midwinter. Mr. Weingartner has been mentioned for the position, but will probably not accept it, if offered. Messrs. Muck, of Berlin; Schuch, of Dresden, and d'Indy, of Paris, are also mentioned. Fritz Scheel, director of the Philadelphia Orchestra, is said to be satisfied with his position and will hardly leave to go with the Boston Orchestra.

WASHINGTON, D. C.

MAR 7 - 1906

Boston Symphony Concert.

The next concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the National Theater, Tuesday afternoon, March 13, will be the last of this season's series. This will be Mr. Gericke's last appearance as conductor of the orchestra, as he will return to Austria at the end of the season. The soloist of this concert will be Mr. Henri Marteau, the greatest of French violinists and one of the greatest artists now before the public. In response to many resquests Mr. Gericke has been persuaded to give a number by Beethoven and one by Wagner, and the program will include symphony No. 2 in D major, Beethoven; concerto in C minor fo violin and orchestra, Jacques-Daleroze; Bacchenale from "Tannhaeuser," Wagner overture to "Der Freischutz," Weber.

[1906

STAR.
WASHINGTON, D. C.
MAR 11 1906

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The end of the Boston Symphony season in Washington will come on next Tuesday afternoon, when the last concert of the series will be given in the New National Theater at 4:30 o'clock. It was not without some misgivings that arrangements were made for this series of five concerts, but with a subscription which meant a crowded house at every concert, Washington has more than justified the promises made last spring when the project of bringing the orchestra back again was first broached.

Next year the orchestra must bring another conductor, for Mr. Gericke has announced his intention of retiring from active life at the end of the present season. Consequently next Tuesday will mark his last appearance in this city as the conductor of the orchestra. The soloist on Tuesday will be Henri Marteau, who will play a concerto for the violin written by the Swiss, Emile Jaques-Dalcroze, which is dedicated to Mr. Marteau. Its composer is the professor of harmony of the Conservatory of Geneva, of which Mr. Marteau is the head.

In response to many requests that have been made by the Washington patrons of these concerts, Mr. Gericke has placed on the program a Beethoven and Wagner number. The former will be the second symphony in D major. The Wagner number will be the brilliant bacchanale from the first act of "Tannhaeuser" (Paris version). It was written for the first Paris performance of opera in 1861, it then being a rule of the grand opera that all works presented there must have a ballet.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
TIMES

MAR 8 -

National—Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The next concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the New National Theater, Tuesday afternoon, March 13, will be the last of this season's concerts, and additional interest will be lent, it being Mr. Gericke's last appearance as conductor of the orchesra, as he will return to Austria at the close of the season. The soloist of this concert is Henri Marteau, the greatest French violinist, and one of the greatest artists now before the public. In response to many requests, Mr. Gericke has been persuaded to give a number by Beethoven and one by Wagner, and the program will include:

Symphony, No. 2, in D. Major, Beethoven; Concerto in C. Minor, for violin and orchestra, Jaques-Daleroze; Bacchanale from "Tannhaeuser," Wagner; Overture to "Der Freischuetz," Weber.

WASHINGTON, D. C.

MAR 4 - 1906

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The coming concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the New National Theater on Tuesday afternoon, March 13, will be the last of this season's series, and additional interest will be lent it by the fact that it will be the last appearance in this city of Mr. Gericke as conductor of the orchestra. As recently announced, Mr. Gericke will retire from this post which he has held with such honor for altogether thirteen years, and at the end of the present season, returning to his native Austria to enjoy the rest his forty years of continuous work have earned for him. The soloist at his concert will be Henri Marteau, the greatest of French violinists, and one of the greatest artists now before the public. He will play a new violin concerto by Emile Jaques-Dalcroze, a Swiss. The remainder of the programme will comprise Weber's overture to "Der Freischutz," Goldmark's overture "Sakuntala," and Richard Strauss' symphonic fantasia "From Italy." Seats now on sale at T. Arthur Smith's, 1327 F street.

STAR
WASHINGTON, D. C.

MAR 4 - 1906

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The coming concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the New National Theater on Tuesday afternoon, March 13, will be the last of this season's series, and additional interest will be lent it by the fact that it will be the last appearance in this city of Mr. Gericke as conductor of the orchestra. As recently announced, Mr. Gericke will retire from this post which he has held with such honor for altogether thirteen years, at the end of the present season returning to his native Austria to enjoy the rest his forty years of continuous work have earned for him.

The soloist at this concert will be Henri Marteau, the great French violinist. He will play a new violin concerto by Emile Jaques-Dalcroze, a Swiss. The remainder of the program will comprise Weber's overture to "Der Freischuetz," Goldmark's overture "Sakuntala," and Richard Strauss' symphonic fantasia, "From Italy." Seats are now on sale at T. Arthur Smith's, 1327 F street.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
TIMES.
WASHINGTON, D. C.
MAR 4- 1906

...mphony Concert.

...ing concert of the Boston ... Orchestra at the National ... on Tuesday afternoon, March ... be the last of this season's ... and additional interest will be ... by the fact that it will be the ...earance in this city of Mr. ... as conductor of the orchestra. ...oloist at this concert will be ... Marteau, the violinist. He will ... a new concerto by Emile Jaques-...croze, a Swiss. The remainder of ... program will comprise Weber's ...ture to "Der Freischeutz;" Gold...'s overture, "Sakuntala," and ...hard Strauss' symphonic fantasia, ...From Italy."

STAR
WASHINGTON, D. C.
MAR 14 1906

...Last Symphony Concert.

...Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its ...ncert of the season in Washington ...ay at the National Theater. It was ... the farewell of Wilhelm Gericke, con... who will soon return to Europe. ...ncert was up to the standard set ... famous musical organization, and ...est traditions of the great orchestra ... maintained. The audience, large and ...entative of the music-knowing ele... of Washington, was ...ly attentive ... the work of the orchestra and explo... demonstrative at the conclusion of ...ements and numbers. The band played ... the unity of sentiment and poetry ...ne which distinguishes the Boston ...phony.

...Beethoven's Second Symphony, first on ...program, was flawlessly given. It is so ...iliar to concert patrons that the songs ...ng through it are old friends. The ...nes, some bold and noble, some grace... and pathetic and some festive, made a ...ong appeal to the auditory. The lar...etto, or second movement, of the sym...ony, is one of the best known Beethoven ...eadies and it was given with such senti... and satisfaction that it was enthu...astically applauded. The wood wind ...choir was especially effective.

The novelty of the program was a con...certo by Jacques Dalcroze, for violin and ...orchestra, the soloist being Henri Marteau. ...It was the first rendition of this piece in ...Washington. Marteau played with a superb ...tone and spectacular virtuosity. The con...certo, being new to Washington ears, was ...not completely grasped, but wherever the ...melodies rang clearly above the embroid...ery they were thought beautiful. In the ...harmonization the composer has been af...fected by oriental ideas and here and there ...are touches of barbaric color. Concert Mas...ter Willy Hess conducted the concerto. Mr. ...Marteau was recalled half a dozen times, ...but declined to play again.

The third number was the Bacchanale ...from "Tannhauser," and was played with ...poetry and dash and carried through in a ...stirring tempo. The last number was the ...overture to Weber's Der Freischutz," and ...none of its beauty was lost. Mr. Gericke ...conducted from memory.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
TIMES
WASHINGTON, D. C.
MAR 14 1906

Last Symphony Proves Event of the Season

Gericke and Marteau Heroes of Musical Occasion That Will Be Long Remembered.

It was probably Wilhelm Gericke's appearance here as director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra must also ...ow in the annals of musical Wash...on as a triumph of art.

The concluding concert of the season at the National yesterday afternoon ...ed a revelation in several ways. A ...illiant and cultured audience sat al...ost in awe as one number after the ...other was played with an inspiration ...hich really surpassed in finesse of mu...ical portrayal any other concert of the ...eason. It seemed as though Mr. ...ericke was determined that his finale ...should leave a lasting impression, and ...there is no doubt it did. An acute reader ...of Beethoven himself, particularly of ...the master's earlier works, Mr. Gericke ...seemed to infuse his band with this same ...inspiration. He used every energy to ...bring out the peculiar sentiment and ...depth of Beethoven's Second Sym...phony in D major.

Feature of Concert.

The feature of the concert was the ...appearance of Henri Marteau elec...trifying by his performance ...of Jacques-Dalcroze violin concerto in ...E, a modern composition ...which, while ...

drunk deeply of the later German theories, not hesitating in reaching for tone color effect at tutti periods. The concerto in the main is built upon modern lines. Trill unison for the strings introduces the first theme. Then in fugal form there is picture work for the wood wind, including a novel obligato in duo form for the fagotto and first oboe. Then a succession of violin runs to which a percussion of brass and tympani replies, and then with a glorious climax the soloist takes up a rippling theme built purely upon harmonics. These are but a few of the ponderous difficulties of the concerto, but, withal, Marteau measured up to every requirement.

The very introduction indicates the intricacies yet to come. A double stop prologue, with G string predominance, marks the future thematic form and its runs, measure to measure, are cadenzic lines. Then follows the romantic phase wherein the horns without transposition picture the solo thought that trombones and orchestral ensemble bring to a somewhat unexpected climax.

Easy for the Artist.

All of these contrapuntal treasheries were like child's play to Marteau. His tone, technique, interpretation, and self-possession were blended beautifully at critical periods, and upon concluding the concerto he was given an ovation. Willy Hess, concert master of the orchestra, directed the accompaniment.

It is to be hoped that Gericke will have a successor as able in the delineation of Beethoven. In directing the Second Symphony he brought every idea of pure organ point into play. One could ...easily discern how from trio to quin...tet and then to regular symphonic form. ...Could but seldom heard compo...sitions by the ...

Cutting Bureau in the World
TIMES
WASHINGTON, D. C.
MAR 14 1906

GERICKE BIDDEN FAREWELL

Washington Crowds National Theater at Symphony Concert.

Jaques-Dalcroze's Violin Concert Proves a Novelty to Audience—Some Don't Like It.

Residents of Washington thronged to the fifth and last of the Boston Symphony concerts at the National Theater yesterday afternoon. They went primed to witness society in the boxes and to bid Mr. Gericke a rousing and impressive farewell, on the occasion of his last appearance in this city as conductor of the famous organization.

The audience thought little beforehand of the real event of the concert, the performance of a new violin concerto by E. Jaques-Dalcroze, a Swiss, whose radical departures from accustomed musical form and whose strange juggling with orchestral colors has thrown European critics into a perspiration of controversy.

The violin concerto is full of contrasts. At the beginning everything is grotesque, queer, abrupt. The brasses enter, all playing the same tune roughly. The solo violin plays a queer melody with an odd pizzicato accompaniment. Soon a fugal motive makes its appearance in short, staccato horn notes. There are queer, unusual effects of oboe, combined wood winds, horn, and strings. Then, without warning, they cease and an exquisite romance is played by the solo violin with appropriate accompaniment. This keeps up for a while and then pandemonium breaks loose, only to be replaced by ethereal harmonies on the high flutes and wood winds not less beautiful than the opening measures of "Lohengrin." And so the movement goes forward, always bringing out unexpected novelties.

In the second movement Jaques-Dalcroze proves what has been hitherto unsuspected—that he is able to write good music with very small combinations of instruments. At the opening only the flutes and clarinets accompany the violinist, and at other intervals the French horns, or, perhaps, an English horn and 'cellos will be the only instruments with him. Here the time changes continually. One measure will be in two-four time and the next in three-four. The section follows the mood of the traditional slow movement, and seeks beauty of expression rather than noisiness and drollery. The last measures introducing diaphonous harmonics, which Marteau played faultlessly.

Principal among the other numbers of the programme was the Beethoven Second Symphony, heard too seldom nowadays. In Mr. Gericke's reading of it, there were continual beauties of interpretation.

Society was well represented in the boxes, the President and Mrs. Roosevelt, with Mr. and Mrs. Longworth, occupying one in the lower tier.

POST
WASHINGTON, D. C.
MAR 14 1906

The President and Mrs. Roosevelt had a box at the National Theater yesterday afternoon for the last of the Boston Symphony concerts.

With the President were Mr. and Mrs. Longworth, Mrs. Tuckerman, and Mrs. Lowndes. Mrs. Roosevelt wore a becoming pale blue cloth costume, with a black hat trimmed with roses and blue wings, and Mrs. Longworth an exceedingly smart tan broadcloth gown, and a large hat of the same color, brightened by a long magenta plume at the side.

The house was filled from top to bottom by a large and fashionable audience. Among them were Mrs. Metcalf and Miss Chabot, Mrs. Taft, Senator and Mrs. Lodge, Mrs. John R. McLean and her sister, Mme. Bahkmetieff, Mrs. Richard Harlow, Mr. and Mrs. Pinchot, Miss Morgan, Commodore and Mrs. Miller and the Misses Miller, Miss Violet Langham, the Minister to Norway and Mrs. Peirce, Mrs. Herbert Wadsworth, Mrs. Hobson, Miss Boardman, Mrs. William Slater, Mrs. George Howard, Miss Fannie Fuller, Mrs. Hope Slater, Miss Hagner, Mrs. Bromwell, the Misses Fremont, Mrs. Hobson, Dr. von Kuhlmann, conselor of the German embassy, and Frau von Kuhlmann.

STAR
WASHINGTON, D. C.
MAR 14 1906

Boston Symphony Quartet.

The Boston Symphony Quartet's final contribution to Washington's present season of music will be made on next Monday week, March 26, when it will give its third and last evening of chamber music in the ball room of the New Willard Hotel. The next concert will bring as the assisting artist Mme. Olga Samaroff, whose playing here with the Philadelphia Orchestra recently made a profound impression on Washington music lovers. With Prof. Willy Hess she will play Richard Strauss' sonata for pianoforte and violin in E flat major, Op. 18. The other works on the program will be Mozart's quartet in C major (K. 465) and Beethoven's quartet in C major, Op. 59, No. 8.

TIMES.
WASHINGTON, D. C
MAR 18 1906

Boston Symphony Quartet.

Boston's final contribution to Washington's present season of music will be made on Monday, March 26, when the Boston Symphony Quartet will give its third and last evening of chamber music in the ballroom of the New Willard Hotel.

The concert will bring as the assisting artist Mme. Olga Samaroff, whose playing here with the Philadelphia Orchestra recently made such a profound impression on Washington music lovers. With Prof. Willy Hess she will play Richard Strauss' sonata for pianoforte and violin in E flat major, op. 18. The other works on the program will be Mozart's quartet in C major (K 465), and Bethoven's quartet in C major, op. 59, No. 3.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
AMERICA
BALTIMORE, MD
FEB 27 1906

Wilhelm Gericke has resigned as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, his resignation to take effect at the end of the present season. He will return to Europe. Mr. Gericke was conductor of the Symphony Orchestra from 1884 to 1889, and from 1898 until the present time.

HERALD
BALTIMORE, MD
MAR 1 - 1906

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The fifth and last Boston Symphony concert of the season will be given at the Lyric Wednesday evening, March 14, at 8.15 o'clock. This concert will gain greatly in interest since it will mark the farewell appearance in Baltimore of Mr. Gericke as conductor of the orchestra. Mr. Gericke has announced his intention of retiring from active life at the end of this season, and will return to his native Austria, where he will enjoy a well-earned rest after continuous labors of over forty years. Undoubtedly his many Baltimore admirers will turn out in full force to bid him God-speed.

A most attractive program has been arranged. The soloist will be the violinist, Henri Marteau, who has not been heard here for several years. He will introduce to Baltimore a new violin concerto by the Swiss, Emile Jaques-Dalcroze. The orchestral numbers will be Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture, Claude Debussy's exquisite tone-picture "Apres ...d'un Faun" and finally Schubert's ...at C major symphony. Seats are on ...e at Albaugh's.

NEWS
BALTIMORE, MD
MAR 3- 1906

LAST SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mr. Gericke Will Lead Orchestra For Last Time Here.

The fifth and last Boston Symphony concert of the season will be given in the Lyric on Wednesday evening at 8.15 o'clock. This concert will gain greatly in interest since it will mark the farewell appearance in Baltimore of Mr. Gericke as conductor of the Orchestra. Mr. Gericke has announced his intention of retiring from active life at the end of this season, and will return to his native Austria, where he will enjoy a well-earned rest after continuous labors of over 40 years.

A most attractive programme has been arranged. The soloist will be the distinguished violinist, Henri Marteau, who has not been heard here for several years. He will introduce to Baltimore a new violin concerto by the Swiss, Emile Jacques-Dalcroze. The orchestral numbers will be Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture, Claude Debussy's exquisite tone-picture, "Apres Midi d'un Faun," and finally Schubert's great C major symphony.

HERALD
BALTIMORE, MD
MAR 4- 1906

MR. GERICKE'S SUCCESSOR.

Much Speculation As to the New Boston Leader.

Writers on musical topics are speculating about Mr. Gericke's successor. One has predicted Weingartner, apparently because he is the most eminent conductor who has visited America, and another chooses Dr. Muck, of the Berlin opera, because he will soon be disengaged. Others prefer, more wisely, to survey the field and consider the conditions which are likely to influence the choice. One of these, beyond doubt, is the steady increase, actual and expected, in conductors' salaries. Of this "rising market," and of its influence upon orchestral music in America, Mr. Krehbiel writes very sensibly in the New York Tribune as follows:

"When Mr. Gericke came to America his salary was looked upon in some circles as princely, and there were few conductors in Europe who did not envy him his position. But a great change has taken place since then. Conductors have become 'star' performers in the eyes of the public, and Mr. Nikisch, who was Mr. Gericke's immediate successor in Boston, is now earning in Europe more than twice the sum each year that Mr. Higginson paid him. The policy of engaging a different conductor for each concert, which was followed for a time in Berlin, and has now become the rule in Vienna, London and other capitals, as well as in New York, has tended to increase the importance of the men who would catch popular attention, not only in the eyes of the directors of concert organizations, but also in their own, and the demands of the 'stars' have gone up proportionately. As an illustration, it is reported that Mr. Safonoff has set his figure as conductor of the Philharmonic Society in New York at $20,000 a year, with a set term of three years. Mr. Weingartner has finished the first portion of an engagement for three terms with the New York Symphony Orchestra and an auxiliary committee, for which he is paid $12,000 for conducting sixteen concerts. It is said that Mr. Mengelberg, of Amsterdam; Mr. Fiedler, of Hamburg, Mr. Schuch, of Dresden, and other European celebrities, when consulted on the subject of an American engagement, all mentioned figures as an annual salary for which the best of their predecessors much less than a generation ago would have gladly worked for nearly a decade."

Such financial expectations, Mr. Krehbiel believes, will have much to do with the choice of Mr. Gericke's successor. "Yet," he continues, "with all its prestige and success in its native city and elsewhere, the Boston Orchestra is not a money-making institution. It cannot be one under existing conditions. The orchestras of Philadelphia, Chicago and Cincinnati and the New York Symphony Orchestra, with its Weingartner attachment, live only because of large contributions by enthusiastic admirers of orchestral music, of the personality of the imported conductor, or of the cities in which they live. The policy successfully carried out for three years by the Philharmonic Society is also dependent upon the public spirit of a few rich men. But this thing cannot go on. Orchestras cannot count on such benefactions forever. The Pittsburg Orchestra seems to be in the throes of dissolution. Under the best of conditions as they have prevailed with reasonable salaries, no orchestra has been self-supporting except the Philharmonic Society, whose members do not depend upon their concerts for a living, but take the proceeds in payment for their services, whether they be $25 or $200 each for the season.

"It is not likely that any of the permanent orchestras in the cities mentioned will ever be freed from the danger of collapse until they become really permanent through the operation of generous and permanent endowments. To meet the growing demands of the 'star' conductors will only hasten the time of dissolution. A conductor, like every other artist, is worth what he can draw. The time is not come as yet when any one of them can take the place in popular admiration of the solo singer and instrumentalist who provides ... variety in concert schemes that ... still crave. This has been ... New York this season ... concerts. If the ... icke, who earned ... ary, is to be ... like those ... will ...

[191]

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
TIMES
WASHINGTON, D. C.
MAR 4 - 1906

Boston Symphony Concert.

The coming concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the National Theater on Tuesday afternoon, March 13, will be the last of this season's series, and additional interest will be lent it by the fact that it will be the last appearance in this city of Mr. Gericke as conductor of the orchestra.

The soloist at this concert will be Henri Marteau, the violinist. He will play a new concerto by Emile Jaques-Dalcroze, a Swiss. The remainder of the program will comprise Weber's overture to "Der Freischeutz;" Goldmark's overture, "Sakuntala," and Richard Strauss' symphonic fantasia, "From Italy."

STAR
WASHINGTON, D. C.
MAR 14 1906

Last Symphony Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its last concert of the season in Washington yesterday at the National Theater. It was also the farewell of Wilhelm Gericke, conductor, who will soon return to Europe. The concert was up to the standard set by the famous musical organization, and the best traditions of the great orchestra were maintained. The audience, large and representative of the music-knowing element of Washington, was raptly attentive to the work of the orchestra and explosively demonstrative at the conclusion of movements and numbers. The band played with the unity of sentiment and poetry of tone which distinguishes the Boston Symphony.

Beethoven's Second Symphony, first on the program, was flawlessly done. It is so familiar to concert patrons that the songs running through it are old friends. The themes, some bold and noble, some graceful and pathetic and some festive, made a strong appeal to the auditory. The larghetto, or second movement, of the symphony is one of the best known Beethoven melodies and it was given with such sentiment and satisfaction that it was enthusiastically applauded. The wood wind choir was especially effective.

The novelty of the program was a concerto by Jacques Dalcroze, for violin and orchestra, the soloist being Henri Marteau. It was the first rendition of this piece in Washington. Marteau played with a superb tone and spectacular virtuosity. The concerto, being new to Washington ears, was not completely grasped, but wherever the melodies rang clearly above the embroidery they were thought beautiful. In the harmonization the composer has been affected by oriental ideas and here and there are touches of barbaric color. Concert Master Willy Hess conducted the concerto. Mr. Marteau was recalled half a dozen times, but declined to play again.

The third number was the Bacchanale from "Tannhauser," and was played with poetry and dash and carried through in a swirling tempo. The last number was the overture to Weber's Der Freischutz," and none of its beauty was lost. Mr. Gericke conducted it from memory.

Cutting Bureau in the World
TIMES
WASHINGTON, D. C.
MAR 14 1906

Last Symphony Proves Event of the Season

Gericke and Marteau Heroes of Musical Occasion That Will Be Long Remembered.

What was probably Wilhelm Gericke's last appearance here as director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra must also go down in the annals of musical Washington as a triumph of art.

The concluding concert of the season in the National yesterday afternoon proved a revelation in several ways. A brilliant and cultured audience sat almost in awe as one number after the other was played with an inspiration which really surpassed in finesse of musical portrayal any other concert of the season. It seemed as though Mr. Gericke was determined that his finale should leave a lasting impression, and there is no doubt it did. An acute reader of Beethoven himself, particularly of the master's earlier works, Mr. Gericke seemed to infuse his band with this same conception. He used every energy to bring out the peculiar sentiment and poetic depth of Beethoven's Second Symphony in D major.

Feature of Concert.

But the feature of the concert was the solo number, when Henri Marteau electrified his audience by his performance of the Jaques-Dalcroze violin concerto in C minor. This is a modern creation, distinctive for its ponderous technical difficulties and amazing in its daring for [illegible] stilted rule. It was [illegible] but he has drunk deeply of the later German theories, not hesitating in reaching for tone color effect at tutti periods. The concerto in the main is built upon modern lines. Trill unison for the strings introduces the first theme. Then in fugal form there is picture work for the wood wind, including a novel obligato in duo form for the fagotto and first oboe. Then a succession of violin runs to which a percussion of brass and tympani replies, and then with a glorious climax the soloist takes up a rippling theme built purely upon harmonics. These are but a few of the ponderous difficulties of the concerto, but, withal, Marteau measured up to every requirement.

The very introduction indicates the intricacies yet to come. A double stop prologue, with G string predominance, marks the future thematic form and its runs, measure to measure, are cadenzic lines. Then follows the romantic phase wherein the horns without transposition picture the solo thought that trombones and orchestral ensemble bring to a somewhat unexpected climax.

Easy for the Artist.

All of these contrapuntal treacheries were like child's play to Marteau. His tone, technique, interpretation, and self-possession were blended beautifully at critical periods, and upon concluding the concerto he was given an ovation. Willy Hess, concert master of the orchestra, directed the accompaniment.

It is to be hoped that Gericke will have a successor as able in the delineation of Beethoven. In directing the Second Symphony he brought every idea of pure organ point into play. One could easily discern how from trio to quintet, and then to regular symphonic form, this splendid but seldom heard composition had been revised by the master. The orchestra concluded with the Bacchanale from "Tannhauser" and the "Freischeutz" overture.

POST
WASHINGTON, D. C
MAR 14 1906

GERICKE BIDDEN FAREWELL

Washington Crowds National Theater at Symphony Concert.

Jaques-Dalcroze's Violin Concert Proves a Novelty to Audience—Some Don't Like It.

Residents of Washington thronged to the fifth and last of the Boston Symphony concerts at the National Theater yesterday afternoon. They went primed to witness society in the boxes and to bid Mr. Gericke a rousing and impressive farewell, on the occasion of his last appearance in this city as conductor of the famous organization.

The audience thought little beforehand of the real event of the concert, the performance of a new violin concerto by E. Jaques-Dalcroze, a Swiss, whose radical departures from accustomed musical form and whose strange juggling with orchestral colors has thrown European critics into a perspiration of controversy.

The violin concerto is full of contrasts. At the beginning everything is grotesque, queer, abrupt. The brasses enter, all playing the same tune roughly. The solo violin plays a queer melody with an odd pizzicato accompaniment. Soon a fugal motive makes its appearance in short, staccato horn notes. There are queer, unusual effects of oboe, combined wood winds, horn, and strings. Then, without warning, they cease and an exquisite romance is played by the solo violin with appropriate accompaniment. This keeps up for a while and then pandemonium breaks loose, only to be replaced by ethereal harmonies on the high flutes and wood winds not less beautiful than the opening measures of "Lohengrin." And so the movement goes forward, always bringing out unexpected novelties.

In the second movement Jaques-Dalcroze proves what has been hitherto unsuspected—that he is able to write good music with very small combinations of instruments. At the opening only the flutes and clarinets accompany the violinist, and at other intervals the French horns, or, perhaps, an English horn and 'cellos will be the only instruments with him. Here the time changes continually. One measure will be in two-four time and the next in three-four. The section follows the mood of the traditional slow movement, and seeks beauty of expression rather than noisiness and drollery. The last measures introducing diaphonous harmonics, which Marteau played faultlessly.

Principal among the other numbers of the programme was the Beethoven Second Symphony, heard too seldom nowadays. In Mr. Gericke's reading of it, there were continual beauties of interpretation.

Society was well represented in the boxes, the President and Mrs. Roosevelt, with Mr. and Mrs. Longworth, occupying one in the lower tier.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
TIMES
WASHINGTON, D. C.
MAR 14 1906

The President and Mrs. Roosevelt had a box at the National Theater yesterday afternoon for the last of the Boston Symphony concerts.

With the President were Mr. and Mrs. Longworth, Mrs. Tuckerman, and Mrs. Lowndes. Mrs. Roosevelt wore a becoming pale blue cloth costume, with a black hat trimmed with roses and blue wings, and Mrs. Longworth an exceedingly smart tan broadcloth gown, and a large hat of the same color, brightened by a long magenta plume at the side.

The house was filled from top to bottom by a large and fashionable audience. Among them were Mrs. Metcalf and Miss Chabot, Mrs. Taft, Senator and Mrs. Lodge, Mrs. John R. McLean and her sister, Mme. Bahkmetieff, Mrs. Richard Harlow, Mr. and Mrs. Pinchot, Miss Morgan, Commodore and Mrs. Miller and the Misses Miller, Miss Violet Langham, the Minister to Norway and Mrs. Peirce, Mrs. Herbert Wadsworth, Mrs. Hobson, Miss Boardman, Mrs. William Slater, Mrs. George Howard, Miss Fannie Fuller, Mrs. Hope Slater, Miss Hagner, Mrs. Bromwell, the Misses Fremont, Mrs. Hobson, Dr. von Kuhlmann, conselor of the German embassy, and Frau von Kuhlmann.

n
STAR
WASHINGTON, D. C.
ress
e
MAR 14 1906

Boston Symphony Quartet.

The Boston Symphony Quartet's final contribution to Washington's present season of music will be made on next Monday week, March 26, when it will give its third and last evening of chamber music in the ball room of the New Willard Hotel. The next concert will bring as the assisting artist Mme. Olga Samaroff, whose playing here with the Philadelphia Orchestra recently made a profound impression on Washington music lovers. With Prof. Willy Hess she will play Richard Strauss' sonata for pianoforte and violin in E flat major, Op. 18. The other works on the program will be Mozart's quartet in C major (K. 465) and Beethoven's quartet in C major, Op. 59, No. 3.

TIMES
WASHINGTON, D. C
MAR 18 1906

Boston Symphony Quartet.

Boston's final contribution to Washington's present season of music will be made on Monday, March 26, when the Boston Symphony Quartet will give its third and last evening of chamber music in the ballroom of the New Willard Hotel.

The concert will bring as the assisting artist Mme. Olga Samaroff, whose playing here with the Philadelphia Orchestra recently made such a profound impression on Washington music lovers. With Prof. Willy Hess she will play Richard Strauss' sonata for pianoforte and violin in E flat major, op. 18. The other works on the program will be Mozart's quartet in C major (K 465), and Bethoven's quartet in C major, op. 59, No. 3.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
AMERICA
n ress BALTIMORE MD
FEB 27 1906
e

Wilhelm Gericke has resigned as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, his resignation to take effect at the end of the present season. He will return to Europe. Mr. Gericke was conductor of the Symphony Orchestra from 1884 to 1889, and from 1898 until the present time.

HERALD
MAR 1 - 1906

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The fifth and last Boston Symphony concert of the season will be given at the Lyric Wednesday evening, March 14, at 8.15 o'clock. This concert will gain greatly in interest since it will mark the farewell appearance in Baltimore of Mr. Gericke as conductor of the orchestra. Mr. Gericke has announced his intention of retiring from active life at the end of this season, and will return to his native Austria, where he will enjoy a well-earned rest after continuous labors of over forty years. Undoubtedly his many Baltimore admirers will turn out in full force to bid him God-speed.

A most attractive program has been arranged. The soloist will be the violinist, Henri Marteau, who has not been heard here for several years. He will introduce to Baltimore a new violin concerto by the Swiss, Emile Jaques-Dalcroze. The orchestral numbers will be Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture, Claude Debussy's exquisite tone-picture "Apres Midi d'un Faun" and finally Schubert's great C major symphony. Seats are on sale at Albaugh's.

om
dress
te
NEWS
BALTIMORE MD
MAR 3 - 19

LAST SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mr. Gericke Will Lead Orchestra For Last Time Here.

The fifth and last Boston Symphony concert of the season will be given in the Lyric on Wednesday evening at 8.15 o'clock. This concert will gain greatly in interest since it will mark the farewell appearance in Baltimore of Mr. Gericke as conductor of the Orchestra. Mr. Gericke has announced his intention of retiring from active life at the end of this season, and will return to his native Austria, where he will enjoy a well-earned rest after continuous labors of over 40 years.

A most attractive programme has been arranged. The soloist will be the distinguished violinist, Henri Marteau, who has not been heard here for several years. He will introduce to Baltimore a new violin concerto by the Swiss, Emile Jacques-Dalcroze. The orchestral numbers will be Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture, Claude Debussy's exquisite tone-picture, "Apres Midi d'un Faun," and finally Schubert's great C major symphony.

STAR
ss
MAR 4 - 1906

MR. GERICKE'S SUCCESSOR.

Much Speculation As to the New Boston Leader.

Writers on musical topics are speculating about Mr. Gericke's successor. One has predicted Weingartner, apparently because he is the most eminent conductor who has visited America; and another chooses Dr. Muck, of the Berlin opera, because he will soon be disengaged. Others prefer, more wisely, to survey the field and consider the conditions which are likely to influence the choice. One of these, beyond doubt, is the steady increase, actual and expected, in conductors' salaries. Of this "rising market," and of its influence upon orchestral music in America, Mr. Krehbiel writes very sensibly in the New York Tribune as follows:

"When Mr. Gericke came to America his salary was looked upon in some circles as princely, and there were few conductors in Europe who did not envy him his position. But a great change has taken place since then. Conductors have become 'star' performers in the eyes of the public, and Mr. Nikisch, who was Mr. Gericke's immediate successor in Boston, is now earning in Europe more than twice the sum each year that Mr. Higginson paid him. The policy of engaging a different conductor for each concert, which was followed for a time in Berlin, and has now become the rule in Vienna, London and other capitals, as well as in New York, has tended to increase the importance of the men who would catch popular attention, not only in the eyes of the directors of concert organizations, but also in their own, and the demands of the 'stars' have gone up proportionately. As an illustration, it is reported that Mr. Safonoff has set his figure as conductor of the Philharmonic Society in New York at $20,000 a year, with a set term of three years. Mr. Weingartner has finished the first portion of an engagement for three terms with the New York Symphony Orchestra and an auxiliary committee, for which he is paid $12,000 for conducting sixteen concerts. It is said that Mr. Mengelberg, of Amsterdam; Mr. Fiedler, of Hamburg, Mr. Schuch, of Dresden, and other European celebrities, when consulted on the subject of an American engagement, all mentioned figures as an annual salary for which the best of their predecessors much less than a generation ago would have gladly worked for nearly a decade."

Such financial expectations, Mr. Krehbiel believes, will have much to do with the choice of Mr. Gericke's successor. "Yet," he continues, "with all its prestige and success in its native city and elsewhere, the Boston Orchestra is not a money-making institution. It cannot be one under existing conditions. The orchestras of Philadelphia, Chicago and Cincinnati and the New York Symphony Orchestra, with its Weingartner attachment, live only because of large contributions by enthusiastic admirers of orchestral music, of the personality of the imported conductor, or of the cities in which they live. The policy successfully carried out for three years by the Philharmonic Society is also dependent upon the public spirit of a few rich men. But this thing cannot go on. Orchestras cannot count on such benefactions forever. The Pittsburg Orchestra seems to be in the throes of dissolution. Under the best of conditions as they have prevailed with reasonable salaries, no orchestra has been self-supporting except the Philharmonic Society, whose members do not depend upon their concerts for a living, but take the proceeds in payment for their services, whether they be $25 or $200 each for the season.

"It is not likely that any of the permanent orchestras in the cities mentioned will ever be freed from the danger of collapse until they become really permanent through the operation of generous and permanent endowments. To meet the growing demands of the 'star' conductors will only hasten the time of dissolution. A conductor, like every other artist, is worth what he can draw. The time is not come as yet when any one of them can take the place in popular admiration of the solo singer and instrumentalist who provides the variety in concert schemes that audiences still crave. This has been demonstrated in New York this season with Weingartner's concerts. If the successor of Mr. Gericke, who earned every cent of his salary, is to be a high-priced 'star,' days like those of Mr. Higginson's early trials will return to that generous [illegible]

[191]

SUN
BALTIMORE, MD.
MAR 7- 190

CUP FOR MR. GERICKE

Baltimoreans To Honor Director Of Boston Symphony Orchestra.

A movement is on foot to purchase a silver loving cup to be presented March 14 to Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, the director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, when he will make his last appearance in this city before his retirement, which he has recently announced. A committee has been appointed to collect $1 subscriptions for the cup. The committee consists of:

Mrs.—
J. Hemsley Johnson, Harold Randolph,
Elliott Schenck, James M. Thompson,
Jesse Tyson,
Miss Lurman.

A circular letter has been sent to each of the subscribers to the Symphony concerts, stating that subscriptions should be sent to Mrs. J. Hemsley Johnson, 202 West Monument street.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
HERALD
BALTIMORE, MD.
MAR 7- 1906

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The concert season of 1905-1906 will be brought to an end next Wednesday evening, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its fifth and last concert in the Lyric. It is probable that one of the largest audiences of the season will attend the concert, not only because it is the last one of the season, but because it will be the last concert with Mr. Gericke as conductor of the orchestra. In the many years that he has been coming to Baltimore, during his former term of office as conductor and in the last eight seasons, he has won the admiration and support of a great body of Baltimore music lovers, who will keenly regret his going. Yet it is well recognized that his long years of service have earned for him a rest, and when he returns to his native Austria he will carry with him a multitude of good wishes.

The soloist at this concert will be Henri Marteau, now an artist of fully developed power and one of the great violinists of the world. When Mr. Marteau first came to this country, a mere lad, he gave promise of very substantial achievement in the world of art. Now it can truthfully be said that he has arrived and has fulfilled all the promise of his early years. An indefatigable worker, a profoundly learned musician, he is one of those fortunate artists who find united in them the best traits of two great musical nations. From his father, a Frenchman, he inherited the elegance, the feeling for proportion and form and the faultless taste of the French. From his mother, a German, he inherited the depth of feeling, the true sentiment, the thoroughness and the soundness of the German.

Not one of the least admirable traits of Mr. Marteau has been his effort to bring forward new composers and new music. No violinist has done so much for unknown men as he, and to his credit must be laid some of the most interesting works recently added to the literature of the violin. One of these is a concerto by his colleague in the Geneva Conservatory, Emile Jaques-Dalcroze, the professor of harmony in that institution, and this he will play here.

The symphony is one of the greatest of all times—Schubert's No. 7, in C major. Then there will be Claude Debussy's exquisite tone picture "The Afternoon of a Faun." The whole program will be as follows:

Goldmark—Overture, "Sakuntala."
Jaques-Dalcroze—Concerto for violin (first time).
Debussy—"L'Apres-Midi d'un Faun."
Schubert—Symphony No. 7 in C major.

NEWS
BALTIMORE, MD.
MAR 10 1906

LAST SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mr. Gericke Will Lead Boston Orchestra For Final Time.

The musical season of 1905-1906 will be brought practically to an end on next Wednesday, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its fifth and last concert at the Lyric. It is probable that one of the largest audiences of the season will attend the concert, not only because it is the last one of the season, but because it will be the last concert with Mr. Gericke as conductor of the Orchestra. In the many years that he has been coming to Baltimore, during his former term of office as conductor and in the last eight seasons, he has won the admiration and support of a great body of Baltimore music-lovers, who will keenly regret his going. The soloist at this concert will be Henri Marteau, now an artist of fully developed power and one of the great violinists of the world.

The programme will be as follows:

Overture, "Sakuntala" ..... Goldmark
Concerto for violin (first time) .....
Apres Midi d'un Faun ..... Jaques-Dalcroze
Symphony No. 7, in C major ..... Debussy
Solo artist, Mr. Henri Marteau. ..... Schubert

First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
AMERICAN
BALTIMORE, MD.
MAR 4- 1906

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The fifth and last Boston Symphony concert of the season will be given in the Lyric on Wednesday evening, March 14, at 8:15 o'clock. This concert will gain greatly in interest since it marks the farewell appearance in Baltimore of Mr. Gericke as conductor of the orchestra. Mr. Gericke has announced his intention of retiring from active life at the end of this season and will return to his native Austria, where he will enjoy a well-earned rest after continuous labors of over 40 years. A most attractive program has been arranged. The soloist will be the distinguished violinist, Henri Marteau.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
AMERICAN
From
Address
BALTIMORE, MD.
MAR 11 1906

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Next Wednesday evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its fifth and last concert in the Lyric. It is probable that one of the largest audiences of the season will attend the concert, not only because it is the last one of the season, but because it will be the last concert with Mr. Gericke as conductor of the orchestra. In the many years that he has been coming to Baltimore, during his former term of office as conductor and in the last eight seasons, he has won the admiration and support of a great body of Baltimore music-lovers who will keenly regret his going. Yet it is well recognized that his long years of service have earned for him a rest, and when he returns to his native Austria he will carry with him a multitude of good wishes.

The soloist at this concert will be Henri Marteau, now an artist of fully developed power and one of the great violinists of the world. Not one of the least admirable traits of Mr. Marteau has been his effort to bring forward new composers and new music. No violinist has done so much for unknown men as he, and to his credit must be laid some of the most interesting works recently added to the literature of the violin. One of these is a concerto by his colleague in the Geneva Conservatory, Emile Jaques-Dalcroze, the professor of harmony in that institution, and this he will play here.

The program is as follows:

Goldmark—
Overture, "Sakuntala."
Jaques-Dalcroze—
Concerto for violin (first time).
Debussy—
"L'Apres-Midi d'un Faun."
Schubert—
Symphony, No. 7, in C major.
Solo artist, Mr. Henri Marteau.

SUN.
BALTIMORE, MD.
MAR 4- 1906

WHO IN GERICKE'S PLACE?

Vacant Post Is One Of Rare Influence In Music.

WORLD'S GREAT CONDUCTORS

Weingartner, Safonoff And Mengelberg Are Among The Most Inspiring Living, Says Mr. Turnbull.

The resignation of Wilhelm Gericke, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for a period of about 13 years, leaves vacant a post of rare influence and fame in the musical world.

Most critics pronounce this orchestra the finest in existence today, and occupying as it does the center of the musical stage in the New World, the inducement offered to a great conductor to wield the baton over this superb body of musicians is, indeed, a very strong one.

Mr. Gericke is one of the great conductors of the world, but not the greatest, as there are other conducotrs in Europe who are gifted with far more personality and magnetism and a better understanding of the very indispensable art of making programs.

Among these great magicians of the baton may be mentioned Felix Weingartner, Felix Mottl, Hans Richter, Carl Muck, Ernst von Schuch, Richard Strauss and Arthur Nikisch, of Germany; Wassili Safonoff, of Moscow; Victor Colonne, of Paris; Henry Wood, of London, and Willem Mengelberg, of Amsterdam.

If the management of the Boston Symphony is fortunate enough to secure one of these men, and especially Weingartner, Safonoff or Mengelberg, three of the most inspiring conductors in the world, then shall we hear the Boston Symphony at its best. The greatest orchestra in the world deserves the greatest conductor.

HERALD
BALTIMORE, MD.
MAR 13 1906

PUNCH FOR MR. GERICKE

Punch Bowl, Salver and Ladle to Be Given to Retiring Leader of Boston Orchestra.

HIS LAST CONCERT HERE

Event Tomorrow Night Will Be Marked by Presentation of Gift by Baltimore Admirers.

Baltimore music lovers and admirers of Mr. Gericke, the retiring director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, have responded most generously to the opportunity offered them to contribute toward a substantial testimonial of appreciation to be presented to him tomorrow evening at his last appearance in Baltimore as the leader of that great orchestra.

The committee in charge have purchased from Stieff & Co., silversmiths, a handsome repousse silver salver, punch bowl and ladle, with the following inscription on the bowl:

TO WILLIAM GERICKE
In Token of Appreciation from
His Admirers in Baltimore.
March 14, 1906.

The gift will be presented by Mr. Harold Randolph, director of the Peabody Conservatory of Music, during the intermission at the concert.

Mr. Gericke Popular Here.

Mr. Gericke is the most popular leader with Baltimoreans the orchestra has ever had. He was born in Gratz, Styria, sixty-one years ago, and is a soundly educated musician. He studied in the Vienna conservatory and was a conductor of various musical organizations from 1865 to 1874, in the latter year becoming leader of the Vienna Hofoper. He was then engaged for the Boston orchestra. He reorganized the orchestra and put it upon the best basis. Since then it has steadily improved, until now it is regarded as the best orchestra in this country and the equal probably of any in the world.

The men are well paid. The rank and file are for the most part under annual contracts for a season of twenty-nine weeks (of which twenty-four are devoted to the Boston concerts and five to traveling) at a salary of from $30 to $35 a week upward. The chief players—the first violin, or concert master, and some of the other best violinists, the first 'cellist, the first performers on other instruments—receive more—up to an annual salary of $5000, with engagements of several years. Some receive weekly salaries of various amounts guaranteed for various periods of time beyond the regular season, sometimes as long as forty-five weeks in the year.

Received $10,000 a Year.

The conductors have received salaries of about $8000 or $10,000. It is understood that Mr. Gericke's salary is the latter figure.

Mr. Gericke is known to be a great drillmaster and a leader of powerful individuality.

HERALD
From
Address
BALTIMORE,
To
MAR 13 1906

Final Concert Here

Mr. Wilhelm Gericke

Mr. Gericke will be seen as director of the Boston Symphony for the last time tomorrow night. His admirers have raised a fund with which has been purchased a handsome silver tribute which will be presented during the evening.

HERALD
BALTIMORE, MD.
MAR 15 190

The Boston Symphony Orchestra
The fifth and last concert for the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last night at the Lyric, and consisting of Goldmark's overture, "Sakuntala," a violin concerto by Jaques-Dalcroze, the prelude to Stephane Mallarme's Eclogue, "The Afternoon of a Faun," by Debussy, and Schubert's symphony in C major, No. 7, Mr. Henri Marteau was the soloist.

While the concert of last evening was the last one of this season, it marked a very crucial epoch in the history of the organization, being the last appearance of the orchestra here with Mr. Gericke as conductor. As a token of the appreciation and esteem in which Mr. Gericke is held by local music lovers a souvenir was presented to him, the offering being made by Mr. Harold Randolph, who in a very happy speech voiced the sentiments of the public. He said, and very truly, that Mr. Gericke it was who had brought the orchestra to its present state of perfection and had taught Baltimoreans the possibilities of which a highly trained orchestra was capable.

Now, although Mr. Gericke's reading of certain works has been open to criticism on the score of an occasional chilliness, a want of sufficient warmth and fire, an inclination to depreciate the value of great climaxes, it is beyond doubt that he has imbued the men with a spirit of absolute refinement in their playing, with a delicacy and yet withal with a certain vigor, always healthy in interpretation, with a keen sense of tone color and perfect balance, and, above all, with a true perception of the scholarly in music. Program making has not been the strongest point of the Gericke regime, nevertheless many new works and works which otherwise might never have been heard in Baltimore have been presented, and in the most acceptable manner possible.

Mr. Gericke's retirement is not alone a loss to the organization, but a national loss, seeing that the Boston Symphony Orchestra acts and has acted as an instructive body wherever it has played. Without Mr. Gericke the orchestra, from a matter of sentiment, will not seem the same, but from a musical point of view it will be exceedingly difficult to find a competent successor who will adequately fill his place, possessing not only his musicianly ability, but also his absolute control over the orchestra, a control which, while it is felt by the players, is exercised with so much judgment and good taste that it does not intrude itself by ungainly contortions. In a word, Mr. Gericke is the acme of a polite, refined and perfect conductor, and it is much to be regretted that his work is at an end.

The Goldmark overture received a finished and thoroughly musical interpretation. Melodious throughout, not a measure without its individual interest, the composition appealed alike to the conductor and audience.

The violin concerto was just the opposite. It is a work that seems to have for its ulterior aim and object nothing but a technical display for the violin. Melodic inventiveness was conspicuous by its absence. Notes there were in abundance, and yet with all the notes it seems strange that not a melody was evolved therefrom. A subject there was in the first movement that was treated contrapuntally, but the strain that impressed the hearer chiefly was monotony. Monotony, which is the bane of all musical composition, certainly played the leading role in the entire concerto. The first movement was in minor, and the second commenced also in the minor mode. After the overture, which immediately preceded it, the contrast was painfully striking.

Mr. Henri Marteau was the soloist, and why he chose to play the work is best known to himself. As he has studied it and knows it, possibly he sees beauties that lie very deeply hidden, and which are certainly not perceptible on first hearing.

As a violinist, he possesses a strong, clear tone and true intonation, but as far as his artistic conceptions are concerned, it is impossible to judge from his playing of a work containing material of so little interest.

The Debussy work, although essentially modern, is full of interesting episodes. Melody and rich harmonic combinations are never wanting, and the work may be classed as one well worth hearing a second time.

The lengthy but ever melodious Schubert was splendidly interpreted and brought to a successful termination the Boston Orchestra's concerts for this season.

The hall was packed to give Mr. Gericke a cordial reception, and the only thing that marred the complete enjoyment of the audience was the fact that many ladies, doubtless to attract Mr. Gericke's attention, sat the entire concert through with enormous headgear on their heads, utterly oblivious to the inconvenience they were causing to those behind them.

W. G. O.

SUN
BALTIMORE, MD.
MAR 11 1906

The musical season of 1905-1906 will be brought practically to an end Wednesday evening when the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its fifth and last concert for the season at the Lyric. It is probable that one of the largest audiences of the season will attend, not only because it will be the last concert of the season, but because it will be the concluding concert with Mr. Gericke as conductor of the orchestra.

The soloist will be Henri [illegible] an artist of fully developed [illegible] of the great violinists of the world.

Overture—"Sakuntala" .....
Concerto for violin (first time) .....
L'Apres-Midi d'un Faun .....
Symphony .....

[192]

SUN
MAR 7- 190

CUP FOR MR. GERICKE

Baltimoreans To Honor Director Of Boston Symphony Orchestra.

A movement is on foot to purchase a silver loving cup to be presented March 14 to Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, the director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, when he will make his last appearance in this city before his retirement, which he has recently announced. A committee has been appointed to collect $1 subscriptions for the cup. The committee consists of:

Mrs.—
J. Hemsley Johnson, Elliott Schenck, Jesse Tyson, Miss Lurman, Harold Randolph, James M. Thompson.

A circular letter has been sent to each of the subscribers to the Symphony concerts, stating that subscriptions should be sent to Mrs. J. Hemsley Johnson, 202 West Monument street.

...Cutting Bureau in the World

1906
MAR

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The concert season of 1905-1906 will be brought to an end next Wednesday evening, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its fifth and last concert in the Lyric. It is probable that one of the largest audiences of the season will attend the concert, not only because it is the last one of the season, but because it will be the last concert with Mr. Gericke as conductor of the orchestra. In the many years that he has been coming to Baltimore, during his former term of office as conductor and in the last eight seasons, he has won the admiration and support of a great body of Baltimore music lovers, who will keenly regret his going. Yet it is well recognized that his long years of service have earned for him a rest, and when he returns to his native Austria he will carry with him a multitude of good wishes.

The soloist at this concert will be Henri Marteau, now an artist of fully developed power and one of the great violinists of the world. When Mr. Marteau first came to this country, a mere lad, he gave promise of very substantial achievement in the world of art. Now it can truthfully be said that he has arrived and has fulfilled all the promise of his early years. An indefatigable worker, a profoundly learned musician, he is one of those fortunate artists who find united in them the best traits of two great musical nations. From his father, a Frenchman, he inherited the elegance, the feeling for proportion and form and the faultless taste of the French. From his mother, a German, he inherited the depth of feeling, the true sentiment, the thoroughness and the soundness of the German.

Not one of the least admirable traits of Mr. Marteau has been his effort to bring forward new composers and new music. No violinist has done so much for unknown men as he, and to his credit must be laid some of the most interesting works recently added to the literature of the violin. One of these is a concerto by his colleague in the Geneva Conservatory, Emile Jaques-Dalcroze, the professor of harmony in that institution, and this he will play here.

The symphony is one of the greatest of all times—Schubert's No. 7, in C major. Then there will be Claude Debussy's exquisite tone picture "The Afternoon of a Faun." The whole program will be as follows:

Goldmark—Overture, "Sakuntala."
Jaques-Dalcroze—Concerto for Violin (first time).
Debussy—"L'Apres-Midi d'un Faun."
Schubert—Symphony No. 7 in C major.

1906

LAST SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mr. Gericke Will Lead Boston Orchestra For Final Time.

The musical season of 1905-1906 will be brought practically to an end on next Wednesday, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its fifth and last concert at the Lyric. It is probable that one of the largest audiences of the season will attend the concert, not only because it is the last one of the season, but because it will be the last concert with Mr. Gericke as conductor of the Orchestra. In the many years that he has been coming to Baltimore, during his former term of office as conductor and in the last eight seasons, he has won the admiration and support of a great body of Baltimore music-lovers, who will keenly regret his going. The soloist at this concert will be Henri Marteau, now an artist of fully developed power and one of the great violinists of the world.

The programme will be as follows:

Overture, "Sakuntala" ..... Goldmark
Concerto for violin (first time) ..... Jaques-Dalcroze
Apres Midi d'un Faun ..... Debussy
Symphony No. 7, in C major ..... Schubert
Solo artist, Mr. Henri Marteau.

rst Established and Most Complete aper Cutting Bureau in the World
AMERICAN.
BALTIMORE, MD
MAR 4- 1906

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The fifth and last Boston Symphony concert of the season will be given in the Lyric on Wednesday evening, March 14, at 8:15 o'clock. This concert will gain greatly in interest since it marks the farewell appearance in Baltimore of Mr. Gericke as conductor of the orchestra. Mr. Gericke has announced his intention of retiring from active life at the end of this season and will return to his native Austria, where he will enjoy a well-earned rest after continuous labors of over 40 years. A most attractive program has been arranged. The soloist will be the distinguished violinist, Henri Marteau.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the ...

rom AMERICAN
ddress
MAR 11 190

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Next Wednesday evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its fifth and last concert in the Lyric. It is probable that one of the largest audiences of the season will attend the concert, not only because it is the last one of the season, but because it will be the last concert with Mr. Gericke as conductor of the orchestra. In the many years that he has been coming to Baltimore, during his former term of office as conductor and in the last eight seasons, he has won the admiration and support of a great body of Baltimore music-lovers who will keenly regret his going. Yet it is well recognized that his long years of service have earned for him a rest, and when he returns to his native Austria he will carry with him a multitude of good wishes.

The soloist at this concert will be Henri Marteau, now an artist of fully developed power and one of the great violinists of the world. Not one of the least admirable traits of Mr. Marteau has been his effort to bring forward new composers and new music. No violinist has done so much for unknown men as he, and to his credit must be laid some of the most interesting works recently added to the literature of the violin. One of these is a concerto by his colleague in the Geneva Conservatory, Emile Jaques-Dalcroze, the professor of harmony in that institution, and this he will play here.

The program is as follows:

Goldmark—
Overture, "Sakuntala."
Jaques-Dalcroze—
Concerto for violin (first time).
Debussy—
"L'Apres-Midi d'un Faun."
Schubert—
Symphony, No. 7, in C major.
Solo artist, Mr. Henri Marteau.

1906

WHO IN GERICKE'S PLACE?

Vacant Post Is One Of Rare Influence In Music.

WORLD'S GREAT CONDUCTORS

Weingartner, Safonoff And Mengelberg Are Among The Most Inspiring Living, Says Mr. Turnbull

The resignation of Wilhelm Gericke, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for a period of about 13 years, leaves vacant a post of rare influence and fame in the musical world.

Most critics pronounce this orchestra the finest in existence today, and occupying as it does the center of the musical stage in the New World, the inducement offered to a great conductor to wield the baton over this superb body of musicians is, indeed, a very strong one.

Mr. Gericke is one of the great conductors of the world, but not the greatest, as there are other conducotrs in Europe who are gifted with far more personality and magnetism and a better understanding of the very indispensable art of making programs.

Among these great magicians of the baton may be mentioned Felix Weingartner, Felix Mottl, Hans Richter, Carl Muck, Ernst von Schuch, Richard Strauss and Arthur Nikisch, of Germany; Wassili Safonoff, of Moscow; Victor Colonne, of Paris; Henry Wood, of London, and Willem Mengelberg, of Amsterdam.

If the management of the Boston Symphony is fortunate enough to secure one of these men, and especially Weingartner, Safonoff or Mengelberg, three of the most inspiring conductors in the world, then shall we hear the Boston Symphony at its best. The greatest orchestra in the world deserves the greatest conductor.

HERALD
BALTIMORE, M
MAR 13 1906

SILVER FOR MR. GERICKE

Punch Bowl, Salver and Ladle to Be Given to Retiring Leader of Boston Orchestra.

HIS LAST CONCERT HERE

Event Tomorrow Night Will Be Marked by Presentation of Gift by Baltimore Admirers.

Baltimore music lovers and admirers of Mr. Gericke, the retiring director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, have responded most generously to the opportunity offered them to contribute toward a substantial testimonial of appreciation to be presented to him tomorrow evening at his last appearance in Baltimore as the leader of that great orchestra.

The committee in charge have purchased from Stieff & Co., silversmiths, a handsome repousse silver salver, punch bowl and ladle, with the following inscription on the bowl:

TO WILLIAM GERICKE
In Token of Appreciation from
His Admirers in Baltimore.
March 14, 1906.

The gift will be presented by Mr. Harold Randolph, director of the Peabody Conservatory of Music, during the intermission at the concert.

Mr. Gericke Popular Here.

Mr. Gericke is the most popular leader with Baltimoreans the orchestra has ever had. He was born in Gratz, Styria, sixty-one years ago, and is a soundly educated musician. He studied in the Vienna conservatory and was a conductor of various musical organizations from 1865 to 1874, in the latter year becoming leader of the Vienna Hofoper. He was then engaged for the Boston orchestra. He reorganized the orchestra and put it upon the best basis. Since then it has steadily improved, until now it is regarded as the best orchestra in this country and the equal probably of any in the world.

The men are well paid. The rank and file are for the most part under annual contracts for a season of twenty-nine weeks (of which twenty-four are devoted to the Boston concerts and five to traveling) at a salary of from $30 to $35 a week upward. The chief players—the first violin, or concert master, and some of the other best violinists, the first 'cellist, the first performers on other instruments—receive more—up to an annual salary of $5000, with engagements of several years. Some receive weekly salaries of various amounts guaranteed for various periods of time beyond the regular season, sometimes as long as forty-five weeks in the year.

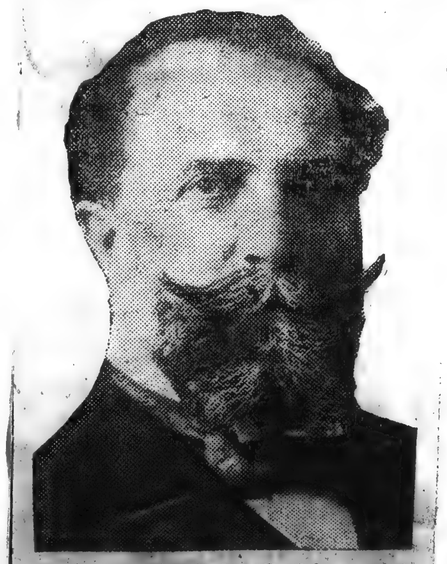
Reeeived $10,000 a Year.

The conductors have received salaries of about $8000 or $10,000. It is understood that Mr. Gericke's salary is the latter figure.

Mr. Gericke is known to be a great drillmaster and a leader of powerful individuality.

m HERALD
BALTIMORE
iress
te 1906

Final Concert Here



Mr. Wilhelm Gericke

Mr. Gericke will be seen as director of the Boston Symphony for the last time tomorrow night. His admirers have raised a fund with which has been purchased a handsome silver tribute which will be presented during the evening.

HERALD
BALTIMORE, MD.
MAR 15 190

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The fifth and last concert for this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last night at the Lyric, the program consisting of Goldmark's Overture to "Sakuntala," a violin concerto by Jacques-Dalcroze, the prelude to Stephane Mallarme's Eclogue, "The Afternoon of a Faun," by Debussy, and Schubert's Symphony in C major, No. 7, Mr. Henri Marteau was the soloist.

While the concert of last evening was the last one of this season, it marked a very crucial epoch in the history of the organization, being the last appearance of the orchestra here with Mr. Gericke as conductor. As a token of the appreciation and esteem in which Mr. Gericke is held by local music lovers a souvenir was presented to him, the offering being made by Mr. Harold Randolph, who in a very happy speech voiced the sentiments of the public. He said, and very truly, that Mr. Gericke it was who had brought the orchestra to its present state of perfection and had taught Baltimoreans the possibilities of which a highly trained orchestra was capable.

Now, although Mr. Gericke's reading of certain works has been open to criticism on the score of an occasional chilliness, a want of sufficient warmth and fire, an inclination to depreciate the value of great climaxes, it is beyond doubt that he has imbued the men with a spirit of absolute refinement in their playing, with a delicacy and yet withal with a certain vigor, always healthy in interpretation, with a keen sense of tone color and perfect balance, and, above all, with a true perception of the scholarly in music. Program making has not been the strongest point of the Gericke regime, nevertheless many new works and works which otherwise might never have been heard in Baltimore have been presented, and in the most acceptable manner possible.

Mr. Gericke's retirement is not alone a loss to the organization, but a national loss, seeing that the Boston Symphony Orchestra acts and has acted as an instructive body wherever it has played. Without Mr. Gericke the orchestra, from a matter of sentiment, will not seem the same, but from a musical point of view it will be exceedingly difficult to find a competent successor who will adequately fill his place, possessing not only his musicianly ability, but also his absolute control over the orchestra, a control which, while it is felt by the players, is exercised with so much judgment and good taste that it does not intrude itself by ungainly contortions. In a word, Mr. Gericke is the acme of a polite, refined and perfect conductor, and it is much to be regretted that his work is at an end.

The Goldmark overture received a finished and thoroughly musical interpretation. Melodious throughout, not a measure without its individual interest, the composition appealed alike to the conductor and audience.

The violin concerto was just the opposite. It is a work that seems to have for its ulterior aim and object nothing but a technical display for the violin. Melodic inventiveness was conspicuous by its absence. Notes there were in abundance, and yet with all the notes it seems strange that not a melody was evolved therefrom. A subject there was in the first movement that was treated contrapuntally, but the strain that impressed the hearer chiefly was monotony. Monotony, which is the bane of all musical composition, certainly played the leading role in the entire concerto. The first movement was in minor, and the second commenced also in the minor mode. After the overture, which immediately preceded it, the contrast was painfully striking.

Mr. Henri Marteau was the soloist, and why he chose to play the work is best known to himself. As he has studied it and knows it, possibly he sees beauties that lie very deeply hidden, and which are certainly not perceptible on first hearing.

As a violinist, he possesses a strong, clear tone and true intonation, but as far as his artistic conceptions are concerned, it is impossible to judge from his playing of a work containing material of so little interest.

The Debussy work, although essentially modern, is full of interesting episodes. Melody and rich harmonic combinations are never wanting, and the work may be classed as one well worth hearing a second time.

The lengthy but ever melodious Schubert was splendidly interpreted and brought to a successful termination the Boston Orchestra's concerts for this season.

The hall was packed to give Mr. Gericke a cordial reception, and the only thing that marred the complete enjoyment of the audience was the fact that many ladies, doubtless to attract Mr. Gericke's attention, sat the entire concert through with enormous headgear on their heads, utterly oblivious to the inconvenience they were causing to those behind them.

W. G. O.

Newspaper ... SUN
BALTIMORE, MD.
MAR 11 1906

Last Boston Symphony Concert.

The musical season of 1905-1906 will be brought practically to an end Wednesday evening when the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its fifth and last concert for the season at the Lyric. It is probable that one of the largest audiences of the season will attend, not only because it will be the last concert of the season, but because it will be the concluding event with Mr. Gericke as conductor of the orchestra.

The soloist will be Henri Marteau, now an artist of fully developed power and one of the great violinists of the world.

Overture—"Sakuntala" ..... Goldmark
Concerto for violin (first time) ..... Jaques-Dalcroze
"L'Apres-Midi d'un Faun" ..... Debussy
Symphony No. 7 in C ...
Solo Artist—Mr. Henri Marteau

[192]

BALTIMORE, MD
NEWS
MAR 14 1906

FAMOUS CONDUCTOR COMES TO BALTIMORE FOR LAST TIME.

Will Spend Remainder Of His Life In Vienna—Schubert's Symphony Tonight.

When the final note of Schubert's Symphony No. 7 has been played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyric tonight, Baltimore probably will have had its last glimpse of Wilhelm Gericke, the Orchestra's famous conductor. After the present season Gericke goes back to Vienna, whence he came to Boston more than 20 years ago, to spend the remainder of his life in less strenuous work than keeping the Hub's great organization up to the standard it has set for itself.

Gericke is 61 years old, and one of the world's famous conductors. He is very much of a martinet in his methods, keen and commanding, and the technical excellence of the Boston organization is unquestionably due more to him than any other man. The "human metronome" they used to call him, because of the absolute precision of his reading of scores, but through it he achieved that perfect ensemble work and great brilliancy which mark the playing of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

It was in 1884 that Gericke first took up his work in Boston; in 1889 he went back to Vienna in impaired health. Nikisch followed him, and gained a great reputation from his emotional handling of the orchestra which Gericke had made technically perfect. Paur followed Nikisch, staying until 1898, when Gericke came to his own again. These and Georg Henschel, who preceded Gericke, are the only leaders the Orchestra has had in its quarter-century of existence. The great Orchestra has never played better than it has in these last few years.

This is the programme that will be presented tonight, Henri Marteau being the solo violinist:

Overture, "Sakuntala".....Goldmark
Concerto for violin.....Jaques-Dalcroze
L'Apres Midi d'un Faun.....Debussy
Symphony No. 7, in C major....Schubert

Mr. Gericke will spend the summer in France and Switzerland, and will make his home in Vienna thereafter. He has made no definite plans for his musical work in the future, but proposes to take things quietly. His successor with the Boston Orchestra has not yet been determined upon, although Weingartner, Richter, Henry Wood and others of the great conductors of the world have been mentioned in connection with the position.

ST. LOUIS
BALTIMORE, MD
MAR 15 1906

PUNCHBOWL FOR MR. GERICKE

Last Appearance Here As Leader Of Boston Symphony.

The farewell appearance in Baltimore last evening of Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who recently resigned as the head of that organization and who will return to Europe, was marked by the presentation by a number of Baltimore music lovers of a handsome silver punchbowl. Incidentally Mr. Gericke was accorded an ovation the heartiness and enthusiasm of which has seldom characterized a similar occasion in this city.

The presentation was made by Mr. Harold Randolph, director of the Peabody Conservatory of Music, at the conclusion of the second number.

In offering the token Mr. Randolph said:

"It was you, Mr. Gericke, who first brought this wonderful orchestra to Baltimore, and it is to you that we are indebted for the marvelous state of perfection that the organization has attained. We have come to deeply appreciate your work, for it has taught us much; in fact, we have learned more through you and your orchestra than from any other source, and we again thank you for the high standard of perfection you have set. It is with profound and sincere regret that we have you before us tonight for the last time. You will accept this token in the name of the music-loving public of Baltimore and carry it with you as an honor wherever you go.

"Had we known earlier that this was to be your last appearance here we could probably have given a better token of our appreciation—not a more appropriate one to you, but one more characteristic of us."

Mr. Gericke was deeply moved by the presentation, which, it is said, came as a complete surprise to him, and it was several moments before he was able to respond.

In accepting the bowl he said:

"I thank you for this from the bottom of my heart. During my frequent visits here I have always noted the thoroughly musical atmosphere of Baltimore and have always been received by appreciative audiences. I sincerely regret that this is my last visit to Baltimore."

Hearty and prolonged applause followed Mr. Gericke's little address and he was obliged to bow many times in acknowledgment.

The program given by the orchestra, which was perhaps the best of the series, was as follows:

"Sakuntala," Op. 13.....Goldmark
Concerto for violin and orchestra (Op. 50. First time here).....Jaques-Dalcroze [illegible] Marteau, violinist, was the soloist. Goldmark overture, the first of the composer's important works, was given in a manner that could but add to its popularity.

The work is characteristic of the modern school of writing and the Goldmark temperament, but rich in beautiful harmony.

In the Jackues-Delcroze concerto Mr. Marteau demonstrated what a fine violinist he is. His work is that of the mature soloist, convincing and technically perfect, especially as to his double stops, in which the first movement of the number abounds.

The Debussy prelude is a beautiful, soothing tone poem, which was first given in this country in 1902. It is full of pure melody, in which the reed instruments play an important part, and was given in a highly commendable manner.

Schubert's symphony in C major, No. 7, one of the most difficult of that composer's works, received a thoroughly conscientious and artistic interpretation. It is a splendid piece of instrumental writing and conveys the romantic message in a gorgeous manner.

HERALD
BALTIMORE, MD
MAR 15 1906

THE ORCHESTRAL CONDUCTOR.

His Evolution and the Salaries in These Days.

An interesting and remarkable phenomenon is the "rise" of the orchestral conductor. There is no reason to suppose that our time is unique in its capacity to produce great conductors. Beethoven was a conductor, Berlioz was one, as was Mendelssohn, and, after him, Wagner. Not every gifted composer is a good director of an orchestra, for this position requires not merely interpretative skill but the possession of the qualities of a drillmaster. Conversely, not every great conductor is an original musician—instance the case of the late Mr. Thomas, who composed no music of any kind, though he profoundly understood and masterfully led his orchestra in all kinds and styles of music. Generally speaking, however, an age that has fine musicians and good orchestras will also have good conductors. Our age has its full share of the latter, and there should be no difficulty in filling vacancies.

There would be none but for the question of salaries. It is in a financial, not an artistic, sense that the orchestral conductor has "grown." Today the great conductor is treated almost as a "star" or a prima donna. He asks fancy compensation for his services, compensation a Wagner or a Beethoven never expected to obtain for all his work, original, interpretative and what not.

For example, the Russian conductor, Safonoff of Moscow, who has been invited to direct the New York Philharmonic, asks $20,000 a year for a set term of three years. Mr. Gericke, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, whose salary has been $12,000 a year, has resigned, and it is reported that he did so because Mr. Higginson had declined to grant him a substantial advance. Weingartner, who is undoubtedly a brilliant and magnetic conductor, but whose work in Chicago was by no means a revelation to level-headed music lovers, is said to be earning, as conductor, $25,000 a year. He received $12,000 here for the sixteen concerts he directed.

Now it cannot be said that the salaries of conductors are regulated by supply and demand. All the great orchestras are subsidized or endowed, and in America none could remain in existence if the wealthy music lovers withdrew their liberal contributions and forced the orchestras to depend on ordinary receipts. In Europe the municipalities generally subsidize the orchestras, or else they work very hard giving popular concerts several times a week and appearing at all sorts of functions.

In these circumstances the demands of the star conductors are hardly warranted by the "market conditions." The heavier the deficits the more precarious is the existence of the symphonic orchestra. Pittsburg is likely to lose hers. The deficit being larger than ever and the conductor getting $12,000.—Chicago Record-Herald.

NEWS
BALTIMORE, MD
MAR 15 1906

MUSIC

Mr. Gericke's Farewell Appearance In Baltimore As The Leader Of The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The departure of such an exceptionally endowed musician as Mr. Gericke from our land is a misfortune. No more erudite, conscientious and respect-inspiring artist ever stood before an orchestra. We have sometimes felt that he was a bit overconservative, but the logic of his conceptions and the clarity and purity of his results more often yield such satisfaction as abandon could not give. The men in the Boston Orchestra are all artists, and they respect Mr. Gericke so highly that his least desire, conveyed to them by a look or a gesture, finds instant and full response. As a consequence the unisons of the strings and the general perfection of their playing is simply sensuous.

Whoever follows Mr. Gericke will have the benefit of the wonderful foundation which he has laid, but will at the same time find a formidable mountain of traditions confronting him. If any of those who seem prominent as candidates are chosen, last night's performance may be the swan song of the great orchestra's perfection, as far as Baltimore is con-

[illegible] Harold Bauer, who has not been heard in New York in recital since 1902, although he has played here since then with the Boston Symphony, the New York Symphony, and Philharmonic Orchestras and with the Kneisel Quartet, will give his only New York recital in Mendelssohn Hall on Saturday afternoon, March 10.

[illegible] Goldmark's "Sakuntala," which has been played several times in Baltimore during the past five years, was wonderfully read.

The concerto by Jaques-Dalcroze shows that its composer has ample invention, and a fine sense of color, and proportion. The most peculiar characteristics of the work are the occasional melodramatic devices employed, and the fact that traditional fiddle passages are absent from the first two movements. The first named were never disturbing. They seemed quite the proper thing, for the whole atmosphere of the piece is very rarified. The composer has not only omitted unmusical display from the first two movements, he has provided musical display in the last movement.

Mr. Marteau is an excellent artist, and he is quite fond of introducing new works. When the writer last heard him in Berlin, he played a new concerto by Sinding, which was not worthy of the honor. This time we should feel under obligations, for this Dalcroze work is piquant, without being tiresome or painful.

A sharper contrast than was furnished by the Debussy prelude and the C major symphony of Schubert could not be imagined. Schubert was a well-spring from which inexhaustible streams of melody flowed. Debussy's melodic streams seem finely painted, but are still only theatrical properties. O. B. B.

NEW YORK EVG. POST
MAR 3 1906

The last two Boston Symphony concerts of the season will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, March 15, and the following Saturday afternoon. Peculiar interest attaches to these, since they will mark Mr. Gericke's farewell appearance in New York as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. As has already been announced, Mr. Gericke will retire from this post at the end of this season. Three novelties are announced for these concerts. One is a symphonic poem by Ernst Boehe, a young composer of Munich. It is a work of very large dimensions, and is entitled "Odysseus's Departure and Shipwreck." Another will be an unknown concerto for violin by the Swiss, Emile Jaques-Dalcroze, which Henri Marteau will play on Thursday evening. The third will be a setting for baritone and orchestra of Keats's "La Belle Dame sans Merci," by Frederick Converse of Boston. This Mr. David Bispham will sing at the Saturday matinée concert. The symphonies will be Richard Strauss's "Aus Italiens" and Schubert's great symphony in C major.

GLOBE
NEW YORK COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER
MAR 2 - 1906

Musical Notes.

WILHELM GERICKE will make his farewell appearance as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its final pair of concerts here for the present season on Thursday evening, March 15, and on Saturday afternoon, March 17. Three novelties are announced for these concerts. One is a symphonic poem by Ernst Boehe, a young composer of Munich. It is a work of very large dimensions and is entitled "Odysseus's Departure and Shipwreck." Another will be an unknown concerto for violin by the Swiss, Emile Jaques Dalcroze, which Henri Marteau will play on Thursday evening. The third will be a setting for baritone and orchestra of Keats's "La Belle Dame sans Merci," by Frederick Converse of Boston. This David Bispham will sing at the Saturday matinée concert. The symphonies will be Richard Strauss's "Aus Italien" and Schubert's symphony in C.

[193]

The First Established and Most Reliable Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
AMERICAN.
from NEW YORK CITY.
Address
MAR 2 - 1906

[illegible] Harold Bauer, who has not been heard in New York in recital since 1902, although he has played here since then with the Boston Symphony, the New York Symphony, and Philharmonic Orchestras and with the Kneisel Quartet, will give his only New York recital in Mendelssohn Hall on Saturday afternoon, March 10.

N. Y. EVG. TELEGRAM
MAR 2 - 1906

Amusement Jottings.

THE last two Boston Symphony concerts of the season will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, March 15, and on Saturday afternoon, March 17. They will mark Mr. Gericke's farewell appearance in New York as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. At the conclusion of the season he will retire from this post.

Three novelties are announced for these concerts. One is a symphonic poem by Ernst Boehe, a young composer of Munich. It is a work of very large dimensions and is entitled "Odysseus' Departure and Shipwreck." Another will be an unknown concerto for violin by the Swiss Emile Jaques-Dalcroze, which Henri Marteau will play on Thursday evening. The third will be a setting for barytone and orchestra of Keat's "La Belle Dame Sans Merci" by Frederick Converse, of Boston. This Mr. David Bispham will sing at the Saturday matinee concert. The symphonies will be Richard Strauss' "Aux Italiens" and Schubert's great symphony in C major.

The third and last concert by the Boston Symphony Quartet will be given in Mendelssohn Hall on next Wednesday evening. It will be the occasion of introducing in New York a novelty which is likely to arouse much interest among musical connoisseurs, a serenade for flute, violin and viola, by Max Reger, who just now is a close rival of Richard Strauss for the honor of holding the centre of the stage in the world of music. This work is new, its opus number being 77A, and it was published only recently. So far as is known Professor Hess gave its first performance in this country at the last Boston Symphony Quartet concert in Boston, and this will be its first performance in New York. In Boston it created a very favorable impression and was regarded as a most valuable addition to the literature of chamber music. It will be played by Professor Willy Hess, Mr. Emile Ferir and Mr. André Maquarre, the flutist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The second number on the programme will be Richard Strauss' sonata for pianoforte and violin in E flat major, a favorite work with lovers of chamber music. This will be played by Professor Willy Hess and Mme. Olga Samaroff. Mme. Samaroff in her several appearances with the Boston Symphony Quartet this winter has shown herself to be as admirable an ensemble artist as she is a virtuosa.

The final number will be Beethoven's quartet in E flat major, Op. 127, No. 12, a work which is generally less familiar than the other late quartets of the master.

from MAR
Address NEW YORK CITY
Date MAR 3 - 1906

The third and last concert by the Boston Symphony Quartet will take place in Mendelssohn Hall next Wednesday evening. A novelty will be a serenade for flute, violin and viola by Max Reger, opus 77a. It will be played by Willy Hess, Emile Ferir and Andre Maquarre, the flutist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The second number will be Richard Strauss's sonata for piano and violin in E flat major, played by Mr. Hess and Mme. Olga Samaroff. Beethoven's quartet in E flat major, op. 127, No. 12, will end the evening.

[illegible] rk, 18

NEW YORK HERALD
MAR 2 - 1906

Mr. Gericke's Providence Farewell.

[SPECIAL DESPATCH TO THE HERALD.]

PROVIDENCE, R. I., Thursday.—Mr. Gericke was surrounded by floral tributes when he took up his baton to-night to conduct the last of the Boston Symphony subscription concerts here and made his farewell appearance in Providence. The novelty of the programme was a ballad for barytone and orchestra, written for and sung by Mr. David S. Bispham, who gave it with piano once at the St. Botolph Club. The ballad is the composition of Mr. Frederick S. Converse, who is prominent in the society of Westwood, Mass. His relatives here and society were in the audience to hear its first orchestral presentation.

BALTIMORE. MD.
NEWS
MAR 14 1906 MAR 14 1906

MR. GERICKE'S FAREWELL

FAMOUS CONDUCTOR COMES TO BALTIMORE FOR LAST TIME.

Will Spend Remainder Of His Life In Vienna—Schubert's Symphony Tonight.

When the final note of Schubert's Symphony No. 7 has been played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyric tonight, Baltimore probably will have had its last glimpse of Wilhelm Gericke, the Orchestra's famous conductor. After the present season Gericke goes back to Vienna, whence he came to Boston more than 20 years ago, to spend the remainder of his life in less strenuous work than keeping the Hub's great organization up to the standard it has set for itself.

Gericke is 61 years old, and one of the world's famous conductors. He is very much of a martinet in his methods, keen and commanding, and the technical excellence of the Boston organization is unquestionably due more to him than any other man. The "human metronome" they used to call him, because of the absolute precision of his reading of scores, but through it he achieved that perfect ensemble work and great brilliancy which mark the playing of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

It was in 1884 that Gericke first took up his work in Boston; in 1889 he went back to Vienna in impaired health. Nikisch followed him, and gained a great reputation from his emotional handling of the orchestra which Gericke had made technically perfect. Paur followed Nikisch, staying until 1898, when Gericke came to his own again. These and Georg Henschel, who preceded Gericke, are the only leaders the Orchestra has had in its quarter-century of existence. The great Orchestra has never played better than it has in these last few years.

This is the programme that will be presented tonight, Henri Marteau being the solo violinist:

Overture, "Sakuntala".....Goldmark
Concerto for violin.....Jaques-Dalcroze
L'Apres Midi d'un Faun.....Debussy
Symphony No. 7, in C major....Schubert

Mr. Gericke will spend the summer in France and Switzerland, and will make his home in Vienna thereafter. He has made no definite plans for his musical work in the future, but proposes to take things quietly. His successor with the Boston Orchestra has not yet been determined upon, although Weingartner, Richter, Henry Wood and others of the great conductors of the world have been mentioned in connection with the position.

BALTIMORE, MD.
MAR 15 1906

PUNCHBOWL FOR MR. GERICKE

Last Appearance Here As Leader Of Boston Symphony.

The farewell appearance in Baltimore last evening of Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who recently resigned as the head of that organization and who will return to Europe, was marked by the presentation by a number of Baltimore music lovers of a handsome silver punchbowl. Incidentally Mr. Gericke was accorded an ovation the heartiness and enthusiasm of which has seldom characterized a similar occasion in this city.

The presentation was made by Mr. Harold Randolph, director of the Peabody Conservatory of Music, at the conclusion of the second number.

In offering the token Mr. Randolph said:

"It was you, Mr. Gericke, who first brought this wonderful orchestra to Baltimore, and it is to you that we are indebted for the marvelous state of perfection that the organization has attained. We have come to deeply appreciate your work, for it has taught us much; in fact, we have learned more through you and your orchestra than from any other source, and we again thank you for the high standard of perfection you have set. It is with profound and sincere regret that we have you before us tonight for the last time. You will accept this token in the name of the music-loving public of Baltimore and carry it with you as an honor wherever you go.

"Had we known earlier that this was to be your last appearance here we could probably have given a better token of our appreciation—not a more appropriate one to you, but one more characteristic of us."

Mr. Gericke was deeply moved by the presentation, which, it is said, came as a complete surprise to him, and it was several moments before he was able to respond.

In accepting the bowl he said:

"I thank you for this from the bottom of my heart. During my frequent visits here I have always noted the thoroughly musical atmosphere of Baltimore and have always been received by appreciative audiences. I sincerely regret that this is my last visit to Baltimore."

Hearty and prolonged applause followed Mr. Gericke's little address and he was obliged to bow many times in acknowledgment.

The program given by the orchestra, which was perhaps the best of the series, was as follows:

Overture to "Sakuntala," Op. 13.....Goldmark
Concerto in C minor, for violin and orchestra.
Op. 50 (first time here).....Jaques-Dalcroze
I. Allegro con ritmo.
II. Andante con moto.
III. Scherzo: Allegro vivace. Trio.
IV. Finale: Allegro vivace.

Henri Marteau, violinist, was the soloist. The Goldmark overture, the first of that composer's important works, was given in a manner that could but add to its popularity.

The work is characteristic of the modern school of writing and the Goldmark temperament, but rich in beautiful harmony.

In the Jackues-Delcroze concerto Mr. Marteau demonstrated what a fine violinist he is. His work is that of the mature soloist, convincing and technically perfect, especially as to his double stops, in which the first movement of the number abounds.

The Debussy prelude is a beautiful, soothing tone poem, which was first given in this country in 1902. It is full of pure melody, in which the reed instruments play an important part, and was given in a highly commendable manner.

Schubert's symphony in C major, No. 7, one of the most difficult of that composer's works, received a thoroughly conscientious and artistic interpretation. It is a splendid piece of instrumental writing and conveys the romantic message in a gorgeous manner.

BALTIMORE, MD.
MAR 15 1906

THE ORCHESTRAL CONDUCTOR.

His Evolution and the Salaries in These Days.

An interesting and remarkable phenomenon is the "rise" of the orchestral conductor. There is no reason to suppose that our time is unique in its capacity to produce great conductors. Beethoven was a conductor, Berlioz was one, as was Mendelssohn, and, after him, Wagner. Not every gifted composer is a good director of an orchestra, for this position requires not merely interpretative skill but the possession of the qualities of a drillmaster. Conversely, not every great conductor is an original musician—instance the case of the late Mr. Thomas, who composed no music of any kind, though he profoundly understood and masterfully led his orchestra in all kinds and styles of music. Generally speaking, however, an age that has fine musicians and good orchestras will also have good conductors. Our age has its full share of the latter, and there should be no difficulty in filling vacancies.

There would be none but for the question of salaries. It is in a financial, not an artistic, sense that the orchestral conductor has "grown." Today the great conductor is treated almost as a "star" or a prima donna. He asks fancy compensation for his services, compensation a Wagner or a Beethoven never expected to obtain for all his work, original, interpretative and what not.

For example, the Russian conductor, Safonoff of Moscow, who has been invited to direct the New York Philharmonic, asks $20,000 a year for a set term of three years. Mr. Gericke, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, whose salary has been $12,000 a year, has resigned, and it is reported that he did so because Mr. Higginson had declined to grant him a substantial advance. Weingartner, who is undoubtedly a brilliant and magnetic conductor, but whose work in Chicago was by no means a revelation to level-headed music lovers, is said to be earning, as conductor, $25,000 a year. He received $12,000 here for the sixteen concerts he directed.

Now it cannot be said that the salaries of conductors are regulated by supply and demand. All the great orchestras are subsidized or endowed, and in America none could remain in existence if the wealthy music lovers withdrew their liberal contributions and forced the orchestras to depend on ordinary receipts. In Europe the municipalities generally subsidize the orchestras, or else they work very hard giving popular concerts several times a week and appearing at all sorts of functions.

In these circumstances the demands of the star conductors are hardly warranted by the "market conditions." The heavier the deficits the more precarious is the existence of the symphonic orchestra. Pittsburg is likely to lose hers. The deficit being larger than ever and the conductor getting $12,000.—Chicago Record-Herald.

BALTIMORE, MD.

MUSIC

Mr. Gericke's Farewell Appearance In Baltimore As The Leader Of The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The departure of such an exceptionally endowed musician as Mr. Gericke from our land is a misfortune. No more erudite, conscientious and respect-inspiring artist ever stood before an orchestra. We have sometimes felt that he was a bit overconservative, but the logic of his conceptions and the clarity and purity of his results more often yield such satisfaction as abandon could not give. The men in the Boston Orchestra are all artists, and they respect Mr. Gericke so highly that his least desire, conveyed to them by a look or a gesture, finds instant and full response. As a consequence the unisons of the strings and the general perfection of their playing is simply sensuous.

Whoever follows Mr. Gericke will have the benefit of the wonderful foundation which he has laid, but will at the same time find a formidable mountain of traditions confronting him. If any of those who seem prominent as candidates are chosen, last night's performance may be the swan song of the great orchestra's perfection, as far as Baltimore is con-

Some of Mr. Gericke's friends in Baltimore had bought a beautiful silver punch bowl, which Mr. Harold Randolph presented to him with a few words of appreciation and affection, which aroused warm responsiveness in the audience. Mr. Randolph quite justly said that Mr. Gericke, who had really created the Boston Symphony Orchestra, had at the same time established a standard which had been made a goal by all the conductors of the land, and that he expected Mr. Gericke's influence to endure long after his departure.

The orchestra was in fine form last evening, and it made the following selections wholly as interesting as the composers' material permitted. Justice was meted out to all, from Schubert to Debussy:

Overture to "Sakuntala." Op. 13.....Goldmark
Concerto in C Minor, for Violin and Orchestra.....Jaques-Dalcroze
(Op. 50. First time here.)
Allegro con ritmo.
Largo.
Finale quasi fantasia (Allegro appassionato).
Prelude to Stephane Mallarme's Eclogue, "The Afternoon of a Faun."
.....Debussy
Symphony in C Major, No. 7....Schubert
Andante: Allegro ma non troppo.
Andante con moto.
Scherzo: Allegro vivace. Trio.
Finale: Allegro vivace.
Soloist, Mr. Henri Marteau.

Goldmark's "Sakuntala," which has been played several times in Baltimore during the past five years, was wonderfully read.

The concerto by Jaques-Dalcroze shows that its composer has ample invention, and a fine sense of color, and proportion. The most peculiar characteristics of the work are the occasional melodramatic devices employed, and the fact that traditional fiddle passages are absent from the first two movements. The first named were never disturbing. They seemed quite the proper thing, for the whole atmosphere of the piece is very rarified. The composer has not only omitted unmusical display from the first two movements, he has provided musical display in the last movement.

Mr. Marteau is an excellent artist, and he is quite fond of introducing new works. When the writer last heard him in Berlin, he played a new concerto by Sinding, which was not worthy of the honor. This time we should feel under obligations, for this Dalcroze work is piquant, without being tiresome or painful.

A sharper contrast than was furnished by the Debussy prelude and the C major symphony of Schubert could not be imagined. Schubert was a well-spring from which inexhaustible streams of melody flowed. Debussy's melodic streams seem finely painted, but are still only theatrical properties. O. B. B.

NEW YORK CITY

s

MAR

The last two Boston Symphony concerts of the season will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, March 15, and the following Saturday afternoon. Peculiar interest attaches to these, since they will mark Mr. Gericke's farewell appearance in New York as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. As has already been announced, Mr. Gericke will retire from this post at the end of this season. Three novelties are announced for these concerts. One is a symphonic poem by Ernst Boehe, a young composer of Munich. It is a work of very large dimensions, and is entitled "Odysseus's Departure and Shipwreck." Another will be an unknown concerto for violin by the Swiss, Emile Jaques-Dalcroze, which Henri Marteau will play on Thursday evening. The third will be a setting for baritone and orchestra of Keats's "La Belle Dame sans Merci," by Frederick Converse of Boston. This Mr. David Bispham will sing at the Saturday matinée concert. The symphonies will be Richard Strauss's "Aus Italiens" and Schubert's great symphony in C major.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

BALTIMORE, MD.

GLOBE

ess ..... SPK COMMERCIAL ADVERTISI

MAR 2 - 1906

Musical Notes.

WILHELM GERICKE will make his farewell appearance as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its final pair of concerts here for the present season on Thursday evening, March 15, and on Saturday afternoon, March 17. Three novelties are announced for these concerts. One is a symphonic poem by Ernst Boehé, a young composer of Munich. It is a work of very large dimensions and is entitled "Odysseus's Departure and Shipwreck." Another will be an unknown concerto for violin by the Swiss, Emile Jaques Dalcroze, which Henri Marteau will play on Thursday evening. The third will be a setting for baritone and orchestra of Keats's "La Belle Dame sans Merci," by Frederick Converse of Boston. This David Bispham will sing at the Saturday matinée concert. The symphonies will be Richard Strauss's "Aus Italien" and Schubert's symphony in C.

[193]

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

AMERICAN
NEW YORK CITY.

Address ..... MAR 2 - 1906

Harold Bauer, who has not been heard in New York in recital since 1902, although he has played here since then with the Boston Symphony, the New York Symphony, and Philharmonic Orchestras and with the Kneisel Quartet, will give his only New York recital in Mendelssohn Hall on Saturday afternoon, March 10.

TELEGRAM

N.

MAR 2 - 1906

Amusement Jottings.

THE last two Boston Symphony concerts of the season will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, March 15, and on Saturday afternoon, March 17. They will mark Mr. Gericke's farewell appearance in New York as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. At the conclusion of the season he will retire from this post.

Three novelties are announced for these concerts. One is a symphonic poem by Ernst Boehe, a young composer of Munich. It is a work of very large dimensions and is entitled "Odysseus' Departure and Shipwreck." Another will be an unknown concerto for violin by the Swiss Emile Jaques-Delcroze, which Henri Marteau will play on Thursday evening. The third will be a setting for barytone and orchestra of Keat's "La Belle Dame Sans Merci" by Frederick Converse, of Boston. This Mr. David Bispham will sing at the Saturday matinee concert. The symphonies will be Richard Strauss' "Aux Italiens" and Schubert's great symphony in C major.

The third and last concert by the Boston Symphony Quartet will be given in Mendelssohn Hall on next Wednesday evening. It will be the occasion of introducing in New York a novelty which is likely to arouse much interest among musical connoisseurs, a serenade for flute, violin and viola, by Max Reger, who just now is a close rival of Richard Strauss for the honor of holding the centre of the stage in the world of music. This work is new, its opus number being 77A, and it was published only recently. So far as is known Professor Hess gave its first performance in this country at the last Boston Symphony Quartet concert in Boston, and this will be its first performance in New York. In Boston it created a very favorable impression and was regarded as a most valuable addition to the literature of chamber music. It will be played by Professor Willy Hess, Mr. Emile Ferir and Mr. André Maquarre, the flutist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The second number on the programme will be Richard Strauss' sonata for pianoforte and violin in E flat major, a favorite work with lovers of chamber music. This will be played by Professor Willy Hess and Mme. Olga Samaroff. Mme. Samaroff in her several appearances with the Boston Symphony Quartet this winter has shown herself to be as admirable an ensemble artist as she is a virtuosa.

The final number will be Beethoven's quartet in E flat major, Op. 127, No. 12, a work which is generally less familiar than the other late quartets of the master.

From .....

Address ..... NEW YORK CITY

Date ..... MAR 2 - 1906

The third and last concert by the Boston Symphony Quartet will take place in Mendelssohn Hall next Wednesday evening. A novelty will be a serenade for flute, violin and viola by Max Reger, opus 77a. It will be played by Willy Hess, Emile Ferir and Andre Maquarre, the flutist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The second number will be Richard Strauss's sonata for piano and violin in E flat major, played by Mr. Hess and Mme. Olga Samaroff. Beethoven's quartet in E flat major, op. 127, No. 12, will end the evening.

s ..... MAR 2 - 1906

Mr. Gericke's Providence Farewell.

[SPECIAL DESPATCH TO THE HERALD.]

PROVIDENCE, R. I., Thursday.—Mr. Gericke was surrounded by floral tributes when he took up his baton to-night to conduct the last of the Boston Symphony subscription concerts here and made his farewell appearance in Providence. The novelty of the programme was a ballad for barytone and orchestra, written for and sung by Mr. David S. Bispham, who gave it with piano once at the St. Botolph Club. The ballad is the composition of Mr. Frederick S. Converse, who is prominent in the society of Westwood, Mass. His relatives here and society were in the audience to hear its first orchestral presentation.

NEW YORK TIMES
MAR 4 - 1906

WILHELM GERICKE
Who will leave the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of the season

Departure of Mr. Gericke

Technical and Artistic Perfection of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Due to Him---Question of His Successor.

NEW YORK is concerned, with Boston, in the departure of Mr. Gericke from the head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of this season. New York is a faithful and enthusiastic supporter of this orchestra, and its interest in the conductor is only less than its interest in the problems concerning the conductors of its own orchestras. It is needless to say that Mr. Gericke's departure will be a cause of great regret among the attendants upon the Boston Orchestra's concerts in New York, and that the appointment of his successor is a matter of intense interest to them.

What the Boston Orchestra is Mr. Gericke has made it. The character it has had as an artistic instrument and the style of its performance are as they are because they have been molded exactly by his ideals and methods. High ideals and strenuous methods they have been. He has never spared his men any of the pains and labor that he considered requisite to obtain the exact effect he was aiming at in any work, in any passage, in any single bit of orchestral color or phrase or adjustment of tonal balance. But neither has he spared himself. A "passion for perfection," it has been well said, has been at the foundation of Mr. Gericke's work as an orchestral conductor, and he has wreaked himself upon the Boston Orchestra to make it what he would have it.

Once before he resigned his place, after five years' labor, and returned to Vienna with shattered nerves. He came back in 1898, after nine years, but nothing had changed in Mr. Gericke's methods; and if anything had changed in the meantime in the Boston Symphony Orchestra, he set himself to work, undismayed and resolute, to change it back again.

Greater technical perfection in the playing of an orchestra it is vain to seek, but there is something finer, subtler, more elusive than technical finish in orchestral performance that Mr. Gericke has given the Boston Orchestra; the perfect euphony, the perfect balance, the exact adjustment of the color and quality of every phrase, so that there shall be just so much of one instrumental color, just so much of another, and the resultant mixture shall be the precise one that belongs to the harmony of the whole. Mr. Gericke has been charged with sacrificing spirit, breadth, and the fiercer sonorities of modern orchestral music in his anxiety to keep this sort of quality.

Whatever it may have been once, it is now an unjust charge. Especially in the later years of his work here, he has shown a continually increasing sympathy with productions of the modern schools of music, has played them frequently, and with splendid enthusiasm and devotion. Who will not say Mr. Gericke's performance [illegible] Quixote," [illegible] in New it has been that these same men have played as scarcely another body of the kind in the world can play; that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is absolutely perfect in its way. And that, too, is something. Another conductor may have done differently, may have got other kinds of effects, may have accomplished another order of results; but—to return to the original proposition—as it is now, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is the product precisely of Mr. Gericke's strenuous, unwearied activities. Those who are grateful for its achievements must express their gratitude first of all to him.

The question of his successor, as is the question of the conductor for the Philharmonic Society, is a very difficult one. The simple fact is that most of the greatest of European conductors could not or would not come at all, and that those who would demand sums that are beyond all reason. A singer at the Opera House is not—for any length of time—in receipt of a cachet greater than the money he or she can draw into the house. But the moneys that orchestral conductors are asking are more than can be driven into the concert halls under any circumstances. If they are paid, it means a certain deficit. If a public-spirited backer or committee of backers has met deficits for a series of years, they may be supposed to have done so in the expectation of some day "getting out of the woods." If the conditions are such that permanent financial gloom is the inevitable outlook, deficits are likely to become wearisome. Nobody has as yet come forward with an endowment ample to meet such deficits and intended to supply what the public is not expected ever to supply.

Will Mr. Higginson secure some young man of great talent without a great name and bring him over to make his place and his success in this country? It would seem to be the most promising suggestion, if the conditions can be met, both for Boston and for New York. But it is a very difficult one. How find an unknown young man of great talent? How be sure of him if you have found him? The accounts seem to indicate that Chicago has succeeded in this, in getting Frederick A. Stock to succeed Theodore Thomas; but there will be no chance to experiment and test in the case of Boston. Such experiment as has been made by the Philharmonic was unsuccessful—for it is more than probable that if young Dr. Kunwald had done better at his trial a month ago he might now be under consideration as the next Philharmonic conductor.

[194]

From NEW YORK HERALD
Address
Date MAR 4 - 1906

THE retirement of Mr. Wilhelm Gericke as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will take effect at the close of the present season, brings the famous organization and its generous patron, Mr. Higginson, face to face with a rather serious situation. If the kind of work which the Boston orchestra has been putting on its record for the last few years is to continue to represent its artistic ideals, the choice of Mr. Gericke's successor is not going to prove an easy one.

The steady growth in the orchestra's following in New York has been due in a large measure to the peculiar refinement, the high polish, obtained by this band of players, qualities which have made its ensemble work very much like a highly magnified style of chamber music and has insured a virtuoso-like performance of the fine programmes presented. This peculiar character of the orchestra's playing, its consistence and uniform adherence to a high standard, can, of course, be attributed to the personality and the methods of Mr. Wilhelm Gericke. He has given the Boston orchestra thirteen years of the hardest labor in his career, it would seem.

Coming here first in 1884, he remained for five years as conductor, and then, broken in health, returned to Austria for a sojourn of nine years, the orchestra during his absence being conducted successively by Mr. Arthur Nikisch and Mr. Emil Paur. He returned to Boston at Mr. Higginson's invitation in 1898, and it is in the eight years which have elapsed since then that he has done most to advance the orchestra to its present front rank place among the organizations of the country.

A large part of Mr. Gericke's success is said to have been due as much to his rigid adherence to strict discipline in the treatment of the men of the orchestra as to his unflagging persistence in the minutae of rehearsal, and rumor has hinted that one of the chief causes which led him to resign his post was the difficulty of carrying out to the full his ideas of discipline.

It is easy even for the layman to understand that one man control of a great orchestra, and the placing of that control in the conductor's hands, is an absolute necessity if the most perfect results are to be obtained. The salary Mr. Gericke has been receiving would have seemed a large one some years ago, but by comparison with the sum paid by the Philharmonic Society to its star conductors recently it seems a very moderate sum. Mr. Gericke, during the present season, will have conducted more than one hundred concerts. For this he will have received $12,500. In his recent negotiations with Mr. Higginson he is reported to have asked for a salary of $15,000, and to have requested also such an arrangement of the orchestra's work as would permit him a brief respite in midwinter.

Both of these requests would seem relatively reasonable. Mr. Safonoff is reputed to have placed a value upon his services for the Philharmonic's sixteen concerts of $20,000, and the prices paid by the society recently to its other "guest" conductors have been proportionately far above the salary suggested by Mr. Gericke for his direction of one hundred concerts.

In these circumstances it is interesting to wonder who, among the best known men of musical Europe, can be found to assume the baton Mr. Gericke lays down at the salary he has been receiving. Mr. Weingartner has been mentioned for the post, but his engagements for next year already announced would seem to put him out of the running. Others mentioned are Messrs. Muck, of Berlin; Schuch, of Dresden, and also Mr. D'Indy, of Paris.

In Carnegie Lyceum next Thursday afternoon Miss Catherine Lewis will give the first of her series of miracle plays under the title of "Old Testament Word Scenes."

Her topics for the afternoon will be "Abraham's Banishment of Hagar," "Hagar and Ishmael in the Wilderness," "The Sacrifice of Isaac," "The Choosing of a Wife for Isaac," "Rebekah at the Well," "Esau Sells His Birthright," "Jacob Steals Esau's Blessing from His Father, Isaac," "Joseph of the Coat of Many Colors," "Joseph Sold Into Egypt," "Jacob Thinks Joseph Dead," "The Story of Potiphar's Wife" and "Joseph in Prison in Egypt."

NEW YORK TIMES
Address
Date MAR 4 - 1906

The last two Boston Symphony concerts of the season will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, March 15, and on Saturday afternoon, March 17. Peculiar interest attaches to these, since they will mark Mr. Gericke's farewell appearance in New York as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. As already has been announced, Mr. Gericke will retire from this post at the end of this season.

Three novelties are announced for these concerts. One is a symphonic poem by Ernst Boehe, a young composer of Munich. It is a work of very large dimensions, and is entitled "Odysseus's Departure and Shipwreck." Another will be an unknown concerto for violin by the Swiss, Emile Jacques-Dalcroze, which Henri Marteau will play on Thursday evening. The third will be a setting for baritone and orchestra of Keats's "La Belle Dame sans Merci," by Frederick Converse of Boston. This Mr. David Bispham will sing at the Saturday matinée concert. The symphonies will be Richard Strauss's "Aus Italien" and Schubert's great symphony in C major.

From NEW YORK WORLD
Address
Date MAR 4 1906

The last concert of this season's Boston Symphony Quartet concerts will be given at Mendelssohn Hall on Wednesday evening. This quartet will play Beethoven's E flat major quartet, op. 127. The quartet's first violinist, Willy Hess, will play a Strauss sonata for violin and piano, assisted by Mme. Olga Samaroff. The remaining number will be a no[illegible] serenade for flute, viola and violin by Max [illegible] This work will be played by Willy [illegible] and André Maquarre.

From
Address
Date MAR [illegible]

[illegible] will be the occasion [illegible] a serenade for [illegible] Max Reger, who just [illegible] Richard Strauss for [illegible] ates on the stage in [illegible] work is new, its opus [illegible] it was published only recently. So far as is known Professor Hess gave its first [illegible] in this country at the last Boston Symphony Quartet concert in Boston, and this will be its first performance in New-York. It will be played by Prof. Willy Hess, Mr. Emile Ferir, and Mr. André Maquarre, the flutist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The second number on the programme will be Richard Strauss's sonata for pianoforte and violin in E flat major. This will be played by Professor Willy Hess and Mme. Olga Samaroff. The final number will be Beethoven's quartet in E-flat major, op. 127.

Address NEW YORK TIMES
Date MAR 4 - 19[illegible]

BOSTON SYMPHONY QUARTET.

The third and last concert by the Boston Symphony Quartet will be given in Mendelssohn Hall on next Wednesday evening at 8.15. It will introduce a novelty, a serenade for flute, [illegible] by Max Reger. This work is new, its opus number being 77A, and it was published only recently. So far as is known, Prof. Hess gave its first performance in this country at the last Boston Symphony Quartet concert in Boston, and this will be its first performance in New York. It will be played by Prof. Willy Hess, Mr. Emile Ferir, and Mr. André Maquarre, the flutist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The second number on the programme will be Richard Strauss's sonata for pianoforte and violin in E flat major. This will be played by Prof. Willy Hess and Mme. Olga Samaroff. Mme. Samaroff has made several appearances with the Boston Symphony Quartet this Winter. The final number will be Beethoven's quartet in E flat major, Op. 127, No. 12, a work which is generally less familiar than the other late quartets of the master. Plans are making to increase the number of concerts by the Boston Symphony Quartet in New York next Winter.

N. Y. TRIBUNE,
Address
MAR 4 1906

The last two Boston symphony concerts of the season will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, March 15, and on Saturday afternoon, March 17. Peculiar interest attaches to these, since they will mark Mr. Gericke's farewell appearance in New-York as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. As already has been announced, Mr. Gericke will retire from this post at the end of this season. Three novelties are announced for these concerts. One is a symphonic poem by Ernst Boehe, a young composer of Munich. It is a work of very large dimensions and is entitled "Odysseus's Departure and Shipwreck." Another will be an unknown concerto for violin, by Emile Jaques-Dalcroze, which Henri Marteau will play on Thursday evening. The third will be a setting for barytone and orchestra of Keats's "La Belle Dame Sans Merci," by Frederick Converse, of Boston. This Mr. David Bispham will sing at the Saturday matinee concert. The symphonies will be Richard Strauss's "Aus Italien," and Schubert's in C major.

NEW YORK PRESS
Address
MAR 4 - 1906

The last two Boston Symphony concerts of the season will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, March 15, and on Saturday afternoon, March 17. Peculiar interest attaches to these, since they will mark Mr. Gericke's farewell appearance in New York as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Three novelties are announced for these concerts. One is a symphonic poem by Ernest Boehe, a young composer of Munich, and is entitled "Odysseus's Departure and Shipwreck." Another will be an unknown concerto for violin by the Swiss, Emile Jaques-Dalcroze, which Henri Marteau will play on Thursday evening. The third will be a setting for baritone and orchestra of Keat's "La Belle Dame Sans Merci," by Frederick Converse of Boston. This Mr. David Bispham will sing at the Saturday matinee concert. The symphonies will be Richard Strauss's "Aus Italien," and Schubert's great symphony in C major.

NEW YORK TIMES
MAR 4 - 1906

WILHELM GERICKE
Who will leave the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of the season

Departure of Mr. Gericke

Technical and Artistic Perfection of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Due to Him---Question of His Successor.

NEW YORK is concerned, with Boston, in the departure of Mr. Gericke from the head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of this season. New York is a faithful and enthusiastic supporter of this orchestra, and its interest in the conductor is only less than its interest in the problems concerning the conductors of its own orchestras. It is needless to say that Mr. Gericke's departure will be a cause of great regret among the attendants upon the Boston Orchestra's concerts in New York, and that the appointment of his successor is a matter of intense interest to them.

What the Boston Orchestra is Mr. Gericke has made it. The character it has had as an artistic instrument and the style of its performance are as they are because they have been molded exactly by his ideals and methods. High ideals and strenuous methods they have been. He has never spared his men any of the pains and labor that he considered requisite to obtain the exact effect he was aiming at in any work, in any passage, in any single bit of orchestral color or phrase or adjustment of tonal balance. But neither has he spared himself. A "passion for perfection," it has been well said, has been at the foundation of Mr. Gericke's work as an orchestral conductor, and he has wreaked himself upon the Boston Orchestra to make it what he would have it.

Once before he resigned his place, after five years' labor, and returned to Vienna with shattered nerves. He came back in 1898, after nine years, but nothing had changed in Mr. Gericke's methods; and if anything had changed in the meantime in the Boston Symphony Orchestra, he set himself to work, undismayed and resolute, to change it back again.

Greater technical perfection in the playing of an orchestra it is vain to seek, but there is something finer, subtler, more elusive than technical finish in orchestral performance that Mr. Gericke has given the Boston Orchestra; the perfect euphony, the perfect balance, the exact adjustment of the color and quality of every phrase, so that there shall be just so much of one instrumental color, just so much of another, and the resultant mixture shall be the precise one that belongs to the harmony of the whole. Mr. Gericke has been charged with sacrificing spirit, breadth, and the fiercer sonorities of modern orchestral music in his anxiety to keep this sort of quality.

Whatever it may have been once, it is now an unjust charge. Especially in the later years of his work here, he has shown a continually increasing sympathy with productions of the modern schools of music, has played them frequently, and with splendid enthusiasm and devotion. Who will not say that Mr. Gericke's performance of Strauss's "Don Quixote," for instance, for the first time in New York, was not superior [illegible] almost every respect to the performance [illegible] the composer himself gave of it not long afterward? Besides all its other excellencies, it had the very important one that the orchestra did not break down in the middle. This is something, and it is something that has always been felt to belong to the Boston Orchestra under Mr. Gericke—its absolute certainty, its unquestioned technical perfection.

it has been that these same men have played as scarcely another body of the kind in the world can play; that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is absolutely perfect in its way. And that, too, is something. Another conductor may have done differently, may have got other kinds of effects, may have accomplished another order of results; but—to return to the original proposition—as it is now, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is the product precisely of Mr. Gericke's strenuous, unwearied activities. Those who are grateful for its achievements must express their gratitude first of all to him.

The question of his successor, as is the question of the conductor for the Philharmonic Society, is a very difficult one. The simple fact is that most of the greatest of European conductors could not or would not come at all, and that those who would demand sums that are beyond all reason. A singer at the Opera House is not—for any length of time—in receipt of a cachet greater than the money he or she can draw into the house. But the moneys that orchestral conductors are asking are more than can be driven into the concert halls under any circumstances. If they are paid, it means a certain deficit. If a public-spirited backer or committee of backers has met deficits for a series of years, they may be supposed to have done so in the expectation of some day "getting out of the woods." If the conditions are such that permanent financial gloom is the inevitable outlook, deficits are likely to become wearisome. Nobody has as yet come forward with an endowment ample to meet such deficits and intended to supply what the public is not expected ever to supply.

Will Mr. Higginson secure some young man of great talent without a great name and bring him over to make his place and his success in this country? It would seem to be the most promising suggestion, if the conditions can be met, both for Boston and for New York. But it is a very difficult one. How find an unknown young man of great talent? How be sure of him if you have found him? The accounts seem to indicate that Chicago has succeeded in this, in getting Frederick A. Stock to succeed Theodore Thomas; but there will be no chance to experiment and test in the case of Boston. Such experiment as has been made by the Philharmonic was unsuccessful—for it is more than probable that if young Dr. Kunwald had done better at his trial a month ago he might now be under consideration as the next Philharmonic conductor.

[194]

From _____
Address NEW YORK HERAL
Date MAR 4 - 190

THE retirement of Mr. Wilhelm Gericke as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will take effect at the close of the present season, brings the famous organization and its generous patron, Mr. Higginson, face to face with a rather serious situation. If the kind of work which the Boston orchestra has been putting on its record for the last few years is to continue to represent its artistic ideals, the choice of Mr. Gericke's successor is not going to prove an easy one.

The steady growth in the orchestra's following in New York has been due in a large measure to the peculiar refinement, the high polish, obtained by this band of players, qualities which have made its ensemble work very much like a highly magnified style of chamber music and has insured a virtuoso-like performance of the fine programmes presented. This peculiar character of the orchestra's playing, its consistence and uniform adherence to a high standard, can, of course, be attributed to the personality and the methods of Mr. Wilhelm Gericke. He has given the Boston orchestra thirteen years of the hardest labor in his career, it would seem.

Coming here first in 1884, he remained for five years as conductor, and then, broken in health, returned to Austria for a sojourn of nine years, the orchestra during his absence being conducted successively by Mr. Arthur Nikisch and Mr. Emil Paur. He returned to Boston at Mr. Higginson's invitation in 1898, and it is in the eight years which have elapsed since then that he has done most to advance the orchestra to its present front rank place among the organizations of the country.

A large part of Mr. Gericke's success is said to have been due as much to his rigid adherence to strict discipline in the treatment of the men of the orchestra as to his unflagging persistence in the minutae of rehearsal, and rumor has hinted that one of the chief causes which led him to resign his post was the difficulty of carrying out to the full his ideas of discipline.

It is easy even for the layman to understand that one man control of a great orchestra, and the placing of that control in the conductor's hands, is an absolute necessity if the most perfect results are to be obtained. The salary Mr. Gericke has been receiving would have seemed a large one some years ago, but by comparison with the sum paid by the Philharmonic Society to its star conductors recently it seems a very moderate sum. Mr. Gericke, during the present season, will have conducted more than one hundred concerts. For this he will have received $12,500. In his recent negotiations with Mr. Higginson he is reported to have asked for a salary of $15,000, and to have requested also such an arrangement of the orchestra's work as would permit him a brief respite in midwinter.

Both of these requests would seem relatively reasonable. Mr. Safonoff is reputed to have placed a value upon his services for the Philharmonic's sixteen concerts of $20,000, and the prices paid by the society recently to its other "guest" conductors have been proportionately far above the salary suggested by Mr. Gericke for his direction of one hundred concerts.

In these circumstances it is interesting to wonder who, among the best known men of musical Europe, can be found to assume the baton Mr. Gericke lays down at the salary he has been receiving. Mr. Weingartner has been mentioned for the post, but his engagements for next year already announced would seem to put him out of the running. Others mentioned are Messrs. Muck, of Berlin; Schuch, of Dresden, and also Mr. D'Indy, of Paris.

In Carnegie Lyceum next Thursday afternoon Miss Catherine Lewis will give the first of her series of miracle plays under the title of "Old Testament Word Scenes."

Her topics for the afternoon will be "Abraham's Banishment of Hagar," "Hagar and Ishmael in the Wilderness," "The Sacrifice of Isaac," "The Choosing of a Wife for Isaac," "Rebekah at the Well," "Esau Sells His Birthright," "Jacob Steals Esau's Blessing from His Father, Isaac," "Joseph of the Coat of Many Colors," "Joseph Sold Into Egypt," "Jacob Thinks Joseph Dead," "The Story of Potiphar's Wife" and "Joseph in Prison in Egypt."

ss NEW YORK TIMES
MAR 4 - 190

The last two Boston Symphony concerts of the season will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, March 15, and on Saturday afternoon, March 17. Peculiar interest attaches to these, since they will mark Mr. Gericke's farewell appearance in New York as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. As already has been announced, Mr. Gericke will retire from this post at the end of this season.

Three novelties are announced for these concerts. One is a symphonic poem by Ernst Boehe, a young composer of Munich. It is a work of very large dimensions, and is entitled "Odysseus's Departure and Shipwreck." Another will be an unknown concerto for violin by the Swiss, Emile Jacques-Dalcroze, which Henri Marteau will play on Thursday evening. The third will be a setting for baritone and orchestra of Keats's "La Belle Dame sans Merci," by Frederick Converse of Boston. This Mr. David Bispham will sing at the Saturday matinée concert. The symphonies will be Richard Strauss's "Aus Italien" and Schubert's great symphony in C major.

From NEW YORK WORLD
Address _____
Date MAR 4 1906

The last concert of this season's Boston Symphony Quartet concerts will be given at Mendelssohn Hall on Wednesday evening. This quartet will play Beethoven's E flat major quartet, op. 127. The quartet's first violinist, Willy Hess, will play a Strauss sonata for violin and piano, assisted by Mme. Olga Samaroff. The remaining number will be a novelty, a serenade for flute, viola and violin by Max Reger. This work will be played by Willy Hess, Emil Ferir and Andre Maquarre.

From N. Y. Tribune
Address _____
Date MAR 4 1906

The first and last concert this season of the Boston Symphony Quartet will be given in Mendelssohn Hall on next Wednesday evening. It will be the occasion for introducing in New York a serenade for flute, violin and viola by Max Reger, who just now is a close rival of Richard Strauss for the honor of holding the centre of the stage in the world of music. The work is new, its opus number being 77A, and it was published only recently. So far as is known Professor Hess gave its first performance in this country at the last Boston Symphony Quartet concert in Boston, and this will be its first performance in New-York. In Boston it created a very favorable impression and was regarded as a most valuable addition to the literature of chamber music. It will be played by Professor Willy Hess, Mr. Emile Ferir and Mr. André Maquarre, the admirable flautist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The second number on the programme will be Richard Strauss's sonata for pianoforte and violin in E-flat major. This will be played by Professor Willy Hess and Mme. Olga Samaroff. The final number will be Beethoven's quartet in E-flat major, op. 127.

Address _____
Date MAR 4 - 1

BOSTON SYMPHONY QUARTET.

The third and last concert by the Boston Symphony Quartet will be given in Mendelssohn Hall on next Wednesday evening at 8:15. It will introduce a novelty, a serenade for flute, violin, and viola by Max Reger. This work is new, its opus number being 77A, and it was published only recently. So far as is known, Prof. Hess gave its first performance in this country at the last Boston Symphony Quartet concert in Boston, and this will be its first performance in New York. It will be played by Prof. Willy Hess, Mr. Emile Ferir, and Mr. André Maquarre, the flutist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The second number on the programme will be Richard Strauss's sonata for pianoforte and violin in E flat major. This will be played by Prof. Willy Hess and Mme. Olga Samaroff. Mme. Samaroff has made several appearances with the Boston Symphony Quartet this Winter. The final number will be Beethoven's quartet in E flat major, Op. 127, No. 12, a work which is generally less familiar than the other late quartets of the master. Plans are making to increase the number of concerts by the Boston Symphony Quartet in New York next Winter.

N. Y. TRIBUNE.
ddress _____
MAR 4 1906

The last two Boston symphony concerts of the season will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, March 15, and on Saturday afternoon, March 17. Peculiar interest attaches to these, since they will mark Mr. Gericke's farewell appearance in New-York as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. As already has been announced, Mr. Gericke will retire from this post at the end of this season. Three novelties are announced for these concerts. One is a symphonic poem by Ernst Boehe, a young composer of Munich, and is entitled "Odysseus's Departure and Shipwreck." Another will be a concerto for violin by the Swiss, Emile Jaques-Dalcroze, which Henri Marteau will play on Thursday evening. The third will be a setting for baritone and orchestra of Keats's "La Belle Dame Sans Merci," by Frederick Converse of Boston. This Mr. David Bispham will sing at the Saturday matinee concert. The symphonies will be Richard Strauss's "Aus Italien," and Schubert's in C major.

l _____ ess _____
MAR 4 1906

The last two Boston Symphony concerts of the season will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, March 15, and on Saturday afternoon, March 17. Peculiar interest attaches to these, since they will mark Mr. Gericke's farewell appearance in New York as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Three novelties are announced for these concerts. One is a symphonic poem by Ernest Boehe, a young composer of Munich, and is entitled "Odysseus's Departure and Shipwreck." Another will be a concerto for violin by the Swiss, Emile Jaques-Dalcroze, which Henri Marteau will play on Thursday evening. The third will be a setting for baritone and orchestra of Keat's "La Belle Dame Sans Merci," by Frederick Converse of Boston. This David Bispham will sing at the Saturday matinee concert. The symphonies will be Richard Strauss's "Aus Italiens" and Schubert's great symphony in C major.

NEW YORK HERALD

MAR 4 - 1906

The third and last chamber music concert of the season will be given by the Boston Symphony Quartet in Mendelssohn Hall on Wednesday evening. The programme will be opened with a work new to local programmes, a serenade for flute, violin and viola by Max Reger, in which Mr. Andre Maquarre, solo flutist of the Boston orchestra, will assist Professor Willy Hess and Mr. Emil Ferir. The other numbers will be Richard Strauss' sonata for piano and violin in E flat major, Mme. Olga Samaroff playing the pianist, and Beethoven's quartet in E flat major, opus 127, a by no means familiar work.

Address NEW YORK SUN

MAR 4 -

The last two Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts of the season will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, March 15, and on Saturday, March 17. Peculiar interest attaches to these, since they will mark Mr. Gericke's farewell appearance in New York as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. As already has been announced, Mr. Gericke will retire from this post at the end of this season. Three novelties are announced for these concerts. One is a symphonic poem by Ernst Boehe, a young composer of Munich. It is a work of very large dimensions and is entitled "Odysseus's Departure and Shipwreck." Another will be an unknown concerto for violin by the Swiss, Emile Jacques-Dalcroze, which Henri Marteau will play on Thursday evening. The third will be a setting for baritone and orchestra of Keats's "La Belle Dame sans Merci," by Frederick Converse of Boston. This David Bispham will sing at the Saturday matinée concert. The symphonies will be Richard Strauss's "Aus Italiens" and Schubert's symphony in C major.

ress NEW YORK SUN

MAR 4 - 190

The third and last concert by the Boston Symphony Quartet will be given in Mendelssohn Hall next Wednesday evening at 8:15. It will be the occasion of introducing in New York a novelty which is likely to arouse much interest among musical connoisseurs, a serenade for flute, violin and viola by Max Reger, who just now is a close rival of Richard Strauss for the honor of holding the centre of the stage in the world of music. The second number on the programme will be Richard Strauss's sonata for pianoforte and violin in E flat major, a favorite work with lovers of chamber music. This will be played by Prof. Willy Hess and Mme. Olga Samaroff. The final number will be Beethoven's quartet in E flat major, opus 127, No. 12 a work which is generally less familiar than the other late quartets of the master.

dress M. Y. EV'G SUN

MAR 6- 190

te

To-night the first of the big orchestras will conclude its season at Carnegie Hall, next week the second and a fortnight from now the third and last. It has been the busiest of concert seasons, and here also the records of the performance will be interesting.

Tschaikowsky and Beethoven lead the orchestra bills of all that New York has heard since November. The oddest feature is the Boston orchestra's ten Manhattan concerts, wherein no symphony of the name of Beethoven occurs. Mr. Gericke, however, played the "Pastoral," No. 6, in Brooklyn. Herr Weingartner conducted the Fifth in both boroughs, the Philadelphia men played it in Brooklyn, the Philharmonic in Manhattan and the People's concerts three times here. Score seven; and one each for the Bostonian Sixth and Philharmonic Third, two for the Eighth by Philharmonic and New York orchestras, two for the Second by Walter Damrosch, and two for the Seventh by Frank Damrosch and Arnold Volpe.

That's fifteen symphonies for Beethoven. The Russian composer has about the same record, his Fourth five times heard, his Fifth and "Manfred" once, his "Serenade" and "Francesca" twice each, his First Symphony twice, by Volpe and Altschuler, and his "Pathétique" No. 6 twice, notably the special Philharmonic repetition under M. Safonoff.

GLOBE

NEW YORK COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER

MAR 7- 1906

The strong probability that Mr. Safonoff will be secured as sole conductor of the Philharmonic Society next season, and that Fritz Steinbach of Cologne, who is to conduct the last public rehearsal and concert of the Philharmonic Society this season, is to succeed Mr. Gericke as head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, points to the solution of two vexed questions. The great popularity of Mr. Safonoff makes his case a happy one. His fame here, true, came chiefly through his remarkable conducting of Tschaikowsky's symphonies, but he has shown his versatility in the successful interpretation of music different in spirit and manner to Tschaikowsky, as in Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" overture. Mr. Steinbach is unknown in America, but there is no special reason for rom N. Y. TRIBUNE,

ddress

ate MAR 7- 1906

THE NEXT BOSTON CONDUCTOR.

There are circumstances which, put together, would seem to indicate that the next conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be Fritz Steinbach, who is coming from Cologne to conduct the last concert this season of the Philharmonic Society. Herr Steinbach is music director general at Cologne, and his services there are arduous. So are those of the Boston conductor, but American salaries are considerably larger than those paid even to music directors general, and it may be that Mr. Higginson, who refused to give Mr. Theodore Thomas $14,000 a year when he went to Chicago, will now be willing to put up that amount or something like it to secure the services of as well known a conductor as Herr Steinbach. In America he would have to conduct over one hundred concerts, but in Cologne the music director general has the direction of two municipal institutions, the Conservatory and the Gürzenich concerts, has to conduct a singing society and miscellaneous concerts, and is generally responsible for the music in his bailiwick besides. The circumstances which point to the likelihood that Herr Steinbach is negotiating with Mr. Higginson are these: In his correspondence with the directors of the Philharmonic touching the concert which is to take place on the 24th of this month, Herr Steinbach sought to make his stay here as short as possible. He wanted to take a quick steamer of one of the German lines, arrive here about March 19 or 20, and hasten back to Europe immediately after the concert. He was thus unwilling to devote as much time to the preliminary rehearsals as his predecessors have given. While the matter was discussing, there suddenly came the announcement that Herr Steinbach had changed his plans and would sail on a slow steamer, the Cymric, from Liverpool, on March 8, for Boston, instead of for New-York. There is much significance in that; also in the fact that Mr. Willy Hess, the concert master of the Boston Orchestra, used to occupy the same place under Herr Steinbach in Cologne.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

AMERICAN HEBREW

From

Address NEW YORK CITY.

Date MAR 9 - 1906

The last two Boston Symphony concerts of the season will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, March 15, and on Saturday afternoon, March 17. Peculiar interest attaches to these, since they will mark Mr. Gericke's farewell appearance in New York as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. As already has been announced, Mr. Gericke will retire from this post at the end of this season. Three novelties are announced for these concerts. One is a symphonic poem by Ernst Boehe, a young composer of Munich. It is a work of very large dimensions, and is entitled "Odysseus's Departure and Shipwreck." Another will be an unknown concerto for violin by the Swiss, Emile Jacques-Dalcroze, which Henri Marteau will play on Thursday evening. The third will be a setting for baritone and orchestra of Keats's "La Belle Dame sans Merci," by Frederick Converse of Boston. This Mr. David Bispham will sing at the Saturday matinee concert. The symphonies will be Richard Strauss's "Aus Italien" and Schubert's great symphony in C major.

MAIL

RK CITY.

MAR 19 1906

Wilhelm Gericke was star at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's final matinee. After the C major Schubert symphony, which is one of Gericke's special accomplishments, so to say, the conductor was compelled to make a short speech of acknowledgment. New York will not see him again. His successor as conductor of the best American orchestra has not been named, though it is a plausible inference that Fritz Steinbach, who leads this week's Philharmonic concerts, may take the post at least for next year.

The Boston men played Weber and Goldmark and David Bispham sang the familiar "Hans Heiling" aria and a new ballade by Frederick S. Converse, "La Belle Dame sans Merci," which made a good impression.

The Russian Symphony Orchestra, com-

n N. Y. EV'G SUN

ress

MAR 1- 190

e

The last two Boston Symphony concerts of the New York season, on March 15 and 17, will mark Mr. Gericke's farewell appearances here as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. As already has been

THE MORNING TELEGRAPH

NEW YORK CITY

MAR 9 - 1906

MAR 9 - 1906

Loving Cup for Gericke.

(Special Dispatch to The Morning Telegraph.)

BALTIMORE, March 8.—There is a movement to purchase a silver loving cup to be presented to Wilhelm Gericke, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, when he makes his last appearance in this city before his retirement. A committee has been appointed to collect $1 subscriptions for the cup. The presentation is to take place at the Lyric on the evening of March 14.

N. Y. EV'G SUN

MAR 1 0 1906

Wilhelm Gericke, who has served the Boston Symphony Orchestra through half its quarter century and made the ensemble what it is to-day, is perhaps the only musician in America whose place in the hearts of his temporary fellow countrymen could be successfully disputed next week against that of the popular idol, Caruso.

His last pair of concerts in Carnegie Hall will bring to an end the most prosperous season the orchestra has ever had in this city. And two of the largest audiences, of course, will mark the farewell appearances of the conductor. Unquestionably the outburst of friendly feeling which greeted him in Boston after the announcement of of his intended retirement will find an echo here, both after the "Eroica" symphony of Beethoven on Thursday night, when Marteau is another attraction, and after the concluding Schubert symphony in C major, No. 7, on Saturday afternoon. David Bispham at the matinée will sing the new ballad by F. S. Converse, whose one-act opera, "Pipes of Desire," has just been heard in Boston.

Brooklyn on Friday night will hear Mr. Gericke conduct two symphonies, the Beethoven and also Mozart's in G minor, while Mr. Warnke will play the Dvorák 'cello concerto.

NEW YORK CIT

dress

te MAR 1 0

Wilhelm Gericke's farewell New York appearances as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be made next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon at Carnegie Hall, and many will be on hand to wish him good fortune, in appreciation of his thorough and admirable service.

The Thursday programme will be:

Suite in D major, No. 3.....Bach
Concerto for violin (first time),
Jaques-Dalcroze
Mr. Henri Marteau.
"L'Apres-Midi d'un Faun".....Debussy
Symphony No. 8, "Eroica"....Beethoven

On Saturday afternoon the Boston Orchestra's list will be as follows:

Overture, "Der Freischuetz".....Weber
Ballade for baritone and orchestra,
Converse (first time)
Overture, "Sakuntala"..... Goldmark
Aria, "An jenem Tag," from Hans Heiling" ..... Marschner
Symphony No. 7, in C major....Schubert

The soloists on Saturday will be David Bispham. The ballade for baritone and orchestra, by Frederick Converse, the young Boston composer, uses as text Keats's "La Belle Dame sans Merci." Mr. Converse is one of the promising American composers. Lately his one-act opera "The Pipe of Desire" was performed in Boston and received favorable

NEW YORK EV'G POST

MAR 1 0 1906

Mr. Gericke will make his farewell appearance as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall next Thursday and Saturday. On Thursday evening the soloist will be Mr. Henri Marteau, who will introduce a violin concerto by Emil Jaques-Dalcroze, a Viennese by birth, but for the last fourteen years the professor of harmony in the Conservatory of Geneva, where Marteau came to know him. The orchestral numbers will be Bach's Suite in D major, which the orchestra is playing on this trip for the first time in eleven years; Debussey's tone-picture "L'Après Midi d'un Faun" and Beethoven's "Eroica." The soloist on Saturday afternoon will be Mr. David Bispham, and his first number will be a ballade for baritone and orchestra by Frederick Converse, the young Boston composer. The text used is Keats's "La Belle Dame sans Merci." Mr. Converse is one of the most promising of the young American composers. Lately, his one-act opera, "The Pipe of Desire," was performed in Boston and received most favorable notices. Mr. Bispham will also sing the aria, "An Jenem Tag," from Marschner's "Hans Heiling." The orchestral numbers will be Weber's "Der Freischütz" overture, Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture, and Schubert's glorious symphony in C major.

N. Y. EV'G WORLD

ess

MAR 1 0 1906

Mr. Gericke's Farewell.

MORE than ordinary interest attaches to the last two concerts of the season in New York by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will take place at Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. They will mark the farewell visit of Mr. Gericke, the conductor, who at the end of the season will sever his connection with the organization he has done so much to make famous. He will return to Germany. Mr. Gericke has a host of admirers here who may be counted upon to show their regret.

The programme for Thursday night includes Beethoven's third symphony, and the soloist will be Henri Marteau, the French violinist.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the Wor

NEW YORK EV'G POS

om

ddress

ate MAR 1 0 190

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's last Brooklyn concert, next Friday evening, will bring Mozart's G minor symphony, Beethoven's "Eroica," and Dvorák's 'cello concerto, to be played by Mr. Warnke.

tablished: London, 1801; New York,

NEW YORK WORL

Address

Date MAR 8- 1906

Boston Symphony Quartet Plays.

The Boston Symphony Quartet gave a novel programme at Mendelssohn Hall last night. A serenade, for flute, violin and viola, by Max Reger, which was a novelty here, proved clever in treatment and musical in its effects. It was played by Willy Hess, Emile Ferir and Maquarre, all members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. A Strauss sonata for violin and piano was played with spirit by Willy Hess and Mme. Olga Samaroff. The final work was the Beethoven Quartet in E flat, Opus 127.

From TOWN & COUNTRY

Address NEW YORK CITY.

Date MAR 10 1906

The last part of the first week of Lent in Providence was marked by two concerts of unusual interest, the "stars" for each being David Bispham and Miss Susan Metcalfe. Mr. Bispham sang at the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Infantry Hall. Miss Susan Metcalfe, however, went to Providence from New York under the patronage of Mrs. Alfred M. Coats, who met her some time ago in Paris, where she had lived and studied until recently. Miss Metcalfe sang in Memorial Hall, in the aristocratic quarter of Providence, where, in response to announcements sent out by Mrs. Coats, the most exclusive society in the city assembled. The voice of the singer was a delight and a revelation and everybody understood why Mrs. Coats had induced her to come to America.

195

m NEW YORK HERALD
ress
MAR 4 - 1906

Its third and last chamber music concert of the season will be given by the Boston Symphony Quartet in Mendelssohn Hall on Wednesday evening. The programme will be opened with a work new to local programmes, a serenade for flute, violin and viola by Max Reger, in which Mr. Andre Maquarre, solo flutist of the Boston orchestra, will assist Professor Willy Hess and Mr. Emil Ferir. The other numbers will be Richard Strauss' sonata for piano and violin in E flat major, Mme. Olga Samaroff being the pianist, and Beethoven's quartet in E flat major, opus 127, a by no means familiar work.

Address NEW YORK SUN
MAR 4 -

The last two Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts of the season will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, March 15, and on Saturday, March 17. Peculiar interest attaches to these, since they will mark Mr. Gericke's farewell appearance in New York as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. As already has been announced, Mr. Gericke will retire from this post at the end of this season. Three novelties are announced for these concerts. One is a symphonic poem by Ernst Boehe, a young composer of Munich. It is a work of very large dimensions and is entitled "Odysseus's Departure and Shipwreck." Another will be an unknown concerto for violin by the Swiss, Emile Jaques-Dalcroze, which Henri Marteau will play on Thursday evening. The third will be a setting for baritone and orchestra of Keats's "La Belle Dame sans Merci," by Frederick Converse of Boston. This David Bispham will sing at the Saturday matinée concert. The symphonies will be Richard Strauss's "Aus Italiens" and Schubert's symphony in C major.

ress NEW YORK SUN
MAR 4 - 1906

The third and last concert by the Boston Symphony Quartet will be given in Mendelssohn Hall next Wednesday evening at 8:15. It will be the occasion of introducing in New York a novelty which is likely to arouse much interest among musical connoisseurs, a serenade for flute, violin and viola by Max Reger, who just now is a close rival of Richard Strauss for the honor of holding the centre of the stage in the world of music. The second number on the programme will be Richard Strauss's sonata for pianoforte and violin in E flat major, a favorite work with lovers of chamber music. This will be played by Prof. Willy Hess and Mme. Olga Samaroff. The final number will be Beethoven's quartet in E flat major, opus 127, No. 12 a work which is generally less familiar than the other late quartets of the master.

dress N. Y. EV'G SUN
MAR 6 - 1906
te

To-night the first of the big orchestras will conclude its season at Carnegie Hall, next week the second and a fortnight from now the third and last. It has been the busiest of concert seasons, and here also the records of the performance will be interesting.

Tschaikowsky and Beethoven lead the orchestra bills of all that New York has heard since November. The oddest feature is the Boston orchestra's ten Manhattan concerts, wherein no symphony of the name of Beethoven occurs. Mr. Gericke, however, played the "Pastoral," No. 6, in Brooklyn. Herr Weingartner conducted the Fifth in both boroughs, the Philadelphia men played it in Brooklyn, the Philharmonic in Manhattan and the People's concerts three times here. Score seven; and one each for the Bostonian Sixth and Philharmonic Third, two for the Eighth by Philharmonic and New York orchestras, two for the Second by Walter Damrosch, and two for the Seventh by Frank Damrosch and Arnold Volpe.

That's fifteen symphonies for Beethoven. The Russian composer has about the same record, his Fourth five times heard, his Fifth and "Manfred" once, his "Serenade" and "Francesca" twice each, his First Symphony twice, by Volpe and Altschuler, and his "Pathétique" No. 6 twice, notably the special Philharmonic repetition under M. Safonoff.

GLOB
NEW YORK COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER
MAR 7 - 1906

THE strong probability that Mr. Safonoff will be secured as sole conductor of the Philharmonic Society next season, and that Fritz Steinbach of Cologne, who is to conduct the last public rehearsal and concert of the Philharmonic Society this season, is to succeed Mr. Gericke as head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, points to the solution of two vexed questions. The local popularity of Mr. Safonoff makes his choice a happy one. His fame here, it is true, came chiefly through his remarkable conducting of Tschaikowsky's music, but he has shown his versatility by his successful interpretation of music as alien in spirit and manner to Tschaikowsky's as Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" overture. Mr. Steinbach is as yet unknown in America, but there would seem to be a special reason for his choice to lead the Boston orchestra in the fact that his own orchestra has been the most polished in rom N. Y. TRIBUNE,

ddress
ate

THE NEXT BOSTON CONDUCTOR.

There are circumstances which, put together, would seem to indicate that the next conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be Fritz Steinbach, who is coming from Cologne to conduct the last concert this season of the Philharmonic Society. Herr Steinbach is music director general at Cologne, and his services there are arduous. So are those of the Boston conductor, but American salaries are considerably larger than those paid even to music directors general, and it may be that Mr. Higginson, who refused to give Mr. Theodore Thomas $14,000 a year when he went to Chicago, will now be willing to put up that amount or something like it to secure the services of as well known a conductor as Herr Steinbach. In America he would have to conduct over one hundred concerts, but in Cologne the music director general has the direction of two municipal institutions, the Conservatory and the Gürzenich concerts, has to conduct a singing society and miscellaneous concerts, and is generally responsible for the music in his bailiwick besides. The circumstances which point to the likelihood that Herr Steinbach is negotiating with Mr. Higginson are these: In his correspondence with the directors of the Philharmonic touching the concert which is to take place on the 24th of this month, Herr Steinbach sought to make his stay here as short as possible. He wanted to take a quick steamer of one of the German lines, arrive here about March 19 or 20, and hasten back to Europe immediately after the concert. He was thus unwilling to devote as much time to the preliminary rehearsals as his predecessors have given. While the matter was discussing, there suddenly came the announcement that Herr Steinbach had changed his plans and would sail on a slow steamer, the Cymric, from Liverpool, on March 8, for Boston, instead of for New-York. There is much significance in that; also in the fact that Mr. Willy Hess, the concert master of the Boston Orchestra, used to occupy the same place under Herr Steinbach in Cologne.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau
From AMERICAN HEBREW
Address NEW YORK CITY.
Date MAR 9 - 1906

The last two Boston Symphony concerts of the season will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, March 15, and on Saturday afternoon, March 17. Peculiar interest attaches to these, since they will mark Mr. Gericke's farewell appearance in New York as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. As already has been announced, Mr. Gericke will retire from this post at the end of this season. Three novelties are announced for these concerts. One is a symphonic poem by Ernst Boehe, a young composer of Munich. It is a work of very large dimensions, and is entitled "Odysseus's Departure and Shipwreck." Another will be an unknown concerto for violin by the Swiss, Emile Jacques-Dalcroze, which Henri Marteau will play on Thursday evening. The third will be a setting for baritone and orchestra of Keats's "La Belle Dame sans Merci," by Frederick Converse of Boston. This Mr. David Bispham will sing at the Saturday matinee concert. The symphonies will be Richard Strauss's "Aus Italien" and Schubert's great symphony in C major.

CITY.
MAR 10

Wilhelm Gericke was star at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's final matinee. After the C major Schubert symphony, which is one of Gericke's special accomplishments, so to say, the conductor was compelled to make a short speech of acknowledgment. New York will not see him again. His successor as conductor of the best American orchestra has not been named, though it is a plausible inference that Fritz Steinbach, who leads this week's Philharmonic concerts, may take the post at least for next year.

The Boston men played Weber and Goldmark and David Bispham sang the familiar "Hans Heiling" aria and a new ballade by Frederick S. Converse, "La Belle Dame sans Merci," which made a good impression.

The Russian Symphony Orchestra, com-

n N. Y. EV'G SUN
ress
MAR 1 - 190
e

The last two Boston Symphony concerts of the New York season, on March 15 and 17, will mark Mr. Gericke's farewell appearances here as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. As already has been announced, Mr. Gericke will retire from this post at the end of this season.

THE MORNING TELEGRAPH
NEW YORK CITY
MAR 9 - 1906

Loving Cup for Gericke.

(Special Dispatch to The Morning Telegraph.)

BALTIMORE, March 8.—There is a movement to purchase a silver loving cup to be presented to Wilhelm Gericke, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, when he makes his last appearance in this city before his retirement. A committee has been appointed to collect $1 subscriptions for the cup. The presentation is to take place at the Lyric on the evening of March 14.

N Y
;

Wilhelm Gericke, who has served the Boston Symphony Orchestra through half its quarter century and made the ensemble what it is to-day, is perhaps the only musician in America whose place in the hearts of his temporary fellow countrymen could be successfully disputed next week against that of the popular idol, Caruso.

His last pair of concerts in Carnegie Hall will bring to an end the most prosperous season the orchestra has ever had in this city. And two of the largest audiences, of course, will mark the farewell appearances of the conductor. Unquestionably the outburst of friendly feeling which greeted him in Boston after the announcement of of his intended retirement will find an echo here, both after the "Eroica" symphony of Beethoven on Thursday night, when Marteau is another attraction, and after the concluding Schubert symphony in C major, No. 7, on Saturday afternoon. David Bispham at the matinée will sing the new ballad by F. S. Converse, whose one-act opera, "Pipes of Desire," has just been heard in Boston.

Brooklyn on Friday night will hear Mr. Gericke conduct two symphonies, the Beethoven and also Mozart's in G minor, while Mr. Warnke will play the Dvorák 'cello concerto.

Address
ate MAR 1

Wilhelm Gericke's farewell New York appearances as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be made next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon at Carnegie Hall, and many will be on hand to wish him good fortune, in appreciation of his thorough and admirable service.

The Thursday programme will be:

Suite in D major, No. 3.....Bach
Concerto for violin (first time),
Jaques-Dalcroze
Mr. Henri Marteau.
"L'Apres-Midi d'un Faun".....Debussy
Symphony No. 3, "Eroica"....Beethoven

On Saturday afternoon the Boston Orchestra's list will be as follows:

Overture, "Der Freischuetz".....Weber
Ballade for baritone and orchestra,
Converse (first time)
Overture, "Sakuntala"..... Goldmark
Aria, "An Jenem Tag," from Hans Heiling" ..... Marschner
Symphony No. 7, in C major....Schubert

The soloists on Saturday will be David Bispham. The ballade for baritone and orchestra, by Frederick Converse, the young Boston composer, uses as text Keats's "La Belle Dame sans Merci." Mr. Converse is one of the promising American composers. Lately his one-act opera "The Pipe of Desire" was performed in Boston and received favorably

ess
e

Mr. Gericke will make his farewell appearance as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall next Thursday and Saturday. On Thursday evening the soloist will be Mr. Henri Marteau, who will introduce a violin concerto by Emil Jaques-Dalcroze, a Viennese by birth, but for the last fourteen years the professor of harmony in the Conservatory of Geneva, where Marteau came to know him. The orchestral numbers will be Bach's Suite in D major, which the orchestra is playing on this trip for the first time in eleven years; Debussey's tone-picture "L'Après Midi d'un Faun" and Beethoven's "Eroica." The soloist on Saturday afternoon will be Mr. David Bispham, and his first number will be a ballade for baritone and orchestra by Frederick Converse, the young Boston composer. The text used is Keats's "La Belle Dame sans Merci." Mr. Converse is one of the most promising of the young American composers. Lately, his one-act opera, "The Pipe of Desire," was performed in Boston and received most favorable notices. Mr. Bispham will also sing the aria, "An Jenem Tag," from Marschner's "Hans Heiling." The orchestral numbers will be Weber's "Der Freischütz" overture, Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture and Schubert's glorious symphony in C major.

N. Y. EV'G
ess
e

Mr. Gericke's Farewell.

MORE than ordinary interest attaches to the last two concerts of the season in New York by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will take place at Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. They will mark the farewell visit of Mr. Gericke, the conductor, who at the end of the season will sever his connection with the organization he has done so much to make famous. He will return to Germany. Mr. Gericke has a host of admirers here who may be counted upon to show their regret.

The programme for Thursday night includes Beethoven's third symphony, and the soloist will be Henri Marteau, the French violinist.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the Wor
om
ldress
ate

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's last Brooklyn concert, next Friday evening, will bring Mozart's G minor symphony, Beethoven's "Eroica," and Dvorák's 'cello concerto, to be played by Mr. Warnke.

tablished: London, 1881; New York,
NEW YORK WORLD
Address
Date MAR 8 - 1906

Boston Symphony Quartet Plays.

The Boston Symphony Quartet gave a novel programme at Mendelssohn Hall last night. A serenade, for flute, violin and viola, by Max Reger, which was a novelty here, proved clever in treatment and musical in its effects. It was played by Willy Hess, Emile Ferir and Maquarre, all members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. A Strauss sonata for violin and piano was played with spirit by Willy Hess and Mme. Olga Samaroff. The final work was the Beethoven Quartet in E flat, Opus 127.

From TOWN & COUNTRY
Address
Date MAR 10 1906

The last part of the first week of Lent in Providence was marked by two concerts of unusual interest, the "stars" for each being David Bispham and Miss Susan Metcalfe. Mr. Bispham sang at the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Infantry Hall. Miss Susan Metcalfe, however, went to Providence from New York under the patronage of Mrs. Alfred M. Coats, who met her some time ago in Paris, where she had lived and studied until recently. Miss Metcalfe sang in Memorial Hall, in the aristocratic quarter of Providence, where, in response to announcements sent out by Mrs. Coats, the most exclusive society in the city assembled. The voice of the singer was a delight and a revelation and everybody understood why Mrs. Coats had induced her to come to America.

[195]

TELEGRAM

MAR 8- 1906

When Flat Notes Are Out

Boston Symphony Quartet Rises from Reger to Beethoven.

THE Boston Symphony Quartet devoted two-thirds of the programme of its third concert at Mendelssohn Hall last night to what may be called "the new music," represented by those composers who agree with M. Vincent d'Indy that the possibilities of musical composition along harmonic and melodic lines have been exhausted and that future development must be made along the line of the dissonance.

Richard Strauss and d'Indy himself were in the van of this school until they were outdistanced by Max Reger, who has carried the idea of the dissonance to such a length that when recently he was serenaded by students with tin horns and similar crude instruments one of his critics claimed that the serenade sounded very much like one of Roger's own works.

And it was with a serenade by Reger for flute, violin and viola that the Boston Symphony Quartet opened its concert. This proved to be a composition characterized by simplicity of theme and mastery of construction. The thematic material was not of marked poetic quality and did not reveal much individuality.

In the first movement, allegro, the flute playing of André Maquarre revealed especially rich quality in the lower tones. There were several long passages evidently written by the composer with no regard for the mere mechanics of breathing.

In the second movement, andante, the theme again was not expressive, although it was written with marvellous counterpoint for flute and viola, followed by variations in minor. The concluding cadences were suave and grateful, after a good deal of complex, varicolored scoring.

The concluding movement, presto, was a brilliant light hearted essay in simple tonalities, with a deft intermingling of rhythms. The viola received the least individual treatment. The serenade ended with a series of plaintive Brahms-like sequences of chaste, august beauty.

Richard Strauss was represented by the second number, a sonata for piano and violin, opus 18, a work of vigorous breadth and much inherent beauty. Of the three movements, the andante was the most appealing, with a tender quality, reminiscent of Bruch. The last movement contained a consummate exposition of theme, a veritable "call to the faithful" (the Strauss faithful) and a challenge to criticism. Mme. Olga Samaroff at the piano played vigorously and self-assertively, yet with a fine sense of proportion. Certain passages in the first movement, allegro, were marred by injudicious pedalling.

Professor Willy Hess' treatment of the violin part of the sonata was marked by scholarly insight rather than poetic inspiration. The damp weather makes the tonal path a slippery one to the unwary. Hess seemed to confuse "legato" with "slurring." Well knit theme-playing is not necessarily a series of slurred dissonances. On the G string, he gave vent to a series of raspings more popular in Vienna than in New York.

The concert ended with a scholarly, but in nowise inspired performance of Beethoven's lengthy quartet in E flat major, opus 127, No. 12. The pitch of the players was not always sure enough to enable the listeners to grasp the intricate polyphonics of Beethoven's maturer work. The concert as a whole was an ascending series from Reger to Beethoven. It is well to remember that, even now, the chairs of mathematics and of music are held by two individuals.

Miss Sally Frothingham Akers

GLOBE

YORK COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER

MAR 8- 1906

THE programme of the final concert of the Boston Symphony Quartet at Mendelssohn Hall last night offered an interesting opportunity to compare Richard Strauss with Max Reger, who is regarded by many as his great German rival in the field of modern music. The work by Reger was a new serenade for flute, violin, and viola, played here for the first time. It showed in common with so much of the ultra-modern music a meagreness of melodic invention. It was certainly far less melodious than the Strauss sonata for violin and piano which followed it. What melody the Reger serenade possesses, however, is varied, contrasted, and interwoven with the skill of genius, and attains, in the last movement, through the magnificent economy with which the slight materials are used, to a kind of restrained austerity.

One is impressed first in the piece by the absence of the more striking qualities of ultra-modern music, abrupt changes of rhythm, and startling contrasts of tone color. There was a moderation in the piece that seemed to mould all its new materials into a strange but almost classic preciseness of form. A surprising thing about the instrumental scheme is the sonorous body of tone which the composer has succeeded in getting from the blending of his three small instruments, and he shapes and models this sonorous body like a sculpture in high relief. Compared with this serenade, the inflamed melodies of the Strauss sonata seemed romantic in spirit and in form. Willy Hess and Mme Olga Samaroff played the sonata brilliantly. Mr. Hess's brilliance was a little nervous and cutting, and missed the tenderness that Mme Samaroff put into the gentler melodies.

The programme closed with the Beethoven quartet in E-flat major, a work so sternly tragic that one feels it could only have been fitted into the intimate quartet form by the sort of evasive reticence with which it is expressed. In the performance the ensemble was often excellent, but it lacked smoothness in the more difficult forte passages. One thing that prevents the perfect ensemble of this organization in the fact that the tone of the first violin is more brilliant than that of any of the other instruments, and that Mr. Hess permits himself to accentuate his own part. On the whole, however, it was the most interesting and finished concert which this quartet has given here.

NEW YORK CITY

MAR 8- 1906

NEW MUSIC OF MODERN GERMANY

Trio by Max Reger Played at Boston Symphony Quartet's Concert—An Interesting Composition.

Max Reger, Germany's absolutely newest composer, who has been setting the Kaiser's dominions agog with his prodigious orchestral works, must have been in docile mood when he wrote the serenade for flute, violin and viola, opus 77A, played last night by the Boston Symphony Quartet at Mendelssohn Hall for the first time here.

Whether the instrumental combination seemed so inadequate as a vehicle of musical anarchism that Reger decided to roar gently for once will be better known after more of his music is performed here. That it will speedily make its way in New York, if it be so genuinely interesting as the trio played last evening, may be confidently expected.

There were distinct and admirable ideas disclosed, in every one of the three movements, and the composer developed them with a knowledge and an intuition happily mated. Each instrument spoke its own language; there was no straining after recondite or sensational effects. It was pure music and good music, and a welcome addition to the repertory.

Mr. Andre Maquarre, flautist, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, assisted Mr. Hess and Mr. Feier in a thoroughly satisfying performance of this novelty.

Richard Strauss also figured on last night's list, and he, too, was taken in kindly and tractable mood. His sonata for piano and violin, played by Mme. Samaroff and Mr. Hess, grows more grateful and more impressive with familiarity. It was performed with spirit, the pianist's forceful touch being restrained to balance the string tone.

The Boston Quartet was heard in Beethoven's E flat major quartet, opus 127, No. 12, a work not often performed.

The audience was enthusiastic and of good size.

MAR 8- 1906

[illegible] mutikalischen Sturmerkundigung [illegible] orientiert, indem es als erste Nummer eine Serenade (op. 77) von Max Reger [illegible] bot. Allerdings betheiligten sich vom Quartett nur die Herren Heß und Ferir, und ferner der erste Flötist des Bostoner Symphonieorchesters, André Maquarre, daran, denn die Serenade ist für Flöte, Violine und Viola geschrieben.

Reger steht unter den modernen deutschen Komponisten sehr weit links, und über die jüngste Berliner Aufführung seiner „Sinfonietta" hat man ganz abenteuerliche Dinge gehört. In der kleinen Serenade indessen ist er lange nicht so schlimm, als jene Berichte ihn gemacht haben. Die Themen sind ungekünstelt und zum größten Theil von überraschender Einfachheit. Sie sind auch nicht besonders tief oder hervorstechend originell, aber das brauchen sie eben in einer Serenade auch nicht zu sein, um ihren Zweck zu erfüllen. Natürlich läßt sich Reger 'solch' moderne Modulationen zu schulden kommen, daß alle diejenigen, die immer nur nach dem "tune" suchen und gar nicht im Stande sind, ihn wiederzuerkennen, wenn der Komponist ihn umgestaltet, sich zur Genüge an dieser Serenade ärgern mögen. Das sei ihnen gegönnt; das Publikum dachte offenbar anders, denn es applaudirte höchst ungezwungen. Den besten Eindruck machte offenbar der zweite Satz, Variationen über ein wirklich schönes und praktisches Thema, das Beste in dieser Serenade. Und wie Reger in einer dieser Variationen die Harmonien wechselt, das muß selbst hartgesottene Konzertbesucher von modernster Observanz überraschen. Desgleichen mag es sie entzücken, denn da ist niemals Gewaltsamkeit in diesen Wechseln zu merken. Die drei Vortragenden verdienen ganz besonders warmen Dank für die vortreffliche Ausführung, die sie dem Werke zu theil werden ließen.

Und dann kam wieder noch nicht das Quartett, sondern die Richard Strauß'sche Sonate für Klavier und Violine. Olga Samaroff spielte den Klavierpart, und sie fügte damit ihren früheren Erfolgen einen neuen hinzu. Wer so jung ist und so viel Technik hat, pflegt dem Ensemblespiel keinen besonderen Reiz abzugewinnen, aber Frau Samaroff ist offenbar von ernsterer Gesinnung. Sie spielte sich nicht von außen an das Werk hinan, sondern sie war offenbar in voller Sympathie mit seinem schönen musikalischen Inhalt; und sie faßte das Ganze mit einer gesunden Energie und Kraft an, wie sie bei klavierspielenden Damen nur selten zu finden ist. Dabei hatte sie, wo es noth that, wie in dem Chopinesken Schluß der „Improvisation", die zartesten, duftigsten Anschlagsnuancen zur Verfügung. Am bewunderungswürdigsten aber war der straffe Rhythmus im letzten Satz, der rhythmisch überaus widerhaarig ist. Nun, und das schwache Geschlecht ist bei allen seinen anderen „starken" Seiten am schwächsten im Rhythmus. Herr Heß aber, der den Violinpart spielte, ließ auch an Schwung nichts zu wünschen übrig, und so erhielt das Publikum mit der Wiedergabe dieser Sonate einen Genuß, der es in förmlichen Enthusiasmus versetzte.

Den Schluß des Konzertes bildete Beethoven's Quartett in Es-dur, op. 127.

NEW YORK PRESS

MAR 8- 1906

Samaroff with Boston Quartet.

The old and the new music had a place on the programme of the Boston Symphony Quartet, at its third concert in Mendelssohn Hall last night, with compositions by Max Reger, Richard Strauss and Beethoven. The Munich composer's work came first to a hearing and gave an answer to the problem, "When Is a Quartet Not a Quartet?" That was when Professor Hess, Emile Ferir and Andre Maquarre, flutist, appeared as a trio. The composition was a serenade, in D major, for flute, violin and viola, never heard here before. It proved an extremely interesting work, with its one theme cleverly embroidered in the second movement. There was nothing in it to shock ears sensitive to the music of the moderns, and much to delight the unprejudiced. The Strauss sonata had Mme. Olga Samaroff at the piano, Professor Hess playing the violin part. The success of this number was due more to Mme. Samaroff, who grows in artistic stature with every appearance, than to Professor Hess, whose intonation at times, particularly in the last movement, was decidedly faulty. As a contrast the pianist played the difficult finale with an authority and beauty of tone that showed how fine an artist she is. With the Beethoven number the quartet appeared in proper person, playing the No. 12, E-flat major, op. 127. The programme and the playing deserved a larger audience.

[illegible]

OUR MOMENTS OF MAX[illegible]
OUR CONCERT HALL

Melody Flows [illegible] Max Reger Flute Notes and the Newest Terror of Tone Poetry Rumble. Sings an Early Strauss Sonata, with Mr. Hess and Mme. Samaroff, at Boston Symphony Quartet's Farewell—Reger's Choral Music To-night—The Next Orchestra Star, Mr. Gericke, Whose Farewells Will Clash with Opera's Biggest Days, Has Dropped a Strauss Symphony for the "Eroica" of Beethoven as His Swan-Song.

Let melody and Max Reger flow. If last evening's musical novelty in town was a fair sample of the newest radical over whom Germany has reached a stage of madness written large, from "Reger clubs" and Regerbier to Reger dress reform and Reger hosiery, then let us have more of the same sort. Reger's trio, opus 77a, can be no early indiscretion of applied sanity. It wasn't queer. It was simply charming in the airy nothingness of André Maquarre's assisting flute notes, the bird-voiced violin of Willy Hess and the velvet viola of Emile Ferir. The final "presto" is an inimitable escapade of high spirits, the very thing that our solemn, long-haired devotees of chamber music in countless musical homes should at once take up as a needed spring medicine. It did you good to hear so spontaneous a work of any composer of latter days. The ensuing Richard Strauss sonata, op. 18, with its prophecy of master songs, was not a more grateful offering, in spite of a performance by Mr. Hess and Mme. Samaroff that made Mendelssohn Hall ring with applause.

Accidentally reduced from tripod to biped, Mr. Roth's music rack fell off the stage when the second violin, together with the 'cellist, Mr. Warnke, reappeared last of all in a Beethoven string quartet, op. 127, No. 12.

The Boston Symphony Quartet, though first among many such organizations to close the work of this busy year, was yet fortunate in putting in its best work at the finish line. Col. Higginson's touring secretary, Mr. Walter, announced a return series next winter.

GERMAN HERALD

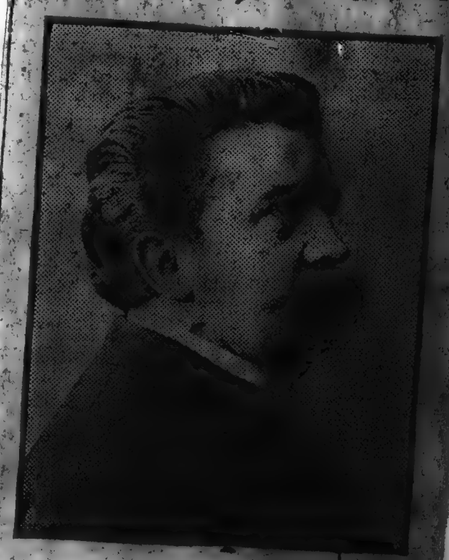
NEW YORK CITY.

MAR 8- 1906

Steinbach nach Boston?

Der Kölner Kapellmeister mag Gericke's Nachfolger werden.

Liverpool, 8. März. Zum Erstaunen seiner Bekannten ist heute der Kölner Kapellmeister Fritz Steinbach statt direkt nach New York mit der „Cymric" nach Boston abgefahren. Seine Fahrt über die Bohnenstadt steht möglicherweise



Fritz Steinbach.

im Zusammenhang mit dem Gerücht, er solle der Nachfolger Wilhelm Gericke's als Leiter des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters werden. Was daran ist, läßt sich noch nicht sagen, immerhin bleibt es ein bedeutsamer Umstand, daß Herr Steinbach nicht direkt nach New York fährt. Es heißt, der erste Anstoß zu mit dem bekannten Musiker eingeleiteten Verhandlungen sei von Herrn Willy Heß ausgegangen, dem Concertmeister im Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester, der denselben Posten unter Herrn Steinbach in Köln bekleidete.

[196]

EVE TELEGRAM

MAR 8- 1904

When Flat Notes Are Overdue.

Boston Symphony Quartet Rises from Reger to Beethoven.

THE Boston Symphony Quartet devoted two-thirds of the programme of its third concert at Mendelssohn Hall last night to what may be called "the new music," represented by those composers who agree with M. Vincent d'Indy that the possibilities of musical composition along harmonic and melodic lines have been exhausted and that future development must be made along the line of the dissonance.

Richard Strauss and d'Indy himself were in the van of this school until they were outdistanced by Max Reger, who has carried the idea of the dissonance to such a length that when recently he was serenaded by students with tin horns and similar crude instruments one of his critics claimed that the serenade sounded very much like one of Roger's own works.

And it was with a serenade by Reger for flute, violin and viola that the Boston Symphony Quartet opened its concert. This proved to be a composition characterized by simplicity of theme and mastery of construction. The thematic material was not of marked poetic quality and did not reveal much individuality.

In the first movement, allegro, the flute playing of André Maquarre revealed especially rich quality in the lower tones. There were several long passages evidently written by the composer with no regard for the mere mechanics of breathing.

In the second movement, andante, the theme again was not expressive, although it was written with marvellous counterpoint for flute and viola, followed by variations in minor. The concluding cadences were suave and grateful, after a good deal of complex, varicolored scoring.

The concluding movement, presto, was a brilliant light hearted essay in simple tonalities, with a deft intermingling of rhythms. The viola received the least individual treatment. The serenade ended with a series of plaintive Brahms-like sequences of chaste, august beauty.

Richard Strauss was represented by the second number, a sonata for piano and violin, opus 18, a work of vigorous breadth and much inherent beauty. Of the three movements, the andante was the most appealing, with a tender quality, reminiscent of Bruch. The last movement contained a consummate exposition of theme, a veritable "call to the faithful" (the Strauss faithful) and a challenge to criticism. Mme. Olga Samaroff at the piano played vigorously and self-assertively, yet with a fine sense of proportion. Certain passages in the first movement, allegro, were marred by injudicious pedalling.

Professor Willy Hess' treatment of the violin part of the sonata was marked by scholarly insight rather than poetic inspiration. The damp weather makes the tonal path a slippery one to the unwary. Hess seemed to confuse "legato" with "slurring." Well knit theme—playing is not necessarily a series of slurred dissonances. On the G string, he gave vent to a series of raspings more popular in Vienna than in New York.

The concert ended with a scholarly, but in nowise inspired performance of Beethoven's lengthy quartet in E flat major, opus 127, No. 12. The pitch of the players was not always sure enough to enable the listeners to grasp the intricate polyphonics of Beethoven's maturer work. The concert as a whole was an ascending series from Reger to Beethoven. It is well to remember that, even now, the chairs of mathematics and of music are held by two individuals.

Miss Sally Frothingham Akers

GLOBE
YORK COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER
MAR 8 1904

THE programme of the final concert of the Boston Symphony Quartet at Mendelssohn Hall last night offered an interesting opportunity to compare Richard Strauss with Max Reger, who is regarded by many as his great German rival in the field of modern music. The work by Reger was a new serenade for flute, violin, and viola, played here for the first time. It showed in common with so much of the ultra-modern music a meagreness of melodic invention. It was certainly far less melodious than the Strauss sonata for violin and piano which followed it. What melody the Reger serenade possesses, however, is varied, contrasted, and interwoven with the skill of genius, and attains, in the last movement, through the magnificent economy with which the slight materials are used, to a kind of restrained austerity.

One is impressed first in the piece by the absence of the more striking qualities of ultra-modern music, abrupt changes of rhythm, and startling contrasts of tone color. There was a moderation in the piece that seemed to mould all its new materials into a strange but almost classic preciseness of form. A surprising thing about the instrumental scheme is the sonorous body of tone which the composer has succeeded in getting from the blending of his three small instruments, and he shapes and models this sonorous body like a sculpture in high relief. Compared with this serenade, the inflamed melodies of the Strauss sonata seemed romantic in spirit and in form. Willy Hess and Mme Olga Samaroff played the sonata brilliantly. Mr. Hess's brilliance was a little nervous and cutting, and missed the tenderness that Mme Samaroff put into the gentler melodies.

The programme closed with the Beethoven quartet in E-flat major, a work so sternly tragic that one feels it could only have been fitted into the intimate quartet form by the sort of evasive reticence with which it is expressed. In the performance the ensemble was often excellent, but it lacked smoothness in the more difficult forte passages. One thing that prevents the perfect ensemble of this organization is the fact that the tone of the first violin is more brilliant than that of any of the other instruments, and that Mr. Hess permits himself to accentuate his own part. On the whole, however, it was the most interesting and finished concert which this quartet has given here.

NEW YORK CITY
MAR 8- 1904

NEW MUSIC OF MODERN GERMANY

Trio by Max Reger Played at Boston Symphony Quartet's Concert—An Interesting Composition.

Max Reger, Germany's absolutely newest composer, who has been setting the Kaiser's dominions agog with his prodigious orchestral works, must have been in docile mood when he wrote the serenade for flute, violin and viola, opus 77A, played last night by the Boston Symphony Quartet at Mendelssohn Hall for the first time here.

Whether the instrumental combination seemed so inadequate as a vehicle of musical anarchism that Reger decided to roar gently for once will be better known after more of his music is performed here. That it will speedily make its way in New York, if it be so genuinely interesting as the trio played last evening, may be confidently expected.

There were distinct and admirable ideas disclosed, in every one of the three movements, and the composer developed them with a knowledge and an intuition happily mated. Each instrument spoke its own language; there was no straining after recondite or sensational effects. It was pure music and good music, and a welcome addition to the repertory.

Mr. Andre Maquarre, flautist, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, assisted Mr. Hess and Mr. Feier in a thoroughly satisfying performance of this novelty.

Richard Strauss also figured on last night's list, and he, too, was taken in kindly and tractable mood. His sonata for piano and violin, played by Mme. Samaroff and Mr. Hess, grows more grateful and more impressive with familiarity. It was performed with spirit, the pianist's forceful touch being restrained to balance the string tone.

The Boston Quartet was heard in Beethoven's E flat major quartet, opus 127, No. 12, a work not often performed.

The audience was enthusiastic and of good size.

MAR 8- 1904

Das „Boston Symphony Quartett".

In seinem gestrigen Konzert in Mendelsohn Hall machte sich das „Boston Symphony Quartett" um die Bereicherung unserer musikalischen Literaturkenntnis verdient, indem es als erste Nummer eine Serenade (op. 77) von Max Reger darbot. Allerdings betheiligten sich vom Quartett nur die Herren Heß und Ferir, und ferner der erste Flötist des Bostoner Symphonieorchesters, André Maquarre, daran, denn die Serenade ist für Flöte, Violine und Viola geschrieben.

Reger steht unter den modernen deutschen Komponisten sehr weit links, und über die jüngste Berliner Aufführung seiner „Sinfonietta" hat man ganz abenteuerliche Dinge gehört. In der kleinen Serenade indessen ist er lange nicht so schlimm, als jene Berichte ihn gemacht haben. Die Themen sind ungekünstelt und zum größten Theil von überraschender Einfachheit. Sie sind auch nicht besonders tief oder hervorstechend originell, aber das brauchen sie eben in einer Serenade auch nicht zu sein, um ihren Zweck zu erfüllen. Natürlich läßt sich Reger solch' moderne Modulationen zu schulden kommen, daß alle diejenigen, die immer nur nach dem "tune" suchen und gar nicht im Stande sind, ihn wiederzuerkennen, wenn der Komponist ihn umgestaltet, sich zur Genüge an dieser Serenade ärgern mögen. Das sei ihnen gegönnt; das Publikum dachte offenbar anders, denn es applaudirte höchst ungezwungen. Den besten Eindruck machte offenbar der zweite Satz, Variationen über ein wirklich schönes und praktisches Thema, das Beste in dieser Serenade. Und wie Reger in einer dieser Variationen die Harmonien wechselt, das muß selbst hartgesottene Konzertbesucher von modernster Observanz überraschen. Desgleichen mag es sie entzücken, denn da ist niemals Gewaltsamkeit in diesen Wechseln zu merken. Die drei Vortragenden verdienen ganz besonders warmen Dank für die vortreffliche Ausführung, die sie dem Werke zu theil werden ließen.

Und dann kam wieder noch nicht das Quartett, sondern die Richard Strauß'sche Sonate für Klavier und Violine. Olga Samaroff spielte den Klavierpart, und sie fügte damit ihren früheren Erfolgen einen neuen hinzu. Wer so jung ist und so viel Technik hat, pflegt dem Ensemblespiel keinen besonderen Reiz abzugewinnen, aber Frau Samaroff ist offenbar von ernsterer Gesinnung. Sie spielte sich nicht von außen an das Werk hinan, sondern sie war offenbar in voller Sympathie mit seinem schönen musikalischen Inhalt; und sie faßte das Ganze mit einer gesunden Energie und Kraft an, wie sie bei klavierspielenden Damen nur selten zu finden ist. Dabei hatte sie, wo es noth that, wie in dem Chopinesken Schluß der „Improvisation", die zartesten, duftigsten Anschlagsnuancen zur Verfügung. Am bewundernswürdigsten aber war der straffe Rhythmus im letzten Satz, der rhythmisch überaus widerhaarig ist. Nun, und das schwache Geschlecht ist bei allen seinen anderen „starken" Seiten am schwächsten im Rhythmus. Herr Heß aber, der den Violinpart spielte, ließ auch an Schwung nichts zu wünschen übrig, und so erhielt das Publikum mit der Wiedergabe dieser Sonate einen Genuß, der es in förmlichen Enthusiasmus versetzte.

Den Schluß des Konzertes bildete Beethoven's Quartett in Es-dur, op. 127.

[illegible]

MAR [illegible] 1904

Samaroff with Boston Quartet.

The old and the new music had a place on the programme of the Boston Symphony Quartet, at its third concert in Mendelssohn Hall last night, with compositions by Max Reger, Richard Strauss and Beethoven. The Munich composer's work came first to a hearing and gave an answer to the problem, "When Is a Quartet Not a Quartet?" That was when Professor Hess, Emile Ferir and Andre Maquarre, flutist, appeared as a trio. The composition was a serenade, in D major, for flute, violin and viola, never heard here before. It proved an extremely interesting work, with its one theme cleverly embroidered in the second movement. There was nothing in it to shock ears sensitive to the music of the moderns, and much to delight the unprejudiced. The Strauss sonata had Mme. Olga Samaroff at the piano, Professor Hess playing the violin part. The success of this number was due more to Mme. Samaroff, who grows in artistic stature with every appearance, than to Professor Hess, whose intonation at times, particularly in the last movement, was decidedly faulty. As a contrast the pianist played the difficult finale with an authority and beauty of tone that showed how fine an artist she is. With the Beethoven number the quartet appeared in proper person, playing the No. 12, E-flat major, op. 127. The programme and the playing deserved a larger audience.

[illegible]

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

ODD MOMENTS OF MAX REGER IN OUR CONCERT HALLS.

Melody Flows in Mr. Maquarre's Soft Flute Notes and the Newest German Terror of Tone Poetry Early Gossings an Early Strauss Sonata, with Mr. Hess and Mme. Samaroff, at Boston Symphony Quartet's Farewell—Reger's Choral Music To-night—The Next Orchestra Star, Mr. Gericke, Whose Farewells Will Clash with Opera's Biggest Days, Has Dropped a Strauss Symphony for the "Eroica" of Beethoven as His Swan-Song.

Let melody and Max Reger flow. If last evening's musical novelty in town was a fair sample of the newest radical over whom Germany has reached a stage of madness written large, from "Reger clubs" and Regerbier to Reger dress reform and Reger hosiery, then let us have more of the same sort. Reger's trio, opus 77a, can be no early indiscretion of applied sanity. It wasn't queer. It was simply charming in the airy nothingness of André Maquarre's assisting flute notes, the bird-voiced violin of Willy Hess and the velvet viola of Emile Ferir. The final "presto" is an inimitable escapade of high spirits; the very thing that our solemn, long-haired devotees of chamber music in countless musical homes should at once take up as a needed spring medicine. It did you good to hear so spontaneous a work of any composer of latter days. The ensuing Richard Strauss sonata, op. 18, with its prophecy of master songs, was not a more grateful offering, in spite of a performance by Mr. Hess and Mme. Samaroff that made Mendelssohn Hall ring with applause.

Accidentally reduced from tripod to biped, Mr. Roth's music rack fell off the stage when the second violin, together with the 'cellist, Mr. Warnke, reappeared last of all in a Beethoven string quartet, op. 127, No. 12.

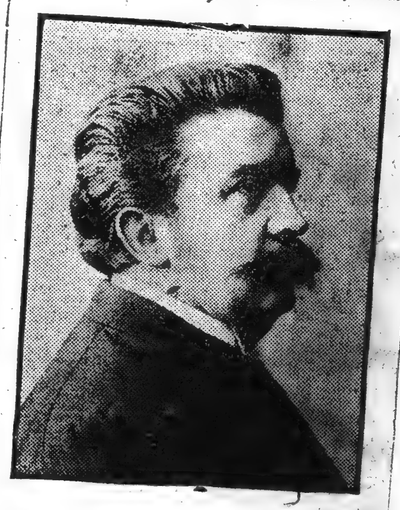
The Boston Symphony Quartet, though first among many such organizations to close the work of this busy year, was yet fortunate in putting in its best work at the finish line. Col. Higginson's touring secretary, Mr. Walter, announced a return series next winter.

GERMAN HERALD
MAR 8- 1904

Steinbach nach Boston?

Der Kölner Kapellmeister mag Gericke's Nachfolger werden.

Liverpool, 8. März. Zum Erstaunen seiner Bekannten ist heute der Kölner Kapellmeister Fritz Steinbach statt direkt nach New York mit der „Cymric" nach Boston abgefahren. Seine Fahrt über die Bohnenstadt steht möglicherweise



Fritz Steinbach.

im Zusammenhang mit dem Gerücht, er solle der Nachfolger Wilhelm Gericke's als Leiter des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters werden. Was daran ist, läßt sich noch nicht sagen, immerhin bleibt es ein bedeutsamer Umstand, daß Herr Steinbach nicht direkt nach New York fährt. Es heißt, der erste Anstoß zu mit dem bekannten Musiker eingeleiteten Verhandlungen sei von Herrn Willy Heß ausgegangen, dem Concertmeister im Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester, der denselben Posten unter Herrn Steinbach in Köln bekleidete.

[196]

N. Y. EVG POST
MAR 8 1906

MUSIC AND DRAMA.

Boston Symphony Quartet.

Reger is coming! While they are breaking heads with beer mugs over him in Munich, American concert-goers have been kept in the dark, so far, as to the quality of his music, except for a few commonplace songs produced at recitals. But last night the Boston Symphony Quartet played one of his works at Mendelssohn Hall, and to-night, at Carnegie Hall, the Musical Art Society will sing one of his choral works; so the ball has been set rolling. It will probably swell to an avalanche within a year or two; and then the whole thing will roll away and Reger be forgotten like hundreds before him.

The composition played last night was a "Serenade" for flute, violin, and viola, marked opus 77 A. It was evidently written by the composer when he was in a peaceful, unchallenging mood, for it does not reflect the cardinal principles that underlie most of his works. It is polyphonic, not aggressively and labyrinthically so; does not show an implacable hostility to tonality and the diatonic scale, nor a craving for quarter tones; and it does not taboo melody. In fact, it is almost as frankly tuneful as Haydn, though, to be sure, the tunes do not amount to much. There is nothing offensive in the Serenade, but it did not leave a desire to hear it again. Twenty-five minutes of music without a boss results, moreover, in monotony. It suggests Méhul's opera "Uthal," in which all the violin parts are played by violas, and after which Grétry exclaimed: "Six strings for a fiddle string."

After the second number on the programme, the Strauss sonata for violin and piano, Mr. Hess had secured the coöperation of that most interesting pianist, Mme. Samaroff. The sonata itself is one of those pieces which concert-goers, for the present, have to put up with, as garden-makers have to with gophers, cut-worms, and ants. No sure remedy for such things has yet been discovered. The final number played was Beethoven's quartet in E flat major.

Address NEW YORK SUN
Date MAR 8 - 1906

BOSTON QUARTET AGAIN.

The Last Performance an Admirable One—Mme. Samaroff Scores.

The first indications that the musical season in New York is drawing to an end are to be found now on every hand. Mr. Damrosch and his Symphony Orchestra have sung their valedictory on Tuesday. Last night the third and last concert of the Boston Symphony Quartet was given in Mendelssohn Hall before an audience of fair size. MM. Hess, Roth, Ferir and Warnke, the members of the quartet, had the assistance of Mme. Olga Samaroff, pianist, and Mr. André Maquarre, flutist.

The programme consisted of Reger's serenade in D major for flute, violin and viola; Richard Strauss's sonata for violin and piano in E flat major and the Beethoven quartet for two violins, viola and violoncello. The Reger number, which was new to this public, proved a very charming composition, with none of the complicated musicianship with which the name of Reger has been associated. The serenade relies in no such means for its interest. In the Strauss sonata Mme. Samaroff distinguished herself by her playing and with Mr. Hess made the performance admirable in every detail.

NEW YORK HERALD
MAR 8 - 19

Boston Symphony Quartet Concert.

The Boston Symphony Quartet's third and final chamber music concert, in Mendelssohn Hall last night, proved to be one of the most interesting entertainments of this organization has given here. Professor Willy Hess and his associates were assisted by Mme. Olga Samaroff, pianist, and Mr. André Maquarre, the Orchestra's flutist, in presenting Reger's serenade for flute, violin and viola in D major, a new work; Richard Strauss' sonata for piano and violin, and Beethoven's rarely heard string quartet in E flat major, opus 127.

The first of these proved to be a most ingenious and charming piece of writing. Reger has stooped to nothing in it that would purchase attention cheaply, and it is likely to obtain popularity slowly, if at all; but he has written fluently in the language of the three instruments and produced some highly agreeable and effective passages. The slow movement was received with most applause last night, as was Mr. Maquarre's beautiful playing. In the Strauss sonata Mme. Samaroff [illegible] frequently

N. Y. EVG SUN
MAR 8 1906

Wilhelm Gericke, whose farewells in Manhattan and Brooklyn are going to clash with the biggest operatic events, has dropped the Strauss "Italian" symphony from the Boston Symphony Orchestra bill for next Thursday night. Beethoven's "Eroica" instead will be this conductor's "swan song." The last matinée symphony will be Schubert's No. 7 in C major.

NEW YORK HERALD
MAR 8 - 1906

Deny Mr. Steinbach Will Be Engaged

[SPECIAL DESPATCH TO THE HERALD.]

BOSTON, Mass., Wednesday.—On the best authority it is denied that Mr. Fritz Steinbach, who is coming from Cologne to conduct the last concert this season of the Philharmonic Society, will be the next conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. No negotiations of any nature whatever have been made with Mr. Steinbach for such purpose.

New York Tim
MAR 11 1906

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The last pair of Boston Symphony concerts of the present season will be given this week on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. They will bring to an end the most successful season the orchestra has ever had in this city, for despite the multiplicity of other orchestral concerts which have made the Winter so notable, the Boston organization has more than held its own in the question of patronage, not only in subscription but also in the sales for the individual concerts.

The coming concerts will mark the farewell appearances in New York of Mr. Gericke as conductor of the orchestra. On Thursday evening the soloist will be Henri Marteau, who will introduce to musical connoisseurs here a violin concerto by Emil Jacques-Dalcrôze, a Viennese by birth, but for the last fourteen years the Professor of Harmony in the Conservatory of Geneva, where Marteau came to know him. The orchestral numbers will be Bach's Suite in D major, which the orchestra is playing on this trip for the first time in eleven years; Debussy's tone-picture, "L'Apres-Midi d'un Faun," and Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony.

The soloist on Saturday afternoon will be David Bispham. His first number will be a ballade for baritone and orchestra by Frederick Converse, the young Boston composer. The text used is Keats's "La Belle Dame sans Merci." Mr. Converse is one of the most promising of the younger American composers. Lately his one-act opera, "The Pipe of Desire," was performed in Boston and received most favorable notices. Mr. Bispham will also sing the aria "An jenem Tag," from Marschner's "Hans Heiling."

The orchestral numbers will be Weber's "Der Freischütz" overture, Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture, and Schubert's symphony in C major. The two programmes in full are as follows:

THURSDAY EVENING.

Suite in D major, No. 3.....Bach
Concerto for violin (first time).....Jacques-Dalcroze
"L'Apres-Midi d'un Faun".....Debussy
Symphony No. 3, Eroica, in E flat major, Op. 55.....Beethoven
Solo artist, Mr. Henri Marteau.

SATURDAY AFTERNOON.

Overture, "Der Freischuetz".....Weber
Ballade for baritone and orchestra, (first time).....Converse
Overture, "Sakuntala".....Goldmark
Aria, "An jenem Tag," from "Hans Heiling".....Marschner
Symphony No. 7, in C major.....Schubert
Solo artist, Mr. David Bispham.

NEW YORK HERALD
MAR 11 19

MUSIC NOTES.

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra's final pair of concerts, on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, in Carnegie Hall, will have the special importance of being Mr. Wilhelm Gericke's farewell to New York concertgoers as conductor of this remarkable organization, to which he has given thirteen years of arduous work. There is sure to be an especially large audience, therefore, as an acknowledgment of the important part he has taken in the upbuilding of musical taste here.

The programmes are both excellent ones. On Thursday evening the assisting artist, Mr. Henri Marteau, will introduce a novelty in a violin concerto by Mr. Emil Jaques-Dalcroze, while the orchestral numbers will be Bach's B major suite for strings; Debussy's tone picture, "L'apres-Midi d'un Faun," and Beethoven's Eroica symphony.

On Saturday afternoon Mr. Bispham will be the soloist, his numbers being a ballad for barytone and orchestra by a young American composer, Mr. Frederick Converse, [illegible] arias from Marschner's "Hans Heiling." The orchestral numbers will be

NEW YORK WORLD
MAR 11 1906

Gericke's Retirement a Great Loss to the Cause of Good Music.

By Edward Ziegler.

AT the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be given at Carnegie Hall next Saturday matinee—which, incidentally, is the last concert this orchestra is to give in New York during the present season—Wilhelm Gericke will appear in this city for the last time as conductor. At least, he will appear here at the head of the Boston Orchestra for the last time; and it is very doubtful if, after his retirement from the podium of this organization, he ever will take up a baton in this country again.

It has been known for some time that this season would be Mr. Gericke's last one; and this rumor assumed the dignity of fact a few weeks ago when this conductor handed in his resignation to Mr. Henry Higginson, the owner and controlling spirit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Since then prophets and music-news detectives have been busy inventing or guessing a conductor of the Boston Orchestra to succeed Mr. Gericke. Several names have been mentioned in this connection. In all likelihood the position will go either to Felix Mottl, of Munich; Dr. Muck, of Berlin, or Gustav Mahler, of Vienna. Thus far the management of the Boston Orchestra maintains a mysterious silence. But the fact that there seems no trace of anxiety about the various principals in this important musical transaction would seem to indicate that, whoever he may be, the successor to Mr. Gericke has already been chosen.

Steinbach May Succeed Gericke.

Recently the above list of candidates has been supplemented by the name of Herr Fritz Steinbach, of Cologne. Steinbach has been engaged to conduct a couple of concerts of the Philharmonic Society a few weeks hence in this city. Rumor had it that because of Herr Steinbach's ardent duties abroad his stay in New York would be of the briefest possible duration. He had planned to arrive here a few days before the first Philharmonic concert, thus allowing himself the customary number of days in which to rehearse the orchestra. But cable reports now inform us that Herr Steinbach sails directly for Boston instead of this port, and that he would arrive in Boston several days before his duties require his presence in New York. All this has been pieced together, and out of it has been woven the story that Herr Steinbach would succeed Herr Gericke in his post as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Herr Steinbach is on the ocean, and the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra still poses as a musical sphinx. So conjecture must remain conjecture until Herr Steinbach arrives to affirm or to deny.

* * *

Gericke's Service to the Orchestra.

Meantime Herr Gericke is bidding farewell to the various audiences in the several cities that are included in the itinerary of this orchestra. Besides an artistic interest, which this conductor has ever shown in his duties, he must feel a deep sentimental interest in parting company with this superb orchestra.

Mr. Gericke has been more than one of the disinterested conductors who have held batons over the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Gericke was one of the conducting godfathers of this organization. He came to it when it was an infant, and he labored with this material, shaping, polishing and filing it until it grew to be one of the most exquisitely balanced and carefully voiced orchestras in the world. More than twenty years ago Mr. Gericke began to slave with this body of players, and he continued active with them for a term of five years, at the end of which he returned to his native country, Austria.

Then there came the aesthetic Arthur Nikisch, who succeeded Gericke, and who found a wonderful instrument upon which to conduct, an instrument that would bend to his slightest wish and was ever alert to follow any artistic whimsicality Nikisch craved. This conductor remained at the head of this orchestra for a term of years and did much toward spreading its fame and toward improving its elasticity.

He was succeeded by the temperamental conductor, Emil Paur, who strove for greater volume of tone and more towering climaxes. Paur served his term faithfully, and at the expiration of it Mr. Gericke was recalled to take up his baton again over an orchestra that he had left comparatively young, but which had aged in beauty and experience during his absence.

It was eight years ago when Herr Gericke returned to the Boston orchestra, and since that time he has been indefatigable in his efforts, not only to maintain the orchestra's standard, but to refine its quality of tone still further. He is known as a drill master of the most untiring patience, who slaved for finesse and refinement of tone within refinement. For all these qualities and for his sane balance of readings Mr. Gericke has been praised endlessly.

But these are days of strenuous music-making. The sensational is listened for, and the ear claims the privilege of hearing crashing climaxes and, in contrast, whispering pianissimos. The latter were among this conductor's specialties, but the crashing climaxes had to be imagined, for Mr. Gericke seldom unleashed the noble brass choir of this band. He had his ideals among the classics, he loved and interpreted Brahms with a devotion that stands to few musicians' credit, but the moderns, with their ponderous orchestral machinery and their excessive demands for deafening effects, were treated in rather a step-fatherly manner by this wielder of the baton. He produced an endless number of novelties of the new school, but he did not read into most of them—particularly not into the Richard Strauss masterpieces—the great draught of fire and did not loose the explosion of climaxes.

Has Been Subject to Criticism.

For this reason Mr. Gericke has been attacked frequently by the impatient ones who missed hearing the life of some of these great modern scores when read by Herr Gericke. But every conductor has his faults, and at this age of music the great craving is for specialists. Yet none has ever denied that Mr. Gericke was a model drill-master. This came to bearing at every concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Never did Gericke seem to lose interest in his work, constantly was he on the alert for the smallest detail of effect. In fact, this was one of his shortcomings since he snapped the thread of logical coherence occasionally by filing at his details with too conscientious accuracy.

Mr. Gericke leaves many friends among his auditors. He will be a difficult man to find a successor for, but whoever is chosen will profit endlessly by the remarkable training this orchestra has had under Gericke's baton. With this orchestra a temperamental conductor like Mottl or Mahler would be able to do emotional wonders. And this is what the music-loving public craves and demands at the present time.

n N. Y. TRIBUNE ress MAR 11 1906
e

MR. GERICKE AND THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

The departure of Mr. Wilhelm Gericke from the musical life of America is a matter of profound regret. Most of the qualities which are looked upon as admirable in the Boston Symphony Orchestra are of his creation. For thirteen years he has set an example of devotion and zeal to a high conception that is quite without parallel. His horizon has not been so wide as that of some of his colleagues who seem to think that fresh ink is a sign of excellence, but neither has it been so unstable, and all that lay within it he presented to the observation and comprehension of the public with marvellous clearness and inviting graciousness. If the ears of the lovers of orchestral music are still familiar with euphony; if the orchestral voice still exerts that elemental charm which lies in beauty of tone-quality and justness of intonation; if we are still able to recognize the fact that there is a difference between musical sonority and noise; if we are not all given over to the belief that passion is most eloquent when it is torn to tatters; if we are still skeptical toward the belief that the ugly is a fit object of artistic pursuit for its own sake,—the credit is largely due to Mr. Gericke and the ideals which he has upheld without a moment's defection during the thirteen years of his labor in America. It is much to be hoped that the hysteria which has seized upon the promoters of orchestral enterprises will soon pass away. Orchestral concerts are the worst of all vehicles for musical sensationalism. Sensationalism in music is the most deplorable of manifestations in art, and orchestral concerts are the worst of all vehicles for its propagation. When once all the old standards of beauty are abandoned, there will be an end of music in the sense that has obtained since the ecclesiastical art culminated in Palestrina, the symphonic in Beethoven and the dramatic in Wagner. The thought is intolerable to all except those mental and physical degenerates for whom all pure and normal pleasures have lost their attractiveness.

NEW YORK PRESS
ss MAR 11 1906

The last pair of Boston Symphony concerts of the present season will be given this week on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. They will bring to an end the most successful season the orchestra has ever held in this city. The coming concerts will be noteworthy in that they will mark the farewell appearances in New York of Mr. Gericke as conductor of the orchestra. Two programmes of artistic merit have been prepared for the coming concerts. On Thursday evening the soloist will be Henri Marteau, who will introduce here a violin concerto by Emil Jaques-Dalcroze, a Viennese by birth, but for the last fourteen years professor of harmony in the Conservatory of Geneva, where Marteau came to know him. The orchestral numbers will be Bach's suite in D major, which the orchestra is playing on this trip for the first time in eleven years; Debussy's exquisite little tone picture, "L'Apres-Midi d'un Faun," and Beethoven's "Eroica."

The soloist on Saturday afternoon will be David Bispham, and his first number will be a ballad for baritone and orchestra by Frederick Converse, the young Boston composer. The text used is Keat's "La Belle Dame sans Merci." Mr. Bispham will also sing the aria "An jenem Tag," from Marschner's "Hans Heiling." The orchestral numbers will be Weber's "Der Freischuetz" overture, Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture and Schubert's symphony in C major.

[197]

NEW YORK EVE POST
MAR 9 1906

MUSIC AND DRAMA.

Boston Symphony Quartet.

Max Reger is coming! While they are already breaking heads with beer mugs over him in Munich, American concert-goers have been kept in the dark, so far, as to the quality of his music, except for a few commonplace songs produced at recent recitals. But last night the Boston Symphony Quartet played one of his pieces at Mendelssohn Hall, and to-night, at Carnegie Hall, the Musical Art Society will sing one of his choral works; so the ball has been set rolling. It will probably swell to an avalanche within a year or two; and then the whole thing will melt away and Reger be forgotten like hundreds before him.

The composition played last night was a "Serenade" for flute, violin, and viola, marked opus 77 A. It was evidently written by the composer when he was in a peaceful, unchallenging mood, for it does not reflect the cardinal principles that underlie most of his works. It is polyphonic, but not aggressively and labyrinthically so; it does not show an implacable hostility to tonality and the diatonic scale, nor a craving for quarter tones; and it does not taboo melody. In fact, it is almost as frankly tuneful as Haydn, though, to be sure, the tunes do not amount to much. There was nothing offensive in the Serenade, but it did not leave a desire to hear it again. Twenty-five minutes of music without a bass results, moreover, in monotony. It suggests Méhul's opera "Uthal," in which all the violin parts are played by violas, and after which Grétry exclaimed: "Six francs for a fiddle string."

For the second number on the programme, the Strauss sonata for violin and piano, Mr. Hess had secured the coöperation of that most interesting pianist, Mme. Samaroff. The sonata itself is one of those pieces which concert-goers, for the present, have to put up with, as garden-makers have to with gophers, cut-worms, and ants. No sure remedy for such things has yet been discovered. The final number played was Beethoven's quartet in E flat major.

Address NEW YORK SUN
Date MAR 8 - 1906

BOSTON QUARTET AGAIN.

The Last Performance an Admirable One —Mme. Samaroff Scores.

The first indications that the musical season in New York is drawing to an end are to be found now on every hand. Mr. Damrosch and his Symphony Orchestra said their valedictory on Tuesday. Last night the third and last concert of the Boston Symphony Quartet was given in Mendelssohn Hall before an audience of fair size. MM. Hess, Roth, Ferir and Warnhe, the members of the quartet, had the assistance of Mme. Olga Samaroff, pianist, and André Moquarre, flutist.

The programme consisted of Reger's serenade in D major for flute, violin and viola; Richard Strauss's sonata for violin and piano in E flat major and the Beethoven quartet for two violins, viola and violoncello. The Reger number, which was new to this public, proved a very charming composition, with none of the complicated musicianship with which the name of Reger has been associated. The serenade relies on no such means for its interest. In the Strauss sonata Mme. Samaroff distinguished herself by her playing and with Mr. Hess made the performance admirable in every detail.

MAR 3 19

Boston Symphony Quartet Concert.

The Boston Symphony Quartet's third and final chamber music concert, in Mendelssohn Hall last night, proved to be one of the most interesting entertainments which this organization has given here. Professor Willy Hess and his associates were assisted by Mme. Olga Samaroff, pianist, and Mr. Andre Maquarre, the Boston Orchestra's flutist, in presenting Max Reger's serenade for flute, violin and viola in D major, a new work; Richard Strauss' sonata for piano and violin, and Beethoven's rarely heard string quartet in E flat major, opus 127.

The first of these proved to be a most ingenious and charming piece of writing. Mr. Reger has stooped to nothing in it which would purchase attention cheaply, and it is likely to obtain popularity slowly, if at all; but he has written fluently in the language of the three instruments and contrived some highly agreeable and effective passages. The slow movement was received with most applause last night, a tribute to Mr. Maquarre's beautiful playing.

In the Strauss sonata Mme. Samaroff sometimes overdid her share of the en- On the other hand, she frequently great taste and delicacy of feel-

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
rom
ddress
MAR 8 1906

Wilhelm Gericke, whose farewells to Manhattan and Brooklyn are going to clash with the biggest operatic events, has dropped the Strauss "Italian" symphony from the Boston Symphony Orchestra bill for next Thursday night. Beethoven's "Eroica" instead will be this conductor's "swan song." The last matinée symphony will be Schubert's No. 7 in C major.

MAR 8 - 1906

Deny Mr. Steinbach Will Be Engaged

[SPECIAL DESPATCH TO THE HERALD.]

BOSTON, Mass., Wednesday.—On the best authority it is denied that Mr. Fritz Steinbach, who is coming from Cologne to conduct the last concert this season of the Philharmonic Society, will be the next conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. No negotiations of any nature whatever have been made with Mr. Steinbach for such purpose.

New York Tim
MAR 8 1906

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The last pair of Boston Symphony concerts of the present season will be given this week on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. They will bring to an end the most successful season the orchestra has ever had in this city, for despite the multiplicity of other orchestral concerts which have made the Winter so notable, the Boston organization has more than held its own in the question of patronage, not only in subscription but also in the sales for the individual concerts.

The coming concerts will mark the farewell appearances in New York of Mr. Gericke as conductor of the orchestra. On Thursday evening the soloist will be Henri Marteau, who will introduce to musical connoisseurs here a violin concerto by Emil Jacques-Dalcrôze, a Viennese by birth, but for the last fourteen years the Professor of Harmony in the Conservatory of Geneva, where Marteau came to know him. The orchestral numbers will be Bach's Suite in D major, which the orchestra is playing on this trip for the first time in eleven years; Debussy's tone-picture, "L'Apres-Midi d'un Faun," and Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony.

The soloist on Saturday afternoon will be David Bispham. His first number will be a ballade for baritone and orchestra by Frederick Converse, the young Boston composer. The text used is Keats's "La Belle Dame sans Merci." Mr. Converse is one of the most promising of the younger American composers. Lately his one-act opera, "The Pipe of Desire," was performed in Boston and received most favorable notices. Mr. Bispham will also sing the aria "An jenem Tag," from Marschner's "Hans Heiling."

The orchestral numbers will be Weber's "Der Freischütz" overture, Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture, and Schubert's symphony in C major. The two programmes in full are as follows:

THURSDAY EVENING.

Suite in D major, No. 3.....Bach
Concerto for violin (first time).....Jacques-Dalcroze
"L'Apres-Midi d'un Faun".....Debussy
Symphony No. 3, Eroica, in E flat major, Op. 55.....Beethoven
Solo artist, Mr. Henri Marteau.

SATURDAY AFTERNOON.

Overture, "Der Freischuetz".....Weber
Balade for baritone and orchestra (first time).....Converse
Overture, "Sakuntala".....Goldmark
Aria, "An jenem Tag," from "Hans Heiling".....Marschner
Symphony No. 7, in C major.....Schubert
Solo artist, Mr. David Bispham.

NEW YORK HERALD
MAR 11 190

MUSIC NOTES.

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra's final pair of concerts, on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, in Carnegie Hall, will have the special importance of being Mr. Wilhelm Gericke's farewell to New York concertgoers as conductor of this remarkable organization, to which he has given thirteen years of arduous work. There is sure to be an especially large audience, therefore, as an acknowledgment of the important part he has taken in the upbuilding of musical taste here.

The programmes are both excellent ones. On Thursday evening the assisting artist, Mr. Henri Marteau, will introduce a novelty in a violin concerto by Mr. Emil Jaques-Dalcroze, while the orchestral numbers will be Bach's B major suite for strings; Debussy's tone picture, "L'apres-Midi d'un Faun," and Beethoven's Eroica symphony.

On Saturday afternoon Mr. Bispham will be the soloist, his numbers being a ballad for barytone and orchestra by a young Boston composer, Mr. Frederick Converse, and an aria from Marschner's "Hans Heiling," while the orchestral numbers will be Weber's "Der Freischütz" overture, Gold- overture and Schu-

NEW YORK WORLD
ess
MAR 11 1906

Gericke's Retirement a Great Loss to the Cause of Good Music.

By Edward Ziegler.

AT the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be given at Carnegie Hall next Saturday matinee—which, incidentally, is the last concert this orchestra is to give in New York during the present season—Wilhelm Gericke will appear in this city for the last time as conductor. At least, he will appear here at the head of the Boston Orchestra for the last time; and it is very doubtful if, after his retirement from the podium of this organization, he ever will take up a baton in this country again.

It has been known for some time that this season would be Mr. Gericke's last one, and this rumor assumed the dignity of fact a few weeks ago when this conductor handed in his resignation to Mr. Henry Higginson, the owner and controlling spirit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Since then prophets and music-news detectives have been busy inventing or guessing a conductor of the Boston Orchestra to succeed Mr. Gericke. Several names have been mentioned in this connection. In all likelihood the position will go either to Felix Mottl, of Munich; Dr. Muck, of Berlin, or Gustav Mahler, of Vienna. Thus far the management of the Boston Orchestra maintains a mysterious silence. But the fact that there seems no trace of anxiety about the various principals in this important musical transaction would seem to indicate that, whoever he may be, the successor to Mr. Gericke has already been chosen.

Steinbach May Succeed Gericke.

Recently the above list of candidates has been supplemented by the name of Herr Fritz Steinbach, of Cologne. Steinbach has been engaged to conduct a couple of concerts of the Philharmonic Society a few weeks hence in this city. Rumor had it that because of Herr Steinbach's ardent duties abroad his stay in New York would be of the briefest possible duration. He had planned to arrive here a few days before the first Philharmonic concert, thus allowing himself the customary number of days in which to rehearse the orchestra. But cable reports now inform us that Herr Steinbach sails directly for Boston instead of this port, and that he would arrive in Boston several days before his duties require his presence in New York. All this has been pieced together, and out of it has been woven the story that Herr Steinbach would succeed Herr Gericke in his post as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Herr Steinbach is on the ocean, and the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra still poses as a musical sphinx. So conjecture must remain conjecture until Herr Steinbach arrives to affirm or to deny.

• • •

Gericke's Service to the Orchestra.

Meantime Herr Gericke is bidding farewell to the various audiences in the several cities that are included in the itinerary of this orchestra. Besides an artistic interest, which this conductor has ever shown in his duties, he must feel a deep sentimental interest in parting company with this superb orchestra.

Mr. Gericke has been more than one of the disinterested conductors who have held batons over the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Gericke was one of the conducting godfathers of this organization. He came to it when it was an infant, and he labored with this material, shaping, polishing and filing it until it grew to be one of the most exquisitely balanced and carefully voiced orchestras in the world. More than twenty years ago Mr. Gericke began to slave with this body of players, and he continued active with them for a term of five years, at the end of which he returned to his native country, Austria.

Then there came the aesthetic Arthur Nikisch, who succeeded Gericke, and who found a wonderful instrument upon which to conduct, an instrument that would bend to his slightest wish and was ever alert to follow any artistic whimsicality Nikisch craved. This conductor remained at the head of this orchestra for a term of years and did much toward spreading its fame and toward improving its elasticity.

He was succeeded by the temperamental conductor, Emil Paur, who strove for greater volume of tone and more towering climaxes. Paur served his term faithfully, and at the expiration of it Mr. Gericke was recalled to take up his baton again over an orchestra that he had left comparatively young, but which had aged in beauty and experience during his absence.

It was eight years ago when Herr Gericke returned to the Boston orchestra, and since that time he has been indefatigable in his efforts, not only to maintain the orchestra's standard, but to refine its quality of tone still further. He is known as a drill master of the most untiring patience, who slaved for finesse and refinement of tone within refinement. For all these qualities and for his sane balance of readings Mr. Gericke has been praised endlessly.

But these are days of strenuous music-making. The sensational is listened for, and the ear claims the privilege of hearing crashing climaxes and, in contrast, whispering pianissimos. The latter were among this conductor's specialties, but the crashing climaxes had to be imagined, for Mr. Gericke seldom unleashed the noble brass choir of this band. He had his ideals among the classics, he loved and interpreted Brahms with a devotion that stands to few musicians' credit, but the moderns, with their ponderous orchestral machinery and their excessive demands for deafening effects, were treated in rather a step-fatherly manner by this wielder of the baton. He produced an endless number of novelties of the new school, but he did not read into most of them—particularly not into the Richard Strauss masterpieces—the great draught of fire and did not loose the explosion of climaxes.

Has Been Subject to Criticism.

For this reason Mr. Gericke has been attacked frequently by the impatient ones who missed hearing the life of some of these great modern scores when read by Herr Gericke. But every conductor has his faults, and at this age of music the great craving is for specialists. Yet none has ever denied that Mr. Gericke was a model drill-master. This came to bearing at every concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Never did Gericke seem to lose interest in his work, constantly was he on the alert for the smallest detail of effect. In fact, this was one of his shortcomings since he snapped the thread of logical coherence occasionally by filing at his details with too conscientious accuracy.

Mr. Gericke leaves many friends among his auditors. He will be a difficult man to find a successor for, but whoever is chosen will profit endlessly by the remarkable training this orchestra has had under Gericke's baton. With this orchestra a temperamental conductor like Mottl or Mahler would be able to do emotional wonders. And this is what the music-loving public craves and demands at the present time.

n
ress
e
MAR 11 1906

MR. GERICKE AND THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

The departure of Mr. Wilhelm Gericke from the musical life of America is a matter of profound regret. Most of the qualities which are looked upon as admirable in the Boston Symphony Orchestra are of his creation. For thirteen years he has set an example of devotion and zeal to a high conception that is quite without parallel. His horizon has not been so wide as that of some of his colleagues who seem to think that fresh ink is a sign of excellence, but neither has it been so unstable, and all that lay within it he presented to the observation and comprehension of the public with marvellous clearness and inviting graciousness. If the ears of the lovers of orchestral music are still familiar with euphony; if the orchestral voice still exerts that elemental charm which lies in beauty of tone-quality and justness of intonation; if we are still able to recognize the fact that there is a difference between musical sonority and noise; if we are not all given over to the belief that passion is most eloquent when it is torn to tatters; if we are still skeptical toward the belief that the ugly is a fit object of artistic pursuit for its own sake,—the credit is largely due to Mr. Gericke and the ideals which he has upheld without a moment's defection during the thirteen years of his labor in America. It is much to be hoped that the hysteria which has seized upon the promoters of orchestral enterprises will soon pass away. Orchestral concerts are the worst of all vehicles for musical sensationalism. Sensationalism in music is the most deplorable of manifestations in art, and orchestral concerts are the worst of all vehicles for its propagation. When once all the old standards of beauty are abandoned, there will be an end of music in the sense that has obtained since the ecclesiastical art culminated in Palestrina, the symphonic in Beethoven and the dramatic in Wagner. The thought is intolerable to all except those mental and physical degenerates for whom all pure and normal pleasures have lost their attractiveness.

H. E. K.

NEW YORK PRESS
ss
MAR 11 1906

The last pair of Boston Symphony concerts of the present season will be given this week on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. They will bring to an end the most successful season the orchestra has ever held in this city. The coming concerts will be noteworthy in that they will mark the farewell appearances in New York of Mr. Gericke as conductor of the orchestra. Two programmes of artistic merit have been prepared for the coming concerts. On Thursday evening the soloist will be Henri Marteau, who will introduce here a violin concerto by Emil Jaques-Dalcroze, a Viennese by birth, but for the last fourteen years professor of harmony in the Conservatory of Geneva, where Marteau came to know him. The orchestral numbers will be Bach's suite in D major, which the orchestra is playing on this trip for the first time in eleven years; Debussy's exquisite little tone picture, "L'Après-Midi d'un Faun," and Beethoven's "Eroica."

The soloist on Saturday afternoon will be David Bispham, and his first number will be a ballad for baritone and orchestra by Frederick Converse, the young Boston composer. The text used is Keat's "La Belle Dame sans Merci." Mr. Bispham will also sing the aria "An jenem Tag," from Marschner's "Hans Heiling." The orchestral numbers will be Weber's "Der Freischuetz" overture, Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture and Schubert's symphony in C major.

[197]

Musikalische Angelegenheiten.

Das musikalische Publikum New Yorks hat in dieser Woche eine Pflicht zu erfüllen, und zwar die wehmüthige Pflicht des Abschiednehmens: Wilhelm Gericke tritt von seinem Posten als Dirigent des Bostoner Symphonieorchesters, den er dreizehn Jahre lang, wenn schon nicht dreizehn aufeinanderfolgende Jahre, bekleidet hat, mit dieser Saison zurück, und am nächsten Donnerstag Abend und Samstag Nachmittag wird er dieses Musterorchester zum letzten Male in New York dirigiren. Da Gericke beinahe dreimal so lange als irgend ein anderer Dirigent an der Spitze dieses Orchesters gestanden hat, ist ihm ohne weiteres das Hauptverdienst an dessen hervorragender Tüchtigkeit zuzumessen. Und wer nicht blos die Resultate seiner Bestrebungen mit eignen Ohren gehört, wer gelegentlich auch einen Blick hinter die Kulissen werfen, wer von den einzelnen Mitgliedern erfahren konnte, mit welch' unendlicher Mühewaltung Gericke in den Proben unausgesetzt an der technischen Vervollkommnung dieses Eliteorchesters gearbeitet hat, der wird sich zu diesem Abschiednehmen mit einem Herzen voll Anerkennung und Dank einstellen.

Wohl hat Herr Gericke als Interpret oftmals Widerspruch herausgefordert, selbst bei denen, die ihm auch persönlich freundlich gesinnt waren. Man fand, daß er manchmal dem Poliren und Abschleifen den Vorzug vor dem energischen, charakteristischen Gestalten einräumte; man empfand, daß er besonders moderne Kompositionen mit zu wenig Temperament anfaßte; aber man hat ihm nie abstreiten können, daß er jederzeit sein Bestes leistete. Und daß dieses Beste doch mehr war, als diejenigen zugeben wollen, die einen Dirigenten stets nur nach seiner Temperamentbegabung beurtheilen, mag vielleicht erst offenbar werden, wenn das Orchester von einem Anderen dirigirt wird. Vor Allem aber muß anerkannt werden, daß Gericke in den letzten Jahren ganz besonders bemüht gewesen ist, den Anforderungen moderner Auffassung nachzukommen. Er hat, in dieser Erkenntniß, die Kontraste gesteigert, er hat sich gegen ein elementares Forte nicht mehr, wie ehemals, gesträubt, er hat uns in der jüngsten Zeit manche Aufführung moderner Werke gegeben, die nicht blos hinsichtlich der äußersten Politur und technischen Glätte, sondern auch dem geistigen Erfassen nach den Stempel der Vorzüglichkeit verdienten.

Und ferner ist er bemüht gewesen, uns mit vielen neuen Kompositionen bekannt zu machen. Seine letzte große That in dieser Beziehung war die glänzende Aufführung der Mahler'schen fünften Symphonie.

Nun aber werden wir uns im nächsten Winter an einen neuen Dirigenten zu gewöhnen haben. Das Gerücht nannte Steinbach aus Köln als Gericke's Nachfolger. Steinbach genießt in Deutschland den Ruf eines außergewöhnlichen Brahms-Interpreten, einen Ruf, den er sich an der Spitze des Meininger Orchesters, als Nachfolger Bülow's, erworben hat. Wenn sich dieser Ruf bestätigt, würde Steinbach zunächst nur als Spezialist bewundert werden können. Es ist aber Grund vorhanden, ihm mehr zuzutrauen. Vielleicht ist er stark zum Konservativen geneigt, vielleicht besitzt er trotz der Liebhaberei für Brahms doch einen weiten musikalischen Horizont. Und vielleicht ist das Gerücht, daß er an Gericke's Stelle treten wird, garnicht einmal zutreffend. Man hat also mit voller Gemüthsruhe abzuwarten.

Ein anderes Gerücht, und zwar ein sehr vages, behauptete sogar, Steinbach's Engagement würde nur eine Uebergangsstation sein, denn für das übernächste Jahr solle der Bostoner Dirigentenposten Herrn Felix Mottl, dem Münchener Generalmusikdirektor zufallen. Es ist wahrscheinlich, daß Verhandlungen mit Mottl gepflogen worden sind, aber — sollte der vielseitige Felix schon so nahe am Ende seiner Münchener Laufbahn angekommen sein, sollte er schon alle die bösen Bemerkungen bereut haben, die er nach seiner Rückkehr von New York über dieses musikalische Barbarenland gemacht hat?

Eines ist aber gewiß, nämlich daß man in Boston nicht so höflerisch bei der Dirigentenauswahl zu Werke geht, wie hier in New York. Unsere Philharmonische Gesellschaft steht im Begriff, wieder einmal einen Frontwechsel auszuführen. Vor vier Jahren gab diese Gesellschaft ihre finanzielle Unabhängigkeit auf. Sie hatte offenbar erkannt, daß ihre Orchesterleistungen allein und mit einem ständigen Dirigenten nicht mehr ausreichten, um die Konzerte einträglich zu machen. Sie gab also einen Unterstützungsfonds an, der es ermöglichte, namhafte Dirigenten [illegible] Konzerte zu

---

New York Tri

MAR 11 1906

ten hoffen eingedenk bleiben, daß Safonoff's große Popularität in New York auf seine Interpretation einer einzigen Symphonie, der „Pathetique" von Tschaikowsky, zurückzuführen ist. Mehr als einmal in der Saison wird er aber diese Symphonie hier doch kaum dirigiren können.

Wenn man die hiesige Dirigenten-Situation mit derjenigen in Chicago vergleicht, kann man sich einer wehmüthigen Regung nicht erwehren. Dort wurde nach Theodor Thomas' Tode dessen Assistent, Stock, mit der Leitung des Orchesters beauftragt, und siehe da: der Erfolg war ein ganz unerwarteter. Ruhige Erwägung sachverständiger Leute, nicht aber die persönliche Vorliebe begeisterter Damen hatte zu diesem Engagement geführt. Die musikalische Aufmerksamkeit wurde also nicht abgelenkt von der Hauptsache, und die Befriedigung war schließlich eine allgemeine. Außerdem wird man wohl viel Geld gespart haben, als man es unterließ, für Chicago einen europäischen Primadonna-Dirigenten mit Primadonna-Preisen zu engagiren. In Bezug auf gesunden musikalischen Instinkt hat in diesem Falle das große Dorf am Michigan See der Metropole am Hudson eine beherzigenswerthe Lehre ertheilt.

* * *

---

om N. Y. TRIBUNE,

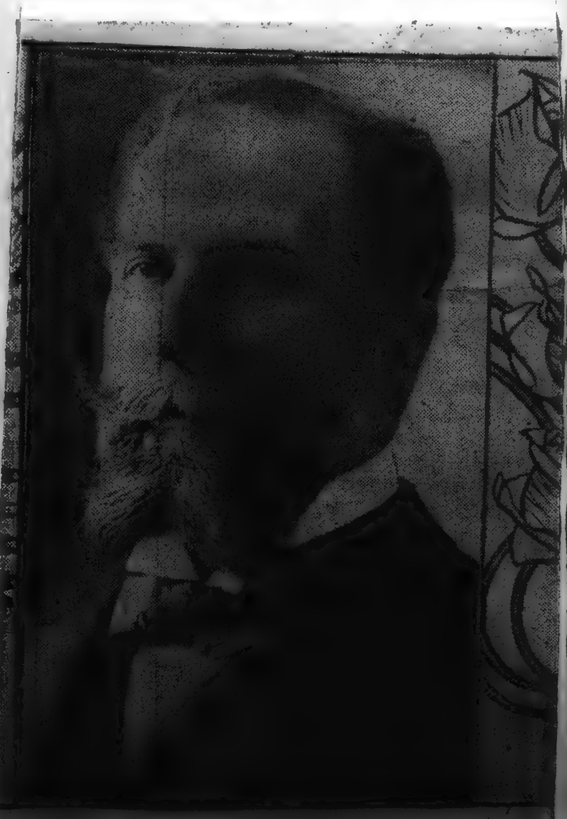
dress

te MAR 11 1906

* * *

The contemplation of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is well calculated to give the members of the Philharmonic a shudder, every time they recur to it, and think of what its performances have meant, in the careful selection of men and the amount of work devoted to preparing each concert and the rigid discipline undergone. But if the Philharmonic really desires to do what its place in our musical life requires it to do, it must "think on these things." And its thinking must be followed by action. It is not enough to secure a noted conductor—largely at somebody else's expense. They must drop the bad old way that has been good enough to bring them down to the present. If they cannot afford to give the needed time for rehearsals, they would be quite as justified in providing it also at somebody else's expense, and in opening another subscription for that less spectacular purpose. There are undoubtedly some men of wealth who would be willing to contribute to it.

* * *



WILHELM GERICKE.
For thirteen years conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

[198]

N. Y. TRIBUNE,

dress

te MAR 11 1906

during the years that he was at the head of [illegible] activities, Mr. Higginson's organization may be [illegible] where in to-day's issue of this journal [illegible] we make room for a few facts about his career. Mr. Gericke was the conductor who first carried the Boston orchestra's standard of performance so high as to command the attention of music lovers all over the United States. How he won the opportunity can be briefly told. On the evening of October 20, 1884, Henry L. Higginson, the founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was in Vienna and attended a performance of "Aida" at the Imperial Opera House. The conductor of the performance was Wilhelm Gericke, a mature musician, who had had experience at the conductor's stand in concerts as well as operas. The next day there was an interview between the American banker and the German musician, and on the 22d it was arranged that Mr. Gericke should go to America as the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which Mr. Higginson had called into life, and whose first conductor, Mr. Henschel, had decided to transfer the field of his labors from Boston to London. When Mr. Henschel came to the front as the Boston orchestra's first leader he was practically without experience. He learned the art empirically, but learned it so well in three years that he could establish himself in London at the head of a series of symphony concerts and carry them on several years. To the writer of these notes he said, on saying farewell in the summer of 1884, that six months of his Boston experience with the orchestra had been of more practical value to him than six years of labor in Europe.

Mr. Gericke came to Boston a thoroughly equipped drill master. He had gone forth from the Vienna Conservatory in 1865 and accepted at once a position as conductor in Linz. There he remained until Vienna, in 1874, came to him with an offer of the second conductorship at the Imperial Opera. His associate and chief was Hans Richter. In 1880 he became conductor also of the Gesellschaftsconcerte and the Singverein. He was thus employed when Mr. Higginson brought him to Boston. Throughout his first term of five years he exercised absolute sway over the artistic side of the orchestra's affairs. Desiring to reinforce the band with young men of unusual talent, he brought all he wished from Vienna and other European centres. Thus came to us Mr. Kneisel, Mr. Roth, Mr. Schroeder and many others whose names are of national repute. In everything Mr. Gericke needed only to ask in order to receive, even to a complete outfit of violins of Viennese make, by means of which Mr. Gericke hoped (but in vain) to secure greater homogeneity in the quality of the string-tone of the orchestra. He might have remained conductor till now, but at the end of five years he was broken in health because of the wear and tear on his nervous system, and he declined a reappointment. He returned to Vienna, took a long rest, made an extremely happy marriage, and for a time resumed some of the labors which he had put aside in favor of his American engagement. He again became conductor of the concerts of the Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde, a post which had been held by Brahms.

Mr. Nikisch was Mr. Gericke's successor in Boston. He came from Leipsic, where he was, for a time, associated with Anton Seidl in the direction of the operas at the municipal theatre. Mr. Nikisch did not serve out the term of his engagement, and when he departed to become conductor of the opera at Budapest, Mr. Higginson's thoughts again turned to Mr. Gericke. Only an accident prevented him from coming to America in the place of Mr. Paur. It was in the summer vacation and Mr. Higginson had practically concluded negotiations with him by telegraph. The signing of the contract, indeed, depended on a single contingency: Mr. Gericke wanted the assurance that the men of the orchestra as well as Mr. Higginson desired his return. For this assurance he intended to wait until Mr. Svecenski, first viola of the orchestra and one of the men whom he had brought to America, should come, as usual, to Vienna on his way to Ischl, where he had planned to spend the summer. But Mr. Svecenski, knowing nothing about the matter, broke his rule, made no stop in Vienna in that year, and, Mr. Higginson pressing for an answer, Mr. Gericke cabled a declination. What Mr. Svecenski's report would have been it is easy to guess. Mr. Gericke was ever a hard taskmaster, but he created an esprit de corps in the orchestra which endured for many years, until it was spoiled by the spirit of unrest nourished by latter day conditions, which have spared music as little as the other branches of art. What Mr. Gericke's plans are has not been divulged. He is sixty-one years old and has plenty of energy left for a decade of labor, at least, but he may choose to retire from active life and spend his remaining years in peace and comfort in his native or adopted land. Who his successor will be is a subject of lively speculation just now. The indications seem to be that Mr. Higginson has his eye upon somebody who will not be free to come to America until a year has passed. He may fill the interregnum with some young man willing to abdicate in a twelvemonth, but how such a man can meet the Boston conditions nurtured by the babble of the revolutionists for whom the classics are becoming tedious it is not easy to perceive.

The last pair of Boston Symphony concerts of the present season in Carnegie Hall will be given this week on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. They will bring to an end the most successful season the orchestra has ever had in this city, for, despite the multiplicity of other orchestral concerts which have made this winter so notable, the Boston organization has [illegible] to the question of [illegible] but in the [illegible]

N. Y. TRIBUNE,

dress

te MAR 11 1906

Mr. Gericke was the conductor who first carried the Boston orchestra's standard of performance so high as to command the attention of music lovers all over the United States. How he won the opportunity can be briefly told. On the evening of October 20, 1884, Henry L. Higginson, the founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was in Vienna and attended a performance of "Aida" at the Imperial Opera House. The conductor of the performance was Wilhelm Gericke, a mature musician, who had had experience at the conductor's stand in concerts as well as operas. The next day there was an interview between the American banker and the German musician, and on the 22d it was arranged that Mr. Gericke should go to America as the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which Mr. Higginson had called into life, and whose first conductor, Mr. Henschel, had decided to transfer the field of his labors from Boston to London. When Mr. Henschel came to the front as the Boston orchestra's first leader he was practically without experience. He learned the art empirically, but learned it so well in three years that he could establish himself in London at the head of a series of symphony concerts and carry them on several years. To the writer of these notes he said, on saying farewell in the summer of 1884, that six months of his Boston experience with the orchestra had been of more practical value to him than six years of labor in Europe.

Mr. Gericke came to Boston a thoroughly equipped drill master. He had gone forth from the Vienna Conservatory in 1865 and accepted at once a position as conductor in Linz. There he remained until Vienna, in 1874, came to him with an offer of the second conductorship at the Imperial Opera. His associate and chief was Hans Richter. In 1880 he became conductor also of the Gesellschaftsconcerte and the Singverein. He was thus employed when Mr. Higginson brought him to Boston. Throughout his first term of five years he exercised absolute sway over the artistic side of the orchestra's affairs. Desiring to reinforce the band with young men of unusual talent, he brought all he wished from Vienna and other European centres. Thus came to us Mr. Kneisel, Mr. Roth, Mr. Schroeder and many others whose names are of national repute. In everything Mr. Gericke needed only to ask in order to receive, even to a complete outfit of violins of Viennese make, by means of which Mr. Gericke hoped (but in vain) to secure greater homogeneity in the quality of the string-tone of the orchestra. He might have remained conductor till now, but at the end of five years he was broken in health because of the wear and tear on his nervous system, and he declined a reappointment. He returned to Vienna, took a long rest, made an extremely happy marriage, and for a time resumed some of the labors which he had put aside in favor of his American engagement. He again became conductor of the concerts of the Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde, a post which had been held by Brahms.

Mr. Nikisch was Mr. Gericke's successor in Boston. He came from Leipsic, where he was, for a time, associated with Anton Seidl in the direction of the operas at the municipal theatre. Mr. Nikisch did not serve out the term of his engagement, and when he departed to become conductor of the opera at Budapest, Mr. Higginson's thoughts again turned to Mr. Gericke. Only an accident prevented him from coming to America in the place of Mr. Paur. It was in the summer vacation and Mr. Higginson had practically concluded negotiations with him by telegraph. The signing of the contract, indeed, depended on a single contingency: Mr. Gericke wanted the assurance that the men of the orchestra as well as Mr. Higginson desired his return. For this assurance he intended to wait until Mr. Svecenski, first viola of the orchestra and one of the men whom he had brought to America, should come, as usual, to Vienna on his way to Ischl, where he had planned to spend the summer. But Mr. Svecenski, knowing nothing about the matter, broke his rule, made no stop in Vienna in that year, and, Mr. Higginson pressing for an answer, Mr. Gericke cabled a declination. What Mr. Svecenski's report would have been it is easy to guess. Mr. Gericke was ever a hard taskmaster, but he created an esprit de corps in the orchestra which endured for many years, until it was spoiled by the spirit of unrest nourished by latter day conditions, which have spared music as little as the other branches of art. What Mr. Gericke's plans are has not been divulged. He is sixty-one years old and has plenty of energy left for a decade of labor, at least, but he may choose to retire from active life and spend his remaining years in peace and comfort in his native or adopted land. Who his successor will be is a subject of lively speculation just now. The indications seem to be that Mr. Higginson has his eye upon somebody who will not be free to come to America until a year has passed. He may fill the interregnum with some young man willing to abdicate in a twelvemonth, but how such a man can meet the Boston conditions nurtured by the babble of the revolutionists for whom the classics are becoming tedious it is not easy to perceive.

The last pair of Boston Symphony concerts of the present season in Carnegie Hall will be given this week on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. They will bring to an end the most successful season the orchestra has ever had in this city, for, despite the multiplicity of other orchestral concerts which have made this winter so notable, the Boston organization has [illegible] to the question of [illegible] but in the [illegible]

NEW YORK HERALD

MAR 11 1906

BROOKLYN INSTITUTE NOTES

Last Philharmonic Concert of the Season—Current and Extraordinary Lectures—The Calendar.

Musically this is to be another noteworthy week in the Brooklyn Institute calendar. The fifth and last for the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Philharmonic concerts is to be given on the evening of next Friday at the Baptist Temple.

Wilhelm Gericke, the veteran conductor of the organization, will wield the baton, and a programme of unusual merit will be given, as follows:—

Mozart—Symphony in G minor No. 40. (I) Allegro molto (G minor); (II) Andante (E flat major); (III) Menuetta: Allegro (G minor), Trio (B major); (IV) Finale: Allegro assai (G minor).
Dvorak—Concerto in B minor for Violoncello, Op. 104. (I) Allegro; (II) Adagio ma non troppo; (III) Finale: Allegro moderato.
Beethoven—Symphony No. 3, in E flat major, Op. 55; "Eroica." (I) Allegro con brio (E flat major); (II) Marcia funebre: Adagio assai (C minor); (III) Scherzo: Allegro vivace (E flat major), Trio (E flat major); (IV) Finale: Allegro molto (E flat major).

---

ress NEW YORK SUN

MAR 11 190

The last two Boston Symphony concerts of the present season will be given this week on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. They will mark the farewell appearances in New York of Mr. Gericke as conductor of the orchestra. On Thursday evening the soloist will be Henri Marteau, who will introduce here a violin concerto by Emil Jaques-Dalcroze, a Viennese by birth, but for the last fourteen years the professor of harmony in the Conservatory of Geneva. The orchestral numbers will be Bach's Suite in D major, Debussy's "L'Apres-Midi d'un Faun" and Beethoven's "Eroica."

The soloist on Saturday afternoon will be David Bispham, and his first number will be a ballade for baritone and orchestra, by Frederick Converse, the young Boston composer. The text used is Keat's "La Belle Dame sans Merci." The orchestral numbers will be Weber's "Der Freischütz" overture, Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture and Schubert's symphony in C major.

18

N. Y. EVG SUN

ss

MAR 13 1906

Philadelphia and Baltimore are now saying goodby to Mr. Gericke. The man from Vienna came to Boston as Col. Higginson's acting captain of industry, first after Henschel and again after Nikisch and Paur. He has led five, ten, fifteen concerts a year in New York, playing the best work of the local orchestras after them and often playing it better.

If Gericke brought out Richard Strauss's "Don Quixote" without the wind machine, it was not in his, but in Strauss's own performance here that a great orchestra came to at least one dead stop in that famous production. There have been times when the irritating duplication of local programmes by the Boston men no longer seemed accidental.

Now, then, the triumph of beating grand opera farewells on their own ground will be a fine feather in Mr. Gericke's cap.

NEW YORK HERALD

MAR 14 1906

President at Symphony Concert.

HERALD BUREAU,
No. 734 FIFTEENTH STREET, N. W.
WASHINGTON, D. C., Tuesday.

The last of the Boston Symphony concerts this afternoon was marked by the attendance of President and Mrs. Roosevelt, who had in their box [illegible] Miss Alice Roosevelt and daughter, Representative Nicholas Longworth, Miss Longworth, Miss [illegible] man and Mrs. Lowndes.

Musikalische Angelegenheiten.

Das musikalische Publikum New Yorks hat in dieser Woche eine Pflicht zu erfüllen, und zwar die wehmüthige Pflicht des Abschiednehmens: Wilhelm Gericke tritt von seinem Posten als Dirigent des Bostoner Symphonieorchesters, den er dreizehn Jahre lang, wenn schon nicht dreizehn aufeinanderfolgende Jahre, bekleidet hat, mit dieser Saison zurück, und am nächsten Donnerstag Abend und Samstag Nachmittag wird er dieses Musterorchester zum letzten Male in New York dirigiren. Da Gericke beinahe dreimal so lange als irgend ein anderer Dirigent an der Spitze dieses Orchesters gestanden hat, ist ihm ohne weiteres das Hauptverdienst an dessen hervorragender Tüchtigkeit zuzumessen. Und wer nicht blos die Resultate seiner Bestrebungen mit eignen Ohren gehört, wer gelegentlich auch einen Blick hinter die Koulissen werfen, wer von den einzelnen Mitgliedern erfahren konnte, mit welch' unendlicher Mühewaltung Gericke in den Proben unausgesetzt an der technischen Vervollkommnung dieses Eliteorchesters gearbeitet hat, der wird sich zu diesem Abschiednehmen mit einem Herzen voll Anerkennung und Dank einstellen.

Wohl hat Herr Gericke als Interpret oftmals Widerspruch herausgefordert, selbst bei denen, die ihm auch persönlich freundlich gesinnt waren. Man fand, daß er manchmal dem Poliren und Abschleifen den Vorrang vor dem energischen, charakteristischen Gestalten einräumte; man empfand, daß er besonders moderne Kompositionen mit zu wenig Temperament anfaßte; aber man hat ihm nie abstreiten können, daß er jederzeit sein Bestes leistete. Und daß dieses Beste doch mehr war, als diejenigen zugeben wollen, die einen Dirigenten stets nur nach seiner Temperamentbegabung beurtheilen, mag vielleicht erst offenbar werden, wenn das Orchester von einem Anderen dirigirt wird. Vor Allem aber muß anerkannt werden, daß Gericke in den letzten Jahren ganz besonders bemüht gewesen ist, den Anforderungen moderner Auffassung nachzukommen. Er hat, in dieser Erkenntniß, die Kontraste gesteigert, er hat sich gegen ein elementares Forte nicht mehr, wie ehemals, gesträubt, er hat uns in der jüngsten Zeit manche Aufführung moderner Werke gegeben, die nicht bloß hinsichtlich der äußersten Politur und technischen Glätte, sondern auch dem geistigen Erfassen nach den Stempel der Vorzüglichkeit verdienten.

Und ferner ist er bemüht gewesen, uns mit vielen neuen Kompositionen bekannt zu machen. Seine letzte große That in dieser Beziehung war die glänzende Aufführung der Mahler'schen fünften Symphonie.

Nun aber werden wir uns im nächsten Winter an einen neuen Dirigenten zu gewöhnen haben. Das Gerücht nannte Steinbach aus Köln als Gericke's Nachfolger. Steinbach genießt in Deutschland den Ruf eines außergewöhnlichen Brahms-Interpreten, einen Ruf, den er sich an der Spitze des Meininger Orchesters, als Nachfolger Bülow's, erworben hat. Wenn sich dieser Ruf bestätigt, würde Steinbach zunächst nur als Spezialist bewundert werden können. Es ist aber Grund vorhanden, ihm mehr zuzutrauen. Vielleicht ist er stark zum Konservativen geneigt, vielleicht besitzt er trotz der Liebhaberei für Brahms doch einen weiten musikalischen Horizont. Und vielleicht ist das Gerücht, daß er an Gericke's Stelle treten wird, garnicht einmal zutreffend. Man hat also mit voller Gemüthsruhe abzuwarten.

Ein anderes Gerücht, und zwar ein sehr vages, behauptete sogar, Steinbach's Engagement würde nur eine Uebergangsstation sein, denn für das übernächste Jahr solle der Bostoner Dirigentenposten Herrn Felix Mottl, dem Münchener Generalmusikdirektor zufallen. Es ist wahrscheinlich, daß Verhandlungen mit Mottl gepflogen worden sind, aber — sollte der vielseitige Felix schon so nahe am Ende seiner Münchener Laufbahn angekommen sein, sollte er schon alle die bösen Bemerkungen bereut haben, die er nach seiner Rückkehr von New York über dieses musikalische Barbarenland gemacht hat?

Eines ist aber gewiß, nämlich daß man in Boston nicht so hysterisch bei der Dirigentenauswahl zu Werke geht, wie hier in New York. Unsere Philharmonische Gesellschaft steht im Begriff, wieder einmal einen Frontwechsel auszuführen. Vor drei Jahren gab diese Gesellschaft ihre finanzielle Unabhängigkeit auf. Sie hatte offenbar erkannt, daß ihre Orchesterleistungen allein und mit einem ständigen Dirigenten nicht mehr ausreichten, um die Konzerte einträglich zu machen. Sie nahm also einen Unterstützungsfonds an, der es ermöglichte, namhafte Dirigenten aus Europa für einzelne Konzerte zu engagiren. Daß ein solches Verfahren nicht in infinitum fortgesetzt werden könne, wurde damals bereits an dieser ten dessen eingedenk bleiben, daß Safonoff's große Popularität in New York auf seine Interpretation einer einzigen Symphonie, der „Pathetique" von Tschaikowsky, zurückzuführen ist. Mehr als einmal in der Saison wird er aber diese Symphonie hier doch kaum dirigiren können. —

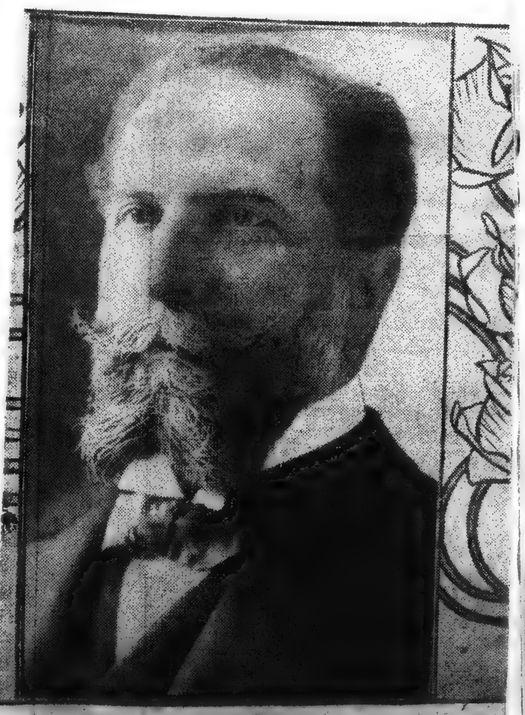
Wenn man die hiesige Dirigenten-Situation mit derjenigen in Chicago vergleicht, kann man sich einer wehmüthigen Regung nicht erwehren. Dort wurde nach Theodor Thomas' Tode dessen Assistent, Stock, mit der Leitung des Orchesters beauftragt, und siehe da: der Erfolg war ein ganz unerwarteter. Ruhige Erwägung sachverständiger Leute, nicht aber die persönliche Vorliebe begeisterter Damen hatte zu diesem Engagement geführt. Die musikalische Aufmerksamkeit wurde also nicht abgelenkt von der Hauptsache, und die Befriedigung war schließlich eine allgemeine. Außerdem wird man wohl viel Geld gespart haben, als man es unterließ, für Chicago einen europäischen Primadonna-Dirigenten mit Primadonna-Preisen zu engagiren. In Bezug auf gefunden musikalischen Instinkt hat in diesem Falle das große Dorf am Michigan See der Metropole am Hudson eine beherzigenswerthe Lehre ertheilt.

* * *

The contemplation of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is well calculated to give the members of the Philharmonic a shudder, every time they recur to it, and think of what its performances have meant, in the careful selection of men and the amount of work devoted to preparing each concert and the rigid discipline undergone. But if the Philharmonic really desires to do what its place in our musical life requires it to do, it must "think on these things." And its thinking must be followed by action. It is not enough to secure a noted conductor—largely at somebody else's expense. They must drop the bad old way that has been good enough to bring them down to the present. If they cannot afford to give the needed time for rehearsals, they would be quite as justified in providing it also at somebody else's expense, and in opening another subscription for that less spectacular purpose. There are undoubtedly some men of wealth who would be willing to contribute to it.

* * *



WILHELM GERICKE.
For thirteen years conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

[198]

N. Y. TRIBUNE,

MAR 11 1906

A critical expression of what Wilhelm Gericke's American activities have signified during the years that he was at the head of Mr. Higginson's organization may be found elsewhere in to-day's issue of this journal. Here we make room for a few facts about his career. Mr. Gericke was the conductor who first carried the Boston orchestra's standard of performance so high as to command the attention of music lovers all over the United States. How he won the opportunity can be briefly told. On the evening of October 20, 1884, Henry L. Higginson, the founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was in Vienna and attended a performance of "Aida" at the Imperial Opera House. The conductor of the performance was Wilhelm Gericke, a mature musician, who had had experience at the conductor's stand in concerts as well as operas. The next day there was an interview between the American banker and the German musician, and on the 22d it was arranged that Mr. Gericke should go to America as the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which Mr. Higginson had called into life, and whose first conductor, Mr. Henschel, had decided to transfer the field of his labors from Boston to London. When Mr. Henschel came to the front as the Boston orchestra's first leader he was practically without experience. He learned the art empirically, but learned it so well in three years that he could establish himself in London at the head of a series of symphony concerts and carry them on several years. To the writer of these notes he said, on saying farewell in the summer of 1884, that six months of his Boston experience with the orchestra had been of more practical value to him than six years of labor in Europe.

Mr. Gericke came to Boston a thoroughly equipped drill master. He had gone forth from the Vienna Conservatory in 1865 and accepted at once a position as conductor in Linz. There he remained until Vienna, in 1874, came to him with an offer of the second conductorship at the Imperial Opera. His associate and chief was Hans Richter. In 1880 he became conductor also of the Gesellschaftsconcerte and the Singverein. He was thus employed when Mr. Higginson brought him to Boston. Throughout his first term of five years he exercised absolute sway over the artistic side of the orchestra's affairs. Desiring to reinforce the band with young men of unusual talent, he brought all he wished from Vienna and other European centres. Thus came to us Mr. Kneisel, Mr. Roth, Mr. Schroeder and many others whose names are of national repute. In everything Mr. Gericke needed only to ask in order to receive, even to a complete outfit of violins of Viennese make, by means of which Mr. Gericke hoped (but in vain) to secure greater homogeneity in the quality of the string-tone of the orchestra. He might have remained conductor till now, but at the end of five years he was broken in health because of the wear and tear on his nervous system, and he declined a reappointment. He returned to Vienna, took a long rest, made an extremely happy marriage, and for a time resumed some of the labors which he had put aside in favor of his American engagement. He again became conductor of the concerts of the Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde, a post which had been held by Brahms.

Mr. Nikisch was Mr. Gericke's successor in Boston. He came from Leipsic, where he was, for a time, associated with Anton Seidl in the direction of the operas at the municipal theatre. Mr. Nikisch did not serve out the term of his engagement, and when he departed to become conductor of the opera at Budapest, Mr. Higginson's thoughts again turned to Mr. Gericke. Only an accident prevented him from coming to America in the place of Mr. Paur. It was in the summer vacation and Mr. Higginson had practically concluded negotiations with him by telegraph. The signing of the contract, indeed, depended on a single contingency: Mr. Gericke wanted the assurance that the men of the orchestra as well as Mr. Higginson desired his return. For this assurance he intended to wait until Mr. Svecenski, first viola of the orchestra and one of the men whom he had brought to America, should come, as usual, to Vienna on his way to Ischl, where he had planned to spend the summer. But Mr. Svecenski, knowing nothing about the matter, broke his rule, made no stop in Vienna in that year, and, Mr. Higginson pressing for an answer, Mr. Gericke cabled a declination. What Mr. Svecenski's report would have been it is easy to guess. Mr. Gericke was ever a hard taskmaster, but he created an esprit de corps in the orchestra which endured for many years, until it was spoiled by the spirit of unrest nourished by latter day conditions, which have spared music as little as the other branches of art. What Mr. Gericke's plans are has not been divulged. He is sixty-one years old and has plenty of energy left for a decade of labor, at least, but he may choose to retire from active life and spend his remaining years in peace and comfort in his native or adopted land. Who his successor will be is a subject of lively speculation just now. The indications seem to be that Mr. Higginson has his eye upon somebody who will not be free to come to America until a year has passed. He may fill the interregnum with some young man willing to abdicate in a twelvemonth, but how such a man can meet the Boston conditions nurtured by the babble of the revolutionists for whom the classics are becoming tedious it is not easy to perceive.

The last pair of Boston Symphony concerts of the present season in Carnegie Hall will be given this week on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. They will bring to an end the most successful season the orchestra has ever had in this city, for, despite the multiplicity of other orchestral concerts which have made this winter so notable, the Boston organization has more than held its own in the question of patronage, not only in subscription but in the

NEW YORK HERALD

MAR 11 1906

BROOKLYN INSTITUTE NOTES.

Last Philharmonic Concert of the Season—Current and Extraordinary Lectures—The Calendar.

Musically this is to be another noteworthy week in the Brooklyn Institute calendar. The fifth and last for the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Philharmonic concerts is to be given on the evening of next Friday at the Baptist Temple.

Wilhelm Gericke, the veteran conductor of the organization, will wield the baton, and a programme of unusual merit will be given, as follows:—

Mozart—Symphony in G minor, No. 40. (I) Allegro molto (G minor); (II) Andante (E flat major); (III) Menuetta: Allegro (G minor), Trio (G major); (IV) Finale: Allegro assai (G minor).
Dvorak—Concerto in B minor for Violoncello, Op. 104. (I) Allegro; (II) Adagio ma non troppo; (III) Finale: Allegro moderato.
Beethoven—Symphony No. 3, in E flat major, Op. 55; "Eroica." (I) Allegro con brio (E flat major); (II) Marcia funebre: Adagio assai (C minor); (III) Scherzo: Allegro vivace (E flat major), Trio (E flat major); (IV) Finale: Allegro molto (E flat major).

NEW YORK SUN

MAR 11 190

The last two Boston Sympony concerts of the present season will be given this week on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. They will mark the farewell appearances in New York of Mr. Gericke as conductor of the orchestra. On Thursday evening the soloist will be Henri Marteau, who will introduce here a violin concerto by Emil Jaques-Dalcroze, a Viennese by birth, but for the last fourteen years the professor of harmony in the Conservatory of Geneva. The orchestral numbers will be Bach's suite in D major, Débussy's "L'Après-Midi d'un Faun" and Beethoven's "Eroica."

The soloist on Saturday afternoon will be David Bispham, and his first number will be a ballade for barytone and orchestra, by Frederick Converse, the young Boston composer. The text used is Keat's "La Belle Dame sans Merci." The orchestral numbers will be Weber's "Der Freischütz" overture, Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture and Schubert's symphony in C major.

Philadelphia and Baltimore are now saying goodby to Mr. Gericke. The man from Vienna came to Boston as Col. Higginson's acting captain of industry, first after Henschel and again after Nikisch and Paur. He has led five, ten, fifteen concerts a year in New York, playing the best work of the local orchestras after them and often playing it better.

If Gericke brought out Richard Strauss's "Don Quixote" without the wind machine, it was not in his, but in Strauss's own performance here that a great orchestra came to at least one dead stop in that famous production. There have been times when the irritating duplication of local programmes by the Boston men no longer seemed accidental.

Now, then, the triumph of beating grand opera farewells on their own ground will be a fine feather in Mr. Gericke's cap.

NEW YORK HERALD

MAR 14 1906

President at Symphony Concert.

HERALD BUREAU,
No. 734 FIFTEENTH STREET, N. W.,
WASHINGTON, D. C., Tuesday.

The last of the Boston Symphony concerts this afternoon was marked by the attendance of President and Mrs. Roosevelt, who had in their box their son-in-law and daughter, Representative and Mrs. Nicholas Longworth, Miss Tuckerman and Mrs. Lowndes.

VOGUE
NEW YORK CITY

MAR 15 1906

RETIREMENT OF MR. GERICKE

The recent announcement that Wilhelm Gericke will retire from the leadership of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the close of the present season is the liveliest current topic in music circles, not only in Boston and New York, but in at least a score of other cities in the East and Canada that are fortunate enough to be comprehended in the orchestra's concert route.

As a matter of fact, this society has come to be regarded well-nigh as a national institution. No wonder, then, that the countless admirers of Mr. Higginson's splendid organization feel profoundly concerned at the prospect of losing the conductor, who, more than any one else, has been the means of making this orchestra what it is—one of the foremost concert institutions of the world.

Mr. Gericke originally entered upon the duties, which he has discharged so well for more than a dozen years, in 1884—nearly a quarter of a century ago. After five years of labors so indefatigable that they undermined his health, the Austrian conductor resigned his post to return home and resume the direction of the Gesellschaft concerts in Vienna. At the end of nine years (1898), during which period Mr. Nikisch and then Mr. Paur endeavored to fill his old position, Mr. Gericke was induced to return to the orchestra, which in 1906 completes the thirteenth year under his leadership.

The Austrian conductor, who is known to be one of the most tireless and conscientious drill masters in his profession, was, perhaps, inadequately remunerated at $12,000 a year for rehearsing and leading over 100 concerts in a season, when Weingartner can demand and receive the same amount for conducting only sixteen concerts, and Safonoff declare that $20,000 would be his lowest annual terms for assuming the directorship of the N. Y. Symphony Orchestra on a three-year contract. This is in truth, the heyday for star conductors, and not only in New York, but in London, Paris and the prominent German cities, as well.

The musical public is bound to be deeply interested in Mr. Higginson's efforts to secure a worthy successor to Wilhelm Gericke.

Since Weingartner and Safonoff are practically out of the question, because of prior engagements, and since gossip has not yet dallied with the honored names of Richter and Mottl, the choice of a conductor of the first rank will probably fall upon Steinbach, of Cologne, Muck of Berlin, Mahler of Vienna, von Schuch of Dresden, or V. d'Indy of Paris. While these five are widely dissimilar in their individual methods and tastes, each one stands near the head of his profession, and two are also eminent composers, who would scarcely be tempted to leave Europe for a permanent engagement at any price. For this reason we think the choice more likely to fall upon Steinbach, Muck or Von Schuch, the first of whom, by the way, will direct the eighth pair of Philharmonic concerts, 23, 24 March, while the latter, it will be recalled, visited us with success some years ago.

N. Y. EV'G WORLD

MAR 16 1906

Ovations to Gericke Mark Boston Symphony Concert

WILLIAM GERICKE has directed the Boston Symphony Orchestra for thirteen years. After this season he will lead it no more. If he ever had a doubt of the esteem in which New York music-lovers hold him, it must have been dispelled last night at Carnegie Hall. When he walked upon the stage to conduct the first of his two farewell concerts here he was greeted with applause that continued for a long time. After the performance the vast audience that had braved the storm remained to pay him a like compliment. Much of the intervening tribute to the skill of the players was also intended for him. A laurel wreath decorated his stand.

The programme was one to justify the faith of his admirers. It opened with Bach's suite in D major, a composition well fitted to display the virtuosity of the band. Such singing in one voice by the violins may rarely be heard. It closed with Beethoven's third symphony, the "Eroica," the splendid measures of which were sonorously pronounced.

Between these came a violin concerto in C minor by Jacques-Daloroze, dedicated to Henri Marteau, who played the solo part, and heard for the first time here. It is Oriental in conception, the first movement seeming harsh and grating, emphasized by a slight discordance in pitch between the solo instrument and the rest of the band. The following two movements, however, were full of charm and interest.

Another almost novelty was that delightful airy, fairy like structure of Debussy's, "The Afternoon of a Faun," played with the grace and delicacy for which the composition calls.

Altogether it was an evening not soon to be forgotten by players and audience.

At the final concert to-morrow afternoon Bispham will be the soloist.

EVG. TELEGRAM

MAR 16 1906

Last Evening Concert of the Boston Symphony at Carnegie.

THE last evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in this city during the present season, and the last but one under the baton of Mr. Gericke, attracted a very large audience despite the severe storm. There was a general feeling of regret at the retirement of the conductor who has done so much for the famous band during both periods of his leadership.

It cannot be forgotten that when Mr. Gericke succeeded Mr. Henschel and first assumed charge of the orchestra he brought the organization through a critical period, and in all the time of his service his work has been faithful and conscientious.

The performance was such as we have been led to expect of late—excellent combinations in the choirs, a remarkably fine balance of tone, and a smooth, musicianly performance. The players were kept well in hand by the director—too well in hand, in fact, with a resultant lack of fire and an uncomfortable feeling of too much repression.

These defects were less noticeable in the first number, Bach's suite in D major, an academic composition which admits of Mr. Gericke's academic rendering. The famous second movement was, as usual, received with the heartiest commendation of the audience, partly because of its frequent repetition in programme music, arranged as a 'cello solo, with orchestral accompaniment.

Mr. Henri Marteau, the soloist of the evening, brought forward a concerto for violin and orchestra, played here for the first time. After a rather unpromising beginning a number of exquisite melodies were introduced. The orchestration is particularly effective, offering a multi-colored background for the solo instrument. It is not likely that the composition will prove to be a favorite with violinists, as it offers more melodies than technical gymnastics.

Debussy's prelude to "An Afternoon with a Faun" has already been heard here this season, when it was played with more enthusiasm and less restraint than the Boston Symphony indulged. It is an admirable specimen of the radical French school, a tone poem of unusual pictorial charm.

The "Eroica" Symphony of Beethoven brought the concert to a close.

NEW YORK PRESS

MAR 16 1906

IN THE REALM OF MUSIC

Gericke's Night of Farewells

Musical New York began to say farewell to Wilhelm Gericke in Carnegie Hall last night. The weather held no terrors for the admirers of the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who after to-morrow's performance will direct the band no longer, so far as this city is concerned. The auditorium was filled comfortably. Gericke had received one of the wreaths which, like farewell performances, are fashionable just now, and this, with its bow of yellow ribbon, was hung on the conductor's desk. The audience's expressions of good will took the form of applause when the leader appeared and when he left the platform. When the concert ended the applause took on that air of mild hysteria to which musical New York is prone on such occasions.

The audience stood up and lingered, like Stevenson's guest who was unwilling to go. It applauded more and more as the conductor bowed again and again with his arms folded across his shirt front. Of course, some women waved their handkerchiefs. Then Gericke stepped nearer the front of the platform and told his eager listeners how much he appreciated the encouragement New York had given to him and how its support was of so much importance to the success of the orchestra. More applause, and the enthusiastic ones filed out into Fifty-seventh street, to face something even more "heroic" than Beethoven's Third Symphony—the weather.

As for the concert itself, which, after all, was a secondary thing to the Gericke "farewell," it consisted of Bach's suite in D minor, Jacques-Delacroze's concerto in C minor, for violin and orchestra, op. 50; Debussy's prelude to Mallarme's ecologue, "The Afternoon of a Faun," and Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony. All of these numbers are familiar here, as played by the Bostonians, save the concerto, which came to a first hearing. Henri Marteau was the soloist, and Professor Willy Hess, the concert master, conducted the work. The violinist had the double honor of having this composition dedicated to him and playing it at its first hearing at the Swiss Music Festival in Geneva, June 23, 1901. He played it last night with affection. This, combined with his customary beauty of tone and breadth of insight, made his performance noteworthy. The first movement of the work calls for a large display of technique, and the second, which is of a pastoral nature, enabled Marteau to show the sheer beauty and bigness of his tone, that is so faultless when he is not called upon to be vigorous. The final movement is in marked contrast to the largo by its gayety and its element of the fantastic. The color of the background was admirably brought out by the band.

In spite of the fact that on its first publication the "Eroica" symphony bore a note of warning that it should be played at the beginning of a concert instead of at the end, Gericke defied that mandate. His reading of the score was such that he sent his auditors home more moved than the composer evidently thought any of its hearers ever would be.

om NEW YORK SUN

ddress

ate SEP 16 1906

N. Y. TRIBUNE

MAR 16 1906

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. Marteau, who did missionary labor on his last visit in behalf of Sinding, the Norseman, last night gave proof of his cosmopolitan generosity by playing a violin concerto by Emile Jacques-Dalcroze, who was born in Vienna to Swiss parents of French extraction. It was at a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which had already enough to signalize it in the fact that it was the last of Mr. Gericke's evening concerts with the organization which he has done so much to make renowned. The fact was evidently uppermost in the minds of the people who braved the weather to hear the music and testify their appreciation both of it and of the musician, who for thirteen years has upborne the banner of musical beauty with rare consistency and devotion. Mr. Gericke, on his part, had prepared a programme which seemed to have been planned to publish his ideals and disprove the notion which has prevailed in some quarters that he is antagonistic to the fruits of modern progress. He began with Bach's Suite in D major and ended with Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony. Between these he placed the violin concerto by Jacques-Dalcroze and that marvellous bit of orchestral delineation, Debussy's "L'Après-Midi d' un Faune," suggested by Mallarmé's eclogue. All that might have been expected from Mr. Gericke, with his exquisite sense of euphony and the virtuosoship of his musicians (both often extolled in these columns), was enjoyed by the audience and met its reward.

As a rule, Mr. Marteau's efforts at propagandism for modern works are well bestowed. The new concerto is a striking example of ingenious construction, and the principle of unity, as exemplified in community of theme in the three movements, is finely carried out. But there would seem to be more cleverness of workmanship than inspiration in the work. It is a highly colored score and a complex, in which the solo instrument holds its own against the orchestra chiefly by dint of the straightforwardness of its part, but also occasionally by main strength exerted by the performer. It has commendable force in its first movement and beauty in the second, but both qualities are used up before the finale is begun. In it there is absolutely nothing to charm and interest runs out into mere curiosity. It bristles with difficulties, and one is tempted to wish, with Dr. Johnson, that it were impossible. A wreath of laurel covered Mr. Gericke's desk, and the audience welcomed him enthusiastically and gave him many hearty rounds of applause after the symphony.

At the close Mr. Gericke gave expression to his gratitude. Without the New-York public, which had always been so kind in its appreciation, he said, the orchestra would in all likelihood not have existed till to-day. Therefore he gave voice to his sentiments and those of the orchestra.

H. E. K.

NEW YORK HERALD

MAR 16 1906

MR. GERICKE BIDDING NEW YORK GOODB

And Local Patrons of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Express Their Regrets.

Last night's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall, had a feature of more than usual interest through the fact that it involved one of the two farewell appearances of Mr. Wilhelm Gericke as the organization conductor.

Recognition of his many years of splendid work as the orchestra's leader was made by last night's audience in round after round of applause as he advanced to the desk he is shortly to relinquish and in enthusiastic tributes for each of his incursions. Some admirers had attached a wreath of laurel to his music stand. Mr. Gericke took these honors in his usual quiet, self-possessed way, and when at one point the applause grew especially insistent, made the men rise to share it.

The programme presented Mr. Henri Marteau as the soloist and contained besides a new violin concerto by Emile Jaques-Dalcroze, to which the French violinist gave its first local hearing, Bach's D major suite, Debussy's prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun" and Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony.

The playing of the orchestra was, as usual, brilliant. It showed to best advantage perhaps in the Debussy piece, the suave, mellow instrumentation of which needs the beautiful balance and elegance of tone for which Mr. Gericke has made his men famous. The Beethoven symphony, save that the Funeral March seemed rather fast, has not had better reading in New York in a long time.

The Dalcroze concerto, which Mr. Marteau played with real devotion, did not make a completely favorable impression. The first movement showed much vitality and some original imaginings and the second was pleasing, but the third seemed to obscured completely the previous reasons in a waste of apparently futile sound. Incidentally this section proved almost unplayable.

[199]

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mr. Gericke Conducts the Orchestra at Carnegie Hall.

The last concert but one that Wilhelm Gericke will conduct with the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place last night at Carnegie Hall. Mr. Gericke will be in his place at the concert on Saturday afternoon. But there is a different public for these two concerts, and Mr. Gericke parted last night from a large number of his local admirers. The cordiality of the feeling toward him was frequently demonstrated last night. Mr. Gericke stands high in the affections of New York music lovers. They have recognized and appreciated his achievements with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

In spite of the recent visits of noted foreign conductors Mr. Gericke is probably more cherished to-day in New York than he ever was. The future will show how much greater or less will be the pleasure that local audiences derive from the performances of the players who have reached such a high degree of excellence under his leadership.

The programme last night included Bach's suite in D major, a concerto in C minor for violin and orchestra by the Swiss composer Jacques Dalcroze; Debussy's "Prelude to Stéphan Mallarme," ecologue "The Afternoon of a Fawn" and Beethoven's third symphony in E flat major, commonly known as the "Eroica." Of these numbers the violin concerto was an absolute novelty.

The number by Claude Debussy was performed here by the orchestra from Boston in 1904 and by Walter Damrosch with his New York Symphony Orchestra in 1905. The violin concerto derived a special interest last night from the fact that it was played by Henry Marteau, to whom the composer dedicated the work. It was Mr. Marteau who gave the piece its first public hearing in 1901 at Geneva.

The first theme of the work appears in the orchestra and, with the second, is utilized throughout the concerto. The first theme is worked out as a fugue in the first movement until the solo violin takes it up in more elaborate form. The second movement is pastoral in character, while the third is lively and gay. Mr. Marteau played the work in masterly fashion, and the composer could have demanded no more perfect performance than the soloist and orchestra offered. He availed himself of every orchestral means to create his effects, especially in the last movement.

In the Debussy number the exquisite finish and delicacy with which the orchestra played the music gave one a sense of beauty even if its elusive nature did not make any more comprehensible the ecologue to which it is a prelude. [illegible] writing music of [illegible] the Gods of [illegible]

Newspaper Cutting Bureau of the World
THE MORNING TELEGRAPH
ess NEW YORK CITY

MAR 16 1906

GERICKE'S CONCERT A BRILLIANT SUCCESS

At Conclusion of Programme Artist Thanks Enthusiastic Audience in Farewell Speech.

Mr. Gericke made the first of his two farewell appearances last night at Carnegie Hall. The programme included a suite in D major by John Sebastian Bach, which was played with great firmness and purity of tone.

Marteau was the soloist and rendered a novelty—a concerto for violin and orchestra by Jacques-Delcroze—which was original, unusual and in parts unnecessary. Mr. Marteau's tone was broad and emphatic.

"The Afternoon of a Faun," Debussy's exquisite little idyll, was gracefully done, and Beethoven's Heroic Sympathy closed the programme. The plaudits of the audience at the end of the concert brought Mr. Gericke out for a speech of farewell and of thanks for the kind-hearted interest of his audiences.

N. Y. EV'G SUN

MAR 16 1906

To-night is Brooklyn's turn to say farewell to Gericke. The last Boston Symphony programme at Baptist Temple includes two symphonies, first the Mozart symphony in G minor, No. 40; then Dvorak's 'cello concerto, played by Warnke, and finally the Beethoven symphony, "Eroica."

At his Carnegie Hall Saturday matinée, Mr. Gericke will conduct Weber's "Freischütz" overture, the new Converse "Ballade" for orchestra, with Mr. Bispham as soloist; Goldmark's "[illegible]" overture, and, after a Marsch[illegible] of "Hans Heiling," the Schubert [illegible] No. 7, not often heard.

...TOGUE
NEW YORK CITY
MAR 15 1906

RETIREMENT OF MR. GERICKE

THE recent announcement that Wilhelm Gericke will retire from the leadership of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the close of the present season is the liveliest current topic in music circles, not only in Boston and New York, but in at least a score of other cities in the East and Canada that are fortunate enough to be comprehended in the orchestra's concert route.

As a matter of fact, this society has come to be regarded well-nigh as a national institution. No wonder, then, that the countless admirers of Mr. Higginson's splendid organization feel profoundly concerned at the prospect of losing the conductor, who, more than any one else, has been the means of making this orchestra what it is—one of the foremost concert institutions of the world.

Mr. Gericke originally entered upon the duties, which he has discharged so well for more than a dozen years, in 1884—nearly a quarter of a century ago. After five years of labors so indefatigable that they undermined his health, the Austrian conductor resigned his post to return home and resume the direction of the Gesellschaft concerts in Vienna. At the end of nine years (1898), during which period Mr. Nikisch and then Mr. Paur endeavored to fill his old position, Mr. Gericke was induced to return to the orchestra, which in 1906 completes the thirteenth year under his leadership.

The Austrian conductor, who is known to be one of the most tireless and conscientious drill masters in his profession, was, perhaps, inadequately remunerated at $12,000 a year for rehearsing and leading over 100 concerts in a season, when Weingartner can demand and receive the same amount for conducting only sixteen concerts, and Safonoff declare that $20,000 would be his lowest annual terms for assuming the directorship of the N. Y. Symphony Orchestra on a three-year contract. This is in truth, the heyday for star conductors, and not only in New York, but in London, Paris and the prominent German cities, as well.

The musical public is bound to be deeply interested in Mr. Higginson's efforts to secure a worthy successor to Wilhelm Gericke.

Since Weingartner and Safonoff are practically out of the question, because of prior engagements, and since gossip has not yet dallied with the honored names of Richter and Mottl, the choice of a conductor of the first rank will probably fall upon Steinbach, of Cologne, Muck of Berlin, Mahler of Vienna, von Schuch of Dresden, or V. d'Indy of Paris. While these five are widely dissimilar in their individual methods and tastes, each one stands near the head of his profession, and two are also eminent composers, who would scarcely be tempted to leave Europe for a permanent engagement at any price. For this reason we think the choice more likely to fall upon Steinbach, Muck or Von Schuch, the first of whom, by the way, will direct the eighth pair of Philharmonic concerts, 23, 24 March, while the latter, it will be recalled, visited us with success some years ago.

...EVG WORLD
MAR 16 1906

Ovations to Gericke Mark Boston Symphony Concert

WILLIAM GERICKE has directed the Boston Symphony Orchestra for thirteen years. After this season he will lead it no more. If he ever had a doubt of the esteem in which New York music-lovers hold him, it must have been dispelled last night at Carnegie Hall. When he walked upon the stage to conduct the first of his two farewell concerts here he was greeted with applause that continued for a long time. After the performance the vast audience that had braved the storm remained to pay him a like compliment. Much of the intervening tribute to the skill of the players was also intended for him. A laurel wreath decorated his stand.

The programme was one to justify the faith of his admirers. It opened with Bach's suite in D major, a composition well fitted to display the virtuosity of the band. Such singing in one voice by the violins may rarely be heard. It closed with Beethoven's third symphony, the "Eroica," the splendid measures of which were sonorously pronounced.

Between these came a violin concerto in C minor by Jacques-Daleroze, dedicated to Henri Marteau, who played the solo part, and heard for the first time here. It is Oriental in conception, the first movement seeming harsh and grating, emphasized by a slight discordance in pitch between the solo instrument and the rest of the band. The following two movements, however, were full of charm and interest.

Another almost novelty was that delightful airy, fairy like structure of Debussy's, "The Afternoon of a Faun," played with the grace and delicacy for which the composition calls.

Altogether it was an evening not soon to be forgotten by players and audience.

At the final concert to-morrow afternoon Bispham will be the soloist.

EVG. TELEGRAM
MAR 16 1906

Last Evening Concert of the Boston Symphony at Carnegie.

THE last evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in this city during the present season, and the last but one under the baton of Mr. Gericke, attracted a very large audience despite the severe storm. There was a general feeling of regret at the retirement of the conductor who has done so much for the famous band during both periods of his leadership.

It cannot be forgotten that when Mr. Gericke succeeded Mr. Henschel and first assumed charge of the orchestra he brought the organization through a critical period, and in all the time of his service his work has been faithful and conscientious.

The performance was such as we have been led to expect of late—excellent combinations in the choirs, a remarkably fine balance of tone, and a smooth, musicianly performance. The players were kept well in hand by the director—too well in hand, in fact, with a resultant lack of fire and an uncomfortable feeling of too much repression.

These defects were less noticeable in the first number, Bach's suite in D major, an academic composition which admits of Mr. Gericke's academic rendering. The famous second movement was, as usual, received with the heartiest commendation of the audience, partly because of its frequent repetition in programme music, arranged as a 'cello solo, with orchestral accompaniment.

Mr. Henri Marteau, the soloist of the evening, brought forward a concerto for violin and orchestra, played here for the first time. After a rather unpromising beginning a number of exquisite melodies were introduced. The orchestration is particularly effective, offering a multi-colored background for the solo instrument. It is not likely that the composition will prove to be a favorite with violinists, as it offers more melodies than technical gymnastics.

Debussy's prelude to "An Afternoon with a Faun" has already been heard here this season, when it was played with more enthusiasm and less restraint than the Boston Symphony indulged. It is an admirable specimen of the radical French school, a tone poem of unusual pictorial charm.

The "Eroica" Symphony of Beethoven brought the concert to a close.

...NEW YORK PRESS
...ress
MAR 16 1906

IN THE REALM OF MUSIC

Gericke's Night of Farewell.

Musical New York began to say goodby to Wilhelm Gericke in Carnegie Hall last night. The weather held no terrors for the admirers of the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who after to-morrow's performance will direct the band no longer, so far as this city is concerned. The auditorium was filled comfortably. Gericke had received one of the wreaths which, like farewell performances, are fashionable just now, and this, with its bow of yellow ribbon, was hung on the conductor's desk. The audience's expressions of good will took the form of applause when the leader appeared and when he left the platform. When the concert ended the applause took on that air of mild hysteria to which musical New York is prone on such occasions.

The audience stood up and lingered, like Stevenson's guest who was unwilling to go. It applauded more and more as the conductor bowed again and again with his arms folded across his shirt front. Of course, some women waved their handkerchiefs. Then Gericke stepped nearer the front of the platform and told his eager listeners how much he appreciated the encouragement New York had given to him and how its support was of so much importance to the success of the orchestra. More applause, and the enthusiastic ones filed out into Fifty-seventh street, to face something even more "heroic" than Beethoven's Third Symphony—the weather.

As for the concert itself, which, after all, was a secondary thing to the Gericke "farewell," it consisted of Bach's suite in D minor, Jacques-Delacroze's concerto in C minor, for violin and orchestra, op. 50; Debussy's prelude to Mallarme's ecologue, "The Afternoon of a Faun," and Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony. All of these numbers are familiar here, as played by the Bostonians, save the concerto, which came to a first hearing. Henri Marteau was the solcist, and Professor Willy Hess, the concert master, conducted the work. The violinist had the double honor of having this composition dedicated to him and playing it at its first hearing at the Swiss Music Festival in Geneva, June 23, 1901. He played it last night with affection. This, combined with his customary beauty of tone and breadth of insight, made his performance noteworthy. The first movement of the work calls for a large display of technique, and the second, which is of a pastoral nature, enabled Marteau to show the sheer beauty and bigness of his tone, that is so faultless when he is not called upon to be vigorous. The final movement is in marked contrast to the largo by its gayety and its element of the fantastic. The color of the background was admirably brought out by the band.

In spite of the fact that on its first publication the "Eroica" symphony bore a note of warning that it should be played at the beginning of a concert instead of at the end, Gericke defied that mandate. His reading of the score was such that he sent his auditors home more moved than the composer evidently thought any of its hearers ever would be.

...om
...ewspaper Clipping Bureau
...ldress
...ate
...ess
APR

N. Y. TRIBUNE
MAR

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. Marteau, who did missionary labor on his last visit in behalf of Sinding, the Norseman, last night gave proof of his cosmopolitan generosity by playing a violin concerto by Emile Jacques-Dalcroze, who was born in Vienna to Swiss parents of French extraction. It was at a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which had already enough to signalize it in the fact that it was the last of Mr. Gericke's evening concerts with the organization which he has done so much to make renowned. The fact was evidently uppermost in the minds of the people who braved the weather to hear the music and testify their appreciation both of it and of the musician, who for thirteen years has upborne the banner of musical beauty with rare consistency and devotion. Mr. Gericke, on his part, had prepared a programme which seemed to have been planned to publish his ideals and disprove the notion which has prevailed in some quarters that he is antagonistic to the fruits of modern progress. He began with Bach's Suite in D major and ended with Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony. Between these he placed the violin concerto by Jacques-Dalcroze and that marvellous bit of orchestral delineation, Debussy's "L'Après-Midi d' un Faune," suggested by Mallarmé's eclogue. All that might have been expected from Mr. Gericke, with his exquisite sense of euphony and the virtuososhiip of his musicians (both often extolled in these columns), was enjoyed by the audience and met its reward.

As a rule, Mr. Marteau's efforts at propagandism for modern works are well bestowed. The new concerto is a striking example of ingenious construction, and the principle of unity, as exemplified in community of theme in the three movements, is finely carried out. But there would seem to be more cleverness of workmanship than inspiration in the work. It is a highly colored score and a complex, in which the solo instrument holds its own against the orchestra chiefly by dint of the straightforwardness of its part, but also occasionally by main strength exerted by the performer. It has commendable force in its first movement and beauty in the second, but both qualities are used up before the finale is begun. In it there is absolutely nothing to charm and interest runs out into mere curiosity. It bristles with difficulties, and one is tempted to wish, with Dr. Johnson, that it were impossible. A wreath of laurel covered Mr. Gericke's desk, and the audience welcomed him enthusiastically and gave him many hearty rounds of applause after the symphony.

At the close Mr. Gericke gave expression to his gratitude. Without the New-York public, which had always been so kind in its appreciation, he said, the orchestra would in all likelihood not have endured till to-day. Therefore he gave voice to his own thanks and those of the orchestra.

H. E. K.

NEW YORK HERALD
...ss
MAR 16 1906

MR. GERICKE BIDDING NEW YORK GOODB

And Local Patrons of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Express Their Regrets.

Last night's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall, had a feature of more than usual interest through the fact that it involved one of the two farewell appearances of Mr. Wilhelm Gericke as the organization conductor.

Recognition of his many years of splendid work as the orchestra's leader was made by last night's audience in round after round of applause as he advanced to the desk he is shortly to relinquish and in enthusiastic tributes for each of his interpretations. Some admirers had attached a huge wreath of laurel to his music stand. Mr. Gericke took these honors in his usual quiet, self-possessed way, and when at one point the applause grew especially insistent, made the men rise to share it.

The programme presented Mr. Henri Marteau as the soloist and contained besides a new violin concerto by Emile Jaques-Dalcroze, to which the French violinist gave its first local hearing, Bach's D major suite, Debussy's prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun" and Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony.

The playing of the orchestra was, as usual, brilliant. It showed to best advantage perhaps in the Debussy piece, the suave, mellow instrumentation of which needs the beautiful balance and elegance of tone for which Mr. Gericke has made his men famous. The Beethoven symphony, save that the Funeral March seemed rather fast, has not had better playing in New York in a long time.

The Dalcroze concerto, which Mr. Marteau played with real devotion, did not make a completely favorable impression. Its first movement showed much vitality and some original imaginings and the second section was pleasing, but the third movement obscured completely the previous impressions in a waste of apparently meaningless sound. Incidentally this section proved almost unplayable.

[199]

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mr. Gericke Conducts the Orchestra at Carnegie Hall.

The last concert but one that Wilhelm Gericke will conduct with the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place last night at Carnegie Hall. Mr. Gericke will be in his place at the concert on Saturday afternoon. But there is a different public for these two concerts, and Mr. Gericke parted last night from a large number of his local admirers. The cordiality of the feeling toward him was frequently demonstrated last night. Mr. Gericke stands high in the affections of New York music lovers. They have recognized and appreciated his achievements with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

In spite of the recent visits of noted foreign conductors Mr. Gericke is probably more cherished to-day in New York than he ever was. The future will show how much greater or less will be the pleasure that local audiences derive from the performances of the players who have reached such a high degree of excellence under his leadership.

The programme last night included Bach's suite in D major, a concerto in C minor for violin and orchestra by the Swiss composer Jacques Dalcroze: Debussy's "Prelude to Stéphan Mallarme," ecologue "The Afternoon of a Fawn" and Beethoven's third symphony in E flat major, commonly known as the "Eroica." Of these numbers the violin concerto was an absolute novelty.

The number by Claude Debussy was performed here by the orchestra from Boston in 1904 and by Walter Damrosch with his New York Symphony Orchestra in 1905. The violin concerto derived a special interest last night from the fact that it was played by Henry Marteau, to whom the composer dedicated the work. It was Mr. Marteau who gave the piece its first public hearing in 1901 at Geneva.

The first theme of the work appears in the orchestra and, with the second, is utilized throughout the concerto. The first theme is worked out as a fugue in the first movement until the solo violin takes it up in more elaborate form. The second movement is pastoral in character, while the third is lively and gay. Mr. Marteau played the work in masterly fashion, and the composer could have demanded no more perfect performance than the soloist and orchestra offered. He availed himself of every orchestral means to create his effects, especially in the last movement.

In the Debussy number the exquisite finish and delicacy with which the orchestra played the music gave one a sense of beauty, even if its elusive nature did not make any more comprehensible the ecologue to which it is a prelude. Mallarmé claimed to be writing music of his own with words, so the task of the composer seems not unlike the labor of painting the lily.

GERICKE'S CONCERT A BRILLIANT SUCCESS

At Conclusion of Programme Artist Thanks Enthusiastic Audience in Farewell Speech.

Mr. Gericke made the first of his two farewell appearances last night at Carnegie Hall. The programme included a suite in D major by John Sebastian Bach, which was played with great firmness and purity of tone.

Marteau was the soloist and rendered a novelty—a concerto for violin and orchestra by Jacques-Delcroze—which was original, unusual and in parts unnecessary. Mr. Marteau's tone was broad and emphatic.

"The Afternoon of a Faun," Debussy's exquisite little idyll, was gracefully done, and Beethoven's Heroic Sympathy closed the programme. The plaudits of the audience at the end of the concert brought Mr. Gericke out for a speech of farewell and of thanks for the kind-hearted interest of his audiences.

...8
N. Y. EV'G SUN
...ss
MAR 16 1906

To-night is Brooklyn's turn to say farewell to Gericke. The last Boston Symphony programme at Baptist Temple includes two symphonies, first the Mozart symphony in G minor, No. 40; then Dvorak's 'cello concerto, played by Warnke, and finally the Beethoven symphony, "Eroica."

At his Carnegie Hall Saturday matinée, Mr. Gericke will conduct Weber's "Freischütz" overture, the new Converse "Ballade" for orchestra, with Mr. Bispham as soloist; Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture, and, after a Marschner aria of "Hans Heiling," the Schubert symphony No. 7, not often heard.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the GLOBE
NEW YORK COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER
MAR 16 1906

This music for to-night is "La Gioconda" at the Metropolitan Opera House and the People's Symphony Concert at Grand Central Palace.

To-morrow the farewell performances of the opera season will take place—in the afternoon, the first and second acts of "Tosca," with Mme Eames and Messrs. Dippel and Scotti, and the second and third acts of "The Barber of Seville," with Mme Sembrich and Messrs. Dippel, Campanari, Rossi, and Journet; in the evening "Lohengrin," with Mmes Rappold and Walker, and Messrs. Knote, Goritz, and Blass.

Mr. Gericke will also take his farewell of New York to-morrow afternoon at the final concert of the series given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The programme of the occasion will include Weber's "Freischütz" overture, Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture, and Schubert's C major symphony, besides a new setting of Keats's "Belle Dame sans Merci," by F. S. Converse, and the aria "An Jenem Tag," from "Hans Heiling," for Mr. David Bispham, the soloist of the occasion.

To-morrow night the Russian Symphony Society will present the following programme: Gliere, symphony No. 1; Seroff, "Cossack Dance"; César Cui, "Valse"; Mlinarsky, concerto for violin; Rimsky-Korsakoff, suite "Tsar Saltan." Alexander Saslavsky will be the soloist.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
NEW YORK

MUSIC AND DRAMA.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Boreal conditions somewhat affected the size of the Boston orchestra's audience at Carnegie Hall last night, but Mr. Gericke had no reason to complain of coldness. A warmer reception than he received when he came on the platform has seldom been accorded to a popular conductor. He has many friends and admirers here who regret his decision to retire and return to Vienna. Who his successor will be no one knows except possibly Major Higginson. The rumor that Mr. Fritz Steinbach, who conducts our pair of Philharmonic concerts next week, had been engaged, is emphatically and, apparently, officially denied in the Boston Herald. The rumor arose because of Mr. Steinbach's landing in Boston instead of in New York. Prof. Hess of the Boston orchestra is an intimate friend of his.

Last night's programme began with the familiar Bach suite in D major, No. 3, and ended with Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony. The middle numbers were a violin concerto, opus 50, by Jacques-Dalcroze, and Debussy's "The Afternoon of a Faun." The orchestra played with its usual precision, beauty of tone, and attention to subtle shading. The Bach suite was particularly enjoyable, and Debussy could not have imagined a more refined and delicately colored performance of his pretty musical blotch than it received on this occasion. The word blotch is used advisedly. This modern French music has neither pattern nor melody; it is simply a vague mass of harmonized musical paint. Interesting as a curiosity, it has no enduring value; nor does it bear any obvious relation to the poem that inspired it—Mallarmé's "famous miracle of unintelligibility," as Mr. Gosse has called it.

The violin concerto of Jaques-Dalcroze apparently owed the honor of being produced on this occasion to the utilitarian fact of its being dedicated to Mr. Marteau, who played it. Not long ago a Philharmonic concert was nearly marred by the inclusion in the programme of an interminably stupid 'cello concerto dedicated to the player. This violin concerto proved to be little better, nor did Mr. Marteau succeed in making it interesting by his playing, which was dry and uninspired. He was recalled several times at the end.

To-morrow afternoon Mr. Gericke will say his farewell to New York with a programme that includes Schubert's sublime symphony in C major, which alone would insure a full house. The preceding numbers are Weber's "Freischütz" and Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overtures. Mr. David Bispham will sing a baritone solo by Converse and an aria from "Hans Heiling."

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
New York Times
MAR 16 1

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

Mr. Gericke's Last Appearances in Its Final Concerts.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is giving this week the last concerts of its season in New York. They are also the last concerts which Mr. Gericke will conduct here, since he has resigned his place at the head of the orchestra and will return to Vienna in May. The audience at the concert last evening in Carnegie Hall was anxious to make him understand its regard for him, and when he appeared there was a great burst of applause, long continued, which Mr. Gericke must have felt was a genuine tribute.

The programme was one of strong contrasts. It began with Bach's orchestral suite in D minor, the one that contains the much-abused air, and much else that is strong and vigorous, tender and merry; a wonderful piece that has retained its freshness and interest so long. It was played with splendid spirit. There was also for orchestra Debussy's prelude, "The Afternoon of a Faun," that Mr. Damrosch performed here recently. There is much imagination, much suggestion, behind the vague outlines of this music, the vaporous and filmy orchestration, the strangely shifting harmonies; there are glimpses of the golden days when the world was young; woodland vistas and glinting lakes, naiads and nymphs, and the dreams of old and far-off things. The texture of this musical fabric is exquisite and of gossamer thinness; but it is beautiful, and it was ravishingly played.

Mr. Henri Marteau was the soloist, and played a violin concerto dedicated to him by Emile Jaques-Dalcrôge, a Swiss composer hardly known here, or if at all, chiefly by some melodious children's songs. Yet he has written much, even in some of the larger forms; and this concerto shows a skillful hand. What is of as much importance, it shows also a strong imagination and ingenuity, if not exactly a strongly creative musical gift. Mr. Dalcrôge is familiar with the modern orchestra and its possibilities, and he has written a work that is in many ways striking. It is the kind of thing that artists, in speaking of pictures, call "amusing"; and that in a highly complimentary sense. There is a vein of fantasy through it that is frequently erratic, and in the last movement grotesque; and there are many beauties in the themes and their ingenious development, and in the brilliant orchestration. Mr. Marteau played it with a fine and sweeping energy, and a perfect conviction that was contagious. It abounds in sonorous and effective passages for the solo instrument, and these he made the most of. The work pleased greatly and called forth much applause.

Instead of Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, that closed the programme, Mr. Gericke originally intended to play Strauss's early symphonic poem, "Aus Italien," the work that marks his transition from the cultivation of the symphony and sonata to that of the programme tone picture. But Mr. Gericke thought better of it, and substituted Beethoven's symphony; and it is possible that the audience, too, may have thought better of it.

At the close of the symphony there was long-continued, enthusiastic applause. Mr. Gericke was recalled and bowed many times. Finally he stilled the applause and spoke a few words expressing his thanks for himself and for the orchestra, adding that without the support given by New York the orchestra would probably not have been able to go on.

MAR 16 1906

Bostoner Symphonieorchester.

„Zum Abschiednehmen just das rechte Wetter!"

Das Bostoner Symphonieorchester und sein langjähriger Dirigent, Wilhelm Gericke, fingen gestern Abend an, von uns Abschied zu nehmen, und in dem folgenden Samstag-Nachmittag-Konzert werden sie dieses Abschiednehmen zum Abschluß bringen. Aber während sich das Orchester nur bis zur nächsten Saison vom New Yorker Publikum beurlaubt, wird Herr Gericke nicht auf den Posten zurückkehren, den er so lange inne gehabt. Das Publikum war freilich nicht so zahlreich erschienen wie sonst, — der März-Schneesturm mochte manche gute Intentionen zu nichte gemacht haben, — aber es ließ es nicht an einer warmen Anerkennungsdemonstration fehlen. Ein Lorbeerkranz schmückte das Dirigentenpult, und als Herr Gericke erschien, begrüßte ihn ein stürmischer Applaus, der wohl eine Minute lang anhielt. Und wo sich während des Verlaufs des Konzertes dazu irgend Gelegenheit bot, brach der Beifall mit besonderer Heftigkeit wieder durch. Es kann Herrn Gericke also nicht verborgen geblieben sein, daß man seinem Wirken ein ehrendes Angedenken zu bewahren gedenkt. Wohl hat man manches Mal gewünscht, er möge über der ängstlichen Korrektheit nicht die Temperament-Aeußerungen zu sehr vergessen, aber man hat sich immer von seinem künstlerischen Ernst und seiner musikalischen Noblesse wieder versöhnen lassen. Gestern bewies Herr Gericke in dem „Nachmittag eines Fauns" von Debussy wiederum, daß er auch solcher Musik sein ganzes Können widmet, die seinem Naturell kaum sympathisch sein kann. Das köstliche musikalische Gemälde machte in der virtuosen

MAR 16 1906

Mit Recht wurde Wilhelm Gericke, der Leiter der Bostoner Symphoniekonzerte, gestern Abend in der Carnegie Hall bei seinem Erscheinen mit einem Beifallssturm begrüßt, der sich nach jeder Nummer des Programms wiederholte. Er hat sich in den sieben Jahren seiner Wirksamkeit in Boston und New York die Herzen der Musikfreunde erobert, und sie wissen, daß sie in ihm einen Künstler ersten Ranges verlieren, wenn er nach Wien zurückkehrt, wo er bereits vor seiner Berufung nach Amerika eine hervorragende Stellung bekleidete. Gericke ist ein Meister des Dirigierstabes, ein Meister des Orchesters, ein Meister der Interpretation. Er ist ein Musiker durch und durch, der sich in die Seele eines jeden Tonwerkes zu versenken weiß, der es mit Liebe und Hingebung studiert und es dann mit Feuer an seine Aufgabe geht, der spielend die größten technischen Schwierigkeiten mit steggewohnter Leichtigkeit. Er bewies gestern Abend wiederum, daß er in der allerersten Reihe der modernen Meister des Violinspiels steht, und nicht wenige werden ihn für den sympathischsten von allen halten. Er wurde mit stürmischem Beifall ausgezeichnet.

MA
ss
NEW YORK CITY,
MAR 16 1906

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA PLAYS

Wilhelm Gericke's Farewell Appearances Here as Conductor—Bach, Beethoven, Debussy and a New Swiss Composer.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is finishing its New York series. The final evening concert took place last night; to-morrow the last matinee will mark also the farewell of Wilhelm Gericke, who for a total of thirteen years has been the organization's conductor.

There were warm demonstrations for Mr. Gericke last night, and there will be more to-morrow. He deserves all of these and more, for his work in building up the orchestra and maintaining it at its present efficiency has been simply beyond valuation. Whoever succeeds him as its leader, the Boston Orchestra must remain a monument to the patient skill and resolute mastery of Wilhelm Gericke.

The programme last night was one that made it worth while to disregard wind and weather—Carnegie Hall was filled, despite them. A Bach suite in D major began the concert, and Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony ended it. Each was played with noble solidity; the symphony was read with majestic eloquence.

Debussy's exquisitely suggestive prelude to Stephane Mallarme's eclogue, "The Afternoon of a Faun," which Walter Damrosch had made known here last year, was performed with complete regard for the delicate beauty. Music like this, which depends upon subtle shadings and precisely adjusted orchestral tones, demands the very perfection of interpretation.

At the hands of the Boston men this imaginative transiation of the spirit of a poem into music was set forth with loving care. The audience appreciated it, and at this second hearing it tightened its grasp upon the listener—Debussy is one of the men of the hour.

Henri Marteau, the French violinist, was the soloist and brought out as a novelty a concerto in C minor, opus 50, by Emile Jaques-Dalcroze, a Swiss composer little known here. The concerto is of a beauty easily discernible yet not commonplace or too obvious.

The composer has absorbed the ideals of Wagner, without aping his manner. His melodic invention is considerable and his harmonic sense is not sharpened to the point where dissonance alone appeals to him. His orchestration is refined in method—French traits predominate. The second movement, a largo, recalls a phenomenon remarked by observant Alpine travelers—the hushed and subdued voices of the mountain folk, accustomed to the oppressive silences of remote solitudes. The slow movement of this violin concerto seems to reproduce just such a mood, peaceful, reserved, poised.

Mr. Marteau was at his best. The style native to him is a certain elegance enforced with virility. He is French in the true sense. His tone was clear, full, alive. His phrasing was intelligent. He played the concerto, which is dedicated to him, as one would carry out a labor of love.

At Saturday afternoon's concert, Mr. David Bispham will be soloist in a new ballade by Frederick S. Converse for baritone and orchestra and a Marschner aria. The orchestra will play the overtures to "Der Freischutz" and "Sakuntala" of Weber and Goldmark respect[illegible] Schubert C major sym[illegible]

N. Y. EV'G SUN
ss
MAR 17 1906

[illegible] "Well done!" that was [illegible] him by audiences on Thurs[illegible] ugh and last night in Brook[illegible] popular recognition of the [illegible] though he chose to make his [illegible] Boston Symphony Orchestra [illegible] him in the acknowledgment.

Is Gericke quitting because [illegible] Schroeder and other men, th[illegible] brought with him from Vienna, ha[illegible] away from the old standard? [illegible] year's D'Indy business a deathblow? [illegible] the spirit of his men in doubt, as once [illegible] fore, when Col. Higginson invited Gericke the second time to Boston? It was the historic doubt at that time whether or not his men wanted their iron drillmaster back that held his answer until Svecenski should stop in Vienna on his annual visit and tell the old leader how badly they wanted him. As it happened, the first viola went home to Ischl direct. He did not visit Gericke. And his former chief, being pressed by Col. Higginson for an answer, simply cabled "No."

Never more loyal to his own Vienna than now, Mr. Gericke made his farewell programmes a tribute to that centre of light and leading in times past. His Beethoven "Eroica," his Mozart symphony, and to-day his Schubert No. 7, were tributes to his chosen immortals. Some things besides bakers have made Vienna famous. The Goldmark of to-day's second overture was his early contemporary there.

In M. Marteau's new violin concerto by a Swiss musician and in to-day's Converse "Ballade" for Mr. Bispham, Mr. Gericke still showed his attitude of toleration for what is new. He has read perhaps more American manuscripts than any other leader since Thomas. He has played a temperate few. And Gericke himself has written for singer and chorus and orchestra in his time.

NEW YORK PRESS
m ress
e
MAR 17 1906

Boston Band Plays in Brooklyn.

Swayed by the baton of Wilhelm Gericke, the men of the Boston Symphony Orchestra poured out music in the Baptist Temple, in Brooklyn, last night. It was the fifth concert of the season of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society, and the crowd was big enough and applausive enough to make Gericke happy—or to make him sad at the prospect of not leading the Hub musicians here again.

NEW YORK SUN
MAR 18 1906

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Wilhelm Gericke Conducts the Organization for the Last Time Here.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its final New York concert of the present season yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall. The programme consisted of the overture to Weber's "Der Freischütz," and Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture; Schubert's symphony in C major, an aria from Marschner's "Hans Heiling," and a novelty in a ballade composed by F. S. Converse after Keats's poem "La Belle Dame Sans Merci."

Mr. Converse's composition was completed in 1902. The composer described the number as a ballade in the nature of a symphonic poem with voice part. The orchestral interludes are also intended to express the words of the poem. It was in these that the composer met with his greatest success. They are scored with exquisite delicacy and exhibit an uncommon skill in the command of the means to produce color and variety in instrumentation. The voice part was less interesting. It was somewhat monotonous in effect and lacked the essential surge of passion. Mr. Bispham, who has sung the vocal part several times before, was not in good voice yesterday. He sang also the familiar Marschner aria beloved of barytones.

The orchestra played with its usual brilliancy in the other numbers. There was long continued applause for Mr. Gericke and the men after the Weber overture, and the conductor was greeted with an enthusiastic round of applause when he took his place before the orchestra. So great was the enthusiasm after the Goldmark number that he was compelled to motion his men to rise [illegible] set twice before the audience would allow the concert to proceed. After the [illegible] which was superbly performed, [illegible] was repeated [illegible] and the [illegible] last tribute [illegible] ge, but [illegible]

[200]

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
GLOBE
NEW YORK COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER
MAR 16 1906

THE music for to-night is "La Gioconda" at the Metropolitan Opera House and the People's Symphony Concert at Grand Central Palace.

To-morrow the farewell performances of the opera season will take place—in the afternoon, the first and second acts of "Tosca," with Mme Eames and Messrs. Dippel and Scotti, and the second and third acts of "The Barber of Seville," with Mme Sembrich and Messrs. Dippel, Campanari, Rossi, and Journet; in the evening "Lohengrin," with Mmes Rappold and Walker, and Messrs. Knote, Goritz, and Blass.

Mr. Gericke will also take his farewell of New York to-morrow afternoon at the final concert of the series given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The programme of the occasion will include Weber's "Freischütz" overture, Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture, and Schubert's C major symphony, besides a new setting of Keats's "Belle Dame sans Merci," by F. S. Converse, and the aria "An Jenem Tag," from "Hans Heiling," for Mr. David Bispham, the soloist of the occasion.

To-morrow night the Russian Symphony Society will present the following programme: Gliere, symphony No. 1; Seroff, "Cossack Dance"; César Cui, "Valse"; Milnarsky, concerto for violin; Rimsky-Korsakoff, suite "Tsar Saltan." Alexander Saslavsky will be the soloist.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

MUSIC AND DRAMA.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Boreal conditions somewhat affected the size of the Boston orchestra's audience at Carnegie Hall last night, but Mr. Gericke had no reason to complain of coldness. A warmer reception than he received when he came on the platform has seldom been accorded to a popular conductor. He has many friends and admirers here who regret his decision to retire and return to Vienna. Who his successor will be no one knows except possibly Major Higginson. The rumor that Mr. Fritz Steinbach, who conducts our pair of Philharmonic concerts next week, had been engaged, is emphatically and, apparently, officially denied in the Boston Herald. The rumor arose because of Mr. Steinbach's landing in Boston instead of in New York. Prof. Hess of the Boston orchestra is an intimate friend of his.

Last night's programme began with the familiar Bach suite in D major, No. 3, and ended with Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony. The middle numbers were a violin concerto, opus 50, by Jacques-Dalcroze, and Debussy's "The Afternoon of a Faun." The orchestra played with its usual precision, beauty of tone, and attention to subtle shading. The Bach suite was particularly enjoyable, and Debussy could not have imagined a more refined and delicately colored performance of his pretty musical blotch than it received on this occasion. The word blotch is used advisedly. This modern French music has neither pattern nor melody; it is simply a vague mass of harmonized musical paint. Interesting as a curiosity, it has no enduring value; nor does it bear any obvious relation to the poem that inspired it—Mallarmé's "famous miracle of unintelligibility," as Mr. Gosse has called it.

The violin concerto of Jaques-Dalcroze apparently owed the honor of being produced on this occasion to the utilitarian fact of its being dedicated to Mr. Marteau, who played it. Not long ago a Philharmonic concert was nearly marred by the inclusion in the programme of an interminably stupid 'cello concerto dedicated to the player. This violin concerto proved to be little better, nor did Mr. Marteau succeed in making it interesting by his playing, which was dry and uninspired. He was recalled several times at the end.

To-morrow afternoon Mr. Gericke will say his farewell to New York with a programme that includes Schubert's sublime symphony in C major, which alone would insure a full house. The preceding numbers are Weber's "Freischütz" and Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overtures. Mr. David Bispham will sing a baritone solo by Converse and an aria from "Hans Heiling."

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
New York Times.
MAR 16 1906

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Mr. Gericke's Last Appearances in Its Final Concerts.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is giving this week the last concerts of its season in New York. They are also the last concerts which Mr. Gericke will conduct here, since he has resigned his place at the head of the orchestra and will return to Vienna in May. The audience at the concert last evening in Carnegie Hall was anxious to make him understand its regard for him, and when he appeared there was a great burst of applause, long continued, which Mr. Gericke must have felt was a genuine tribute.

The programme was one of strong contrasts. It began with Bach's orchestral suite in D minor, the one that contains the much-abused air, and much else that is strong and vigorous, tender and merry; a wonderful piece that has retained its freshness and interest so long. It was played with splendid spirit. There was also for orchestra Debussy's prelude, "The Afternoon of a Faun," that Mr. Damrosch performed here recently. There is much imagination, much suggestion, behind the vague outlines of this music, the vaporous and filmy orchestration, the strangely shifting harmonies; there are glimpses of the golden days when the world was young; woodland vistas and glinting lakes, naiads and nymphs, and the dreams of old and far-off things. The texture of this musical fabric is exquisite and of gossamer thinness; but it is beautiful, and it was ravishingly played.

Mr. Henri Marteau was the soloist, and played a violin concerto dedicated to him by Emile Jaques-Dalcrôge, a Swiss composer hardly known here, or if at all, chiefly by some melodious children's songs. Yet he has written much, even in some of the larger forms; and this concerto shows a skillful hand. What is of as much importance, it shows also a strong imagination and ingenuity, if not exactly a strongly creative musical gift. Mr. Dalcrôge is familiar with the modern orchestra and its possibilities, and he has written a work that is in many ways striking. It is the kind of thing that artists, in speaking of pictures, call "amusing"; and that in a highly complimentary sense. There is a vein of fantasy through it that is frequently erratic, and in the last movement grotesque; and there are many beauties in the themes and their ingenious development, and in the brilliant orchestration. Mr. Marteau played it with a fine and sweeping energy, and a perfect conviction that was contagious. It abounds in sonorous and effective passages for the solo instrument, and these he made the most of. The work pleased greatly and called forth much applause.

Instead of Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, that closed the programme, Mr. Gericke originally intended to play Strauss's early symphonic poem, "Aus Italien," the work that marks his transition from the cultivation of the symphony and sonata to that of the programme tone picture. But Mr. Gericke thought better of it, and substituted Beethoven's symphony; and it is possible that the audience, too, may have thought better of it.

At the close of the symphony there was long-continued, enthusiastic applause. Mr. Gericke was recalled and bowed many times. Finally he stilled the applause and spoke a few words expressing his thanks for himself and for the orchestra, adding that without the support given by New York the orchestra would probably not have been able to go on.

MAR 16 1906

Bostoner Symphonieorchester.

„Zum Abschiednehmen just das rechte Wetter!"

Das Bostoner Symphonieorchester und sein langjähriger Dirigent, Wilhelm Gericke, fingen gestern Abend an, von uns Abschied zu nehmen, und in dem folgenden Samstag-Nachmittag-Konzert werden sie dieses Abschiednehmen zum Abschluß bringen. Aber während sich das Orchester nur bis zur nächsten Saison vom New Yorker Publikum beurlaubt, wird Herr Gericke nicht auf den Posten zurückkehren, den er so lange inne gehabt. Das Publikum war freilich nicht so zahlreich erschienen wie sonst, — der März-Schneesturm mochte manche gute Intentionen zu nichte gemacht haben, — aber es ließ es nicht an einer warmen Anerkennungsdemonstration fehlen. Ein Lorbeerkranz schmückte das Dirigentenpult, und als Herr Gericke erschien, begrüßte ihn ein stürmischer Applaus, der wohl eine Minute lang anhielt. Und wo sich während des Verlaufs des Konzertes dazu irgend Gelegenheit bot, brach der Beifall mit besonderer Heftigkeit wieder durch. Es kann Herrn Gericke also nicht verborgen geblieben sein, daß man seinem Wirken ein ehrendes Angedenken zu bewahren gedenkt. Wohl hat man manches Mal gewünscht, er möge über der ängstlichen Korrektheit nicht die Temperament-Aeußerungen zu sehr vergessen, aber man hat sich immer von seinem künstlerischen Ernst und seiner musikalischen Noblesse wieder versöhnen lassen. Gestern bewies Herr Gericke in dem „Nachmittag eines Fauns" von Debussy wiederum, daß er auch solcher Musik sein ganzes Können widmet, die seinem Naturell kaum sympathisch sein kann. Das köstliche musikalische Genrebild machte in der virtuosen Ausführung einen ungemein anziehenden Eindruck. Die weiteren Programmnummern bestanden in Bach's D-dur Suite und Beethoven's „Eroica"-Symphonie.

Solist des Abends war der allezeit willkommene Henri Marteau, der [illegible]

[illegible] Marteau ist eine [illegible] Virtuosen, die auf [illegible] und dieses [illegible] zwungenes an sich.
Marteau aber spielte die Novität ganz meisterlich. Er ging mit einem hinreißenden Feuer an seine Aufgabe und er bewältigte die großen technischen Schwierigkeiten mit steggewohnter Leichtigkeit. Er bewies gestern Abend wiederum, daß er in der allerersten Reihe der modernen Meister des Violinspiels steht, und nicht wenige werden ihn für den sympathischsten von allen halten. Er wurde mit stürmischem Beifall ausgezeichnet.
MA
[illegible]
APR 1 1906

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA PLAYS

Wilhelm Gericke's Farewell Appearances Here as Conductor—Bach, Beethoven, Debussy and a New Swiss Composer.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is finishing its New York series. The final evening concert took place last night; to-morrow the last matinee will mark also the farewell of Wilhelm Gericke, who for a total of thirteen years has been the organization's conductor.

There were warm demonstrations for Mr. Gericke last night, and there will be more to-morrow. He deserves all of these and more, for his work in building up the orchestra and maintaining it at its present efficiency has been simply beyond valuation. Whoever succeeds him as its leader, the Boston Orchestra must remain a monument to the patient skill and resolute mastery of Wilhelm Gericke.

The programme last night was one that made it worth while to disregard wind and weather—Carnegie Hall was filled, despite them. A Bach suite in D major began the concert, and Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony ended it. Each was played with noble solidity; the symphony was read with majestic eloquence.

Debussy's exquisitely suggestive prelude to Stephane Mallarme's eclogue, "The Afternoon of a Faun," which Walter Damrosch had made known here last year, was performed with complete regard for the delicate beauty. Music like this, which depends upon subtle shadings and precisely adjusted orchestral tones, demands the very perfection of interpretation.

At the hands of the Boston men this imaginative translation of the spirit of a poem into music was set forth with loving care. The audience appreciated it, and at this second hearing it tightened its grasp upon the listener—Debussy is one of the men of the hour.

Henri Marteau, the French violinist, was the soloist and brought out as a novelty a concerto in C minor, opus 50, by Emile Jaques-Dalcroze, a Swiss composer little known here. The concerto is of a beauty easily discernible yet not commonplace or too obvious.

The composer has absorbed the ideals of Wagner, without aping his manner. His melodic invention is considerable and his harmonic sense is not sharpened to the point where dissonance alone appeals to him. His orchesration is refined in method—French traits predominate. The second movement, a largo, recalls a phenomenon remarked by observant Alpine travelers—the hushed and subdued voices of the mountain folk, accustomed to the oppressive silences of remote solitudes. The slow movement of this violin concerto seems to reproduce just such a mood, peaceful, reserved, poised.

Mr. Marteau was at his best. The style native to him is a certain elegance enforced with virility. He is French in the true sense. His tone was clear, full, alive. His phrasing was intelligent. He played the concerto, which is dedicated to him, as one would carry out a labor of love.

At Saturday afternoon's concert, Mr. David Bispham will be soloist in a new ballade by Frederick S. Converse for baritone and orchestra and a Marschner aria. The orchestra will play the overtures to "Der Freischutz" and "Sakuntala," of Weber and Goldmark respectively, and the Schubert C major symphony, which shows Mr. Gericke at his

[illegible]

N. Y. EV'G SUN
[illegible]
MAR [illegible] 1906

Wilhelm Gericke at 60 years, the Osler limit, retires from an accomplished work. The "Well done!" that was thundered at him by audiences on Thursday in this borough and last night in Brooklyn meant a popular recognition of the man himself, though he chose to make his men of the Boston Symphony Orchestra rise and take him in the acknowledgment.

Is Gericke quitting because Knessel, Schroeder and other men, the best he brought with him from Vienna, have drifted away from the old standard? Was this year's D'Indy business a deathblow? Is the spirit of his men in doubt, as once before, when Col. Higginson invited Gericke the second time to Boston? It was the historic doubt at that time whether or not his men wanted their iron drillmaster back that held his answer until Svecenski should stop in Vienna on his annual visit and tell the old leader how badly they wanted him. As it happened, the first viola went home to Ischl direct. He did not visit Gericke. And his former chief, being pressed by Col. Higginson for an answer, simply cabled "No."

Never more loyal to his own Vienna than now, Mr. Gericke made his farewell programmes a tribute to that centre of light and leading in times past. His Beethoven "Eroica," his Mozart symphony, and to-day his Schubert No. 7, were tributes to his chosen immortals. Some things besides bakers have made Vienna famous. The Goldmark of to-day's second overture was his early contemporary there.

In M. Marteau's new violin concerto by a Swiss musician and in to-day's Converse "Ballade" for Mr. Bispham, Mr. Gericke still showed his attitude of toleration for what is new. He has read perhaps more American manuscripts than any other leader since Thomas. He has played a temperate few. And Gericke himself has written for singer and chorus and orchestra in his time.

NEW YORK PRESS
[illegible]
MAR 17 1906

Boston Band Plays in Brooklyn.

Swayed by the baton of Wilhelm Gericke, the men of the Boston Symphony Orchestra poured out music in the Baptist Temple, in Brooklyn, last night. It was the fifth concert of the season of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society, and the crowd was big enough and applausive enough to make Gericke happy—or to make him sad at the prospect of not leading the Hub musicians here again.

MAR 18 1906

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Wilhelm Gericke Conducts the Organization for the Last Time Here.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its final New York concert of the present season yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall. The programme consisted of the overture to Weber's "Der Freischütz," and Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture; Schubert's symphony in C major, an aria from Marschner's "Hans Heiling," and a novelty in a ballade composed by F. S. Converse after Keats's poem "La Belle Dame Sans Merci."

Mr. Converse's composition was completed in 1902. The composer described the number as a ballade in the nature of a symphonic poem with voice part. The orchestral interludes are also intended to express the words of the poem. It was in these that the composer met with his greatest success. They are scored with exquisite delicacy and exhibit an uncommon skill in the command of the means to produce color and variety in instrumentation. The voice part was less interesting. It was somewhat monotonous in effect and lacked the essential surge of passion. Mr. Bispham, who has sung the vocal part several times before, was not in good voice yesterday. He sang also the familiar Marschner aria, beloved of barytones.

The orchestra played with its usual brilliancy in the other numbers. There was long continued applause for Mr. Gericke and his men after the Weber overture, and the conductor was greeted with an enthusiastic round of applause when he took his place before the orchestra. So great was the enthusiasm after the Goldmark number that he was compelled to motion his men to their feet twice before the audience would allow the concert to proceed. After the symphony, which was superbly performed, Mr. Gericke was repeatedly compelled to bow his thanks and the orchestra again took part in the joint tribute. The players then left the stage, but the audience did not disperse until Mr. Gericke had expressed his thanks in a brief speech.

[200]

NEW YORK PRES
MAR 18 1906

...I bade adieu to New ... afternoon at the final con... season of the Boston Symphony ...chestra. There were demonstrations of ...ed by the audience at the beginning of ...e matinee and at the end, as on Thursday ...and the departing conductor had to ...another speech, in which he repeated ...ssions of gratitude and told his ...hat he always would remember ...ection the treatment he had re... in this city. But there was some... about the afternoon's performance ...de it even more impressive than the ...farewell—this being the playing of ...nd. With one exception the pro... was made up of familiar numbers, ...ning with the overture to "Der Frei... and including the "Sakuntala" ...ure by Goldmark and Schubert's ...hony in C major, No. 7. It is always ...one conclusion that the Bostonians ...play well, but it is not always they ...with such sheer beauty of tone as ...ished their work yesterday. It was a ...rformance to remember for these things ...not for the novelty on the programme, ...Converse's setting of Keats's "La ...elle Dame sans Merci," for baritone solo ...orchestra. If there is any poem in the ...English language further away from the ...of some of the boisterous music the ...Boston composer has written here than ...of the "haggard knight at arms" and ...heartless "Lady" we cannot recall it. ...sionally there are passages in this ...position that bear some relation to the ...melancholy of Keats's lines, but on ...whole the work is of little importance. ...Bispham sang both this and the "Upon ...Day" aria from Marschner's "Hans ...ling." His interpretation of the Con... ballade was as foreign to the spirit of ...text as could be imagined.

...om
...ddress
...ate MAR 18 1906

MR. GERICKE'S FAREWELL.

At the Final Boston Symphony Concert Retiring Conductor Makes a Speech.

New York said its final farewell to Mr. Wilhelm Gericke as the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the closing concert in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon.

There was a warm welcome for him at his entrance, some remarkable enthusiasm for his several fine interpretations, and at the end of the concert quite a scene, everybody crowding toward the stage and bringing him back long after the men of the orchestra had left. Finally he made a brief speech of thanks, the burden of which was that he would always remember New York's appreciation of his work and its generous support of the orchestra's concerts.

The programme manner of performance was something to remember. Goldmark's delightful "Sakuntala" overture and Schubert's massive C major Symphony have not had finer playing in New York in a blue moon.

Mr. Bispham was the soloist, singing a ballade for barytone and orchestra by F. S. Converse on Keats' "La Belle Dame Sans Merci"—a novelty here—and an aria from Marschner's "Hans Heiling."

...dress N. Y. TRIBUNE
MAR 18 1906
...te

MR. GERICKE'S FAREWELL.

Among the musical leavetakings yesterday was that of Mr. Gericke at the last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the afternoon at Carnegie Hall. It was one in which the lovers of that fine organization took a marvellous interest, and in which expression with so much eloquence as to the spectacular flourishes at the opera pale into insignificance. But operatic partings are generally a sweet sorrow of but brief endurance. The most enthusiastic farewells are said to those who are surest to bespeak a welcome after the summer holidays. To many the parting with Mr. Gericke must have seemed like a parting with the orchestra itself, which under him for thirteen years has stood for the finest, if not always the most thrilling, expression in the instrumental art. No matter who may be his successor there will be many who will feel that the most individual element will have departed with the man whose exquisite sense of euphony and pure musical beauty, combined with unparalleled devotion to lofty ideals, placed it on a plane which no other organization of its kind has yet reached in America. The audience that filled Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon began its demonstrations with a dozen welcoming rounds of applause when Mr. Gericke came upon the platform. It continued them with redoubled force after a performance of the overture to "Der Freischütz" which was ineffable in its beauty. In the "Sakuntala" overture the enthusiasm broke forth again with greater energy than ever, and there was no cessation till the conductor, mutely claiming credit for himself, twice asked the men to rise and bow their acknowledgment with him. At the end of the final number, Schubert's symphony in C, there was a fourth outburst, which lasted until Mr. Gericke gave verbal expression to his thanks for the appreciation won by the men in the metropolis.

Always the orchestra was at its best, as was Gericke at his, and the concert in some ways touched the instrumental season's high-water mark. It brought forward a novelty in the shape of a setting for barytone and orchestra of the ballad, "La Belle Dame sans Merci," by F. S. Converse, of Boston, who had represented a Kneisel programme last season with a symphonic ballad. The new music is more fascinating in its orchestral coloring and its delineation of the moods of Keats's poem, frequently suggestive of Liszt, than for any charm of melody. The success of the concert, was doubtless due to the singing of David Bispham, which was a model of declamatory treatment of the text and of the music. His singing of "Hans Heiling" from

...dress
...te

MR. GERICKE'S FAREWELL.

The last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's New York series was given yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. There was a very large audience, and the occasion was recognized as one of special and regrettable import, in that it was Mr. Gericke's last appearance as conductor of the famous orchestra in this city. Mr. Gericke conducted in a fashion that will be remembered as representing his best, and his men seconded him in every possible way in giving a performance of splendid spirit, finish, and euphony.

The orchestral numbers were all familiar. They began with the overture to "Der Freischütz," which was read without any attempt at emphasizing the effects which modern conductors love to make in this piece, but yet with great spirit and dramatic contrast. Goldmark's glowing "Sakuntala" overture followed, in which Mr. Gericke's tempos are somewhat faster than those of some other conductors in this piece. The symphony was Schubert's in C, whose heavenly lengths had not been unfolded in a New York concert hall for several years, and which were heard with manifest delight. It was a performance that warmed the hearts of all the lovers of Schubert's wonderful music, in which every beauty was brought out with consummate art and with a full appreciation of the supremely poetic and imaginative spirit of the work. It was a delight to hear all the instrumental touches so perfectly presented—from whom else shall the oboe theme in the Andante be heard so exquisitely blown?

Mr. David Bispham was the soloist and sang a ballad by Frederick S. Converse, a setting for baritone voice and orchestra of Keats's poem, "La Belle Dame Sans Merci," a work in which the composer has given more to the orchestra than to the voice that declaims the verses, making it a symphonic poem with a voice part and relying upon the orchestra to present the moods of the poem. He has written some strikingly descriptive music, orchestrated with distinction. As to its success in heightening and extending the power of the poet's words, there may be some doubt; and upon this must rest the success the musicians attempt. Mr. Bispham also sang the air, "An jenem Tag," from Marschner's opera, "Hans Heiling," and in both he did some violence to the text through his distortion of the vowel sounds.

There was great and long continued applause for Mr. Gericke, who was again and again called out; and finally, when the audience would not go, he came to the front and spoke a few words, expressing his gratitude for the sympathy and kindness that had been extended to him in New York, and saying that he could never forget it. He had previously acknowledged much applause after the performance of the earlier numbers on the programme, and had shared it with his men by making them twice rise in a body to acknowledge it.

...om NEW YORK STAATS-ZEITUNG
MAR 18 1906

Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester.

Gestern Nachmittag gab das Bostoner Symphonieorchester sein letztes Konzert der Saison in Carnegie Hall. Die Gelegenheit war eine festliche, respektive eine Abschieds-festliche, und darum mag für dieses Mal bloße Berichterstattung an Stelle der Kritik treten. Das Publikum feierte den scheidenden Dirigenten, Herrn Gericke, in ausgiebigster Weise, und es ist nicht zu bezweifeln, daß von den vielen Abschiedskonzerten, die er in diesen letzten Wochen der Saison zu absolviren hat, Herrn Gericke die beiden in New York in besonders angenehmer Erinnerung bleiben werden. Gespielt wurde die „Freischütz"-Ouverture, die B-dur-Ouverture von Schubert und die „Sakuntala"-Ouverture von Goldmark. Ferner sang Herr Bispham eine merkwürdige Komposition von Converse und die bekannte „Hans Heiling"-Arie von Marschner.

...om NEW YORK PRESS
...ss
MAR 18 1906

SONGS AND SINGERS.

With Gericke going and Steinbach coming; with Safonoff actually engaged by the Philharmonic Society and the announcement of the re-engagement by the Philadelphia Orchestra of Fritz Scheel; with the news that Rachmaninoff is not able to come to this city as the "prima donna" leader at the next concert of the Russian Symphony Orchestra, and with Conried's ungrateful slap at Hertz in his report on the opera season that he issued this week, orchestral conductors are occupying a prominent place in the musical world of New York at present. Felix Steinbach is the man of the hour in more than one sense, for he is to be seen on the conductor's platform at the two concerts of the Philharmonic Society this week, and he has been mentioned as the probable successor to Gericke, although this has been denied by the Boston Herald, which is

...om NEW YORK TIMES
...ress
MAR 18 1906

MR. GERICKE'S FAREWELL.

The Last Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Season.

The last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's New York series was given yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. There was a very large audience, and the occasion was recognized as one of special and regrettable import, in that it was Mr. Gericke's last appearance as conductor of the famous orchestra in this city. Mr. Gericke conducted in a fashion that will be remembered as representing his best, and his men seconded him in every possible way in giving a performance of splendid spirit, finish, and euphony.

The orchestral numbers were all familiar. They began with the overture to "Der Freischütz," which was read without any attempt at emphasizing the effects which modern conductors love to make in this piece, but yet with great spirit and dramatic contrast. Goldmark's glowing "Sakuntala" overture followed, in which Mr. Gericke's tempos are somewhat faster than those of some other conductors in this piece. The symphony was Schubert's in C, whose heavenly lengths had not been unfolded in a New York concert hall for several years, and which were heard with manifest delight. It was a performance that warmed the hearts of all the lovers of Schubert's wonderful music, in which every beauty was brought out with consummate art and with a full appreciation of the supremely poetic and imaginative spirit of the work. It was a delight to hear all the instrumental touches so perfectly presented—from whom else shall the oboe theme in the Andante be heard so exquisitely blown?

Mr. David Bispham was the soloist and sang a ballad by Frederick S. Converse, a setting for baritone voice and orchestra of Keats's poem, "La Belle Dame Sans Merci," a work in which the composer has given more to the orchestra than to the voice that declaims the verses, making it a symphonic poem with a voice part and relying upon the orchestra to present the moods of the poem. He has written some strikingly descriptive music, orchestrated with distinction. As to its success in heightening and extending the power of the poet's words, there may be some doubt; and upon this must rest the success the musicians attempt. Mr. Bispham also sang the air, "An jenem Tag," from Marschner's opera, "Hans Heiling," and in both he did some violence to the text through his distortion of the vowel sounds.

There was great and long continued applause for Mr. Gericke, who was again and again called out; and finally, when the audience would not go, he came to the front and spoke a few words, expressing his gratitude for the sympathy and kindness that had been extended to him in New York, and saying that he could never forget it. He had previously acknowledged much applause after the performance of the earlier numbers on the programme, and had shared it with his men by making them twice rise in a body to acknowledge it.

...om NEW YORK PRESS
...ss
MAR 19 1906

SONGS AND SINGERS.

With Gericke going and Steinbach coming; with Safonoff actually engaged by the Philharmonic Society and the announcement of the re-engagement by the Philadelphia Orchestra of Fritz Scheel; with the news that Rachmaninoff is not able to come to this city as the "prima donna" leader at the next concert of the Russian Symphony Orchestra, and with Conried's ungrateful slap at Hertz in his report on the opera season that he issued this week, orchestral conductors are occupying a prominent place in the musical world of New York at present. Felix Steinbach is the man of the hour in more than one sense, for he is to be seen on the conductor's platform at the two concerts of the Philharmonic Society this week, and he has been mentioned as the probable successor to Gericke, although this has been denied by the Boston Herald, which is

...om
...ddress
...ate MAR 18 1906

America with a recent record of appearances as guest-conductor at Berlin, Brussels and London, and with one based more solidly on his long term of years as the director of the court orchestra of the Grand Duke of Saxe-Meiningen, a post he held from 1886 until 1903, having succeeded Dr. von Bulow in that position. One of the greatest influences in Steinbach's artistic development was his friendship with Brahms, of whom the new conductor is not only an ardent admirer, but also an active disciple. We are informed he has strong classical leanings, and his first programme bears out that idea, since it includes a Brahms symphony and two Beethoven numbers. The main reason for the rumor that he is to be next leader of the Bostonians is the fact that he arrived in this country by way of Boston, though this has been explained away by the knowledge that he is an old friend of Professor Willy Hess, the concert-master of the Hub band. It is said on the best authority that Colonel Higginson alone knows who is to be the new leader of his band; but if Steinbach is chosen it may be certain he will carry on the traditions of Gericke, who, for a second time in the history of the orchestra, brought it out of a situation that was fraught with danger of dissolution.

...om NEW YORK EV'G POST
...ss
MAR 19 1906

Gericke's Farewell.

David Bispham, whose concerts this season have taken him over a greater mileage than he would have traversed had he circled the globe, turned up in this town again last Saturday afternoon to sing, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, an aria from Marschner's "Hans Heiling" and "La Belle Dame sans Merci" by F. S. Converse. He sang the aria "An jenem Tag" with fine appreciation of its passionate contents, betraying the born opera singer in every bar. Mr. Converse is professor of music at Harvard. While his ballad does not, at least at a first hearing, seem remarkable for thematic content, it is elaborated and orchestrated with the skill of an expert—a splendid piece of workmanship. It was well received.

Weber's "Freischütz" overture, Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture, and Schubert's glorious last symphony (known variously as the seventh, the ninth, and the tenth) were the three masterworks chosen by Mr. Gericke for his final appearance in Carnegie Hall. The demonstrative applause after each of these numbers was a tribute both to the excellent playing and to the sterling qualities of the conductor. At the end the large audience remained to recall the conductor over and over again. He finally motioned for silence and made a brief speech of thanks. And thus ends another episode in the history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

...om N. Y. TRIBUNE,
...dress
MAR 20 1906
...te

CONDUCTORSHIP GOSSIP.

The plausibility of the theory that Herr Steinbach had been engaged as the next conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra received its first blow when it became plain that Major Higginson had not sought to re-engage Mr. Gericke for a term of years, but only for one year. It is now a widespread belief among those familiar with musical affairs in Boston that a conductor has been chosen from among the well known men of Europe, but that he cannot secure a release from his present obligations until after the next season. Hence the present search for a conductor who will serve ad interim. There was no likelihood that Herr Steinbach would give up the prominent position which he fills in Cologne for a year's engagement.

The reported engagement of Mr. Safonoff as conductor for three years by the Philharmonic Society of New York still lacks official confirmation and, while likely, is not an assured fact. Some of the ladies who were interested in securing the fund necessary for his engagement have withdrawn their subscriptions and ceased their efforts because of their unwillingness to countenance a union of the interests of the Philharmonic Society and the National Conservatory of Music, which was said to be willing to defray a portion of the cost of bringing Mr. Safonoff to America. Moreover, the only assurance that has been received by the directors of the Philharmonic Society was not sent by Mr. Safonoff himself, but by a gentleman who is friendly to Mr. Safonoff and associated with the National Conservatory.

...om NEW YORK TIMES
...ess
MAR 20 1906

Steinbach Will Not Be Boston Leader.

Fritz Steinbach, the German music conductor, who is to lead the Philharmonic Society's concerts at Carnegie Hall Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, denies the report published last Sunday that he would accept the permanent leadership of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He says he will sail for his home in Cologne on Tuesday and remain there.

...om N. Y. TRIBUNE,
...ddress
MAR 20 1906
...ate

HERR STEINBACH NOT FOR BOSTON.

Herr Fritz Steinbach, of Cologne, who is to conduct the public rehearsal and concert of the Philharmonic Society next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, arrived in the city yesterday. He made the voyage from Liverpool to Boston in the steamship Cymric, and arrived in Boston on Sunday morning, but the steamship was not docked until evening, owing to the low tide. His brief stay in Boston was largely taken up with a visit from Mr. Willy Hess, leader of the violins of the Boston Orchestra, whose association in a similar capacity with him in Germany, coupled with the circumstance that he sailed to Boston, instead of New York, gave rise to the surmise that he was a likely candidate for the post of successor to Mr. Gericke. To this theory Herr Steinbach gave a quietus at the Hotel Netherland, where he will make his home during his stay of one week in America. In effect he said that his present position in Cologne was such that nothing that was likely to be offered him in the way of salary would tempt him to leave it. The work was arduous, but agreeable, and there were ample opportunities to extend his fame and add to his income by conducting concerts as he had been doing in Brussels, London, Madrid and other European cities.

...om N. Y. EV'G SUN
...ddress
MAR 15 1906
...ate

To-night brings two of the biggest musical attractions of the year. At the Metropolitan, the favorite "Hansel and Gretel" will be sung to a gala audience, including Mrs. Roosevelt and the youngest members of the President's family from Washington. The sale is enormous and the proceeds go to the Legal Aid Society.

Wilhelm Gericke at Carnegie Hall makes the first of his farewell American appearances as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

...om NEW YORK SUN
...ddress
MAR 20 1906
...ate

New Philharmonic Conductor Here.

Fritz Steinbach, the noted German conductor who is to conduct the last concerts of the Philharmonic Society at Carnegie Hall, reached New York last night. He arrived on Sunday in Boston from London. He said he knew nothing of the report that he was to be invited to become conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra beyond what he read in the newspapers. It was rumored that Mr. Steinbach was to succeed Mr. Wilhelm Gericke as conductor of the Boston orchestra for at least one season.

...om Standard Union
Brooklyn, N. Y.
MAR 3 1906

The last Boston Symphony Orchestra concert of the season will be given in the Baptist Temple on Friday evening, March 16. The soloist will be Heinrich Warnke, the new principal 'cellist of the orchestra, who has not yet been heard in this city as a virtuoso. The impression he has made elsewhere with the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been most favorable. He will play Dvorak's concerto for the violoncello. The orchestral numbers will be Mozart's symphony in G minor, Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture and Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony. Additional interest will be lent to the concert by the fact that it will be the farewell appearance of Mr. Gericke in Brooklyn as conductor of the orchestra. There is much discussion as to Mr. Gericke's successor. Beyond a doubt the right man for the place would be Felix Weingartner, but thus far there is no hint from the management as to who are regarded as available candidates.

...om NEW YORK TIMES
...ess
MAR 20 1906

Steinbach Will Not Be Boston Leader.

Fritz Steinbach, the German music conductor, who is to lead the Philharmonic Society's concerts at Carnegie Hall Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, denies the report published last Sunday that he would accept the permanent leadership of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He says he will sail for his home in Cologne on Tuesday and remain there.

...om EAGLE
Brooklyn, N. Y.
...ss
MAR 3 1906

The last Boston Symphony Orchestra concert of the season will be given in the Baptist Temple on Friday evening, March 16. The soloist will be Heinrich Warnke, the new principal 'cellist of the orchestra, who has not yet been heard in this city as a virtuoso. The impression he has made elsewhere with the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been most favorable. He will play Dvorak's concerto for the violoncello. The orchestral numbers will be Mozart's symphony in G minor, Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture and Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony. Additional interest will be lent to the concert by the fact that it will be the farewell appearance of Mr. Gericke in Brooklyn as conductor of the orchestra. There is much discussion as to Mr. Gericke's successor. Beyond a doubt the right man for the place would be Felix Weingartner, but thus far there is no hint from the management as to who are regarded as available candidates.

[201]

n _____

ress _____

e _____

Gericke's Adieu to Gotham.

Wilhelm Gericke said his adieu to New York yesterday afternoon at the final concert of the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. There were demonstrations of regret by the audience at the beginning of the matinee and at the end, as on Thursday night, and the departing conductor had to make another speech, in which he repeated his expressions of gratitude and told his hearers that he always would remember with affection the treatment he had received in this city. But there was something about the afternoon's performance that made it even more impressive than the leader's farewell—this being the playing of the band. With one exception the programme was made up of familiar numbers, beginning with the overture to "Der Freischutz" and including the "Sakuntala" overture by Goldmark and Schubert's Symphony in C major, No. 7. It is always a foregone conclusion that the Bostonians will play well, but it is not always they play with such sheer beauty of tone as marked their work yesterday. It was a performance to remember for these things and not for the novelty on the programme, F. S. Converse's setting of Keats's "La Belle Dame sans Merci," for baritone solo and orchestra. If there is any poem in the English language further away from the spirit of some of the boisterous music the Boston composer has written here than that of the "haggard knight at arms" and his heartless "Lady" we cannot recall it. Occasionally there are passages in this composition that bear some relation to the sweet melancholy of Keats's lines, but on the whole the work is of little importance. Mr. Bispham sang both this and the "Upon That Day" aria from Marschner's "Hans Heiling." His interpretation of the Converse ballade was as foreign to the spirit of the text as could be imagined.

om _____

ldress _____

ate _____

MR. GERICKE'S FAREWELL.

At the Final Boston Symphony Concert Retiring Conductor Makes a Speech.

New York said its final farewell to Mr. Wilhelm Gericke as the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the closing concert in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon.

There was a warm welcome for him at his entrance, some remarkable enthusiasm for his several fine interpretations, and at the end of the concert quite a scene, everybody crowding toward the stage and bringing him back long after the men of the orchestra had left. Finally he made a brief speech of thanks, the burden of which was that he would always remember New York's appreciation of his work and its generous support of the orchestra's concerts.

The programme manner of performance was something to remember. Goldmark's delightful "Sakuntala" overture and Schubert's massive C major Symphony have not had finer playing in New York in a blue moon.

Mr. Bispham was the soloist, singing a Ballade for barytone and orchestra by F. S. Converse on Keats' "La Belle Dame Sans Merci"—a novelty here—and an aria from Marschner's "Hans Heiling."

ldress _____

MAR 8 1906

ate _____

MR. GERICKE'S FAREWELL.

Among the musical leavetakings yesterday was that of Mr. Gericke at the last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the afternoon at Carnegie Hall. It was one in which the lovers of that fine organization took a marvellous interest, and gave it expression with so much eloquence as to make the spectacular flourishes at the opera pale into insignificance. But operatic partings are generally a sweet sorrow of but brief endurance. The most enthusiastic farewells are said to those who are surest to bespeak a welcome after the summer holidays. To many the parting with Mr. Gericke must have seemed like a parting with the orchestra itself, which under him for thirteen years has stood for the purest, if not always the most thrilling, expression in the instrumental art. No matter who may be his successor there will be many who will feel that its most individual element will have departed with the man whose exquisite sense of euphony and pure musical beauty, combined with unparalleled devotion to lofty ideals, placed it on a plane which no other organization of its kind has ever reached in America. The audience that filled Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon began its demonstrations with a dozen welcoming rounds of applause when Mr. Gericke came upon the platform. It continued them with redoubled vigor after a performance of the overture to "Der Freischütz" which was ineffable in its beauty. After the "Sakuntala" overture the enthusiasm broke forth again with greater energy than ever, and there was no cessation till the conductor, mutely disclaiming credit for himself, twice asked the musicians to rise and bow their acknowledgment with him. At the end of the final number, Schubert's symphony in C, there was a fourth outburst, which lasted until Mr. Gericke gave verbal expression of his thanks for the appreciation won by the orchestra in the metropolis.

In all things the orchestra was at its best, as was Mr. Gericke at his, and the concert in some respects touched the instrumental season's high-water mark. It brought forward a novelty in the shape of a setting for barytone and orchestra of Keats's ballad, "La Belle Dame sans Merci," by Frederick S. Converse, of Boston, who had representation on a Kneisel programme last season with a string quartet. The new music is more fascinating for its refined orchestral coloring and its delineation of the moods of Keats's poem, frequently [illegible], though never profound, than for any charm of vocal melody. This, however, was doubtless due largely to the singing of Mr. Bispham, which was of his least admirable kind. His maltreatment of the English language in this ballad and of the German in the familiar air, "An jenem Tag," from Marschner's "Hans Heiling," as well as of many [illegible], was shocking to every

n NEW YORK TIMES

ress _____

MAR 18 1906

e _____

MR. GERICKE'S FAREWELL.

The Last Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Season.

The last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's New York series was given yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. There was a very large audience, and the occasion was recognized as one of special and regrettable import, in that it was Mr. Gericke's last appearance as conductor of the famous orchestra in this city. Mr. Gericke conducted in a fashion that will be remembered as representing his best, and his men seconded him in every possible way in giving a performance of splendid spirit, finish, and euphony.

The orchestral numbers were all familiar. They began with the overture to "Der Freischütz," which was read without any attempt at emphasizing the effects which modern conductors love to make in this piece, but yet with great spirit and dramatic contrast. Goldmark's glowing "Sakuntala" overture followed, in which Mr. Gericke's tempos are somewhat faster than those of some other conductors in this piece. The symphony was Schubert's in C, whose heavenly lengths had not been unfolded in a New York concert hall for several years, and which were heard with manifest delight. It was a performance that warmed the hearts of all the lovers of Schubert's wonderful music, in which every beauty was brought out with consummate art and with a full appreciation of the supremely poetic and imaginative spirit of the work. It was a delight to hear all the instrumental touches so perfectly presented—from whom else shall the oboe theme in the Andante be heard so exquisitely blown?

Mr. David Bispham was the soloist and sang a ballad by Frederick S. Converse, a setting for baritone voice and orchestra of Keats's poem, "La Belle Dame Sans Merci," a work in which the composer has given more to the orchestra than to the voice that declaims the verses, making it a symphonic poem with a voice part and relying upon the orchestra to present the moods of the poem. He has written some strikingly descriptive music, orchestrated with distinction. As to its success in heightening and extending the power of the poet's words, there may be some doubt; and upon this must rest the success the musicians attempt. Mr. Bispham also sang the air, "An jenem Tag," from Marschner's opera, "Hans Heiling," and in both he did some violence to the text through his distortion of the vowel sounds.

There was great and long continued applause for Mr. Gericke, who was again and again called out; and finally, when the audience would not go, he came to the front and spoke a few words, expressing his gratitude for the sympathy and kindness that had been extended to him in New York, and saying that he could never forget it. He had previously acknowledged much applause after the performance of the earlier numbers on the programme, and had shared it with his men by making them twice rise in a body to acknowledge it.

[illegible]

[illegible] 8 1906

Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester.

Gestern Nachmittag gab das Bostoner Symphonieorchester sein letztes Konzert der Saison in Carnegie Hall. Die Gelegenheit war eine festliche, respektive eine Abschieds-festliche, und darum mag für dieses Mal bloße Berichterstattung an Stelle der Kritik treten. Das Publikum feierte den scheidenden Dirigenten, Herrn Gericke, in ausgiebigster Weise, und es ist nicht zu bezweifeln, daß von den vielen Abschiedskonzerten, die er in diesen letzten Wochen der Saison zu absolviren hat, Herrn Gericke die beiden in New York in besonders angenehmer Erinnerung bleiben werden. Gespielt wurde die „Freischütz"-Ouverture, die B-dur-Ouverture von Schubert und die „Sakuntala"-Ouverture von Goldmark. Ferner sang Herr Bispham eine merkwürdige Komposition von Converse und die bekannte „Hans Heiling"-Arie von Marschner.

NEW YORK PRESS

is _____

MAR 18 1906

SONGS AND SINGERS.

With Gericke going and Steinbach coming; with Safonoff actually engaged by the Philharmonic Society and the announcement of the re-engagement by the Philadelphia Orchestra of Fritz Scheel; with the news that Rachmaninoff is not able to come to this city as the "prima donna" leader at the next concert of the Russian Symphony Orchestra, and with Conried's ungrateful slap at Hertz in his report on the opera season that he issued this week, orchestral conductors are occupying a prominent place in the musical world of New York at present. Felix Steinbach is the man of the hour in more than one sense, for he is to be seen on the conductor's platform at the two concerts of the Philharmonic Society this week, and he has been mentioned as the probable successor to Gericke, although this has been de[illegible] by the Boston Herald, which is presumed to be the voice of Colonel Higginson in affairs pertaining to the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Steinbach comes to America with a recent record of appearing as guest-conductor at Berlin, Brussels and London, and with one based more solidly on his long term of years as the director of the court orchestra of the Grand Duke of Saxe-Meiningen, a post he held from 1886 until 1903, having succeeded Dr. von Bulow in that position. One of the greatest influences in Steinbach's artistic development was his friendship with Brahms, of whom the new conductor is not only an ardent admirer, but also an active disciple. We are informed he has strong classical leanings, and his first programme bears out that idea, since it includes a Brahms symphony and two Beethoven numbers. The main reason for the rumor that he is to be next leader of the Bostonians is the fact that he arrived in this country by way of Boston, though this has been explained away by the knowledge that he is an old friend of Professor Willy Hess, the concertmaster of the Hub band. It is said on the best authority that Colonel Higginson alone knows who is to be the new leader of his band; but if Steinbach is chosen it may be certain he will carry on the traditions of Gericke, who, for a second time in the history of the orchestra, brought it out of a situation that was fraught with danger of dissolution.

s _____

Gericke's Farewell.

David Bispham, whose concerts this season have taken him over a greater mileage than he would have traversed had he circled the globe, turned up in this town again last Saturday afternoon to sing, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, an aria from Marschner's "Hans Heiling" and "La Belle Dame sans Merci" by F. S. Converse. He sang the aria "An jenem Tag" with fine appreciation of its passionate contents, betraying the born opera singer in every bar. Mr. Converse is professor of music at Harvard. While his ballad does not, at least at a first hearing, seem remarkable for thematic content, it is elaborated and orchestrated with the skill of an expert—a splendid piece of workmanship. It was well received.

Weber's "Freischütz" overture, Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture, and Schubert's glorious last symphony (known variously as the seventh, the ninth, and the tenth) were the three masterworks chosen by Mr. Gericke for his final appearance in Carnegie Hall. The demonstrative applause after each of these numbers was a tribute both to the excellent playing and to the sterling qualities of the conductor. At the end the large audience remained to recall the conductor over and over again. He finally motioned for silence and made a brief speech of thanks. And thus ends another episode in the history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

[illegible]

om _____

dress _____ MAR 20 1906

te _____

CONDUCTORSHIP GOSSIP.

The plausibility of the theory that Herr Steinbach had been engaged as the next conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra received its first blow when it became plain that Major Higginson had not sought to re-engage Mr. Gericke for a term of years, but only for one year. It is now a widespread belief among those familiar with musical affairs in Boston that a conductor has been chosen from among the well known men of Europe, but that he cannot secure a release from his present obligations until after the next season. Hence the present search for a conductor who will serve ad interim. There was no likelihood that Herr Steinbach would give up the prominent position which he fills in Cologne for a year's engagement.

The reported engagement of Mr. Safonoff as conductor for three years by the Philharmonic Society of New York still lacks official confirmation and, while likely, is not an assured fact. Some of the ladies who were interested in securing the fund necessary for his engagement have withdrawn their subscriptions and ceased their efforts because of their unwillingness to countenance a union of the interests of the Philharmonic Society and the National Conservatory of Music, which was said to be willing to defray a portion of the cost of bringing Mr. Safonoff to America. Moreover, the only assurance that has been received by the directors of the Philharmonic Society was not sent by Mr. Safonoff himself, but by a gentleman who is friendly to Mr. Safonoff and associated with the National Conservatory.

1 NEW YORK TIMES

ess _____

MAR 20 1906

Steinbach Will Not Be Boston Leader.

Fritz Steinbach, the German music conductor, who is to lead the Philharmonic Society's concerts at Carnegie Hall Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, denies the report published last Sunday that he would accept the permanent leadership of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He says he will sail for his home in Cologne on Tuesday and remain there.

[201]

rom N. Y. TRIBUNE.

ddress _____

ate _____ MAR 20 1906

HERR STEINBACH NOT FOR BOSTON.

Herr Fritz Steinbach, of Cologne, who is to conduct the public rehearsal and concert of the Philharmonic Society next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, arrived in the city yesterday. He made the voyage from Liverpool to Boston in the steamship Cymric, and arrived in Boston on Sunday morning, but the steamship was not docked until evening, owing to the low tide. His brief stay in Boston was largely taken up with a visit from Mr. Willy Hess, leader of the violins of the Boston Orchestra, whose association in a similar capacity with him in Germany, coupled with the circumstance that he sailed to Boston, instead of New York, gave rise to the surmise that he was a likely candidate for the post of successor to Mr. Gericke. To this theory Herr Steinbach gave a quietus at the Hotel Netherland, where he will make his home during his stay of one week in America. In effect he said that his present position in Cologne was such that nothing that was likely to be offered him in the way of salary would tempt him to leave it. The work was arduous, but agreeable, and there were ample opportunities to extend his fame and add to his income by conducting concerts as he had been doing in Brussels, London, Madrid and other European cities.

om N. Y. EVG SUN

ldress _____

ate _____ MAR 15 1906

To-night brings two of the biggest musical attractions of the year. At the Metropolitan, the favorite "Hansel and Gretel" will be sung to a gala audience, including Mrs. Roosevelt and the youngest members of the President's family from Washington. The sale is enormous and the proceeds go to the Legal Aid Society.

Wilhelm Gericke at Carnegie Hall makes the first of his farewell American appearances as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

[illegible] YORK SUN

om _____

ddress _____ MAR 20 1906

ate _____

New Philharmonic Conductor Here.

Fritz Steinbach, the noted German conductor who is to conduct the last concerts of the Philharmonic Society at Carnegie Hall, reached New York last night. He arrived on Sunday in Boston from London. He said he knew nothing of the report that he was to be invited to become conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra beyond what he read in the newspapers. It was rumored that Mr. Steinbach was to succeed Mr. Wilhelm Gericke as conductor of the Boston orchestra for at least one season.

Brooklyn, N. Y.

MAR 3 1906

The last Boston Symphony Orchestra concert of the season will be given in the Baptist Temple on Friday evening, March 16. The soloist will be Heinrich Warnke, the new principal 'cellist of the orchestra, who has not yet been heard in this city as a virtuoso. The impression he has made elsewhere with the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been most favorable. He will play Dvorak's concerto for the violoncello. The orchestral numbers will be Mozart's symphony in G minor, Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture and Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony. Additional interest will be lent to the concert by the fact that it will be the farewell appearance of Mr. Gericke in Brooklyn as conductor of the orchestra. There is much discussion as to Mr. Gericke's successor. Beyond a doubt the right man for the place would be Felix Weingartner, but thus far there is no hint from the management as to who are regarded as available candidates.

ess _____

Brooklyn, N. Y.

MAR 3 1906

The last Boston Symphony Orchestra concert of the season will be given in the Baptist Temple on Friday evening, March 16. The soloist will be Heinrich Warnke, the new principal 'cellist of the orchestra, who has not yet been heard in this city as a virtuoso. The impression he has made elsewhere with the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been most favorable. He will play Dvorak's concerto for the violoncello. The orchestral numbers will be Mozart's symphony in G minor, Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture and Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony. Additional interest will be lent to the concert by the fact that it will be the farewell appearance of Mr. Gericke in Brooklyn as conductor of the orchestra.

Standard Union
Brooklyn, N. Y.
MAR 3 1906

Among the music notes in to-day's paper will be found a brief reference to the fact that Mr. William Gericke will make his farewell appearance as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the concert to be given next week in the Baptist Temple. This is official. The subjoined suggestion that Felix Weingartner would make an excellent conductor is not, but it will doubtless be approved by the musical public in general.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has for years given five concerts in Brooklyn each season. Thanks to the efforts of the Ladies' Auxiliary to the Philharmonic Society in the first place; to that society itself, and to the Brooklyn Institute, these concerts have been well patronized, and have been of much educational value. It is obvious, of course, that a community the size of Brooklyn should support its own permanent orchestra, and have at least twenty concerts each season, instead of depending upon a foreign organization for five. That is a matter to be discussed elsewhere. For the present Brooklyn is almost wholly dependent upon Boston for high grade orchestral concerts, and the choice of Mr. Gericke's successor therefore possesses genuine local interest.

No orchestra in this country with the exception of the one founded here and translated to Chicago by the lamented Theodore Thomas, is to be compared with the one under consideration. It is a superb instrument, for despite the virtuosity and the personality of its individual musicians, that is all an orchestra amounts to. The conductor is as much a soloist as the man who plays an unaccompanied piano sonata, or a solo passage for violin. Paganini once played an instrument improvised from a wooden shoe. Had Messrs. Krehbiel, Finck and Henderson been present, we should doubtless possess lucid analyses of the performance, with the suggestion that the music would have sounded to better advantage had he played a Cremona. Thus a great conductor might obtain excellent results from an orchestra inferior to that from Boston, but so perfect a medium of expression deserves the greatest master of interpretation available. The Philharmonic Society across the river has been experimenting at its concerts with foreign conductors. Perhaps the committee in Boston will decide upon a similar course. One thing, however, should be borne in mind; mere scholarship in a conductor is not enough. The conductor should have in addition what the musicians call temperament, the players genius; qualities possessed by such men as Seidl, Liszt, Rubinstein and the other great ones who have gone before, and which are shared by some half dozen men who still survive.

TIMES
Brooklyn, N. Y.
MAR 10 1906

A programme with two well-loved symphonies, has been chosen for the last concert of the season here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the Baptist Temple next Friday evening. Mozart's Symphony in G minor and Beethoven's "Eroica" (No. 3) will be given with Dvorak's Concerto in B minor for violoncello as a solo number, to be played by Heinrich Warnke, the new 'cellist of the orchestra. An interesting feature of the concert will be that it will be the farewell appearance in Brooklyn of Mr. Gericke, conductor of the orchestra. As was announced recently, Mr. Gericke has decided to retire from active life at the end of the present season and this concert will be his last in Brooklyn. He has been actively at work as a conductor for forty years and now he feels that he has earned the rest which is coming to him. At the end of the Boston season, which comes on April 28, he

CITIZEN.
Brooklyn, N. Y.
MAR 10 1906

CONCERT YEAR WILL END HERE FRIDAY

Warnke, Principal 'Cellist of Boston Band, to Play Solo.

CHORAL ART PROGRAMME.

Other Concerts and Recitals Near at Hand in the Two Boroughs.

The last Boston Symphony concert of the series of 1905-6 will be given in the Baptist Temple on next Friday evening, March 16, at 8:15 o'clock. The soloist will be Heinrich Warnke, the new principal 'cellist of the orchestra, who has had such gratifying success in the concert season now almost at an end. Mr. Warnke was brought to Boston last fall to replace Mr. Krasselt. He came from the famous Kaim orchestra of Munich, where he held a similar place for eight years. There he was most intimately connected with Felix Weingartner during the latter's term as conductor of the Kaim orchestra, and it was largely through Mr. Weingartner's recommendation that Mr. Warnke came to Boston. He has filled the difficult place in the orchestra and has been the 'cello of the Boston Symphony Quartet with complete success. Not the least interesting feature of this concert will come from the fact that it will be the formal farewell of Mr. Gericke to Brooklyn. As was announced recently, Mr. Gericke has decided to retire from active life at the end of the present season, and this concert will be his last in Brooklyn. He has been actively at work as a conductor for forty years, and now he feels that he has earned the rest which is coming to him. At the end of the Boston season, which comes on April 28, he will return to Vienna, where he expects to live. His host of admirers and friends in Brooklyn will undoubtedly turn out in full force to bid him good-by. The programme he has prepared is made up entirely of familiar and well-lored works, the names on it being Mozart, Dvorak and Beethoven. It is as follows: Mozart's Symphony in G minor (K. 350); Dvorak's Concerto in B minor, for violoncello, op. 104, and Beethoven's Symphony No. 3, in E flat major, "Eroica," op. 55.

From Standard Union
Address Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date MAR 10 1906

The last Boston Symphony concert of the series of 1905-6 will be given in the Baptist Temple on next Friday evening, at 8:15 o'clock. The soloist will be Heinrich Warnke, the new principal 'cellist of the orchestra, who has had such gratifying success in the concert season now almost at an end. Mr. Warnke was brought to Boston last fall to replace Mr. Krasselt. He came from the famous Kaim Orchestra, of Munich, where he held a similar place for eight years. There he was most intimately connected with Felix Weingartner, during the latter's term as conductor of the Kaim Orchestra, and it was largely through Mr. Weingartner's recommendation that Mr. Warnke came to Boston. He has filled the difficult place in the orchestra, and has been the 'cello of the Boston Symphony Quartet with complete success. Not the least interesting feature of this concert will come from the fact that it will be the formal farewell of Mr. Gericke to Brooklyn. As was announced recently, Mr. Gericke has decided to retire from active life at the end of the present season, and this concert will be his last in Brooklyn. He has been actively at work as a conductor for forty years, and now he feels that he has earned the rest which is coming to him. At the end of the Boston season, which comes on April 28, he will return to Vienna where he expects to live. His host of admirers and friends in Brooklyn will undoubtedly turn out in full force to bid him goodby. The programme he has prepared is made up entirely of familiar and well loved works, the names on it being Mozart, Dvorak, and Beethoven. It is as follows:

Symphony in G minor (K. 550).....Mozart
Concerto in B minor, for violoncello, Op. 104, Dvorak
Symphony No. 3, in E flat major, Eroica, Op. 55, Beethoven

EAGLE
Brooklyn, N. Y.
MAR 10 1906

...ple on next Friday evening, at 8:15 o'clock. The soloist will be Heinrich Warnke the new principal 'cellist of the orchestra who has had such gratifying success in the concert season now almost at an end. Mr. Warnke was brought to Boston last fall to replace Mr. Krasselt. He came from the famous Kaim Orchestra of Munich where he held a similar place for eight years. He has filled the difficult place in the orchestra and has been the 'cello of the Boston Symphony Quartet with complete success. Not the least interesting feature of this concert will come from the fact that it will be the formal farewell of Mr. Gericke to Brooklyn. As was announced recently, Mr. Gericke has decided to retire from active life at the end of the present season and this concert will be his last in Brooklyn. He has been actively at work as a conductor for forty years and now he feels that he has earned the rest which is coming to him. At the end of the Boston season, which comes on April 28, he will return to Vienna where he expects to live. His host of admirers and friends in Brooklyn will undoubtedly turn out in full force to bid him goodby. The programme he has prepared is made up entirely of familiar and well loved works, the names on it being Mozart, Dvorak, and Beethoven. It is as follows:

Symphony in G minor (K. 550).....Mozart
Concerto in B minor, for violoncello, Op. 104, Dvorak
Symphony No. 3, in E flat major, Eroica, Op. 55, Beethoven

CITIZEN.
Brooklyn, N. Y.
MAR 15 1906

188

THREE LECTURES.

"Liebnitz—the World of Harmony," was the subject of Prof. Frederick J. E. Woodbridge's fourth Brooklyn Institute lecture on "Modern Philosophers," at the Art Gallery last evening.

Miss Emma O. Conro, principal of St. Catharine's Hall, began at that school yesterday afternoon a course of lectures on "House Sanitation," before the school and the department of domestic sciences of the Brooklyn Institute.

Louis C. Elson, head of the theory department of the New England Conservatory, assisted by Alfred De Voto, teacher of piano in that school, gave the lecture preparatory to the Friday concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He spoke at Association Hall yesterday afternoon, the lecture being under the direction of the Brooklyn Institute and the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society.

From Standard Union
Address Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date MAR 15 1906

perpetuity.

BOSTON SYMPHONY'S PROGRAMME EXPLAINED.

Louis C. Elson, music editor of the "Boston Advertiser," and head of the theory department of the New England Conservatory, assisted by Alfred De Voto, teacher of piano in that school, gave the lecture Tuesday preparatory to the Friday concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He spoke at Association Hall, the lecture being under the direction of the Brooklyn Institute and the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society. Mr. Elson gave a clear and musicianly study of the programme, taking up each detail and leaving out all extraneous matter. The illustrations closely followed the talk in presenting the detail with the development of the several figures. The two men were closely followed but without applause until the close, when it was long continued.

From TIMES
Address Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date MAR 16 1906

BROOKLYN INSTITUTE CALENDAR.

This is the calendar of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences for to-day: Fifth in a course of lectures on "The North of Africa," by Charles W. Furlong. A. M. Topic, "With Arabs in the Sahara," illustrated by lantern projections. Art Gallery

EAGLE
Brooklyn, N. Y
MAR 15 1906

Preliminary Lecture by L... on Friday Night's C...

Louis C. Elson, music editor ... Advertiser and head of the ... ment of the New Englan... sisted by Alfred De Voto, ... that school, gave the lecture ... the Friday concert of the Bos... Orchestra. He spoke at Associa... yesterday afternoon, the lecture being ... the direction of the Brooklyn Institute ... the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society ... Elson came before the former in ... some five years ago. He gave a clear ... musicianly—study of the programme, taking ... up each detail and leaving out all extraneous matter. The illustrations closely followed the talk in presenting the detail with the development of the several figures. The two men were closely followed, but without applause, until the close, when it was long continued. Mr. Elson thought the programme full of interest and the two symphonies—the Mozart G minor and the Beethoven E flat major, "Eroica," an object lesson in contrast. These are separated by Dvorak's concerto in B minor for 'cello. The oldest music cycle was made up of dances and this idea has influenced the form of the symphony, which is an outgrowth. The movements of the symphony, four in number, were said to represent the intellectual, the emotional, the playful and popular and the jovial and merry. In old days the jig was always put last. Later folk-music was generally incorporated in the third or a minuet introduced. The minuet, one of the simplest of musical forms, is always greatly accelerated in time when incorporated in a symphony. Mozart's writings were passed in review and the G minor was said to be the greatest symphony of all he wrote. In hearing it one must think of the simple orchestra of his time. The form was not perfect, but back of the form is to be recognized the content of the work and the poetic beauty of its conception. While some modern musicians attack the Mozartian form yet others and among them the most advanced, such as Tschaikowsky and Strauss, prize it. The two themes of a movement were said to be masculine and feminine in order as mentioned. They are sometimes called the "husband and wife." The first is orchestrated in much more masculine form than the second. The development precedes the closing theme. "In Mozart's time development was simple, but to-day it is pushed to the very verge," it was said, D'Indy being quoted as an example. Attention was called to the trio, another song form following the minuet, and to the "dialogue" of the last movement when the whole orchestra answers the arpeggio of the strings. The concerto was the last Dvorak wrote before leaving this country. He had the assistance of Alwin Schroeder in the working out of this. After speaking of concertos in general, which have been written for all solo instruments—even the kettledrum—Mr. Elson urged his listeners to notice particularly in this to-morrow evening the double stopping; so much more difficult on the 'cello than on the violin; the harmonics or "high piping tones," what the Germans call "the flagiolet tones"; the tremolo, and the pizzicato, which is better on the 'cello than on the violin. Wonder was expressed that Dvorak had held to the old method of having the orchestra present the theme before the solo instrument begins, "thus affording an excellent chance for the artist to get very nervous," said Mr. Elson. The solo instrument has also two beautiful duets with the flute and the oboe, the latter being called, when speaking of the oboe passages in the Beethoven number, "the instrument of sorrow, of woman's tears." The beauty of the military form of the finale was also commented upon. "But, with the Russian writers the paths of glory lead but to the minor key," it was said. Beethoven's symphonies properly began the nineteenth century and a new school. In them the lecturer found always Beethoven's ideal of universal brotherhood and universal liberty. Beethoven's "Coda," like a woman's postscript, was said to contain some of his noblest thought. This symphony was carefully studied and the figures and developments pointed out as in the Mozart.

TIMES
ss Brooklyn, N. Y.
MAR 16 1906

SYMPHONY PROGRAMME LECTURE

Louis C. Elson Talks on the Music for Friday Concert.

Louis C. Elson, music editor of the Boston Advertiser, and head of the theory department of the New England Conservatory, assisted by Alfred De Voto, teacher of piano in that school, gave the lecture preparatory to the Friday concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at Association Hall yesterday afternoon. Mr. Elson thought the programme full of interest, and the two symphonies—the Mozart G minor and the Beethoven E flat major, "Eroica," and object lesson in contrast. These are separated by Dvorak's concerto in B minor for 'cello. Mozart's writings were passed in review and the G minor was said to be the greatest symphony of all he wrote. The concerto was ... Dvorak wrote before leaving this ... Mr. Elson urged his listeners to notice particularly in this to-morrow evening the double stopping, so much more difficult on the 'cello than on the violin; the harmonics or "high-piping tones," what the Germans call "the flagiolet tones"; the tremolo, the pizzicato, which is better on the 'cello than on the violin. Wonder was expressed that Dvorak had held to the old method of having the orchestra present the theme before the solo instrument begins, "thus affording an excellent chance for the artist to get very nervous," said Mr. Elson. The solo instrument has also two beautiful duets with the flute and the oboe, the latter being called, when speaking of the oboe passages in the Beethoven number, "the instrument of sorrow, of woman's tears." The beauty of the military form of the finale was also commented upon. "But, with the Russian writers the paths of glory lead but to the minor key," it was said. Beethoven's symphonies properly began the nineteenth century and a new school. In them the lecturer found always Beethoven's ideal of universal brotherhood and universal liberty. Beethoven's "Coda," like a woman's postscript, was said to contain some of his noblest thought. This symphony was carefully studied and the figures and developments pointed out as in the Mozart.

[202]

Standard Union
Brooklyn, N. Y.
MAR 3 1906

Wanted—A Conductor.

Among the music notes in to-day's paper will be found a brief reference to the fact that Mr. William Gericke will make his farewell appearance as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the concert to be given next week in the Baptist Temple. This is official. The subjoined suggestion that Felix Weingartner would make an excellent conductor is not, but it will doubtless be approved by the musical public in general.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has for years given five concerts in Brooklyn each season. Thanks to the efforts of the Ladies' Auxiliary to the Philharmonic Society in the first place; to that society itself, and to the Brooklyn Institute, these concerts have been well patronized, and have been of much educational value. It is obvious, of course, that a community the size of Brooklyn should support its own permanent orchestra, and have at least twenty concerts each season, instead of depending upon a foreign organization for five. That is a matter to be discussed elsewhere. For the present Brooklyn is almost wholly dependent upon Boston for high grade orchestral concerts, and the choice of Mr. Gericke's successor therefore possesses genuine local interest.

No orchestra in this country with the exception of the one founded here and translated to Chicago by the lamented Theodore Thomas, is to be compared with the one under consideration. It is a superb instrument, for despite the virtuosity and the personality of its individual musicians, that is all an orchestra amounts to. The conductor is as much a soloist as the man who plays an unaccompanied piano sonata, or a solo passage for violin. Paganini once played an instrument improvised from a wooden shoe. Had Messrs. Krehbiel, Finck and Henderson been present, we should doubtless possess lucid analyses of the performance, with the suggestion that the music would have sounded to better advantage had he played a Cremona. Thus a great conductor might obtain excellent results from an orchestra inferior to that from Boston, but so perfect a medium of expression deserves the greatest master of interpretation available. The Philharmonic Society across the river has been experimenting at its concerts with foreign conductors. Perhaps the committee in Boston will decide upon a similar course. One thing, however, should be borne in mind; mere scholarship in a conductor is not enough. The conductor should have in addition what the musicians call temperament, the players genius; qualities possessed by such men as Seidl, Liszt, Rubinstein and the other great ones who have gone before, and which are shared by some half dozen men who still survive.

---

om ..... Citizen
dress .....
te ..... Brooklyn, N. Y.
MAR 10 1906

SYMPHONY CONCERT YEAR WILL END HERE FRIDAY

Warnke, Principal 'Cellist of Boston Band, to Play Solo.

CHORAL ART PROGRAMME.

Other Concerts and Recitals Near at Hand in the Two Boroughs.

The last Boston Symphony concert of the series of 1905-6 will be given in the Baptist Temple on next Friday evening, March 16, at 8:15 o'clock. The soloist will be Heinrich Warnke, the new principal 'cellist of the orchestra, who has had such gratifying success in the concert season now almost at an end. Mr. Warnke was brought to Boston last fall to replace Mr. Krasselt. He came from the famous Kaim orchestra of Munich, where he held a similar place for eight years. There he was most intimately connected with Felix Weingartner during the latter's term as conductor of the Kaim orchestra, and it was largely through Mr. Weingartner's recommendation that Mr. Warnke came to Boston. He has filled the difficult place in the orchestra and has been the 'cello of the Boston Symphony Quartet with complete success. Not the least interesting feature of this concert will come from the fact that it will be the formal farewell of Mr. Gericke to Brooklyn. As was announced recently, Mr. Gericke has decided to retire from active life at the end of the present season, and this concert will be his last in Brooklyn. He has been actively at work as a conductor for forty years, and now he feels that he has earned the rest which is coming to him. At the end of the Boston season, which comes on April 28, he will return to Vienna, where he expects to live. His host of admirers and friends in Brooklyn will undoubtedly turn out in full force to bid him good-by. The programme he has prepared is made up entirely of familiar and well-loved works, the names on it being Mozart, Dvorak and Beethoven. It is as follows: Mozart's Symphony in G minor (K. 350); Dvorak's Concerto in B minor, for violoncello, op. 104, and Beethoven's Symphony No. 3, in E flat major, "Eroica," op. 55.

---

om .....
ddress .....
ate ..... MAR

The last Boston Symphony concert of the series of 1905-6 will be given in the Baptist Temple on next Friday evening, at 8:15 o'clock. The soloist will be Heinrich Warnke, the new principal 'cellist of the orchestra, who has had such gratifying success in the concert season now almost at an end. Mr. Warnke was brought to Boston last fall to replace Mr. Krasselt. He came from the famous Kaim Orchestra, of Munich, where he held a similar place for eight years. There he was most intimately connected with Felix Weingartner, during the latter's term as conductor of the Kaim Orchestra, and it was largely through Mr. Weingartner's recommendation that Mr. Warnke came to Boston. He has filled the difficult place in the orchestra, and has been the 'cello of the Boston Symphony Quartet with complete success. Not the least interesting feature of this concert will come from the fact that it will be the formal farewell of Mr. Gericke to Brooklyn. As was announced recently, Mr. Gericke has decided to retire from active life at the end of the present season, and this concert will be his last in Brooklyn. He has been actively at work as a conductor for forty years, and now he feels that he has earned the rest which is coming to him. At the end of the Boston season, which comes on April 28, he will return to Vienna, where he expects to live. The programme he has prepared is made up entirely of familiar and well-loved works, the names on it being Mozart, Dvorak and Beethoven. It is as follows: Symphony in G minor (K. 550), Mozart; Concerto in B minor for violoncello, Op. 104, Dvorak; Symphony No. 3, in E flat major, "Eroica," Op. 55, Beethoven.

---

ss .....

A programme with two well-loved symphonies, has been chosen for the last concert of the season here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the Baptist Temple next Friday evening. Mozart's Symphony in G minor and Beethoven's "Eroica" (No. 3) will be given with Dvorak's Concerto in B minor for violoncello as a solo number, to be played by Heinrich Warnke, the new 'cellist of the orchestra. An interesting feature of the concert will be that it will be the farewell appearance in Brooklyn of Mr. Gericke, conductor of the orchestra. As was announced recently, Mr. Gericke has decided to retire from active life at the end of the present season and this concert will be his last in Brooklyn. He has been actively at work as a conductor for forty years and now he feels that he has earned the rest which is coming to him. At the end of the Boston season, which comes on April 28, he will return to Vienna, where he expects to live. His host of admirers and friends in Brooklyn will undoubtedly turn out in full force to bid him goodby.

---

ess ..... Eagle
Brooklyn, N. Y.
MAR 10 1906

The last Boston Symphony concert of the series of 1905-6 will be given in the Baptist Temple on next Friday evening, at 8:15 o'clock. The soloist will be Heinrich Warnke, the new principal 'cellist of the orchestra, who has had such gratifying success in the concert season now almost at an end. Mr. Warnke was brought to Boston last fall to replace Mr. Krasselt. He came from the famous Kaim Orchestra of Munich where he held a similar place for eight years. He has filled the difficult place in the orchestra and has been the 'cello of the Boston Symphony Quartet with complete success. Not the least interesting feature of this concert will come from the fact that it will be the formal farewell of Mr. Gericke to Brooklyn. As was announced recently, Mr. Gericke has decided to retire from active life at the end of the present season and this concert will be his last in Brooklyn. He has been actively at work as a conductor for forty years and now he feels that he has earned the rest which is coming to him. At the end of the Boston season, which comes on April 28, he will return to Vienna where he expects to live. His host of admirers and friends in Brooklyn will undoubtedly turn out in full force to bid him goodby. The programme he has prepared is made up entirely of familiar and well loved works, the names on it being Mozart, Dvorak, and Beethoven. It is as follows:

Symphony in G minor (K. 550).....Mozart
Concerto in B minor, for violoncello, Op. 104, Dvorak
Symphony No. 3, in E flat major, Eroica, Op. 55, Beethoven

-- 4 188

THREE LECTURES.

"Liebnitz—the World of Harmony," was the subject of Prof. Frederick J. E. Woodbridge's fourth Brooklyn Institute lecture on "Modern Philosophers," at the Art Gallery last evening.

Miss Emma O. Couro, principal of St. Catharine's Hall, began at that school yesterday afternoon a course of lectures on "House Sanitation," before the school and the department of domestic sciences of the Brooklyn Institute.

Louis C. Elson, head of the theory department of the New England Conservatory, assisted by Alfred De Voto, teacher of piano in that school, gave the lecture preparatory to the Friday concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He spoke at Association Hall yesterday afternoon, the lecture being under the direction of the Brooklyn Institute and the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society.

---

om .....
ldress .....
ate .....

perpetuity.

BOSTON SYMPHONY'S PROGRAMME EXPLAINED.

Louis C. Elson, music editor of the "Boston Advertiser," and head of the theory department of the New England Conservatory, assisted by Alfred De Voto, teacher of piano in that school, gave the lecture Tuesday preparatory to the Friday concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He spoke at Association Hall, the lecture being under the direction of the Brooklyn Institute and the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society. Mr. Elson gave a clear and musicianly study of the programme, taking up each detail and leaving out all extraneous matter. The illustrations closely followed the talk in presenting the detail with the development of the several figures. The two men were closely followed but without applause until the close, when it was long continued.

---

om .....
ldress .....
ate .....

BROOKLYN INSTITUTE CALENDAR.

This is the calendar of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences for to-day: Fifth in a course of lectures on "The North of Africa," by Charles W. Furlong. A. M. Topic, "With Arabs in the Sahara," illustrated by lantern projections. Art Gallery, 8:15 P. M. Exhibit of photographs by Alice Boughton, 288 Montague street, 3 to 10 P. M. Concert, Boston Symphony Orchestra, Wilhelm Gericke, conductor; Heinrich Warnke, 'cello; Baptist Temple, 8 P. M. To-morrow, illustrated lecture by Dwight L. Elmendorf. Subject, "The Rhine Journey." Association Hall, 8 P. M.

Eagle
Brooklyn, N. Y.
MAR 15 1906

THE SYMPHONY PROGRAMME.

Preliminary Lecture by Louis C. Elson on Friday Night's Concert.

Louis C. Elson, music editor of the Boston Advertiser and head of the theory department of the New England Conservatory, assisted by Alfred De Voto, teacher of piano in that school, gave the lecture preparatory to the Friday concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He spoke at Association Hall yesterday afternoon, the lecture being under the direction of the Brooklyn Institute and the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society. Mr. Elson came before the former in lectures some five years ago. He gave a clear—a musicianly—study of the programme, taking up each detail and leaving out all extraneous matter. The illustrations closely followed the talk in presenting the detail with the development of the several figures. The two men were closely followed, but without applause, until the close, when it was long continued. Mr. Elson thought the programme full of interest and the two symphonies—the Mozart G minor and the Beethoven E flat major, "Eroica," an object lesson in contrast. These are separated by Dvorák's concerto in B minor for 'cello. The oldest music cycle was made up of dances and this idea has influenced the form of the symphony, which is an outgrowth. The movements of the symphony, four in number, were said to represent the intellectual, the emotional, the playful and popular and the jovial and merry. In old days the jig was always put last. Later folk-music was generally incorporated in the third or a minuet introduced. The minuet, one of the simplest of musical forms, is always greatly accelerated in time when incorporated in a symphony. Mozart's writings were passed in review and the G minor was said to be the greatest symphony of all he wrote. In hearing it one must think of the simple orchestra of his time. The form was not perfect, but back of the form is to be recognized the content of the work and the poetic beauty of its conception. While some modern musicians attack the Mozartian form yet others, and among them the most advanced, such as Tschaikowsky and Strauss, prize it. The two themes of a movement were said to be masculine and feminine in order as mentioned. They are sometimes called the "husband and wife." The first is orchestrated in much more masculine form than the second. The development precedes the closing theme. "In Mozart's time development was simple, but to-day it is pushed to the very verge," it was said, D'Indy being quoted as an example. Attention was called to the trio, another song form following the minuet, and to the "dialogue" of the last movement, when the whole orchestra answers the arpeggio of the strings. The concerto was the last Dvorak wrote before leaving this country. He had the assistance of Alwin Schroeder in the working out of this. After speaking of concertos in general, which have been written for all solo instruments—even the kettledrum—Mr. Elson urged his listeners to notice particularly in this to-morrow evening the double stopping, so much more difficult on the 'cello than on the violin; the harmonics or "high piping tones," what the Germans call "the flagiolet tones"; the tremolo, and the pizzicato, which is better on the 'cello than on the violin. Wonder was expressed that Dvorak had held to the old method of having the orchestra present the theme before the solo instrument begins, "thus affording an excellent chance for the artist to get very nervous," said Mr. Elson. The solo instrument has also two beautiful duets with the flute and the oboe, the latter being called, when speaking of the oboe passages in the Beethoven number, "the instrument of sorrow, of woman's tears." The beauty of the military form of the finale was also commented upon. "But, with the Russian writers the paths of glory lead but to the minor key," it was said. Beethoven's symphonies properly began the nineteenth century and a new school. In them the lecturer found always Beethoven's ideal of universal brotherhood and universal liberty. Beethoven's "Coda," like a woman's postscript, was said to contain some of his noblest thought. This symphony was carefully studied and the figures and developments pointed out as in the Mozart.

---

ss .....

SYMPHONY PROGRAMME LECTURE

Louis C. Elson Talks on the Music for Friday Concert.

Louis C. Elson, music editor of the Boston Advertiser, and head of the theory department of the New England Conservatory, assisted by Alfred De Voto, teacher of piano in that school, gave the lecture preparatory to the Friday concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at Association Hall yesterday afternoon. Mr. Elson thought the programme full of interest, and the two symphonies—the Mozart G minor and the Beethoven E flat major, "Eroica," and object lesson in contrast. These are separated by Dvorak's concerto in B minor for 'cello. Mozart's writings were passed in review and the G minor was said to be the greatest symphony of all he wrote. The concerto was the last Dvorak wrote before leaving this country. Mr. Elson urged his listeners to notice particularly in this to-morrow evening, the double stopping, so much more difficult on the 'cello than on the violin; the harmonics or "high-piping tones," what the Germans call "the flagiolet tones; the tremmolo, and the pizzicato, which is better on the 'cello than on the violin.

Beethoven's symphonies properly began the nineteenth century and a new school. In them the lecturer found always Beethoven's ideal of universal brotherhood and universal liberty. Beethoven's "Coda," like a woman's postscript, was [illegible] some of his noblest [illegible]

[202]

PASTE OVER

Brooklyn, N. Y.

MAR 17 1906

...mphony Concert of the Season ... Farewell Appearance of Con... Wilhelm Gericke.

...company of musicians, the Boston ... Orchestra, gave its fifth and last ... of the season in Brooklyn, at the ... Temple, last night, and a knowledge ... circumstance that this concert, while ... closes the season's series, would also ... the farewell here of Wilhelm Ger... conductor, had the effect of crow... house with an audience in especia... mood, who took opportunity to ma... to Mr. Gericke its good feeling to ... without, however, bursting the ... time-honored restraint which ... of the characteristic negations ... audiences.

...programme offered two symphonies, ... in G minor, and Beethoven's No. 8 ... separated in their performance by ... Concerto in B minor for violon... This arrangement, while generous in ... proportions, was like a final insis... Mr. Gericke upon the conservatism ...-making which has marked his ... He has ever avoided the spectacu... never been disposed to make a show ... might be called captivating dis... To offer at one concert two sympho... of the classic type is unusual, and this ... might with propriety have given way ... to a scheme more broadly appeal... But it was evident that Mr. Gericke ... no wish to pander to any sentimental ... interest in the concert on the part of the audience. Perhaps Mr. Gericke had reason ... be more than naturally conservative in ... attitude toward Brooklyn because of at... made to interfere with his policy of ...-making, and perhaps the Brook... Institute management has not been as ... as might be in seeking to swerve ... from the course of artistic propriety ... he saw it.

There is great charm for the listener in ... Mozart symphony, whose winsome and ... qualities challenge the fullest ad... Less essentially joyous in spirit ... nobly impressive is the Beethoven sym... and the distinguishing qualities of ... were brought out with that fine discrim... and care which has made Mr. Ger... work as a conductor singularly influ... The soloist for the concerto was ... Warnke, the leading 'cellist of the ..., who produced a beautiful though ... large or sonorous tone, and displayed ... which met the requirements of ... to a nicety. It was during the ... of the solo number that one of ... curious indiscretions that ushers will ... guilty of, caused an amusing incident. Af... the first movement of the concerto, an ... hurried down the aisle with a large ..., which he handed up to Mr. Gericke, ... without looking at the attached card, ... it on to the soloist. Mr. Warnke ... presence of mind enough to look at the ... card, and seeing that the wreath ... for Mr. Gericke, passed it back to the ... The incident caused a ripple of ... It is, of course, too bad that ... presentation of the wreath to Mr. Gericke ... have been robbed of its proper inci... importance. Some one should have ... the offering of a wreath to Mr. ... in the midst of a performance by a ...

It is a matter of regret that those who ... Mr. Gericke's work for the artistic ... he has so consistently uphel... look forward to a continuance of his ... here. But it is apparent that t... tendency of the times is in the directi... of endorsing the show spirit in concert giv... and it is equally apparent that Mr. ... would not be willing to adapt him... to conditions with which he is so manif... out of sympathy. Mr. Gericke was ... when he first took hold of the Bos... orchestra twenty-one years ago. He ... recognition as a drill master, and ... to this country from Vienna, where ... as a conductor at the Imperial Opera ..., as well as at concerts. The sound... of his knowledge and thoroughness of ... methods were soon revealed in the ... of the orchestra after he became its ... During the five years of his ... the principles of artistic verity were ... consistently emphasized that the playing ... orchestra became established on a ... which made its concerts a matter of ... interest as well as of particular ... for Boston.

Mr. Gericke did not continue his work ... here after 1889 was due only ... with. He was followed by Mr. Nikisch ... Mr. Paur, and took up the baton again ... the musical destiny of the Boston ... in 1898, and he has since firmly estab... the reputation of the Boston players ... leading orchestra of the country. ... chief value of Mr. Gericke's work re... itself in the exceptional euphony of ... among the musicians of the or... He has sought not only that one... of action which produces efficient en... but has produced that higher unity ... that gives the utmost degree of ... significance to every tone-quality ... instruments. It has not been suffi... him that the strings play with ... unity of action, with full, medium ... but that they produce ... absolute perfection of

SMALL GRAND

WERR'S

NEW YORK, N.Y.

...m EAGLE

...ress Brooklyn, N. Y.

...e MAR 17 1906

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Its Season Closes at the Baptist Temple.

The well meant efforts of the Street Cleaning Department to have the people who wanted to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra in trim for to-day were unavailing. The department had inclosed the Baptist Temple in ramparts of snow, and had diverted rivers of slush before its doors. The police co-operated with the street cleaners by staying away so that there was no management of the traffic. Symphony orchestras have no political standing. Hence the busiest spot in Brooklyn last night was a scene of some distress, and there was a sad mix of cars, carriages and squads on foot. But the people would not go to bed; they insisted on hearing the music, and they got into the Temple, somehow, a good many of them late and damp, but glad, and they gave so many rounds of applause to the leader that both at the beginning and end of the performance, that he was affected out of his usual coldness. A wreath was also sent to him—oddly, during the concerto, so that the soloist imagined it might be for him, and a little comedy of doubt and denial was enacted, before Mr. Gericke finally accepted the offering. This is the last we shall see of Mr. Gericke, for he returns to Europe presently and his place will be taken by somebody who is now there. In time Europe will be sending out for leaders, all of whom will be here.

The programme last night was one of those proper things in which Mr. Gericke delights. It consisted of three symphonies; that is, the Dvorak concerto that separated the Mozart G minor and the Beethoven "Heroic" is practically a symphony with violoncello obligato. The Mozart number, one that he dashed off in July, 1788—did it in a day or two, perhaps, because he had finished another less than a month before—has all the characteristics of his music, spontaneity, grace, bounce, tune, a degree of formality, slightness in orchestration, for there are no brasses except a pair of horns, and a certain immaturity. Some of the phrases are lovely, and the minuet is a gem because the author stops when he is through. This a musician will seldom do, any more than an after dinner speaker or an acrobat, and the clangorous wind-up of the usual composition, be it symphony, sonata, overture or the pesky march, is a precise equivalent to the attitude struck by the artist of the horizontal bar when he has done his somersault and appeals to the audience for recognition as a great man.

It was a change from the eighteenth to the nineteenth centuries in more than a matter of date that was made in the change from Mozart to Dvorak. It was a change in the view of life. Mozart's music is bright with the youth of the race. It had suddenly grown to maturity in Dvorak's time. We hear the pessimism of its age in Tschaikowsky. When Mozart wrote there was no science to vex religion and challenge faith. Men took all on trust, and were content in that. Governments rested on those divinely appointed to the task, and were not imposed on a multitude that is still incapable of understanding them. Labor was done with hands and not by machines, hence it was well and soundly done, and those who did it had not banded together to distress those who employed them. No doubt it was a narrow world, yet great art came of it, and it was the simple days that gave us the cathedrals. Mozart's symphony is as interesting a document in political and social history as it is considered as music. We find ourselves more at home, hence more discontented, when Dvorak speaks for us, albeit he was somewhat a free soul, too, and had little experience of democracies and doubters; but he lived in a time of change, and the problems that cause it affect all men in their thinking and doing, even in the writing of songs and concertos. The unrest of the world is therefore audible in Dvorak, and in those passages of his concerto that have an appealing beauty we find the melancholy which in Mozart is almost wholly missing. This work, which was written in America, by the by, is mature and thoughtful, though colored by some of the Bohemian rhythms such as the young Dvorak noted in the songs and dances of the street when he stood in the door of his father's butcher shop. The solo part, for 'cello, was given intelligently, sympathetically and skillfully by Heinrich Warnke, of the orchestra, an agreeable player, not of extreme force and authority, and peccable as to intonation, but of sentiment and good training. He was much applauded, as soloists always are, for the majority better likes a deed upon a Chinese fiddle with one string than the singing of the heavenly choir.

The "Heroic" symphony was played without heroism; indeed, Mr. Gericke's readings are too bland for works of this dimension and significance. The adagio lost its tremendous gloom and was a lament rather than a tragedy. Still, it was a clear, scholarly performance, and its magnificent directness and force were the more obvious by contrast with the Dvorak number. It was a fitting close to a pleasant and doubtless profitable season. The summary of works given in Brooklyn during the winter by this orchestra is appended:

Beethoven:
Symphony No. 6, "Pastoral."
Symphony No. 3, "Eroica."

...mic Overture.

...ti Sorcier."

...Lament and Triumph."

...Overture, "Sea Calm and Prosperous Voyage."

Mozart:
Symphony in G minor.
Recitative, "How Susanna Delays!" and aria, "Flown Forever," from "The Marriage of Figaro."
Mme. Gadski.

Schubert:
Unfinished symphony in B minor.

Schumann:
Concerto in A minor, for pianoforte and orchestra.
Harold Bauer.

Tschaikowsky:
Symphony No. 4.
"Francesca da Rimini."

Weber:
Concert piece in F minor, for pianoforte and orchestra.
Alfred Reisenauer.

Overture, "Der Freischuetz."
Recitative and aria from "Der Freischuetz."
Mme. Gadski.

...in E flat major, Op. ...

...ILLUSTRATED EXPRESS
...Fr... BUFFALO, N. Y.
Address
Date MAR 4 - 1906

With deep gratification on the part of the managers, the announcement ...

...Y CONCERT SOON

...Es...

...sent out last week to the 40 men and women who were instrumental in bringing the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Buffalo for two superb concerts this season, that the generous patronage for both recitals rendered it unnecessary to call upon the guarantors to make good a deficit.

It was not until the October concert that it was thought possible to give two such expensive recitals here without financial loss. To bring the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Buffalo was a tremendous undertaking, especially when two high-priced soloists appeared with the orchestra in February; but Buffalo certainly rose to its opportunities, with the result that the guarantors have the happy realization that they secured for this city two of the finest concerts ever given here, and this without personal loss.

Next season, encouraged by this winter's record, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will again come to Buffalo, giving two and perhaps three concerts. This is the first and only time that an orchestra has played here under a guarantee without necessitating a call upon its backers, and it required the greatest orchestra in America to establish this record.

Standard Union
...Brooklyn, N. Y.
...ess
MAR 1 - 1906

LAST SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The last of this season's concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and incidentally, the last at which Wilhelm Gericke will conduct, was given yesterday evening at the Baptist Temple, where there was a perceptible falling off in attendance owing to the weather, notwithstanding the fact that the programme was the biggest of the season, as it included two symphonies, relieved only by a concerto for 'cello.

Mr. Gericke received a round of sympathetic applause as he came on the platform, was twice recalled on the conclusion of the concert, and it was meant that he should be given a floral wreath, but the attendants decided that the soloist of the evening was entitled to this distinction, and presented it to Mr. Warnke at the end of the first movement of his concerto. There was a hearty laugh in which the musicians joined with the audience when the error was realized, and Mr. Warnke insisted that Mr. Gericke accept the wreath, ignoring the generosity of the usher.

The "todtgesang" of the Gericke administration was Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony (No. 3, op. 55), which came last in performance, but must always be first considered, whatever the remainder of the programme may be. Many thousands of words have been expended in vain attempts to read into this gigantic masterpiece a dramatic tale based upon "the life of a hero," but in view of the vague data left by Beethoven, those who hear it performed may be permitted to draw their own conclusions as to its meaning. It is not all tragedy, but it is all great music, and it is a pleasure to record Mr. Gericke as having given it a masterly performance. Possibly he may have missed some of the beauty of the first movement, which was neither fast nor brilliant, but the magnificent funeral march and the succeeding movements more than atoned for this. The first number was the Mozart symphony in G minor, which was given in most conventional form.

Heinrich Warnke, first 'cellist of the orchestra, had a bad night for his debut. Strings were snapping in the orchestra from the damp, and one of his colleagues often looked anxiously at the ceiling, as though in anticipation of a form of baptism which is not approved at the Temple. Still he played well enough to satisfy the audience that he is worthy of the important post which he holds, and to give a pretty clear idea of Dr. Dvorak's B minor concerto. The work, so Mr. Hale tells us, was written before Dvorak's departure from America, with much aid from Alwin Schroeder, who was Mr. Warnke's predecessor as first 'cellist to this orchestra. It began as though Dvorak's mind had still been upon "new world" themes, but speedily became reminiscent of the Ride of the Valkyrs, slightly inverted, and of the last of "Tosca." The audience would gladly have listened to an encore.

...ILLUSTRATED TIMES
...m
...dress ...BUFFALO, N.Y.
MAR 4 - 1906
...te

With deep gratification on the part of the managers, the announcement was sent out last week to the 40 men and women who were instrumental in bringing the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Buffalo for two superb concerts this season, that the generous patronage for both recitals rendered it unnecessary to call upon the guarantors to make good a deficit. It was not until the October concert that it was thought possible to give two such expensive recitals here without financial loss. To bring the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Buffalo was a tremendous undertaking, especially when two high-priced soloists appeared with the orchestra in February, but Buffalo certainly arose to its opportunities with the result that the guarantors have the happy realization that they secured for this city two of the finest concerts ever given here, and this without personal loss. Next season, encouraged by this winter's record, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will again come to Buffalo, giving two and perhaps three concerts. This is the first and only time that an orchestra has played here under a guarantee without necessitating a call upon its backers, and it required the greatest orchestra in America to establish the record.

...m JOURNAL
...ress MILWAUKEE, WIS.
...e FEB 23 1906

BOSTON.—Wilhelm Gericke has resigned as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Gericke was offered the position for the season of 1906-07, and informed Maj. H. L. Higginson, the head of the organization, that he would accept under certain conditions. Maj. Higginson did not approve them and Mr. Gerecki declined the offer. He will return to Europe. Mr. Gerecki was conductor from 1884 to 1889 and from 1898 until the present time.

...CITIZEN
...Brooklyn, N. Y.
...ress
...e MAR 17 1906

GERICKE'S FAREWELL.

Laurel Wreath for Retiring Conductor of Boston Orchestra at Temple Concert.

Brooklyn said farewell to the Boston Symphony Orchestra for this season and to its retiring conductor, Wilhelm Gericke, last evening at a concert in the Baptist Temple. The customary attendants at these concerts were in their places and showed more than usual warmth in appreciation of Mr. Gericke's term of leadership, which concluded for Brooklyn on this occasion. The conductor was given a large laurel wreath. It was presented, however, at the close of a solo performance by Mr. Warnke, the new 'cellist of the Boston orchestra, and in consequence, there was a question as to whether the tribute was for the 'cellist or for Mr. Gericke. A look at the card decided for the latter and then there was great applause.

The programme of last evening was quite heavy ...

...om PLAIN DEALER
...ddress ...VELAND, OHIO
...ate FEB 26 1906

Boston is much torn up over the loss of William Gericke, who has resigned his position as director of the Boston Symphony orchestra. In Boston the leader of the orchestra is a good deal bigger man than the mayor.

[203]

PASTE OVER

WFRR SMALL GRAND

ss

MAR 17 1906

MUSICAL.

Last Symphony Concert of the Season and Farewell Appearance of Conductor Wilhelm Gericke.

That fine company of musicians, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, gave its fifth and last concert of the season in Brooklyn, at the Baptist Temple, last night, and a knowledge of the circumstance that this concert, while concluding the season's series, would also serve as the farewell here of Wilhelm Gericke, the conductor, had the effect of crowding the house with an audience in especially friendly mood, who took opportunity to make known to Mr. Gericke its good feeling toward him, without, however, bursting the bonds of the time-honored restraint which is one of the characteristic negations of Brooklyn audiences.

The programme offered two symphonies, Mozart's, in G minor, and Beethoven's No. 3 "Eroica," separated in their performance by Dvorak's Concerto in B minor for violoncello. This arrangement, while generous in musical proportions, was like a final insistence by Mr. Gericke upon the conservatism in programme-making which has marked his policy. He has ever avoided the spectacular—has never been disposed to make a show of what might be called captivating display. To offer at one concert two symphonies of the classic type is unusual, and this plan might with propriety have given way last night to a scheme more broadly appealing. But it was evident that Mr. Gericke had no wish to pander to any sentimental interest in the concert on the part of the audience. Perhaps Mr. Gericke had reason to be more than naturally conservative in his attitude toward Brooklyn because of attempts made to interfere with his policy of programme-making, and perhaps the Brooklyn Institute management has not been as discreet as might be in seeking to swerve him from the course of artistic propriety as he saw it.

There is great charm for the listener in the Mozart symphony, whose winsome and engaging qualities challenge the fullest admiration. Less essentially joyous in spirit but nobly impressive is the Beethoven symphony, and the distinguishing qualities of both were brought out with that fine discrimination and care which has made Mr. Gericke's work as a conductor singularly influential. The soloist for the concerto was Heinrich Warnke, the leading 'cellist of the orchestra, who produced a beautiful though not a large or sonorous tone, and displayed a technique which met the requirements of the concerto to a nicety. It was during the performance of the solo number that one of those curious indiscretions that ushers will be guilty of, caused an amusing incident. After the first movement of the concerto, an usher hurried down the aisle with a large wreath, which he handed up to Mr. Gericke, who, without looking at the attached card, passed it on to the soloist. Mr. Warnke had presence of mind enough to look at the attached card, and seeing that the wreath was for Mr. Gericke, passed it back to the conductor. The incident caused a ripple of amusement. It is, of course, too bad that the presentation of the wreath to Mr. Gericke should have been robbed of its proper incidental importance. Some one should have prevented the offering of a wreath to Mr. Gericke in the midst of a performance by a soloist.

It is a matter of regret that those who admire Mr. Gericke's work for the artistic standards he has so consistently upheld cannot look forward to a continuance of his labor here. But it is apparent that the tendency of the times is in the direction of endorsing the show spirit in concert giving, and it is equally apparent that Mr. Gericke would not be willing to adapt himself to conditions with which he is so manifestly out of sympathy. Mr. Gericke was just 30 when he first took hold of the Boston orchestra twenty-one years ago. He had won recognition as a drill master, and came to this country from Vienna, where he was a conductor at the Imperial Opera House, as well as at concerts. The soundness of his knowledge and thoroughness of his methods were soon revealed in the work of the orchestra after he became its conductor. During the five years of his stay the principles of artistic verity were so persistently emphasized that the playing of the orchestra became established on a basis which made its concerts a matter of national interest as well as of particular local pride for Boston.

That Mr. Gericke did not continue his work as conductor here after 1889 was due only to ill-health. He was followed by Mr. Nikisch and Mr. Paur, and took up the baton again to direct the musical destiny of the Boston band in 1898, and he has since firmly established the reputation of the Boston players as the leading orchestra of the country. The chief value of Mr. Gericke's work reveals itself in the exceptional euphony of endeavor among the musicians of the orchestra. He has sought not only that oneness of action which produces efficient ensemble, but has produced that higher unity of effort that gives the utmost degree of beauteous significance to every tone-quality of the instruments. It has not been sufficient for him that the strings play with perfect unity of action, with full, medium or diminished volume; but that they produce, so far as possible, the absolute perfection of beauty in tone quality. He has insisted upon elegance and refinement in expression as well as upon the accuracy and precision [illegible] requisites in orchestral

---

More than most conductors, Mr. Gericke has emphasized the point that the highest effectiveness in orchestral utterance does not lie wholly in the instruments themselves, handled even with skill, but that much depends upon the demand that man's intelligence makes upon their normal resources. It is not known who will succeed Mr. Gericke as conductor of the Boston orchestra. It is understood that he will retire from active work and return to Europe to make his home in Vienna.

m EAGLE

ress Brooklyn, N. Y.

te MAR 17 1906

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Its Season Closes at the Baptist Temple.

The well meant efforts of the Street Cleaning Department to have the people who wanted to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra in trim for to-day were unavailing. The department had inclosed the Baptist Temple in ramparts of snow, and had diverted rivers of slush before its doors. The police co-operated with the street cleaners by staying away, so that there was no management of the traffic. Symphony orchestras have no political standing. Hence the busiest spot in Brooklyn last night was a scene of some distress, and there was a sad mix of cars, carriages and squads on foot. But the people would not go to bed; they insisted on hearing the music, and they got into the Temple, somehow, a good many of them late and damp, but glad, and they gave so many rounds of applause to the leader that both at the beginning and end of the performance, that he was affected out of his usual coldness. A wreath was also sent to him—oddly, during the concerto, so that the soloist imagined it might be for him, and a little comedy of doubt and denial was enacted, before Mr. Gericke finally accepted the offering. This is the last we shall see of Mr. Gericke, for he returns to Europe presently and his place will be taken by somebody who is now there. In time Europe will be sending out for leaders, all of whom will be here.

The programme last night was one of those proper things in which Mr. Gericke delights. It consisted of three symphonies; that is, the Dvorak concerto that separated the Mozart G minor and the Beethoven "Heroic" is practically a symphony with violoncello obligato. The Mozart number, one that he dashed off in July, 1788—did it in a day or two, perhaps, because he had finished another less than a month before—has all the characteristics of his music, spontaneity, grace, bounce, tune, a degree of formality, slightness in orchestration, for there are no brasses except a pair of horns, and a certain immaturity. Some of the phrases are lovely, and the minuet is a gem because the author stops when he is through. This a musician will seldom do, any more than an after dinner speaker or an acrobat, and the clangorous wind-up of the usual composition, be it symphony, sonata, overture or the pesky march, is a precise equivalent to the attiude struck by the artist of the horizontal bar when he has done his somersault and appeals to the audience for recognition as a great man.

It was a change from the eighteenth to the nineteenth centuries in more than a matter of date that was made in the change from Mozart to Dvorak. It was a change in the view of life. Mozart's music is bright with the youth of the race. It had suddenly grown to maturity in Dvorak's time. We hear the pessimism of its age in Tschaikowsky. When Mozart wrote there was no science to vex religion and challenge faith. Men took all on trust, and were content in that. Governments rested on those divinely appointed to the task, and were not imposed on a multitude that is still incapable of understanding them. Labor was done with hands and not by machines, hence it was well and soundly done, and those who did it had not banded together to distress those who employed them. No doubt it was a narrow world, yet great art came of it, and it was the simple days that gave us the cathedrals. Mozart's symphony is as interesting a document in political and social history as it is considered as music. We find ourselves more at home, hence more discontented, when Dvorak speaks for us, albeit he was somewhat a free soul, too, and had little experience of democracies and doubters; but he lived in a time of change, and the problems that cause it affect all men in their thinking and doing, even in the writing of songs and concertos. The unrest of the world is therefore audible in Dvorak, and in those passages of his concerto that have an appealing beauty we find the melancholy which in Mozart is almost wholly missing. This work, which was written in America, by the by, is mature and thoughtful, though colored by some of the Bohemian rhythms such as the young Dvorak noted in the songs and dances of the street when he stood in the door of his father's butcher shop. The solo part, for 'cello, was given intelligently, sympathetically and skillfully by Heinrich Warnke, of the orchestra, an agreeable player, not of extreme force and authority, and peccable as to intonation, but of sentiment and good training. He was much applauded, as soloists always are, for the majority better likes a deed upon a Chinese fiddle with one string than the singing of the heavenly choir.

The "Heroic" symphony was played without heroism; indeed, Mr. Gericke's readings are too bland for works of this dimension and significance. The adagio lost its tremendous gloom and was a lament rather than a tragedy. Still, it was a clear, scholarly performance, and its magnificent directness and force were the more obvious by contrast with the Dvorak number. It was a fitting close to a pleasant and doubtless profitable season. The summary of works given in Brooklyn during the winter by this orchestra is appended:

Beethoven:
Symphony No. 6. "Pastoral."
Symphony No. 3. "Eroica."
Brahms:
Academic Overture.
Paul Dukas:
"L'Apprenti Sorcier."

Concerto for violoncello. Dvorak
Heinrich Warnke.
Gabriel Faure:
Suite, "Pelleas et Melisande," de Maeterlinck.
Humperdinck:
Introduction to Act III of "Kings' Children."
Vincent d'Indy:
Second Symphonie, in B flat.
"Sauge fleurie."
Liszt:
"Tasso: Lament and Triumph."
Mendelssohn:
Overture, "Sea Calm and Prosperous Voyage."
Mozart:
Symphony in G minor.
Recitative, "How Susanna Delays!" and aria, "Flown Forever," from "The Marriage of Figaro."
Mme. Gadski.
Schubert:
Unfinished symphony in B minor.
Schumann:
Concerto in A minor, for pianoforte and orchestra.
Harold Bauer.
Tschaikowsky:
Symphony No. 4.
"Francesca da Rimini."
Weber:
Concert piece in F minor, for pianoforte and orchestra.
Alfred Reisenauer.
Overture, "Der Freischuetz."
Recitative and aria from "Der Freischuetz."
Mme. Gadski.

ure

ess

LAST SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The last of this season's concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and incidentally, the last at which Wilhelm Gericke will conduct, was given yesterday evening at the Baptist Temple, where there was a perceptible falling off in attendance owing to the weather, notwithstanding the fact that the programme was the biggest of the season, as it included two symphonies, relieved only by a concerto for 'cello.

Mr. Gericke received a round of sympathetic applause as he came on the platform, was twice recalled on the conclusion of the concert, and it was meant that he should be given a floral wreath, but the attendants decided that the soloist of the evening was entitled to this distinction, and presented it to Mr. Warnke at the end of the first movement of his concerto. There was a hearty laugh in which the musicians joined with the audience when the error was realized, and Mr. Warnke insisted that Mr. Gericke accept the wreath, ignoring the generosity of the usher.

The "todtgesang" of the Gericke administration was Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony (No. 3, op. 55), which came last in performance, but must always be first considered, whatever the remainder of the programme may be. Many thousands of words have been expended in vain attempts to read into this gigantic masterpiece a dramatic tale based upon "the life of a hero," but in view of the vague data left by Beethoven, those who hear it performed may be permitted to draw their own conclusions as to its meaning. It is not all tragedy, but it is all great music, and it is a pleasure to record Mr. Gericke as having given it a masterly performance. Possibly he may have missed some of the beauty of the first movement, which was neither fast nor brilliant, but the magnificent funeral march and the succeeding movements more than atoned for this. The first number was the Mozart symphony in G minor, which was given in most conventional form.

Heinrich Warnke, first 'cellist of the orchestra, had a bad night for his debut. Strings were snapping in the orchestra from the damp, and one of his colleagues often looked anxiously at the ceiling, as though in anticipation of a form of baptism which is not approved at the Temple. Still he played well enough to satisfy the audience that he is worthy of the important post which he holds, and to give a pretty clear idea of Dr. Dvorak's B minor concerto. The work, so Mr. Hale tells us, was written before Dvorak's departure from America, with much aid from Alwin Schroeder, who was Mr. Warnke's predecessor as first 'cellist to this orchestra. It began as though Dvorak's mind had still been upon "new world" themes, but speedily became reminiscent of the Ride of the Valkyrs, slightly inverted, and of the last of "Tosca." The audience would gladly have listened to an encore.

1

ress

e

GERICKE'S FAREWELL.

Laurel Wreath for Retiring Conductor of Boston Orchestra at Temple Concert.

Brooklyn said farewell to the Boston Symphony Orchestra for this season and to its retiring conductor, Wilhelm Gericke, last evening at a concert in the Baptist Temple. The customary attendants at these concerts were in their places and showed more than usual warmth in appreciation of Mr. Gericke's term of leadership, which concluded for Brooklyn on this occasion. The conductor was given a large laurel wreath. It was presented, however, at the close of a solo performance by Mr. Warnke, the new 'cellist of the Boston orchestra, and in consequence, there was a question as to whether the tribute was for the 'cellist or for Mr. Gericke. A look at the card decided for the latter and then there was great applause.

The programme of last evening was quite heavy and contained no novelties, but it was rendered with the exquisite finish incomparable to any other or-

---

Mr. Warnke played with [illegible] and taste and the orchestra supported effectively in the Dvorak number. The selections were these: Mozart's symphony in G minor, No. 140; Dvorak's concerto in B minor for Violoncello, Op. 104, and Beethoven's "Aroica" symphony, No. 3, in E flat major, Op. 55.

From EXPRESS

Address MAR 4 - 1906

Date

Y CONCERT SOON

Es

sent out last week to the 40 men and women who were instrumental in bringing the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Buffalo for two superb concerts this season, that the generous patronage for both recitals rendered it unnecessary to call upon the guarantors to make good a deficit.

It was not until the October concert that it was thought possible to give two such expensive recitals here without financial loss. To bring the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Buffalo was a tremendous undertaking, especially when two high-priced soloists appeared with the orchestra in February; but Buffalo certainly rose to its opportunities, with the result that the guarantors have the happy realization that they secured for this city two of the finest concerts ever given here, and this without personal loss.

Next season, encouraged by this winter's record, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will again come to Buffalo, giving two and perhaps three concerts. This is the first and only time that an orchestra has played here under a guarantee without necessitating a call upon its backers, and it required the greatest orchestra in America to establish this record.

TIMES

om

dress MAR 4 - 1906

te

With deep gratification on the part of the managers, the announcement was sent out last week to the 40 men and women who were instrumental in bringing the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Buffalo for two superb concerts this season, that the generous patronage for both recitals rendered it unnecessary to call upon the guarantors to make good a deficit. It was not until the October concert that it was thought possible to give two such expensive recitals here without financial loss. To bring the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Buffalo was a tremendous undertaking, especially when two high-priced soloists appeared with the orchestra in February, but Buffalo certainly arose to its opportunities with the result that the guarantors have the happy realization that they secured for this city two of the finest concerts ever given here, and this without personal loss. Next season, encouraged by this winter's record, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will again come to Buffalo, giving two and perhaps three concerts. This is the first and only time that an orchestra has played here under a guarantee without necessitating a call upon its backers, and it required the greatest orchestra in America to establish the record.

JOURNAL

m

ress MILWAUKEE, WIS.

e FEB 3

BOSTON.—Wilhelm Gericke has resigned as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Gericke was offered the position for the season of 1906-07, and informed Maj. H. L. Higginson, the head of the organization, that he would accept under certain conditions. Maj. Higginson did not approve them and Mr. Gerecki declined the offer. He will return to Europe. Mr. Gerecki was conductor from 1884 to 1889 and from 1898 until the present time.

om DEALER

ddress LAND, OHIO

ate FEB 26 1906

Boston is much torn up over the loss of William Gericke, who has resigned his position as director of the Boston Symphony orchestra. In Boston the leader of the orchestra is a good deal bigger man than the mayor.

[203]

REDUCTION RATIO 14x

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

150 mm

100 mm

A5

A4

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

4.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

3.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PASTE OVER

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1905-06

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

VI. CONCERT.

(Last of the Season.)

THURSDAY, APRIL 19, AT 7.45 P.M.

Programme.

BEETHOVEN. OVERTURE to Goethe's "Egmont," op. 84.

BRAHMS. SYMPHONY No. 4, in E minor, op. 98.
I. Allegro non troppo.
II. Andante moderato.
III. Allegro giocoso.
IV. Allegro energico e passionato.

LISZT. CONCERTO for PIANOFORTE and ORCHESTRA in E flat major, No. 1.
Allegro maestoso.—Quasi adagio.—Allegretto vivace.—Allegro animato.—Allegro marziale animato.—Presto.

WAGNER. PRELUDE and LOVE-DEATH, from "Tristan and Isolde."

Soloist:

Mme. SAMAROFF.

The Pianoforte is a Steinway.

INCOMPLETE

In richly figured mahogany and other choice woods

WEBER SMALL GRAND

(SMALLER EVEN THAN THE BABY GRAND)

THE latest of the great musicians to express unbounded enthusiasm for the Weber Piano is Engelbert Humperdinck, the distinguished composer of "Hansel and Gretel," the intimate friend of the great Wagner, and one of the original conductors of "Parsi(fal" at Bayreuth. Upon the eve of returning home from his first visit to this country, Herr Humperdinck voluntarily sent the following autograph letter to The Weber Piano Company:

(TRANSLATION)

WEBER PIANO COMPANY, Aeolian Hall, New York.

Dear Sirs, — You were gracious enough to place at my disposal during my stay in New York one of your excellent grand pianos. I am charmed with the superior merit of this instrument, and I wish to testify that, in the details of volume, clearness, and beauty of tone, this instrument is to be reckoned among the highest standards of the various kinds of pianos known to me.

With greatest esteem,

E. HUMPERDINCK.

The Weber Small Grand measures but five feet four inches in length. It is thus suitable for music-rooms of moderate size, and occupies scarcely more space than the ordinary upright. Send for Art Catalog J.

THE WEBER PIANO COMPANY, Aeolian Hall
362 FIFTH AVENUE, near Thirty-fourth Street, NEW YORK, N.Y.

C. J. HEPPE & SON
1117 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia

PASTE OVER

INCOMPLETE

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1905-06

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

VI. CONCERT.

(Last of the Season.)

THURSDAY, APRIL 19, AT 7.45 P.M.

Programme.

BEETHOVEN. OVERTURE to Goethe's "Egmont," op. 84.

BRAHMS. SYMPHONY No. 4, in E minor, op. 98.
I. Allegro non troppo.
II. Andante moderato.
III. Allegro giocoso.
IV. Allegro energico e passionato.

LISZT. CONCERTO for PIANOFORTE and ORCHESTRA in E flat major, No. 1.
Allegro maestoso.—Quasi adagio.—Allegretto vivace.—Allegro animato.—Allegro marziale animato.—Presto.

WAGNER. PRELUDE and LOVE-DEATH, from "Tristan and Isolde."

Soloist:

Mme. SAMAROFF.

The Pianoforte is a Steinway.

In richly figured mahogany and other choice woods

WEBER SMALL GRAND

(SMALLER EVEN THAN THE BABY GRAND)

THE latest of the great musicians to express unbounded enthusiasm for the Weber Piano is Engelbert Humperdinck, the distinguished composer of "Hansel and Gretel," the intimate friend of the great Wagner, and one of the original conductors of "Parsifal" at Bayreuth. Upon the eve of returning home from his first visit to this country, Herr Humperdinck voluntarily sent the following autograph letter to The Weber Piano Company:

(TRANSLATION)

WEBER PIANO COMPANY, Aeolian Hall, New York.
Dear Sirs,— You were gracious enough to place at my disposal during my stay in New York one of your excellent grand pianos. I am charmed with the superior merit of this instrument, and I wish to testify that, in the details of volume, clearness, and beauty of tone, this instrument is to be reckoned among the highest standards of the various kinds of pianos known to me.
With greatest esteem,
E. HUMPERDINCK.

The Weber Small Grand measures but five feet four inches in length. It is thus suitable for music-rooms of moderate size, and occupies scarcely more space than the ordinary upright. Send for Art Catalog J.

THE WEBER PIANO COMPANY, Aeolian Hall
362 FIFTH AVENUE, near Thirty-fourth Street, NEW YORK, N.Y.

C. J. HEPPE & SON
1117 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

FOOT-GUARD HALL . . . HARTFORD

Tuesday Evening, March 20, at 8.15

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

TWENTY-FIFTH
SE SON
1905 906

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

F. R. COMEE, Asst. Manager.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

CITY HALL . . . . . FITCHBURG

Thursday Evening, April 5, at 8.

Under the auspices of the Fitchburg Smith College Club.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

TWENTY-FIFTH
SEASON
1905–1906

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

F. R. COMEE, Asst. Manager.

[805]

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

BAPTIST TEMPLE . . . BROOKLYN

Friday Evening, March 16, at 8.15 precisely.

Under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences and the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

TWENTY-FIFTH SEASON
1905–1906

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager. 5 F. R. COMEE, Asst. Manager.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

SMITH'S THEATRE . . . BRIDGEPORT

Monday Evening, March 19, at 8.15 precisely

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

TWENTY-FIFTH SEASON
1905–1906

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager. * F. R. COMEE, Asst. Manager.

[Box]

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

THE LYRIC . . . . . BALTIMORE

Wednesday Evening, March 14, at 8.15 precisely.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Asst. Manager.

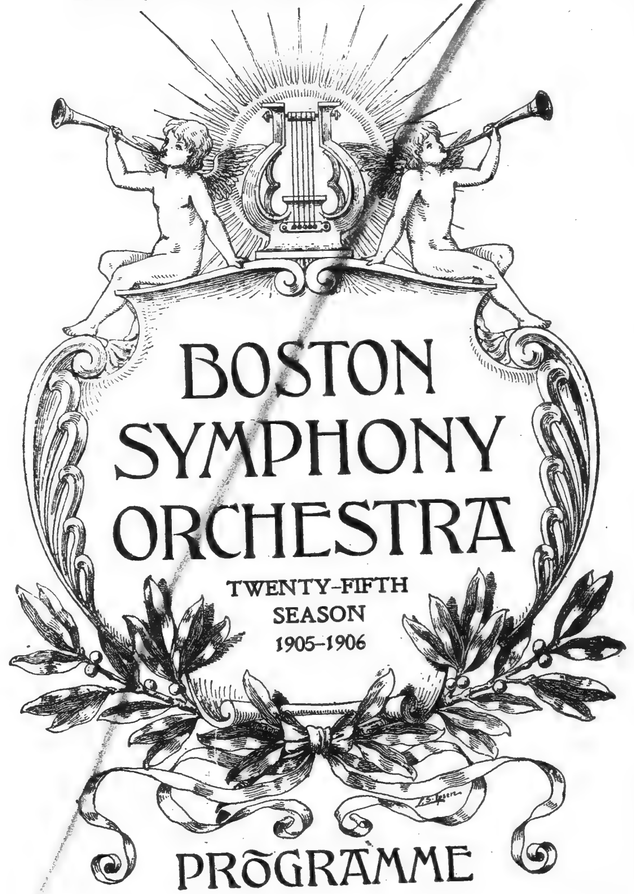
5

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Albaugh's, 109 North Charles Street.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

CARNEGIE HALL . . . NEW YORK

Thursday Evening, March 15, at 8.15 precisely.
Saturday Afternoon, March 17, at 2.30 precisely.



C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

5

F. R. COMEE, Asst. Manager.

Tickets at Carnegie Hall, Tyson's, and Luckhardt & Belder's, 10 East 17th Street.

[207]

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

ACADEMY OF MUSIC . . PHILADELPHIA

Monday Evening, March 12, at 8.15 precisely.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

TWENTY-FIFTH SEASON
1905–1906

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Asst. Manager.

5

Tickets on sale at
The Heppe Piano Rooms,
1115 Chestnut Street.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

NEW NATIONAL THEATRE . WASHINGTON

Tuesday Afternoon, March 13, at 4.30 precisely.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

TWENTY-FIFTH SEASON
1905–1906

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

5

F. R. COMEE, Asst. Manager.

[Boston]

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

INFANTRY HALL . . . PROVIDENCE

Thursday Evening, March 1, at 8.15.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

TWENTY-FIFTH
SEASON
1905-1906

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager. 3 F. R. COMEE, Asst. Manager.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1905-06

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

V. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, MARCH 8, AT 7.45 P.M.

Programme.

MENDELSSOHN.	OVERTURE to the Legend of "The Fair Melusina," op. 32.
SCHUBERT.	UNFINISHED SYMPHONY in D minor. I. Allegro moderato. II. Andante con moto.
WEBER.	LYSIART'S ARIA, "Wo berg ich mich," from "Euryanthe."
VIEUXTEMPS.	CONCERTO in A minor, No. 5, for VIOLIN and ORCHESTRA, op. 37. I. Allegro non troppo. II. Adagio. III. Allegro con fuoco.
	SONGS with PIANOFORTE.
a) STRAUSS.	"Schlagende Herzen."
b) BROGI.	"In riva al mar."
c) DEBUSSY	"Mandoline."
TSCHAIKOWSKY	THEME and VARIATIONS from SUITE No. 3, in G major, op. 55.

Soloists:

Mr. M. W. WHITNEY, Jr.
Mr. ADOLF BAK.

The Pianoforte is a Steinway.

Sixth and last Concert of the season Thursday Evening, April 19.

Brattle Hall, Cambridge. Third Concert of the Boston Symphony Quartet, Thursday evening, March 22, at 8 o'clock. Programme: Mozart, quartet in C major, (K 465) J. K. Paine, Sonata for Piano and Violin. Mendelssohn, Octet in E flat. op. 20. Assisting artists, Hoffman String Quartet and Mr. Heinrich Gebhard, Pianist.
Tickets at the University Bookstore, $1.00 and 50 cents.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

INFANTRY HALL . . . PROVIDENCE

Thursday Evening, March 1, at 8.15.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

TWENTY-FIFTH SEASON 1905–1906

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager. 3 F. R. COMEE, Asst. Manager.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1905-06

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

V. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, MARCH 8, AT 7.45 P.M.

Programme.

MENDELSSOHN.	OVERTURE to the Legend of "The Fair Melusina," op. 32.
SCHUBERT.	UNFINISHED SYMPHONY in D minor. I. Allegro moderato. II. Andante con moto.
WEBER.	LYSIART'S ARIA, "Wo berg ich mich," from "Euryanthe."
VIEUXTEMPS.	CONCERTO in A minor, No. 5, for VIOLIN and ORCHESTRA, op. 37. I. Allegro non troppo. II. Adagio. III. Allegro con fuoco.
	SONGS with PIANOFORTE.
a) STRAUSS.	"Schlagende Herzen."
b) BROGI.	"In riva al mar."
c) DEBUSSY	"Mandoline."
TSCHAIKOWSKY.	THEME and VARIATIONS from SUITE No. 3, in G major, op. 55.

Soloists:

Mr. M. W. WHITNEY, Jr.

Mr. ADOLF BAK.

The Pianoforte is a Steinway.

Sixth and last Concert of the season Thursday Evening, April 19.

Brattle Hall, Cambridge. Third Concert of the Boston Symphony Quartet, Thursday evening, March 22, at 8 o'clock. Programme: Mozart, quartet in C major, (K 465) J. K. Paine, Sonata for Piano and Violin. Mendelssohn, Octet in E flat, op. 20. Assisting artists, Hoffman String Quartet and Mr. Heinrich Gebhard, Pianist.
Tickets at the University Bookstore, $1.00 and 50 cents.

1905

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

CONVENTION HALL . . . BUFFALO

Monday Evening, February 19, 1906, at 8.15.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Asst. Manager.

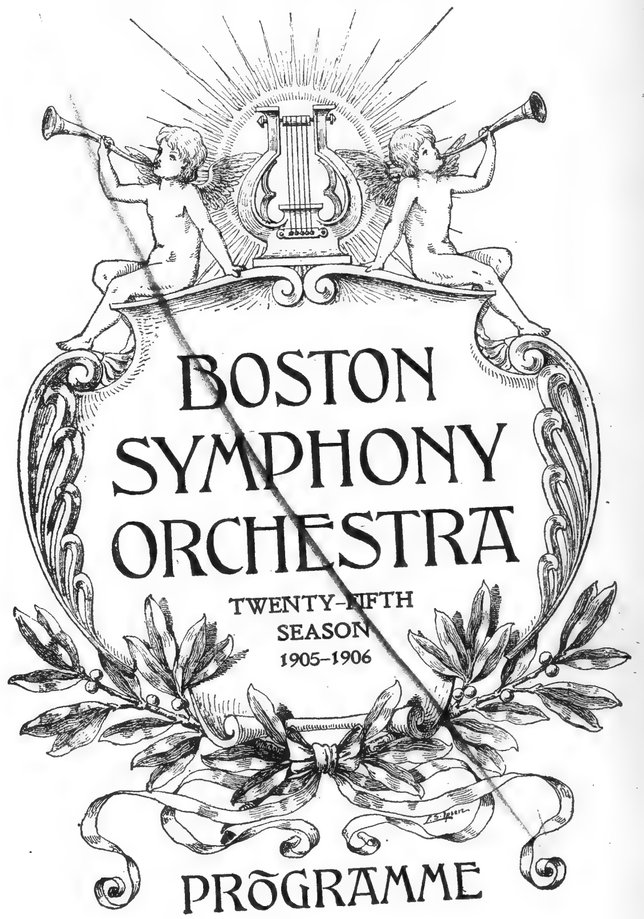
2

Seats on sale at
Denton, Cottier & Daniels.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

MUSIC HALL . . . . . TROY

Tuesday Evening, February 20, at 8.15



C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

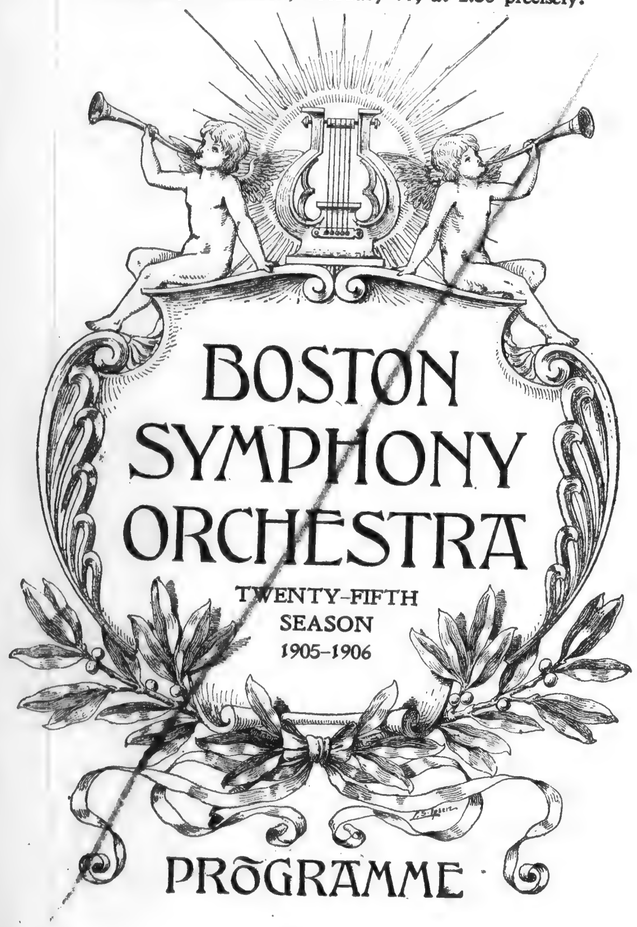
F. R. COMEE, Asst. Manager.

[1906].

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

CARNEGIE HALL . . . NEW YORK

Thursday Evening, February 15, at 8.15 precisely.
Saturday Afternoon, February 17, at 2.30 precisely.



C. A. ELLIS, Manager. 4 F. R. COMEE, Asst. Manager.

Tickets at Carnegie Hall, Tyson's, and Luckhardt & Belder's, 10 East 17th Street.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

BAPTIST TEMPLE . . . BROOKLYN

Friday Evening, February 16, at 8.15 precisely.

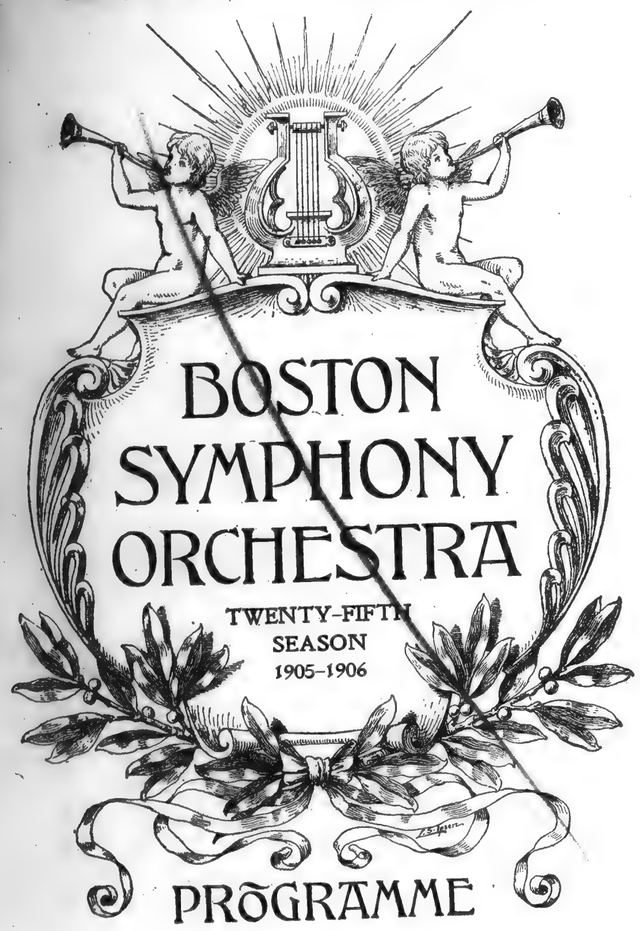
Under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences and the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager. 4 F. R. COMEE, Asst. Manager.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

NEW NATIONAL THEATRE . WASHINGTON

Tuesday Afternoon, February 13, at 4.30 precisely.



C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

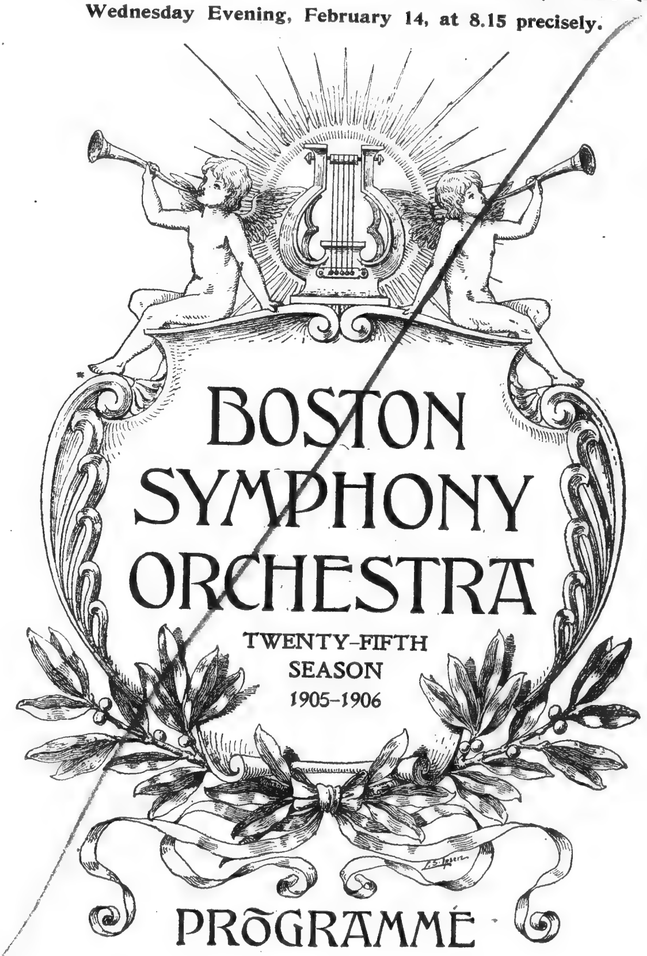
4

F. R. COMEE, Asst. Manager.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

THE LYRIC . . . . . BALTIMORE

Wednesday Evening, February 14, at 8.15 precisely.



C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Asst. Manager.

4

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Albaugh's, 109 North Charles Street.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

CITY HALL . . . . . PORTLAND

Wednesday Evening, February 7, at 8.15 precisely.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

TWENTY-FIFTH SEASON
1905–1906

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

2

F. R. COMEE, Asst. Manager.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

ACADEMY OF MUSIC . . PHILADELPHIA

Monday Evening, February 12, at 8.15 precisely.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

TWENTY-FIFTH SEASON
1905–1906

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Asst. Manager.

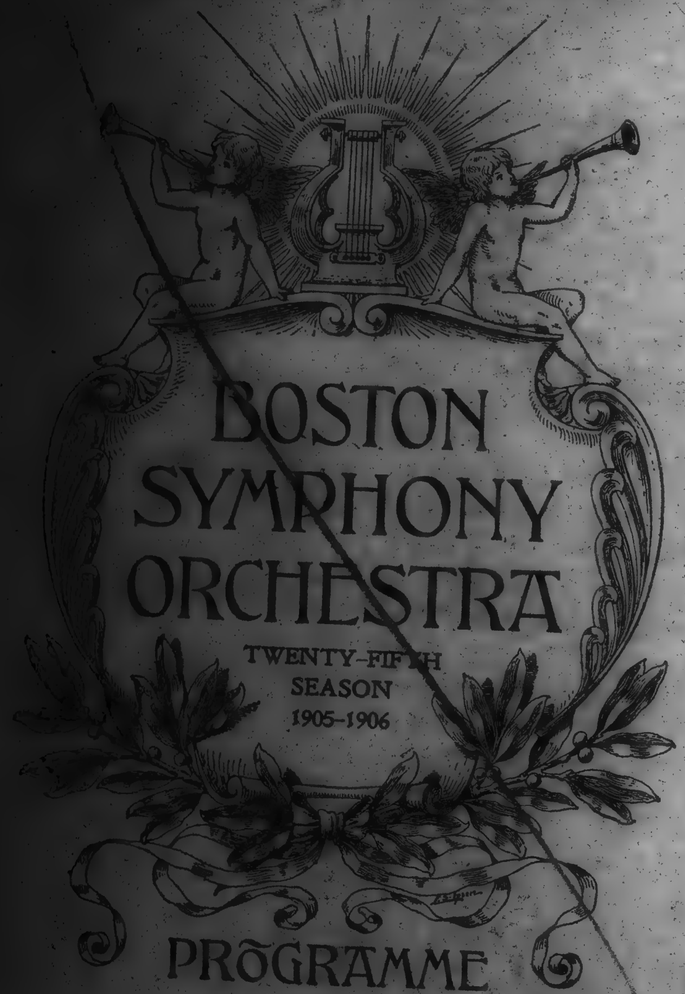
4

Tickets on sale at
The Heppe Piano Rooms,
1115 Chestnut Street.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

MECHANICS HALL . . . WORCESTER

Thursday Evening, January 25, at 8.15 precisely



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

TWENTY-FIFTH SEASON 1905-1906

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager. 2 F. R. COMEE, Asst. Manager.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1905-06

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

IV. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 1, AT 7.45 P.M.

Programme.

MOZART. SYMPHONY in G minor (Kloepfel 550.)
I. Allegro molto.
II. Andante.
III. Menuetto: Trio.
IV. Finale: Allegro assai.

BACH. CONCERTO for VIOLIN, in A minor.
I. Allegro non tanto.
II. Andante.
III. Allegro assai.

ERNEST CHAUSSON, SYMPHONY in B flat major, op. 20.
I. Lent; Allegro vivo.
II. Très lent.
III. Animé.
(First time at these concerts.)

Soloist:

Miss CLARA KLOBERG.

Fifth Concert Thursday Evening, March 8.

Brattle Hall, Cambridge. Second Concert of the Boston Symphony Quartet, Thursday evening, February 22, at 8 o'clock. Assisting artists, Miss Laura Hawkins and Mr. Max Hess. Tickets at the University Bookstore, $1.00 and 50 cents.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

MECHANICS HALL . . . WORCESTER

Thursday Evening, January 25, at 8.15 precisely

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

TWENTY-FIFTH SEASON 1905–1906

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager. F. R. COMEE, Asst. Manager.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1905-06

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

IV. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 1, AT 7.45 P.M.

Programme.

MOZART. SYMPHONY in G minor (Kloepfel 550.)
I. Allegro molto.
II. Andante.
III. Menuetto: Trio.
IV. Finale: Allegro assai.

BACH. CONCERTO for VIOLIN, in A minor.
I. Allegro non tanto.
II. Andante.
III. Allegro assai.

ERNEST CHAUSSON, SYMPHONY in B flat major, op. 20.
I. Lent; Allegro vivo.
II. Très lent.
III. Animé.
(First time at these concerts.)

Soloist:

Miss CLARA KLOBERG.

Fifth Concert Thursday Evening, March 8.

Brattle Hall, Cambridge. Second Concert of the Boston Symphony Quartet, Thursday evening, February 22, at 8 o'clock. Assisting artists, Miss Laura Hawkins and Mr. Max Hess. Tickets at the University Bookstore, $1.00 and 50 cents.

[214]

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

FOOT-GUARD HALL . . . HARTFORD

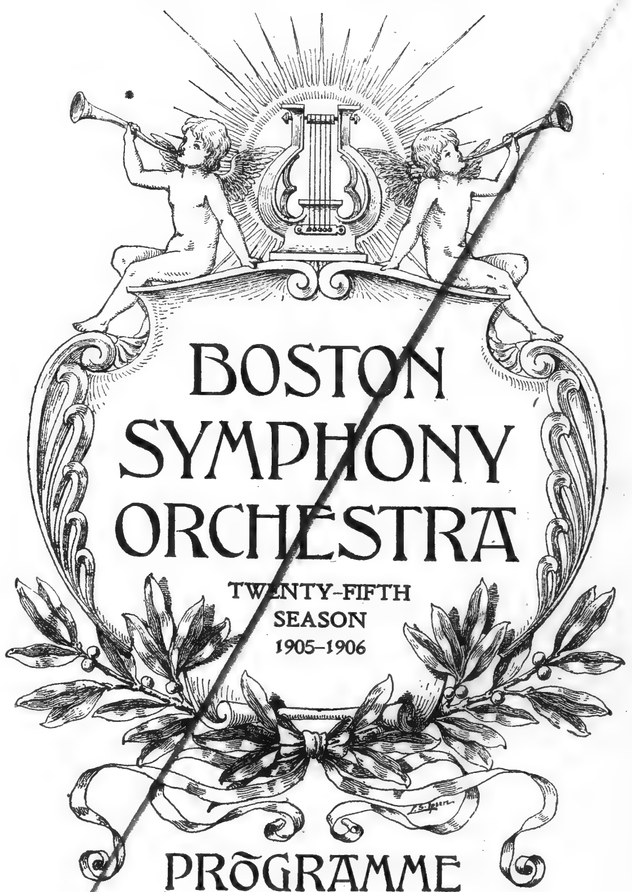
Monday Evening, January 15, at 8.15

C. A. ELLIS, Manager. 2 F. R. COMEE, Asst. Manager.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Court Square Theatre . . . Springfield

Tuesday Evening, January 16, at 8.15 precisely.



C. A. ELLIS, Manager. * F. R. COMEE, Asst. Manager.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

CARNEGIE HALL . . . NEW YORK

Thursday Evening, January 11, at 8.15 precisely.
Saturday Afternoon, January 13, at 2.30 precisely.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager. 3 F. R. COMEE, Asst. Manager.

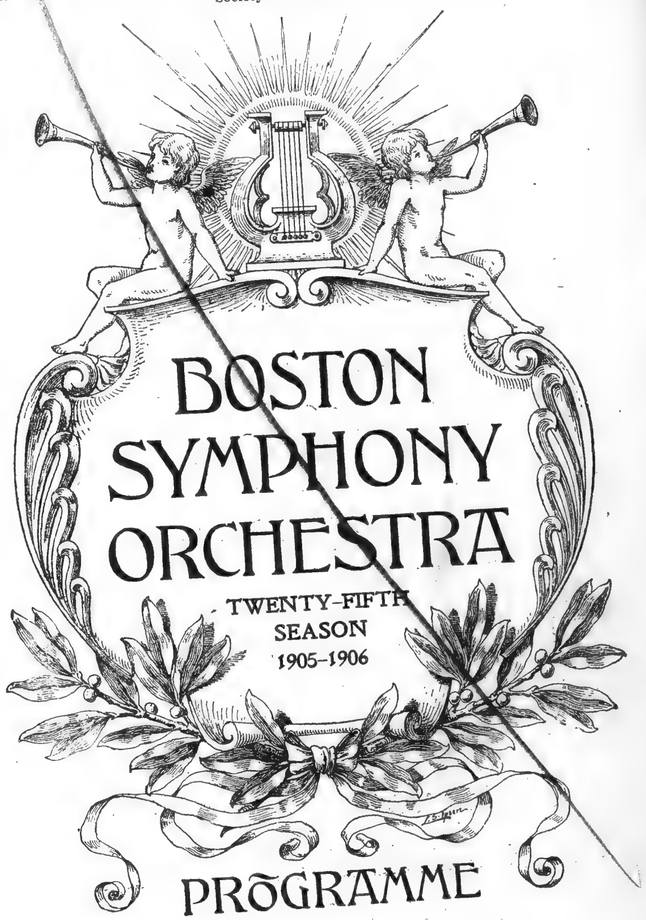
Tickets at Carnegie Hall, Tyson's, and Luckhardt & Belder's, 10 East 17th Street.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

BAPTIST TEMPLE . . . BROOKLYN

Friday Evening, January 12, at 8.15 precisely

Under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences and the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn.



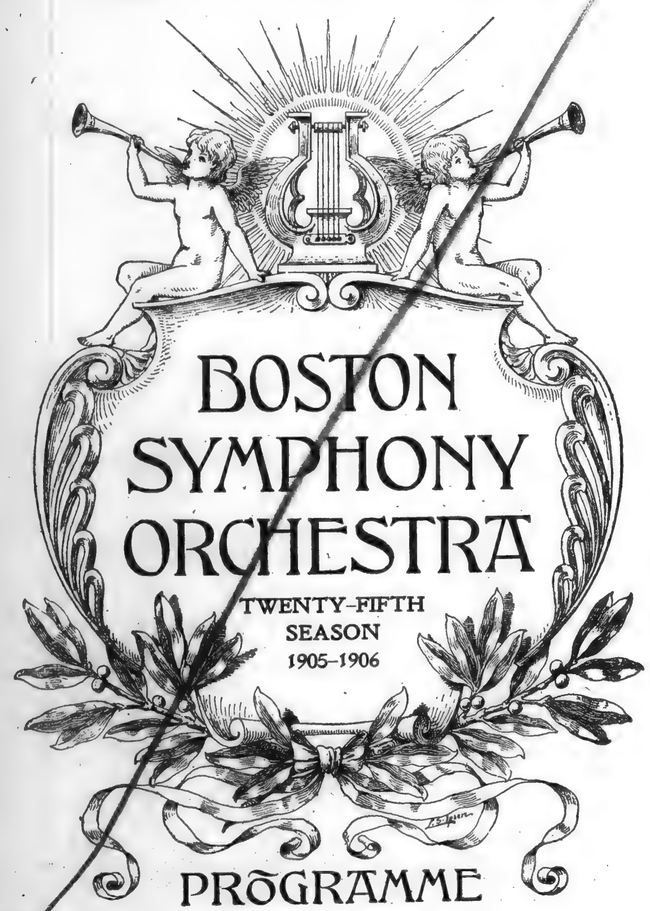
C. A. ELLIS, Manager. 3 F. R. COMEE, Asst. Manager.

[216]

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

NEW NATIONAL THEATRE . WASHINGTON

Tuesday Afternoon, January 9, at 4.30 precisely.



C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

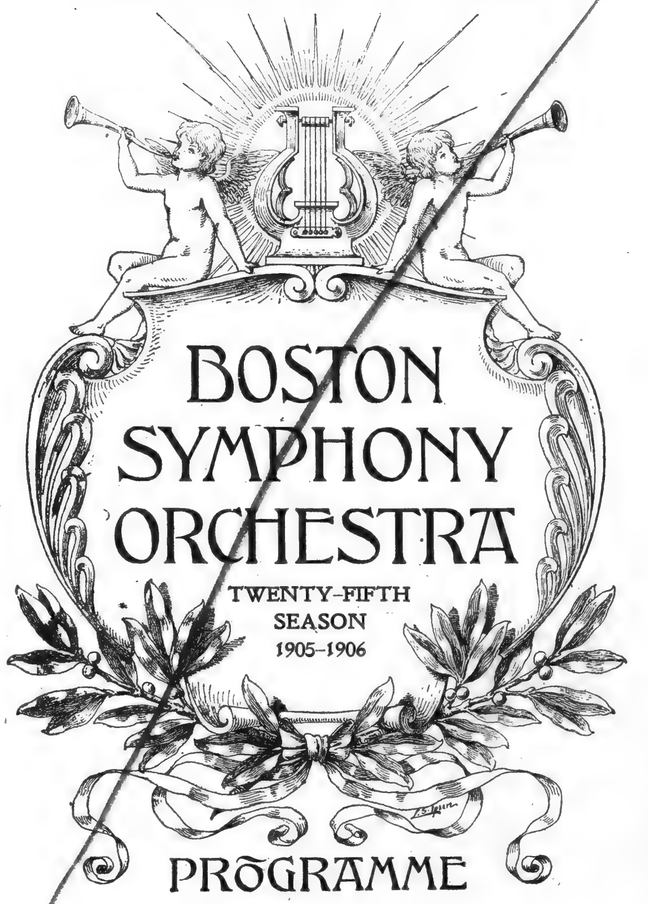
3

F. R. COMEE, Asst. Manager.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

THE LYRIC . . . . . BALTIMORE

Wednesday Evening, January 10, at 8.15 precisely.



C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Asst. Manager.

3

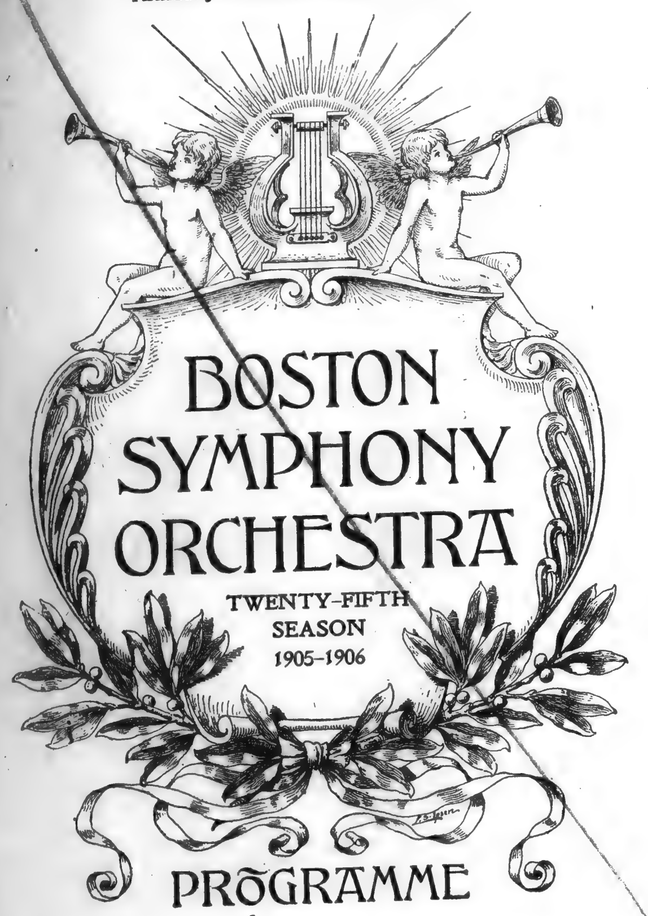
Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Albaugh's, 109 North Charles Street.

[a 7]

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

INFANTRY HALL . . . PROVIDENCE

Thursday Evening, January 4, at 8.15.



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

TWENTY-FIFTH SEASON
1905–1906

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

F. R. COMEE, Asst. Manager.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

ACADEMY OF MUSIC . . PHILADELPHIA

Monday Evening, January 8, at 8.15 precisely.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

TWENTY-FIFTH SEASON
1905–1906

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Asst. Manager.

Tickets on sale at
The Heppe Piano Rooms,
1115 Chestnut Street.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

MECHANICS HALL . . . WORCESTER

Thursday Evening, December 21, at 8.15 precisely

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

TWENTY-FIFTH SEASON 1905–1906

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager. 1 F. P. COMEE, Asst. Manager.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1905-06

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

III. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 28, AT 7.45 P.M.

Programme.

SCHUMANN.	SYMPHONY No. 1, in B flat major, op. 38. I. Andante un poco maestoso; Allegro molto vivace. II. Larghetto. III. Scherzo molto vivace. Trio I. Molto più vivace. Trio II IV. Allegro animato e grazioso.
GRIEG,	CONCERTO for PIANOFORTE in A minor, op. 16. I. Allegro molto moderato. II. Adagio. III. Allegro moderato molto e marcato.
J. K. PAINE.	PRELUDE to "The Birds" of Aristophanes.
LISZT.	SYMPHONIC POEM No. 2: "Tasso: Lament and Triumph."

Soloist:

Mr. GEORGE PROCTOR.

The Pianoforte is a Chickering.

Fourth Concert Thursday Evening, February 1.

The BOSTON SYMPHONY QUARTET, Professor Willy Hess, First Violin; Otto Roth, Second Violin; Emile Ferir, Viola; Heinrich Warnke, Violoncello, will give three concerts in Brattle Hall on Thursday evening, January 16, February 22, and March 22. The assisting artists will be Mme. Olga Samaroff, Miss Laura Hawkins and the Hoffmann String Quartet. Season tickets, $3.00. On sale at the University Book Store, Monday, January 8.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

MECHANICS HALL . . . WORCESTER

Thursday Evening, December 21, at 8.15 precisely

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

TWENTY-FIFTH SEASON 1905-1906

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager. 1 F. P. COMEE, Asst. Manager.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1905-06

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

III. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 28, AT 7.45 P.M.

Programme.

SCHUMANN.	SYMPHONY No. 1, in B flat major, op. 38. I. Andante un poco maestoso: Allegro molto vivace. II. Larghetto. III. Scherzo molto vivace. Trio I. Molto più vivace. Trio II IV. Allegro animato e grazioso.
GRIEG.	CONCERTO for PIANOFORTE in A minor, op. 16. I. Allegro molto moderato. II. Adagio. III. Allegro moderato molto e marcato.
J. K. PAINE.	PRELUDE to "The Birds" of Aristophanes.
LISZT.	SYMPHONIC POEM No. 2: "Tasso: Lament and Triumph."

Soloist:

Mr. GEORGE PROCTOR.

The Pianoforte is a Chickering.

Fourth Concert Thursday Evening, February 1

The BOSTON SYMPHONY QUARTET, Professor Willy Hess, First Violin; Otto Roth, Second Violin; Emile Ferir, Viola; Heinrich Warnke, Violoncello, will give three concerts in Brattle Hall on Thursday evenings, January 18, February 22, and March 22. The assisting artists will be Mme. Olga Samaroff, Miss Laura Hawkins and the Hoffmann String Quartet. Season tickets, $3.00. On sale at the University Book Store, Monday, January 8.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

CARNEGIE HALL . . . NEW YORK

Thursday Evening, December 7, at 8.15 precisely.
Saturday Afternoon, December 9, at 2.30 precisely.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager. 2 F. R. COMEE, Asst. Manager.

Tickets at Carnegie Hall, Tyson's, and Luckhardt & Belder's, 10 East 17th Street.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

BAPTIST TEMPLE . . . BROOKLYN

Friday Evening, December 8, at 8.15 precisely

Under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences and the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager. 2 F. R. COMEE, Asst. Manager.

[220]

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

THE LYRIC . . . . . BALTIMORE

Wednesday Evening, December 6, at 8.15 precisely.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

TWENTY-FIFTH
SEASON
1905–1906

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Asst. Manager.

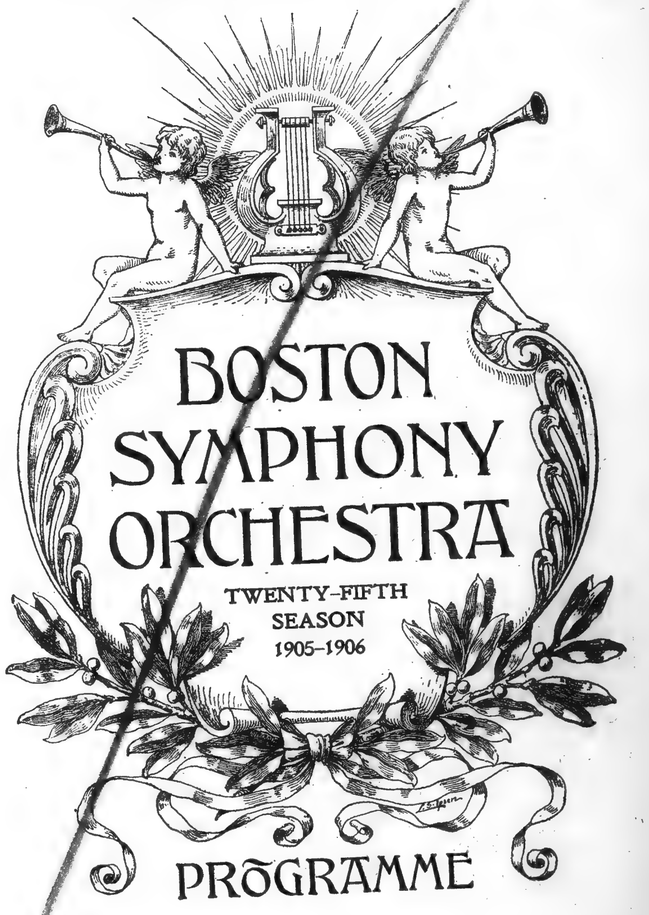
2

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Albaugh's, 109 North Charles Street

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

NEW NATIONAL THEATRE . WASHINGTON

Tuesday Afternoon, December 5, at 4.30 precisely.



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

TWENTY-FIFTH
SEASON
1905–1906

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

2

F. R. COMEE, Asst. Manager.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

ACADEMY OF MUSIC . . PHILADELPHIA

Monday Evening, December 4, at 8.15 precisely.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

TWENTY-FIFTH SEASON 1905-1906

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
H. R. COMEE, Asst. Manager.

2

Tickets on sale at
The Heppe Piano Rooms,
1115 Chestnut Street.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1905-06

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

II. CONCERT.

Professor WILLY HESS, Conductor.

WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 29, AT 7.45 P.M.

Programme.

BRAHMS. ACADEMIC OVERTURE, op. 80.

LISZT. ARIA: "Kennst du das Land."

BERLIOZ.
a) Minuet of Will-o'-the-wisps.
b) Waltz of Sylphs.
c) Rakoczy March.
from "The Damnation of Faust." op. 24.

SONGS with PIANOFORTE.

a) LULLY. "Bois Epais."
b) SCHUMANN, "Der Nussbaum."
c) BRAHMS. "Die Botschaft."

TSCHAIKOWSKY. SYMPHONY No. 4, in F minor, op. 36.
I. Andante sostenuto.
Moderato con anima in movimento di valse.
II. Andantino in modo di canzona.
III. Scherzo, "Pizzicato ostinato": Allegro.
IV. Finale: Allegro con fuoco.

Soloist:

Miss ALICE ROBBINS COLE.

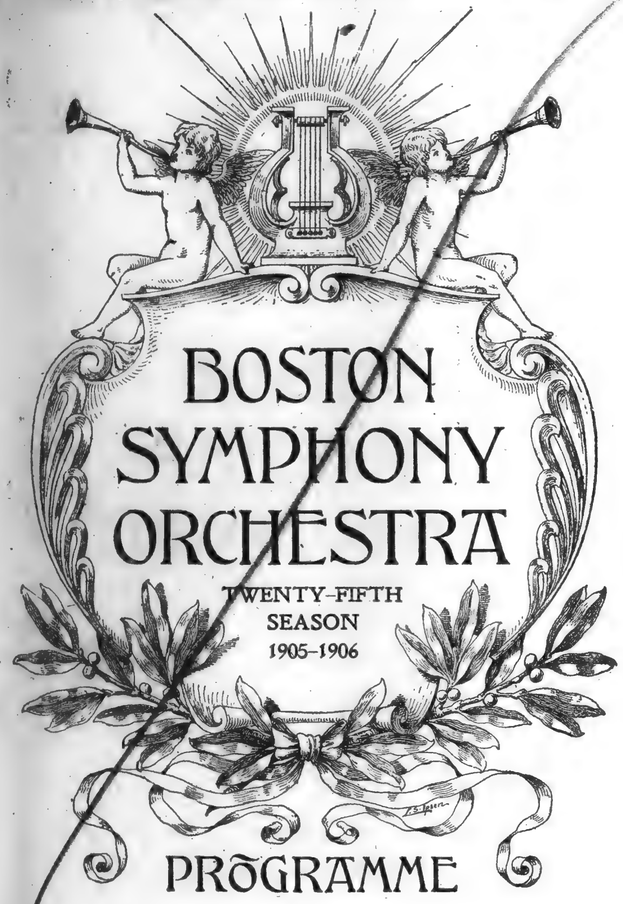
The Pianoforte is a Steinway.

Third Concert Thursday Evening, December 28.

The BOSTON SYMPHONY QUARTET, Professor Willy Hess and Mr. Otto Roth, Violins; Mr. Emile Ferir, Viola; Mr. Heinrich Warnke, Violoncello, will give three evenings of Chamber Music in Brattle Hall, on Thursdays, January 18, February 22 and March 22. Tickets for the series, $3.00. The date for the opening of the sale at the University Bookstore will be announced later.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

ACADEMY OF MUSIC . . PHILADELPHIA
Monday Evening, December 4, at 8.15 precisely.



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

TWENTY-FIFTH
SEASON
1905–1906

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Asst. Manager.

2

Tickets on sale at
The Heppe Piano Rooms,
1115 Chestnut Street.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1905-06

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

II. CONCERT.

Professor WILLY HESS, Conductor.

WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 29, AT 7.45 P.M.

Programme.

BRAHMS.	ACADEMIC OVERTURE, op. 80.
LISZT.	ARIA: "Kennst du das Land."
BERLIOZ.	a) Minuet of Will-o'-the-wisps. b) Waltz of Sylphs. c) Rakoczy March. from "The Damnation of Faust." op. 24.
	SONGS with PIANOFORTE.
a) LULLY.	"Bois Epais"
b) SCHUMANN,	"Der Nussbaum."
c) BRAHMS.	"Die Botschaft."
TSCHAIKOWSKY.	SYMPHONY No. 4, in F minor, op. 36. I. Andante sostenuto. Moderato con anima in movimento di valse. II. Andantino in modo di canzona. III. Scherzo, "Pizzicato ostinato": Allegro. IV. Finale: Allegro con fuoco.

Soloist:

Miss ALICE ROBBINS COLE.

The Pianoforte is a Steinway.

Third Concert Thursday Evening, December 28.

The BOSTON SYMPHONY QUARTET, Professor Willy Hess and Mr. Otto Roth, Violins; Mr. Emile Ferir, Viola; Mr. Heinrich Warnke, Violoncello, will give three evenings of Chamber Music in Brattle Hall, on Thursdays, January 18, February 22 and March 22. Tickets for the series, $3.00. The date for the opening of the sale at the University Bookstore will be announced later.

[2.67]

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

FOOT-GUARD HALL . . . HARTFORD

Tuesday Evening, November 14, at 8.15.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

TWENTY-FIFTH SEASON
1905–1906

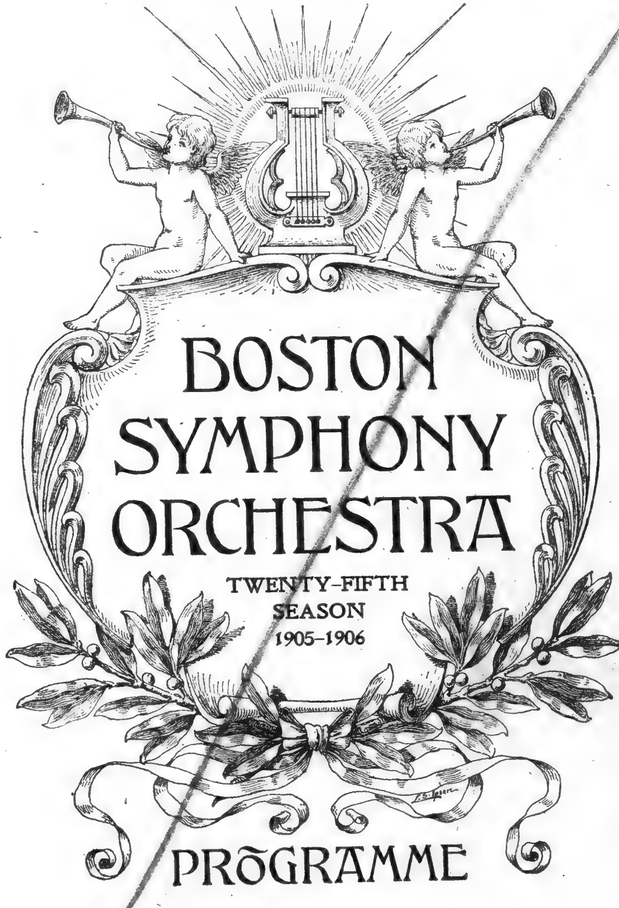
PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager. 1 F. R. COMEE, Asst. Manager.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

CITY HALL . . . . . PORTLAND

Wednesday Evening, November 22, at 8.15 precisely.



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

TWENTY-FIFTH SEASON
1905–1906

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager. 1 F. R. COMEE, Asst. Manager.

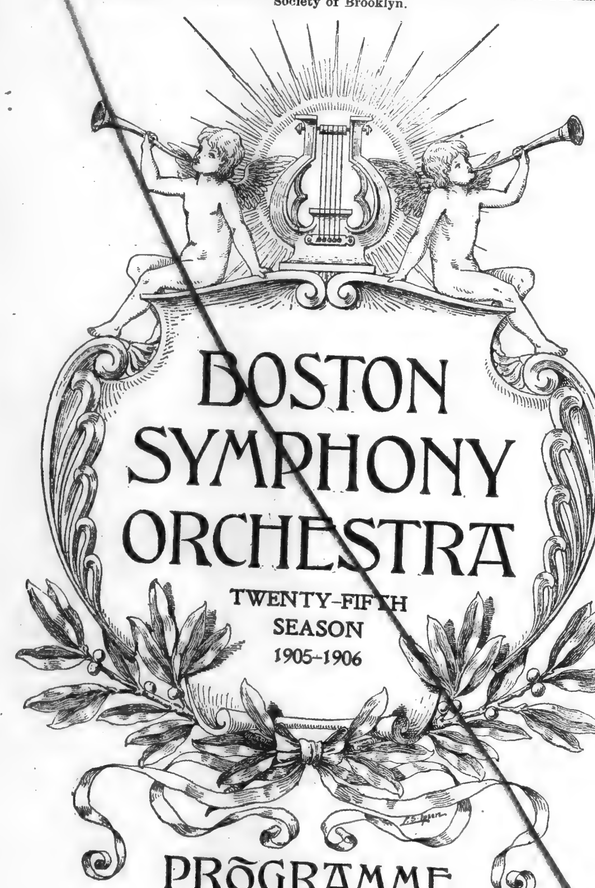
[23]

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

BAPTIST TEMPLE . . . BROOKLYN

Friday Evening, November 10, at 8.15 precisely

Under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences and the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn.



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

TWENTY-FIFTH SEASON 1905-1906

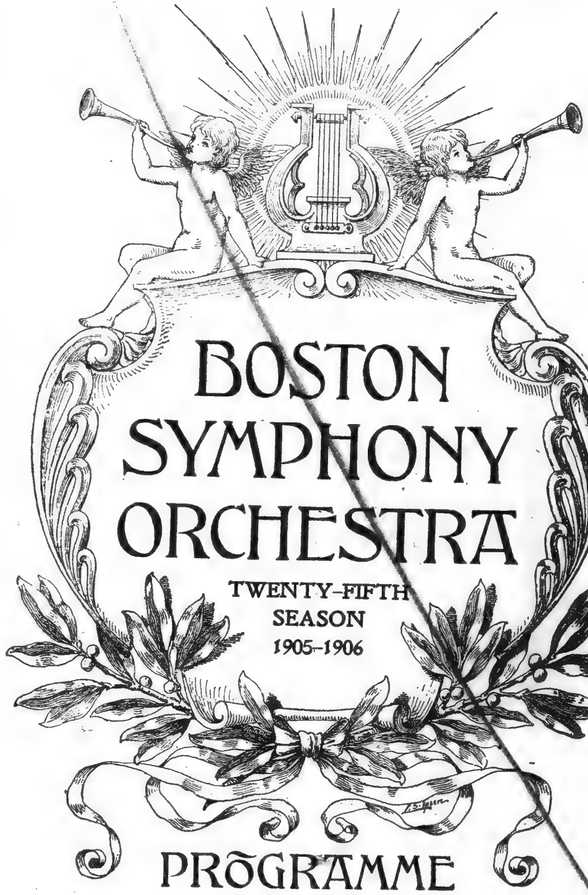
PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager. 1 F. R. COMEE, Asst. Manager.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

COLLINGWOOD OPERA HOUSE . . POUGHKEEPSIE

Monday Evening, November 13, at 8.15 precisely.



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

TWENTY-FIFTH SEASON 1905-1906

PROGRAMME

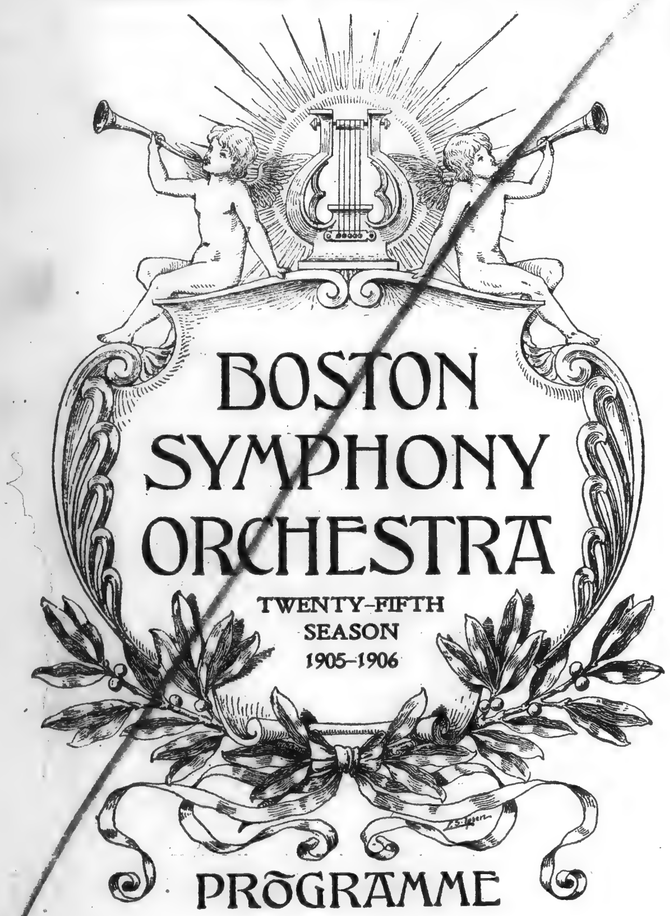
C. A. ELLIS, Manager. * F. R. COMEE, Asst. Manager.

[224]

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

THE LYRIC . . . . . BALTIMORE

Wednesday Evening, November 8, at 8.15 precisely.



C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Asst. Manager.

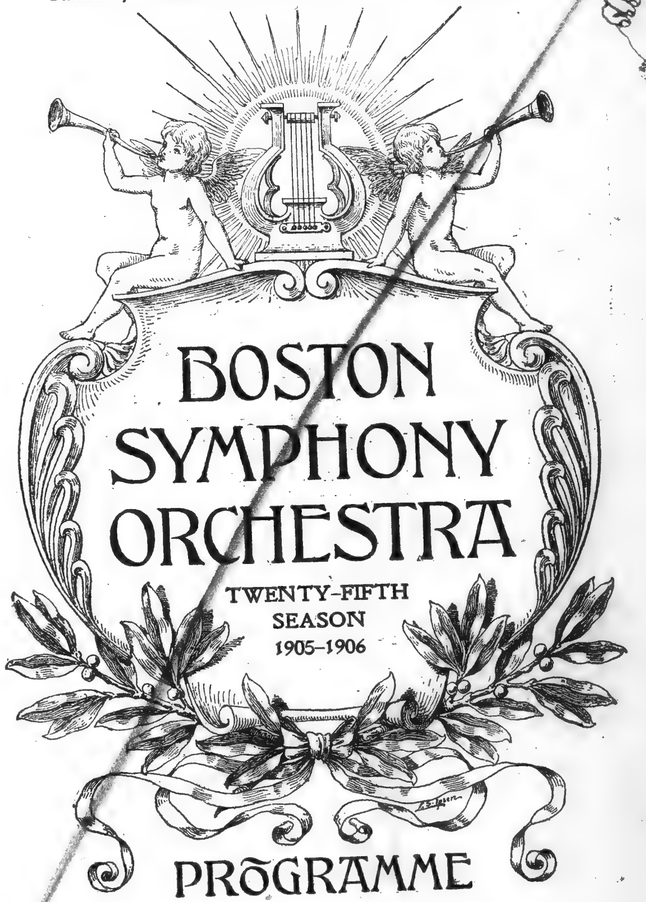
1

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Albaugh's, 109 North Charles Street

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

CARNEGIE HALL . . . . NEW YORK

Thursday Evening, November 9, at 8.15 precisely.
Saturday Afternoon, November 11, at 2.30 precisely.



C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

1

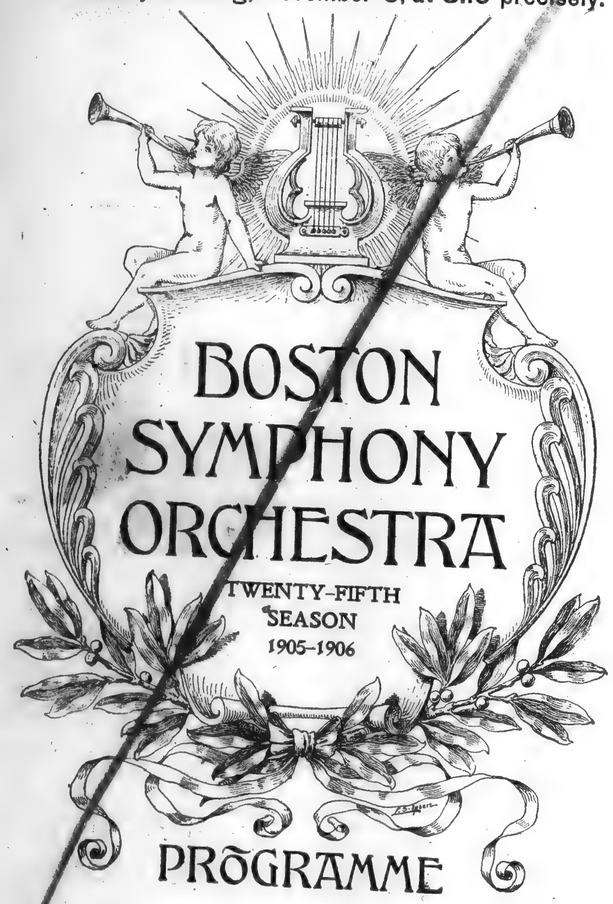
F. R. COMEE, Asst. Manager.

Tickets at Carnegie Hall, Tyson's, and Luckhardt & Belder's, 10 East 17th Street.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

ACADEMY OF MUSIC . . PHILADELPHIA

Monday Evening, November 6, at 8.15 precisely.



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

TWENTY-FIFTH SEASON
1905–1906

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Asst. Manager.

1

Tickets on sale at
The Heppe Piano Rooms,
1115 Chestnut Street.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

NEW NATIONAL THEATRE . WASHINGTON

Tuesday Afternoon, November 7, at 4.30 precisely.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

TWENTY-FIFTH SEASON
1905–1906

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

1

F. R. COMEE, Asst. Manager.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1905-06

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

I. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 26 AT 7.45 P.M.

Programme.

GOLDMARK. CONCERT OVERTURE, in A major, op. 36, "In the Spring."

SAINT-SAËNS. CONCERTO for VIOLIN, No. 3, in B minor, op. 61.
I. Allegro non troppo.
II. Andantino quasi Allegretto.
III. Molto moderato e maestoso.— Allegro non troppo.

DVOŘÁK. SYMPHONIC POEM, "The Wood Dove." (after Erben's like-named Ballad), op. 110.

BEETHOVEN. SYMPHONY No. 2, in D major, op. 36.
I. Adagio molto. — Allegro con brio.
II. Larghetto.
III. Scherzo: Allegro.—Trio.
IV. Allegro molto.

Soloist:

Miss OLIVE MEAD.

Second Concert Wednesday Evening, November 29.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

INFANTRY HALL . . . PROVIDENCE

Thursday Evening, November 2, at 8.15.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

TWENTY-FIFTH SEASON 1905-1906

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager. 1 F. R. COMEE, Asst. Manager.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1905-06

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

I. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 26 AT 7.45 P.M.

Programme.

GOLDMARK. CONCERT OVERTURE, in A major, op. 36, "In the Spring."

SAINT-SAËNS. CONCERTO for VIOLIN, No. 3, in B minor, op. 61.
I. Allegro non troppo.
II. Andantino quasi Allegretto.
III. Molto moderato e maestoso.— Allegro non troppo.

DVORAK. SYMPHONIC POEM, "The Wood Dove." (after Erben's like-named Ballad), op. 110.

BEETHOVEN. SYMPHONY No. 2, in D major, op. 36.
I. Adagio molto. — Allegro con brio.
II. Larghetto.
III. Scherzo: Allegro.—Trio.
IV. Allegro molto.

Soloist:

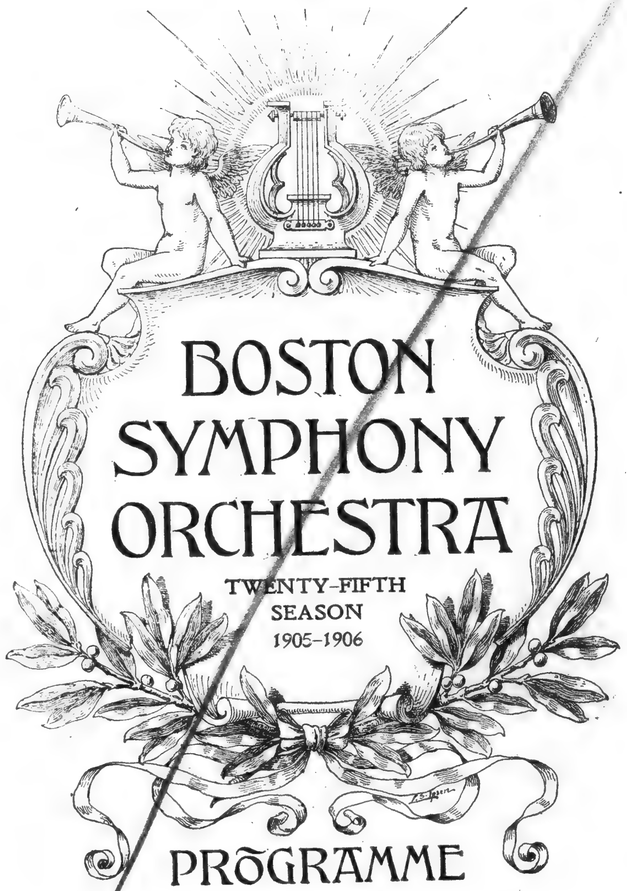
Miss OLIVE MEAD.

Second Concert Wednesday Evening, November 29.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

INFANTRY HALL . . . PROVIDENCE

Thursday Evening, November 2, at 8.15.



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

TWENTY-FIFTH SEASON
1905-1906

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

1

F. R. COMEE, Asst. Manager.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

GRAYS' ARMORY . . . . CLEVELAND

Friday Evening, October 6, 1905, at 8.15.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

TWENTY-FIFTH SEASON
1905–1906

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Asst. Manager

Seats on sale at
The Burrows Brothers Co.,
133 Euclid Avenue.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

THE BAKER THEATRE . . ROCHESTER

Saturday Evening, October 7, 1905, at 8.15.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

TWENTY-FIFTH SEASON
1905–1906

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Asst. Manager

Seats on sale at the Baker Theatre.

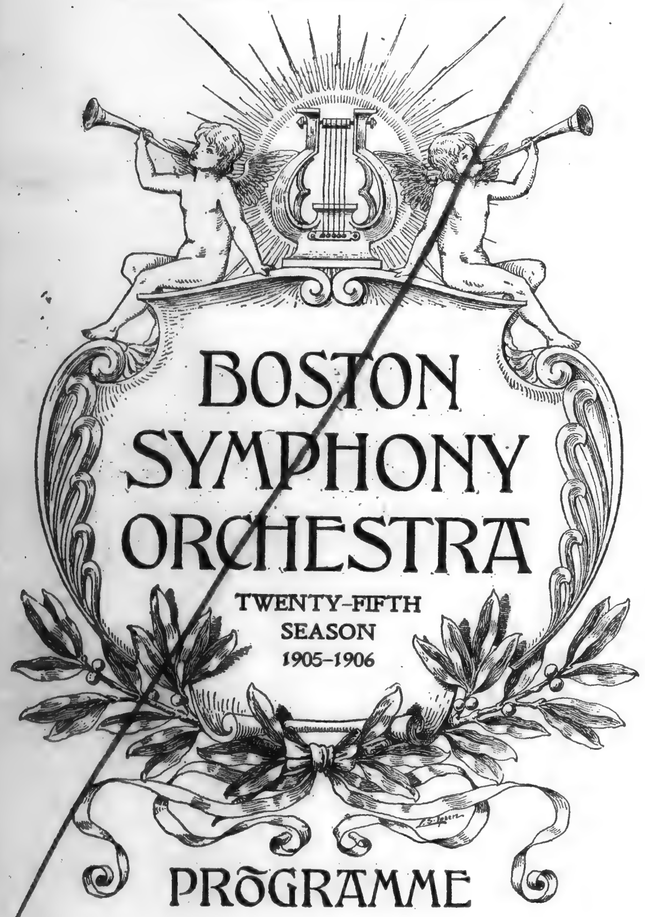
- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

CONVENTION HALL . . . BUFFALO

Wednesday Evening, October 4, 1905, at 8.15.



C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Asst. Manager

1

Seats on sale at
Denton, Cottier & Daniels.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

SEASON 1905-1906.

THE DETROIT ORCHESTRAL ASSOCIATION

President, FREDERICK KIMBALL STEARNS. Secretary, NEWTON J. COREY.
Vice-President, WILLIAM H. MURPHY. Treasurer, RALPH M. DYAR.
Advisory Board, Mrs. S. Olin Johnson, Mrs. Henry B. Joy, Miss Francis B. Sibley, Edwin S. Barbour, Alpheus W. Chittenden, John T. Nichols.

LIGHT GUARD ARMORY . . DETROIT

Thursday Evening, October 5, 1905, at 8.15.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Asst. Manager

*

Reserved seats, $2, $1.50, $1, 75c., 50c. Box seats, $2.50.
Seats on sale at the store of Wright, Kay & Co., beginning Monday, October 2.

A special sale for season tickets only, for the six concerts of the Association, at a reduction of about twenty per cent. in price, will take place at the same store on Saturday, September 30.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

VICTORIA RINK . . . . MONTREAL

Monday Evening, October 2, 1905, at 8.15.

Canadian Tour under the direction of Mr. STEWART HOUSTON.
Local Manager, Mr. F. A. VEITCH.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Asst. Manager

Seats now on sale at Nordheimer's and Archambault's
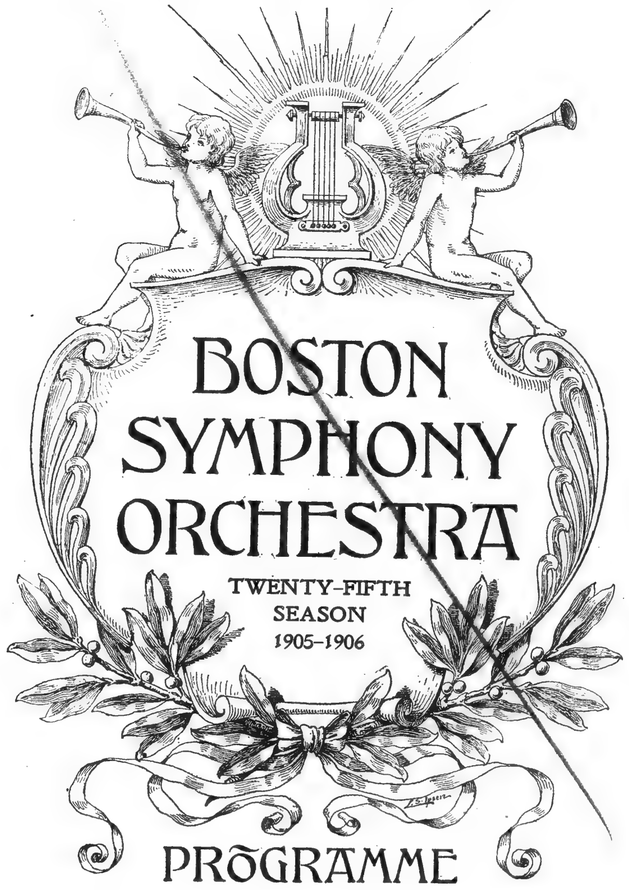
Music Stores.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

MASSEY MUSIC HALL . . . . TORONTO

Tuesday Evening, October 3, 1905, at 8.15.



C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Asst. Manager

Reserved seats, $1.50, $2, $2.50.
Admission, $1. Sale of seats begins Tuesday, September 26.

[230]

REDUCTION

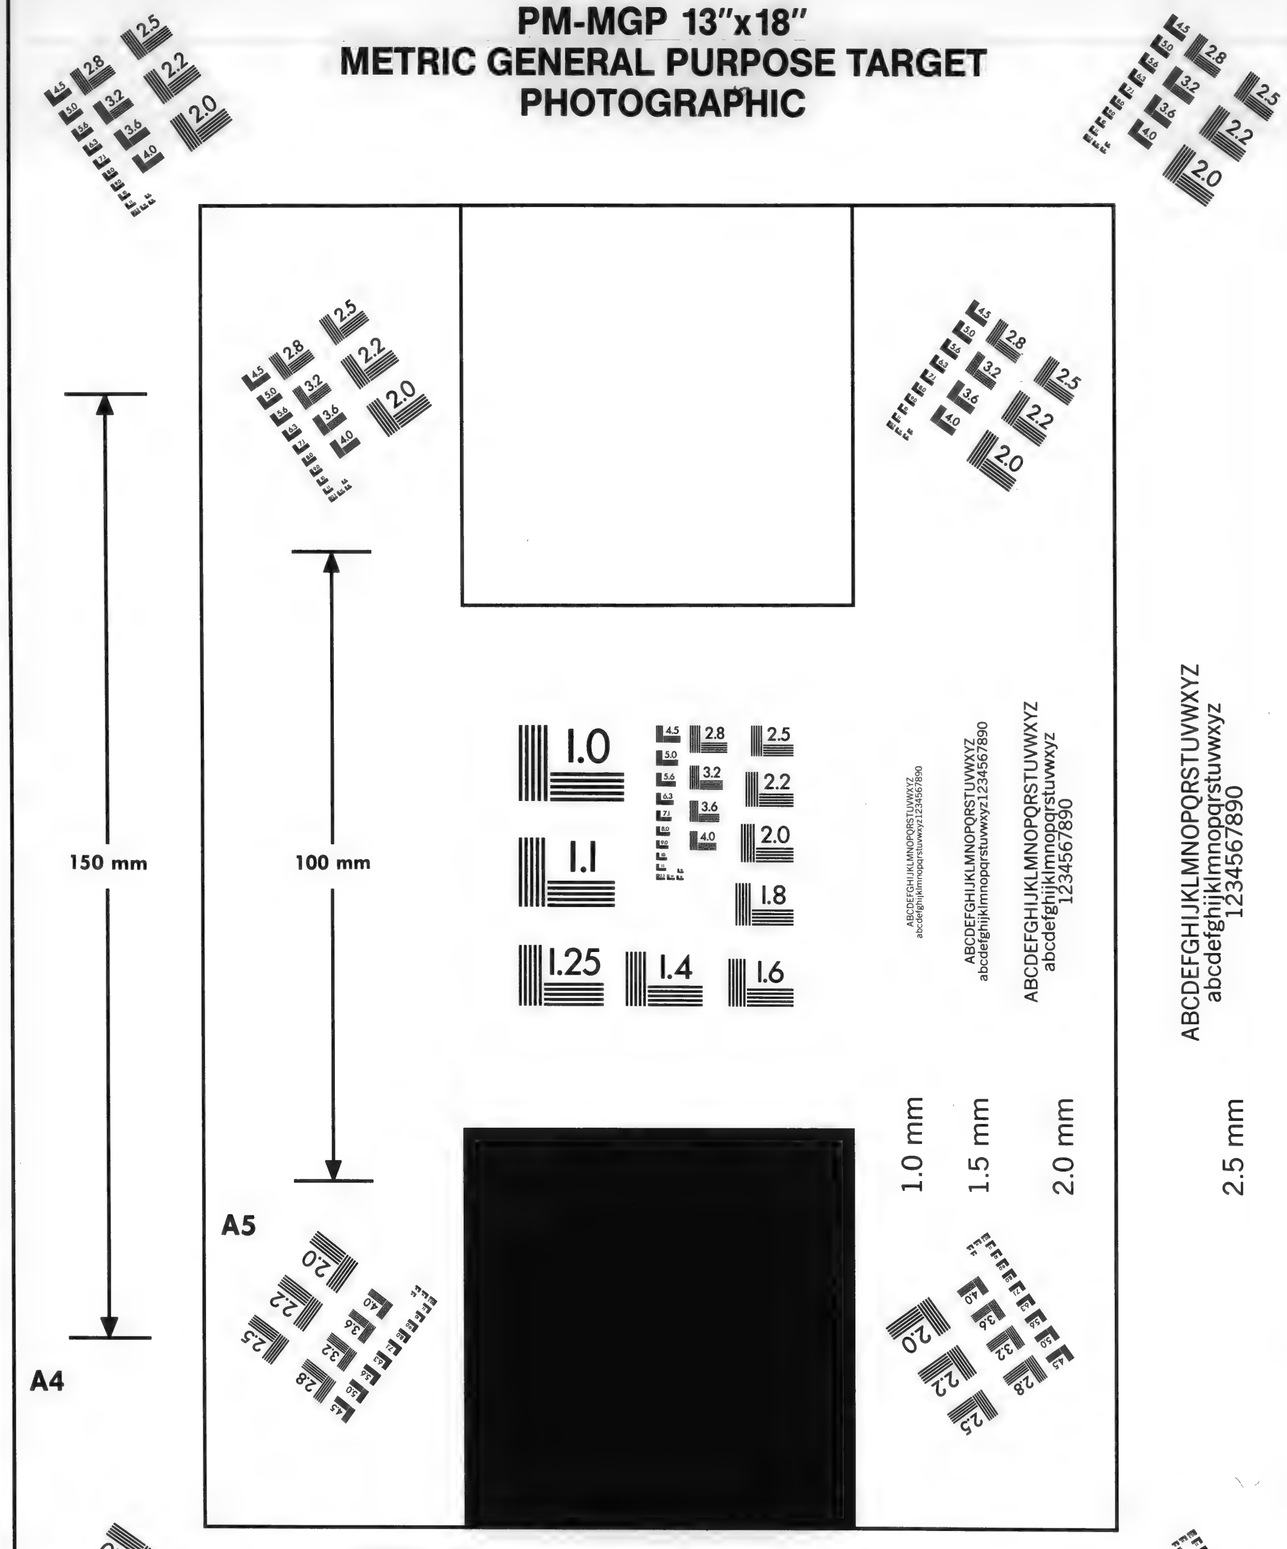
RATIO

12x

2.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
4.5 mm 1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
3.5 mm abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ

BLANK PAGE

BLANK PAGE

BLANK PAGE

Sanders Theatre Cambridge

The Boston Symphony Orchestra

WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor

Twenty-fifth Season
Nineteen Hundred Five and Six

C. A. ELLIS, Manager F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager

A PERMANENT ORCHESTRA, MAINTAINED SOLELY FOR CONCERT PERFORMANCES

SIX CONCERTS

Thursday Evenings at 7.45

OCTOBER 26
Wednesday evening, NOVEMBER 29
DECEMBER 28
FEBRUARY 1
MARCH 8
APRIL 19

SPECIAL ANNOUNCEMENT.

SEASON TICKETS for the six concerts, $5.00.

The sale will be conducted according to the plan in use last season.

Subscribers of last season may secure the same seats by filling out and mailing the enclosed blank, with check payable to C. W. Sever & Co., on or before October 18, 1905. On receipt of check, tickets will be mailed.

The unclaimed seats will be offered for sale in the usual manner at Sever's University Bookstore, Harvard Square, Cambridge, on Saturday morning, October 21, 1905, at 8 o'clock.

A limited number of seats have been reserved for college officers and invited guests.

SOLO ARTISTS

Miss ALICE COLE

Miss OLIVE MEAD

Miss CLARA KLOBERG

Mme. OLGA SAMAROFF

Mr. MYRON W. WHITNEY, Jr.

Mr. GEORGE PROCTOR

And others to be announced

The novelties to be played will be chosen from the following list.

ELGAR	Overture, "In the South"
ELGAR	{ Chanson de Nuit Chanson de Matin
GLAZOUNOW	"Le Kremlin," Symphonic Poem
CESAR FRANCK	"Psyche"
GUSTAV MAHLER	Symphony No. 5.
ERNST BOEHE	"Odysseus Ausfahrt und Schiffbruck," Symphonic Poem
BUSONI	"Lustspiel" Overture
BUSONI	"Geharnischte" Suite
WEBBER	Symphony in E major
CONVERSE	Ballade

Sanders Theatre Cambridge

The Boston Symphony Orchestra

WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor

Twenty-fifth Season
Nineteen Hundred Five and Six

C. A. ELLIS, Manager F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager

[het]

The novelties will be chosen from the following list.

Ernst Boehe	"Odysseus Ausfahrt und Schiffbruck," Symphonic Poem
Busoni	"Lustspiel" Overture
Busoni	"Geharnischte" Suite
Converse	Ballade
Dvorak	Symphonic Poem, "Die Waldtaube"
Elgar	Overture, "In the South"
Elgar	{ Chanson de Nuit { Chanson de Matin
Cesar Franck	"Psyche"
Glazounow	"Le Kremlin," Symphonic Poem
Eugene d'Harcourt	Overture, "Le Tasse"

Location of seats last season, ...

.....

.....

Cambridge, October 14, 1905.

I hereby subscribe for ..... season tickets for the series of six Thursday Evening Concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Sanders Theatre.

.....

Infantry Hall Providence

The Boston Symphony Orchestra

WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor

Twenty-fifth Season, 1905-1906
Ninety-ninth, one hundredth, and one hundred and first concerts in Providence

C. A. ELLIS, Manager F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager

A PERMANENT ORCHESTRA, MAINTAINED SOLELY FOR CONCERT PERFORMANCES

PROVIDENCE, October 16, 1905.

I hereby subscribe for.....season tickets

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, whose concerts in past years have been so liberally patronized by the music-loving public of Providence, announces for the coming season three concerts, to be given in INFANTRY HALL on the evenings of

Thursday, November 2

Thursday, January 4

Thursday, March 1

The prices of seats for the series will be as follows:

FIRST FLOOR

Rows F to CC, inclusive . . .	$4.00
Rows A to E, inclusive . . .	3.00
Rows DD to NN, inclusive . . .	3.00

BALCONY

First two rows	$4.00
Last row	3.00

The Assisting Solo Artists will be

Mme. ANTOINETTE SZUMOWSKA

Mr. KARL BARLEBEN

Mr. DAVID BISPHAM

SPECIAL ANNOUNCEMENT.

Season ticket holders of last season will be allowed to retain the same seats, payment for the same to be made on or before Saturday, October 21, by cash, check, or money order, made payable to C. A. Ellis, to whom all renewals of seats should be sent, at Symphony Hall, Boston.

The general sale of season tickets will open on Monday morning, October 23, at Steinert's Music Store, Westminster Street.

The sale of single seats for the first concert, on Thursday evening, November 2, will open at Steinert's Music Store on Monday morning, October 30. The prices will be corresponding to the division of the hall made for the season tickets.

PROVIDENCE, October 16, 1905.

I hereby subscribe for.....season tickets

The novelties will be chosen from the following list.

ERNST BOEHE	"Odysseus Ausfahrt und Schiffbruck," Symphonic Poem
BUSONI	"Lustspiel" Overture
BUSONI	"Geharnischte" Suite
CONVERSE	Ballade
DVORAK	Symphonic Poem, "Die Waldtaube"
ELGAR	Overture, "In the South"
ELGAR	Chanson de Nuit Chanson de Matin
CESAR FRANCK	"Psyche"
GLAZOUNOW	"Le Kremlin," Symphonic Poem
EUGENE D'HARCOURT	Overture, "Le Tasse"

I hereby subscribe for ..... season tickets

CAMBRIDGE, October 14, 1905.

Sanders Theatre Cambridge

The Boston Symphony

Sanders Theatre Cambridge

The Boston Symphony

Providence, October 16, 1905.

I hereby subscribe for.....season tickets for the series of three Thursday Evening Concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Infantry Hall.

.....

.....

Location of seats last season,.....

.....

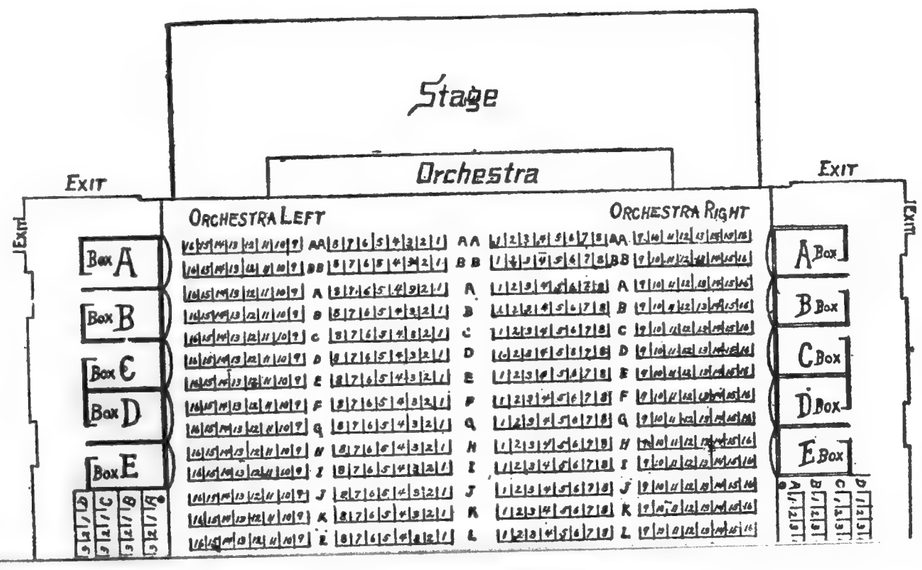
THE LYRIC, BALTIMORE

The Boston Symphony

BALTIMORE, October 2, 1905.

I hereby subscribe for.....season tickets

THE LYRIC, BALTIMORE.



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
FOUNDED EIGHTEEN HUNDRED AND EIGHTY-ONE
WILHELM GERICKE, CONDUCTOR

SYMPHONY HALL, BOSTON.

DEAR SIR:

As a subscriber to the concerts of the BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA at The Lyric last season, we should be pleased to reserve the same seats for you before the public subscription is opened.

Should you desire to renew your subscription, please sign and mail enclosed order before October 21, indicating the location of seats.

Yours respectfully,

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
FOUNDED EIGHTEEN HUNDRED AND EIGHTY-ONE
WILHELM GERICKE, CONDUCTOR

SYMPHONY HALL, BOSTON.

DEAR MADAM:

As a subscriber to the concerts of the BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA at The Lyric last season, we should be pleased to reserve the same seats for you before the public subscription is opened.

Should you desire to renew your subscription, please sign and mail enclosed order before October 21, indicating the location of seats.

Yours respectfully,

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.

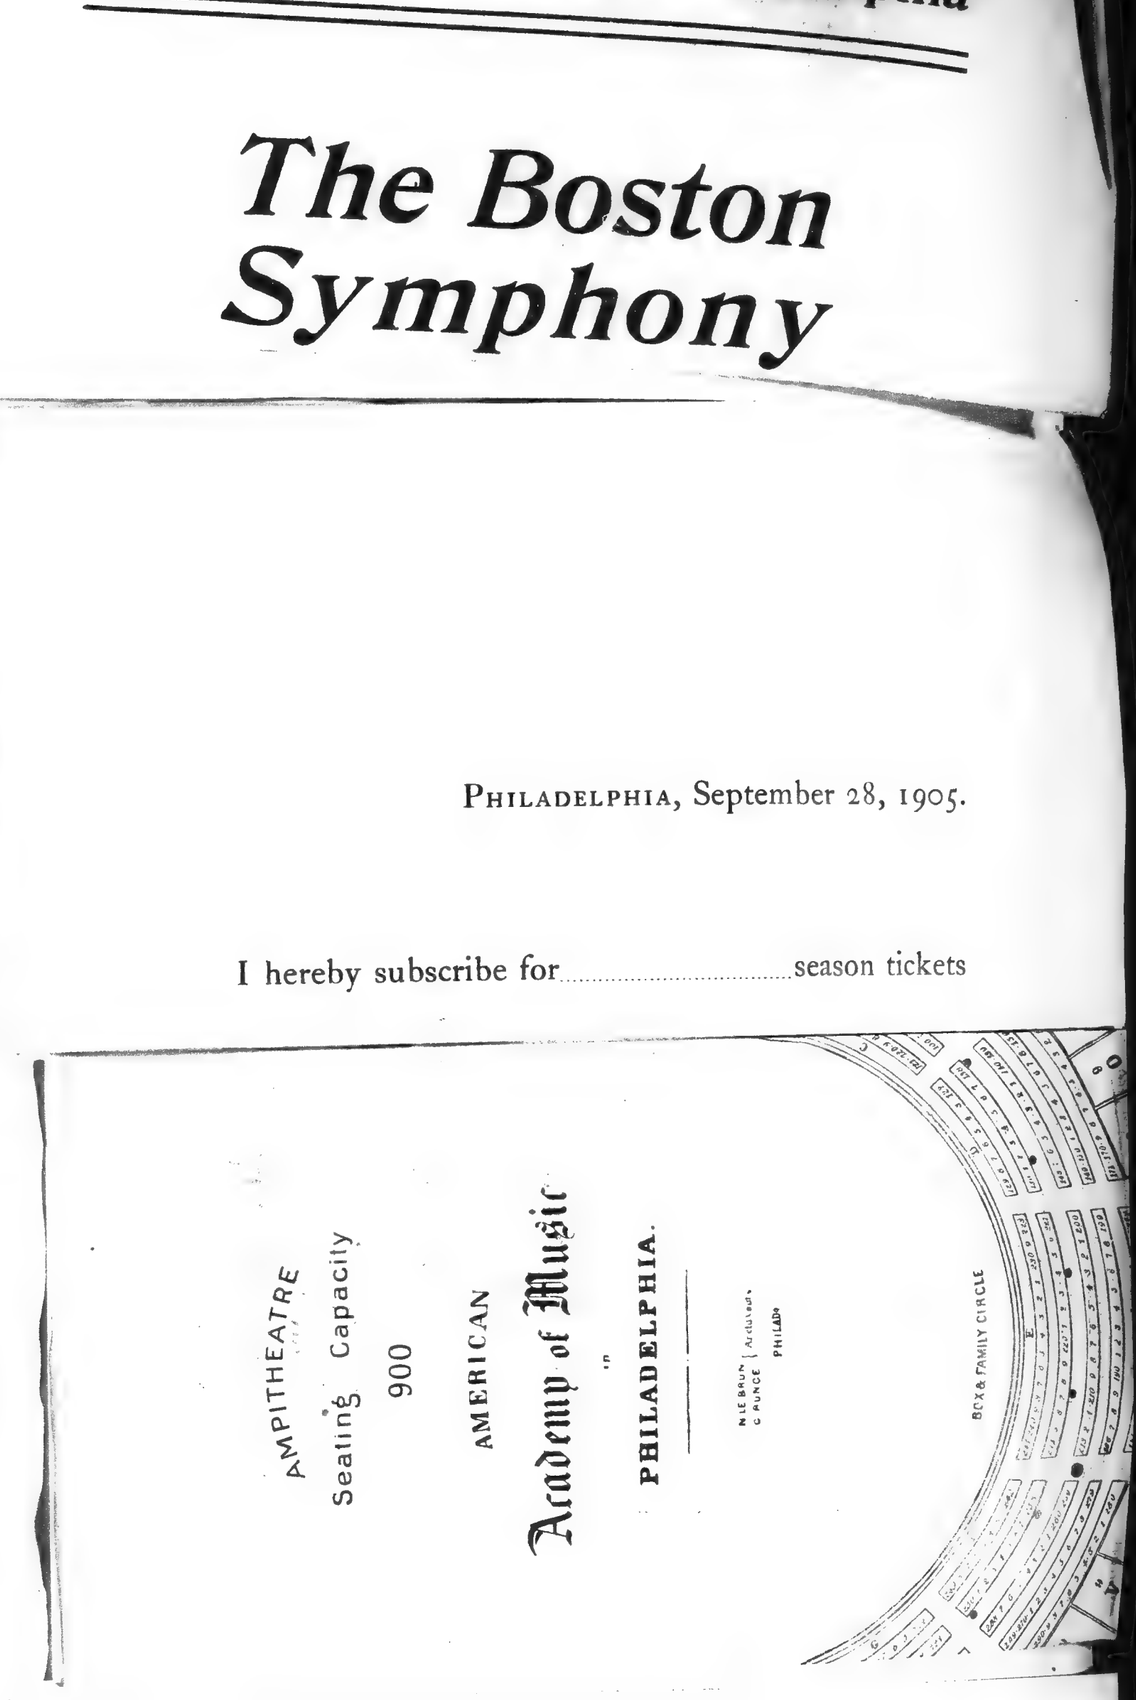
Academy of Music, Philadelphia

The Boston Symphony

PHILADELPHIA, September 28, 1905.

I hereby subscribe for.....season tickets



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
FOUNDED EIGHTEEN HUNDRED AND EIGHTY-ONE
WILHELM GERICKE, CONDUCTOR

SYMPHONY HALL, BOSTON.

DEAR MADAM:

As a subscriber to the Monday evening series of concerts of the BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA at the Academy of Music last season, we should be pleased to reserve the same seats for you before the public subscription is opened.

Should you desire to renew your subscription, please sign and mail enclosed order before October 11, indicating the location of seats.

Yours respectfully,

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
FOUNDED EIGHTEEN HUNDRED AND EIGHTY-ONE
WILHELM GERICKE, CONDUCTOR

SYMPHONY HALL, BOSTON.

DEAR SIR:

As a subscriber to the Monday evening series of concerts of the BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA at the Academy of Music last season, we should be pleased to reserve the same seats for you before the public subscription is opened.

Should you desire to renew your subscription, please sign and mail enclosed order before October 11, indicating the location of seats.

Yours respectfully,

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.

2357

THE LYRIC, BALTIMORE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra

NINETY-SIX PERFORMERS

WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor

Twenty-fifth Season
Nineteen Hundred Five and Six

C. A. ELLIS, Manager F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager

A PERMANENT ORCHESTRA, MAINTAINED SOLELY FOR CONCERT PERFORMANCES

Academy of Music, Philadelphia

The Boston Symphony Orchestra

NINETY-SIX PERFORMERS

WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor

Twenty-fifth Season
Nineteen Hundred Five and Six

C. A. ELLIS, Manager F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager

A PERMANENT ORCHESTRA, MAINTAINED SOLELY FOR CONCERT PERFORMANCES

FIVE CONCERTS

WEDNESDAY EVENINGS AT 8.15 O'CLOCK

NOVEMBER 8

DECEMBER 6

JANUARY 10

FEBRUARY 14

MARCH 14

Boxes seating six, $60 each, for the series of five concerts.

Season tickets, with reserved seats for the series of five concerts, $7 and $5, according to location.

The sale of tickets will open Monday morning, October 23, at Albaugh's, 109 North Charles Street.

Programme books, with descriptive notes on the works to be performed, will be mailed in advance of each concert to purchasers of season tickets.

By special invitation the eminent French composer

M. VINCENT D'INDY

will conduct the concert of December 6

SOLO ARTISTS

Mme. GADSKI

Mr. ELLISON VAN HOOSE

Miss MARIE HALL

Mr. ALFRED REISENAUER

Mr. HENRI MARTEAU

The novelties to be played will be chosen from the following list.

ELGAR	Overture, "In the South"
ELGAR	{ Chanson de Nuit { Chanson de Matin
GLAZOUNOW	"Le Kremlin," Symphonic Poem
CESAR FRANCK	"Psyche"
GUSTAV MAHLER	Symphony No. 5.
ERNST BOEHE	"Odysseus Ausfahrt und Schiffbruck," Symphonic Poem
BUSONI	"Lustspiel" Overture
BUSONI	"Geharnischte" Suite
WEBBER	Symphony in E major
CONVERSE	Ballade

FIVE CONCERTS

MONDAY EVENINGS AT 8.15

NOVEMBER 6

DECEMBER 4

JANUARY 8

FEBRUARY 12

MARCH 12

Proscenium boxes seating eight, and boxes seating six and four, will be sold at $75, $63, and $42, respectively, for the series of five concerts.

Season tickets, with reserved seats for the series of five concerts, $7, $5, and $3.50, according to location.

The public sale of season tickets will open Monday morning, October 16, at the Heppe Piano Rooms, 1115 Chestnut Street.

Programme books, with descriptive notes on the works to be performed, will be mailed in advance of each concert to purchasers of season tickets.

By special invitation the eminent French composer

M. VINCENT D'INDY

will conduct the concert of December 4

SOLO ARTISTS

Mme. GADSKI

Mr. ELLISON VAN HOOSE

Miss ELSA RUEGGER

Mr. HENRI MARTEAU

Mr. T. ADAMOWSKI

SPECIAL ANNOUNCEMENT

Season ticket holders of the first series last season will be allowed to retain the same seats, payment for the same to be made on or before Wednesday, October 11, and season ticket holders of the second series last season will be given the next choice, payment for the same to be made on or before Saturday, October 14, by cash, money order, or check, made payable to Miss H. HARRIS, to whom all renewals of seats should be sent, at 1115 Chestnut Street.

The novelties to be played will be chosen from the following list.

ELGAR	Overture, "In the South"
ELGAR	{ Chanson de Nuit { Chanson de Matin
GLAZOUNOW	"Le Kremlin," Symphonic Poem
CESAR FRANCK	"Psyche"
GUSTAV MAHLER	Symphony No. 5.
ERNST BOEHE	"Odysseus Ausfahrt und Schiffbruck," Symphonic Poem
BUSONI	"Lustspiel" Overture
BUSONI	"Geharnischte" Suite
WEBBER	Symphony in E major
CONVERSE	Ballad

Symphony

The Boston

BALTIMORE

THE LYRIC,

BALTIMORE, October 2, 1905.

I hereby subscribe for.....season tickets for the series of five Wednesday Evening Concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at The Lyric.

.....

.....

Location of seats last season.....

.....

PHILADELPHIA, September 28, 1905.

I hereby subscribe for.....season tickets for the five Monday Evening Concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music.

.....

.....

Location of seats last season.....

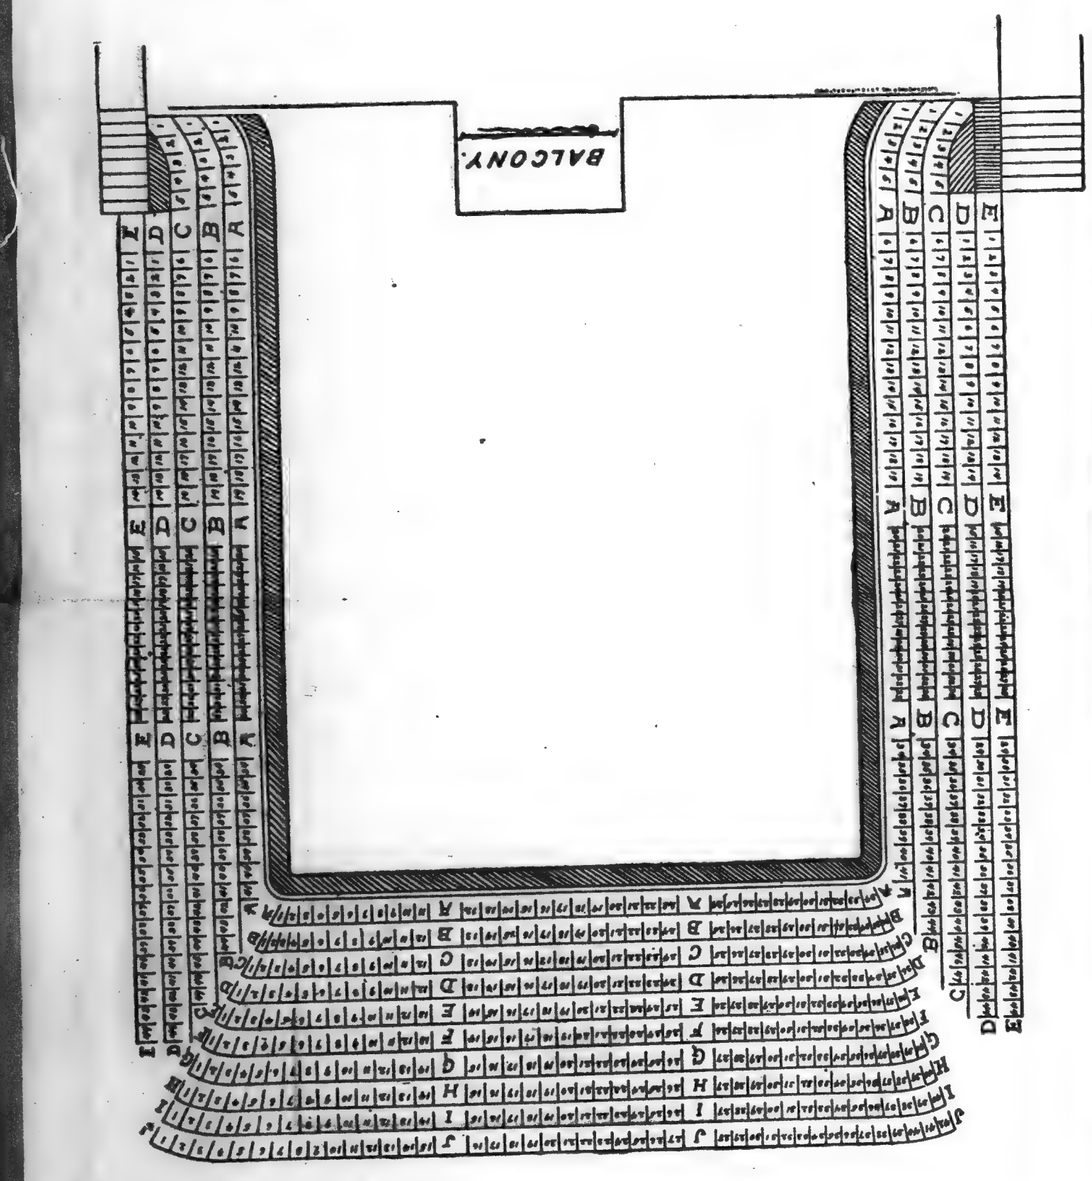
.....

THE LYRIC, BALTIMORE

The Boston Symphony

BALTIMORE, October 2, 1905.

I hereby subscribe for.....season tickets



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
FOUNDED EIGHTEEN HUNDRED AND EIGHTY-ONE
WILHELM GERICKE, CONDUCTOR

SYMPHONY HALL, BOSTON.

DEAR MADAM:

As a subscriber to the concerts of the BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA at The Lyric last season, we should be pleased to reserve the same seats for you before the public subscription is opened.

Should you desire to renew your subscription, please sign and mail enclosed order before October 21, indicating the location of seats.

Yours respectfully,

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.

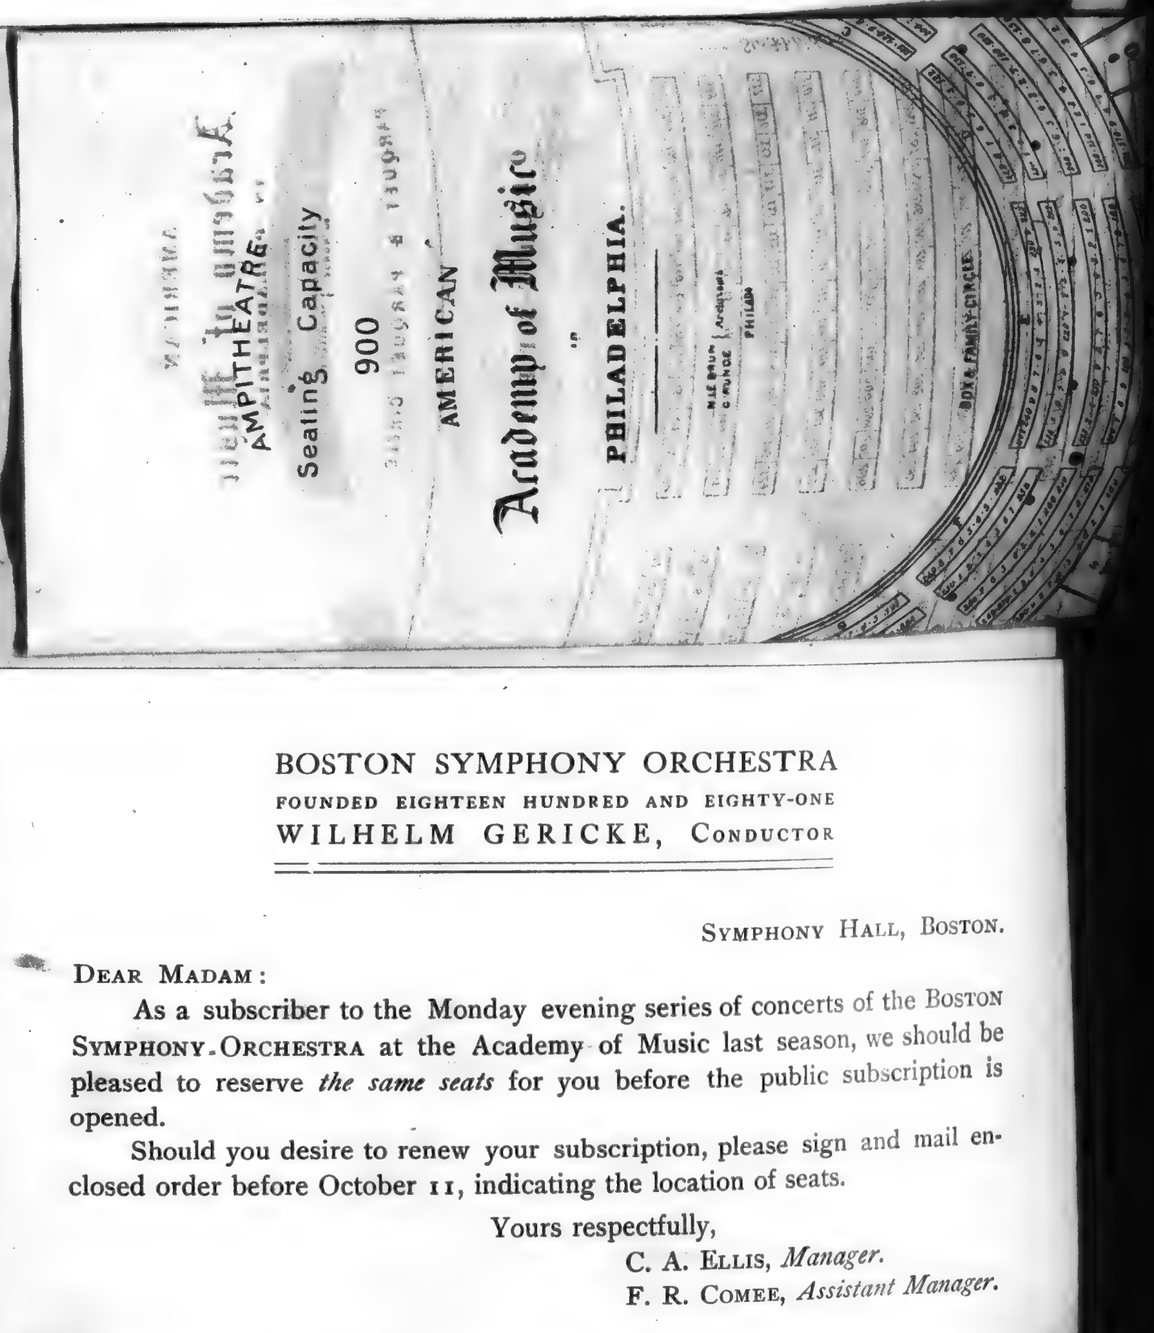
Academy of Music, Philadelphia

The Boston Symphony

PHILADELPHIA, September 28, 1905.

I hereby subscribe for.....season tickets



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
FOUNDED EIGHTEEN HUNDRED AND EIGHTY-ONE
WILHELM GERICKE, CONDUCTOR

SYMPHONY HALL, BOSTON.

DEAR SIR:

As a subscriber to the Monday evening series of concerts of the BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA at the Academy of Music last season, we should be pleased to reserve the same seats for you before the public subscription is opened.

Should you desire to renew your subscription, please sign and mail enclosed order before October 11, indicating the location of seats.

Yours respectfully,

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.

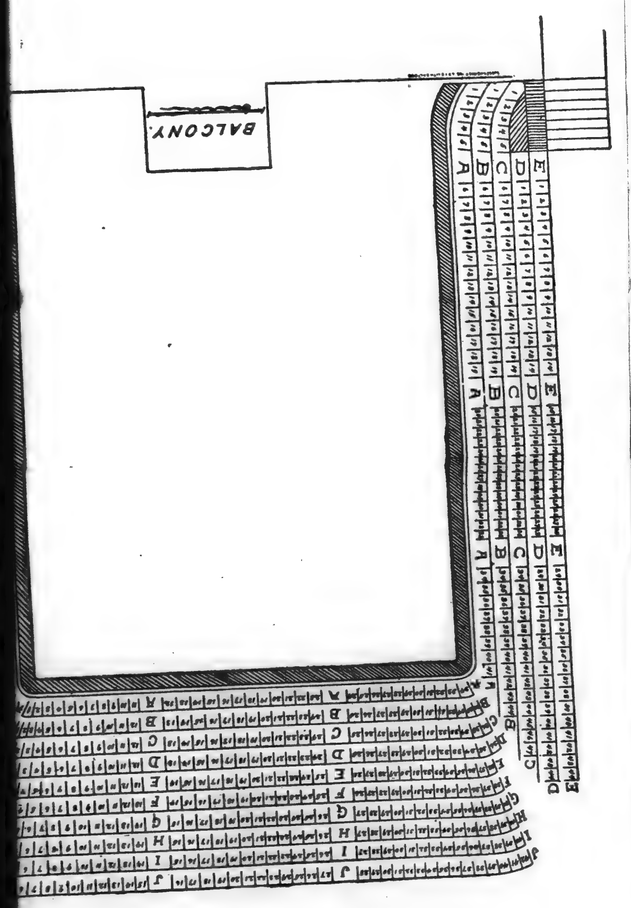
...YRIC, BALTIMORE

...he Boston ...ymphony

BALTIMORE, October 2, 1905.

...y subscribe for.....season tickets



...OSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
...OUNDED EIGHTEEN HUNDRED AND EIGHTY-ONE
...VILHELM GERICKE, CONDUCTOR

SYMPHONY HALL, BOSTON.

...ber to the concerts of the BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA ...st season, we should be pleased to reserve the same seats for ...blic subscription is opened.

...desire to renew your subscription, please sign and mail en... ...re October 21, indicating the location of seats.

Yours respectfully,

Academy of Music, Philadelphia

The Boston Symphony

PHILADELPHIA, September 28, 1905.

I hereby subscribe for.....season tickets opened.

Should you desire to renew your subscription, please sign and mail enclosed order before October 11, indicating the location of seats.

Yours respectfully,

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

E. R. COMB, Assistant Manager.

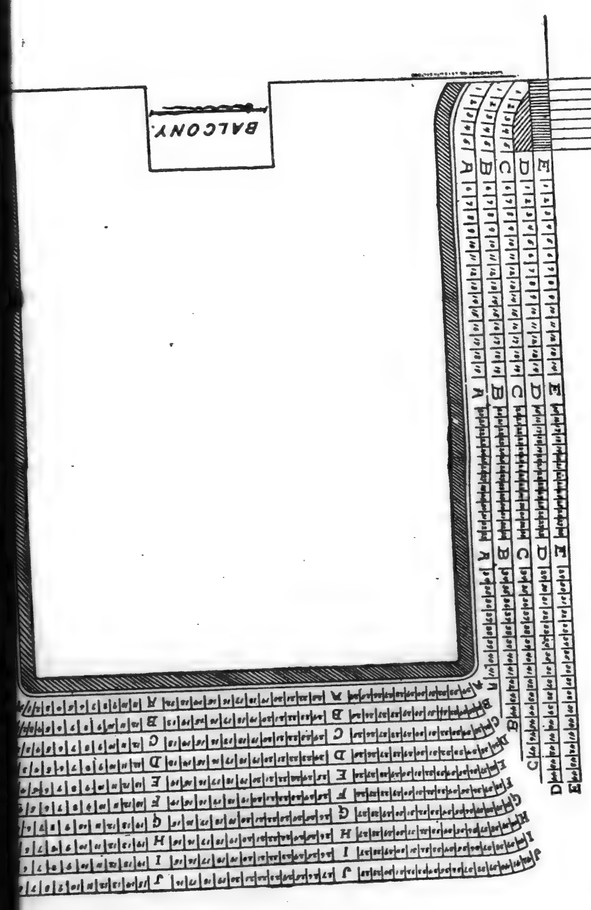
LYRIC, BALTIMORE

The Boston Symphony

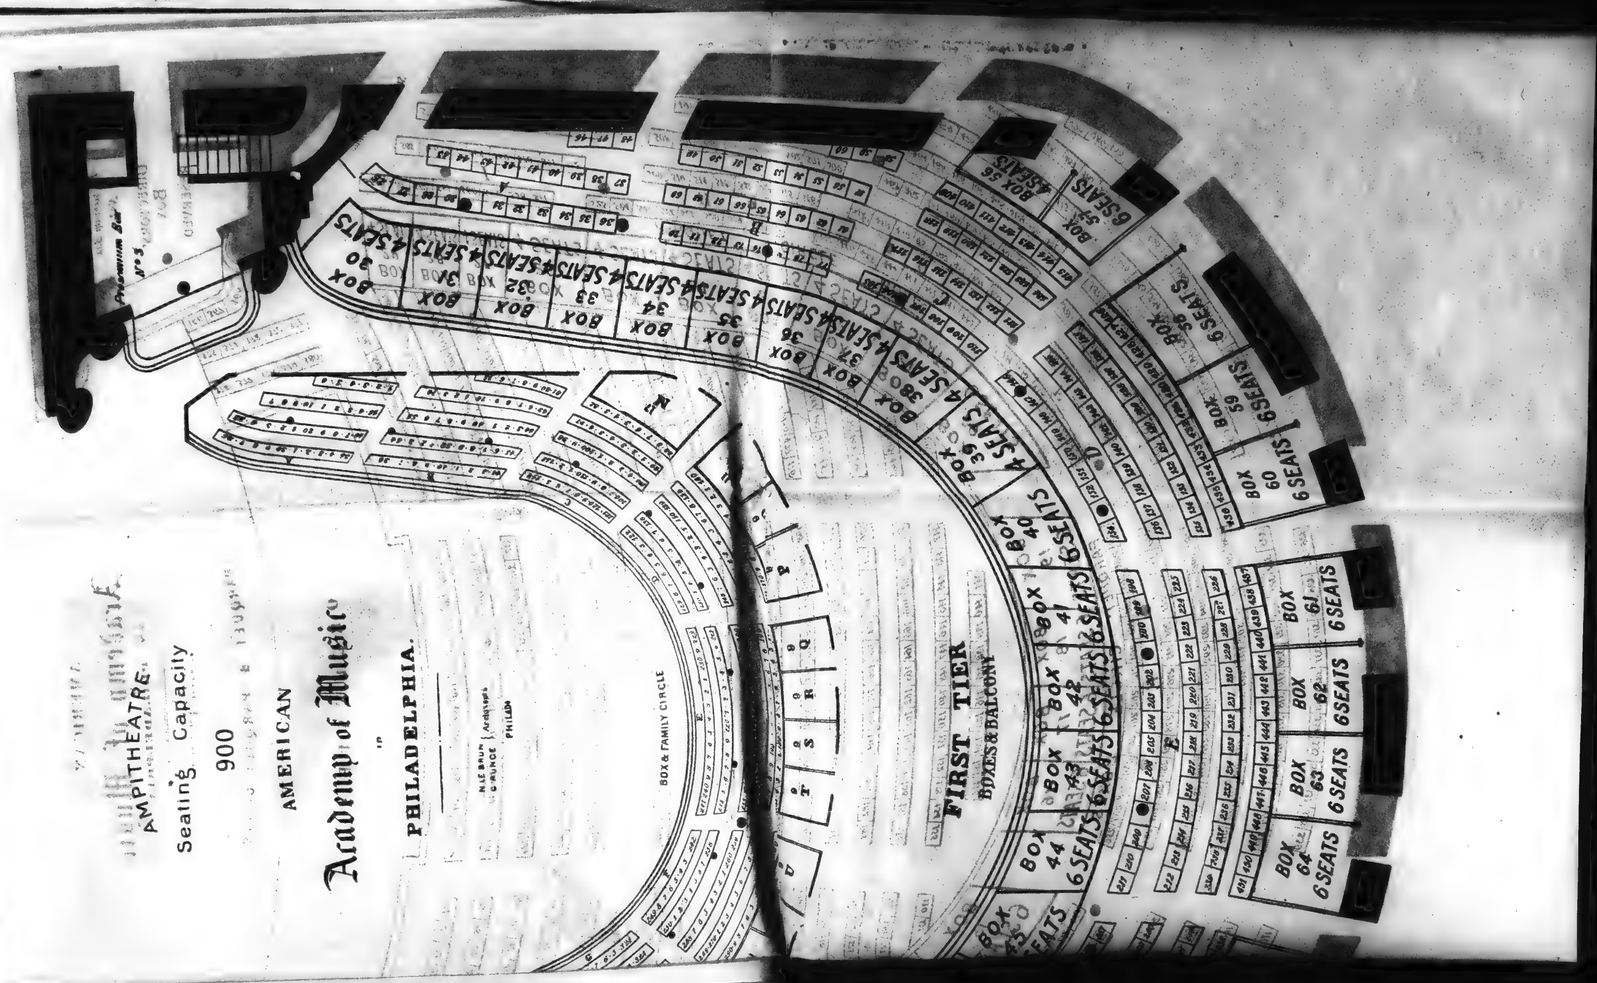
BALTIMORE, October 2, 1905.

by subscribe for.....season tickets



Academy of Music, Philadelphia

The Boston Symphony



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
FOUNDED EIGHTEEN HUNDRED AND EIGHTY-ONE
WILHELM GERICKE, CONDUCTOR

SYMPHONY HALL, BOSTON.

DEAR MADAM:

As a subscriber to the Monday evening series of concerts of the BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA at the Academy of Music last season, we should be pleased to reserve the same seats for you before the public subscription is opened.

Should you desire to renew your subscription, please sign and mail enclosed order before October 11, indicating the location of seats.

Yours respectfully,

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.

OSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
OUNDED EIGHTEEN HUNDRED AND EIGHTY-ONE
VILHELM GERICKE, CONDUCTOR

SYMPHONY HALL, BOSTON.

ber to the concerts of the BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA t season, we should be pleased to reserve the same seats for blic subscription is opened.
desire to renew your subscription, please sign and mail en-re October 21, indicating the location of seats.

Yours respectfully,

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
FOUNDED EIGHTEEN HUNDRED AND EIGHTY-ONE
WILHELM GERICKE, CONDUCTOR

SYMPHONY HALL, BOSTON.

DEAR SIR:

As a subscriber to the Monday evening series of concerts of the BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA at the Academy of Music last season, we should be pleased to reserve the same seats for you before the public subscription is opened.

Should you desire to renew your subscription, please sign and mail enclosed order before October 11, indicating the location of seats.

Yours respectfully,

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.

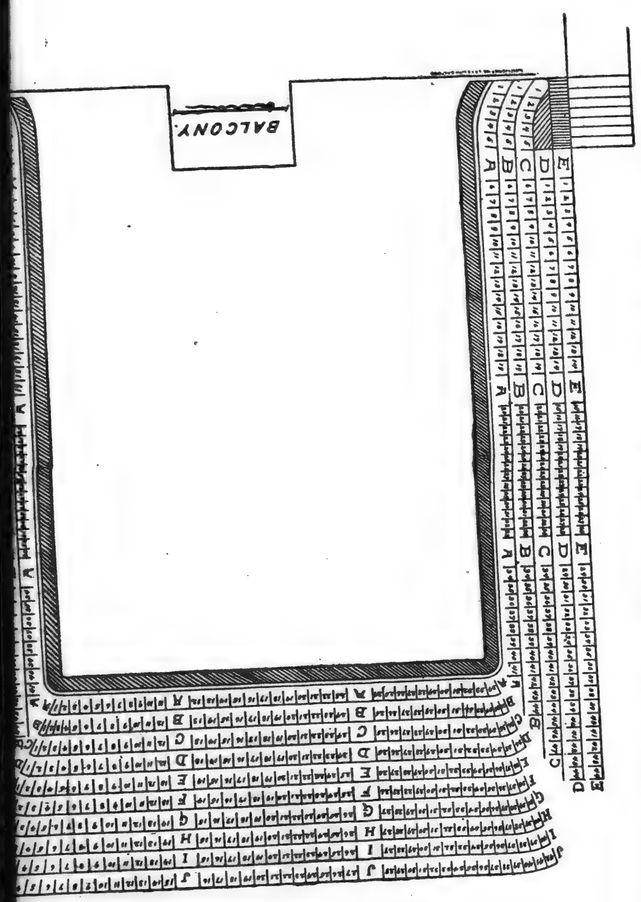
LYRIC, BALTIMORE

The Boston Symphony

Baltimore, October 2, 1905.

reby subscribe for.....season tickets



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

FOUNDED EIGHTEEN HUNDRED AND EIGHTY-ONE

WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor

Symphony Hall, Boston.

M

bscriber to the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra t last season, we should be pleased to reserve the same seats for e public subscription is opened.

ou desire to renew your subscription, please sign and mail en-efore October 21, indicating the location of seats.

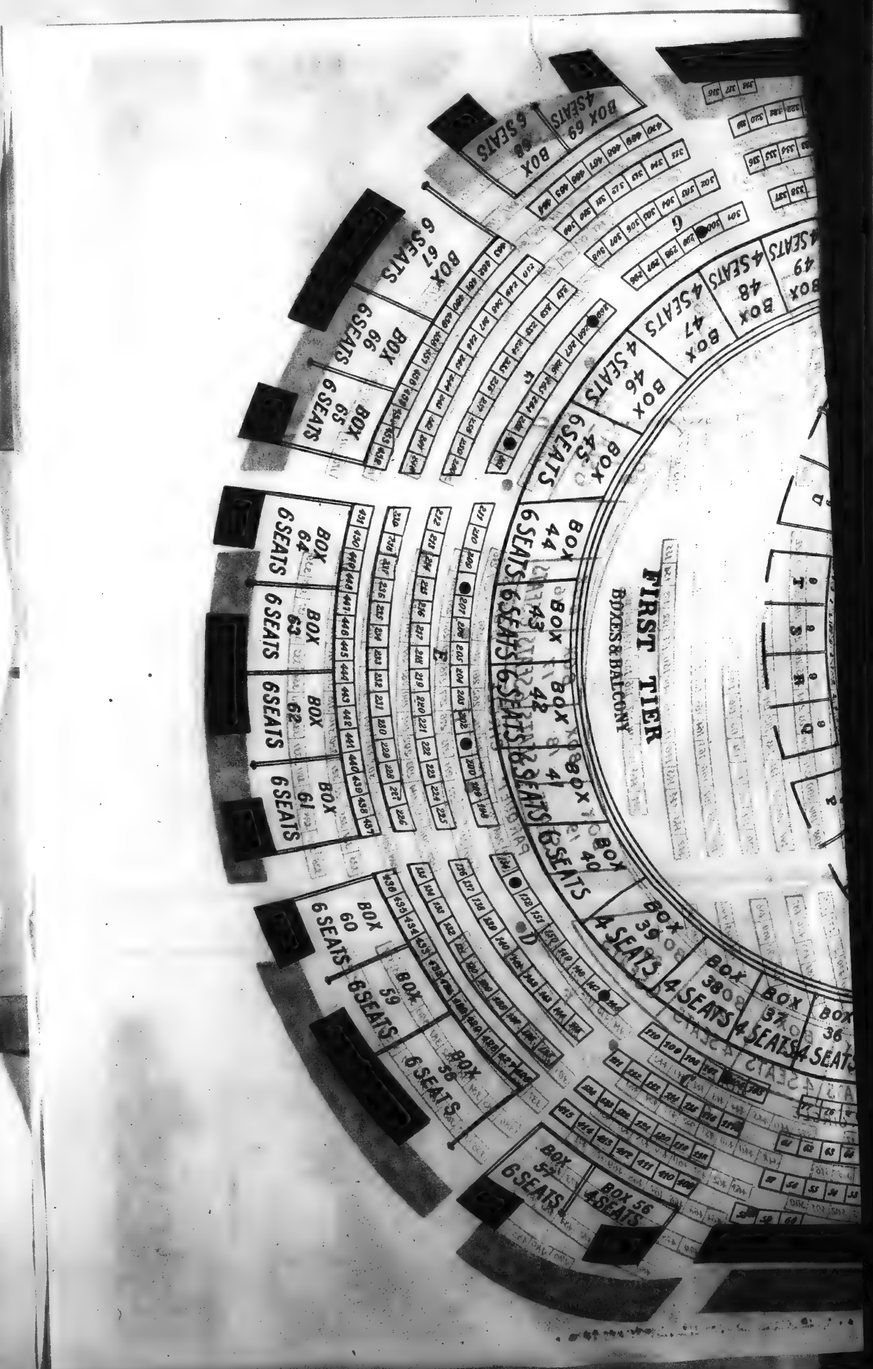
Yours respectfully,

Academy of Music, Philadelphia

The Boston Symphony

Philadelphia, September 28, 1905.

I hereby subscribe for.....season tickets



opened.

Should you desire to renew your subscription, please sign and mail enclosed order before October 11, indicating the location of seats.

Yours respectfully,

C. A. Ellis, Manager.

Carnegie Hall, New York

The Boston Symphony

NEW YORK, September 28, 1905.

I hereby subscribe for.....season tickets for the series of five { Thursday Evening / Saturday Afternoon } Concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall.

.....

.....

.....

Location desired, as near as possible.....

.....

☞ Unless you wish to subscribe for both, please indicate your choice between the Afternoon and Evening series.

PASTE OVER

SYMPHONY HALL

HUNTINGTON AND MASSACHUSETTS AVENUES

TWENTY-FIFTH SEASON, 1905-1906

The Boston Symphony Orchestra

96 Performers WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor

TWENTY-FOUR CONCERTS

On consecutive SATURDAY EVENINGS from October 14, 1905, to April 28, 1906, omitting November 11, December 9, 1905, January 13, February 17, and March 17, 1906, and

Twenty-four Public Rehearsals

On consecutive FRIDAY AFTERNOONS from October 13, 1905, to April 27, 1906, omitting November 10, December 8, 1905, January 12, February 16, and March 16, 1906.

BY SPECIAL INVITATION THE EMINENT FRENCH COMPOSER
M. VINCENT D'INDY
WILL CONDUCT THE CONCERTS OF DECEMBER 1 AND 2

SOLOISTS

¶ Mme. Emma Eames, Mme. Johanna Gadski, Mme. Louise Homer, Mr. Ben Davies, Mr. Ellison Van Hoose, Mr. David Bispham, Miss Adele Aus Der Ohe, Mme. Olga Samaroff, Mr. Alfred Reisenauer, Mr. Harold Bauer, Mr. Waldemar Lutschg, Mr. Rudolph Ganz, Mr. Ernest Hutcheson, Miss Marie Hall, Mr. Henri Marteau, Professor Willy Hess, Mr. T. Adamowski, Mr. Felix Winternitz, Mr. Jacques Hoffmann, Miss Elsa Ruegger, Mr. Heinrich Warnke.

¶ TICKETS for the series of CONCERTS and for the series of REHEARSALS, $12.00 and $7.50, according to location.

¶ The $12 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction at Symphony Hall, MONDAY, October 2, at 10 a.m.
¶ The $7.50 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction at Symphony Hall, TUESDAY, October 3, at 10 a.m.
¶ The $12 Seats for the Concerts will be sold at auction at Symphony Hall on THURSDAY, October 5, at 10 a.m.
¶ The $7.50 Seats for the Concerts will be sold in like manner at the same place on FRIDAY, October 6, at 10 a.m.
¶ Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.

TICKETS WILL BE DELIVERED IN THE HALL, AND MUST BE PAID FOR AS SOON AS BOUGHT, OR THEY WILL BE IMMEDIATELY RESOLD

(OVER)

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
FOUNDED EIGHTEEN HUNDRED AND EIGHTY-ONE
WILHELM GERICKE, CONDUCTOR

SYMPHONY HALL, BOSTON.

DEAR SIR:

As a subscriber to the concerts by the BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA at Carnegie Hall last season, we should be pleased to reserve the same seats for you before the public subscription is opened.

Should you desire to renew your subscription, please sign and mail enclosed order before October 14, indicating the location of seats.

Yours respectfully,

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
FOUNDED EIGHTEEN HUNDRED AND EIGHTY-ONE
WILHELM GERICKE, CONDUCTOR

SYMPHONY HALL, BOSTON.

DEAR MADAM:

As a subscriber to the concerts by the BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA at Carnegie Hall last season, we should be pleased to reserve the same seats for you before the public subscription is opened.

Should you desire to renew your subscription, please sign and mail enclosed order before October 14, indicating the location of seats.

Yours respectfully,

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.

[2360]

PASTE OVER

Carnegie Hall, New York

The Boston Symphony

NEW YORK, September 28, 1905.

I hereby subscribe for.....season tickets for the series of five { Thursday Evening / Saturday Afternoon } Concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall.

.....

.....

Location desired, as near as possible.....

.....

☞ Unless you wish to subscribe for both, please indicate your choice between the Afternoon and Evening series.

SYMPHONY HALL

HUNTINGTON AND MASSACHUSETTS AVENUES

TWENTY-FIFTH SEASON, 1905-1906

The Boston Symphony Orchestra

96 Performers WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor

TWENTY-FOUR CONCERTS

On consecutive SATURDAY EVENINGS from October 14, 1905, to April 28, 1906, omitting November 11, December 9, 1905, January 13, February 17, and March 17, 1906, and

Twenty-four Public Rehearsals

On consecutive FRIDAY AFTERNOONS from October 13, 1905, to April 27, 1906, omitting November 10, December 8, 1905, January 12, February 16, and March 16, 1906.

BY SPECIAL INVITATION THE EMINENT FRENCH COMPOSER

M. VINCENT D'INDY

WILL CONDUCT THE CONCERTS OF DECEMBER 1 AND 2

SOLOISTS

¶ Mme. Emma Eames, Mme. Johanna Gadski, Mme. Louise Homer, Mr. Ben Davies, Mr. Ellison Van Hoose, Mr. David Bispham, Miss Adele Aus Der Ohe, Mme. Olga Samaroff, Mr. Alfred Reisenauer, Mr. Harold Bauer, Mr. Waldemar Lutschg, Mr. Rudolph Ganz, Mr. Ernest Hutcheson, Miss Marie Hall, Mr. Henri Marteau, Professor Willy Hess, Mr. T. Adamowski, Mr. Felix Winternitz, Mr. Jacques Hoffmann, Miss Elsa Ruegger, Mr. Heinrich Warnke.

¶ TICKETS for the series of CONCERTS and for the series of REHEARSALS, $12.00 and $7.50, according to location.

¶ The $12 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction at Symphony Hall, MONDAY, October 2, at 10 a.m.
¶ The $7.50 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction at Symphony Hall, TUESDAY, October 3, at 10 a.m.
¶ The $12 Seats for the Concerts will be sold at auction at Symphony Hall on THURSDAY, October 5, at 10 a.m.
¶ The $7.50 Seats for the Concerts will be sold in like manner at the same place on FRIDAY, October 6, at 10 a.m.
¶ Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.

TICKETS WILL BE DELIVERED IN THE HALL, AND MUST BE PAID FOR AS SOON AS BOUGHT, OR THEY WILL BE IMMEDIATELY RESOLD

(OVER)

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

FOUNDED EIGHTEEN HUNDRED AND EIGHTY-ONE

WILHELM GERICKE, CONDUCTOR

SYMPHONY HALL, BOSTON.

DEAR SIR:

As a subscriber to the concerts by the BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA at Carnegie Hall last season, we should be pleased to reserve the same seats for you before the public subscription is opened.

Should you desire to renew your subscription, please sign and mail enclosed order before October 14, indicating the location of seats.

Yours respectfully,

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

FOUNDED EIGHTEEN HUNDRED AND EIGHTY-ONE

WILHELM GERICKE, CONDUCTOR

SYMPHONY HALL, BOSTON.

DEAR MADAM:

As a subscriber to the concerts by the BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA at Carnegie Hall last season, we should be pleased to reserve the same seats for you before the public subscription is opened.

Should you desire to renew your subscription, please sign and mail enclosed order before October 14, indicating the location of seats.

Yours respectfully,

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.

[236]

Carnegie Hall, New York

The Boston Symphony Orchestra

NINETY-SIX PERFORMERS

WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor

Twenty-fifth Season
Nineteen Hundred Five and Six

C. A. ELLIS, Manager F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager

A PERMANENT ORCHESTRA, MAINTAINED SOLELY FOR CONCERT PERFORMANCES

New York, September 28, 1905.

I hereby subscribe for.....season tickets for the series of five { Thursday Evening / Saturday Afternoon } Concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall.

.....

.....

Location desired, as near as possible.....

.....

☞ Unless you wish to subscribe for both, please indicate your choice between the Afternoon and Evening series.

SYMPHON
HUNTINGTON AND MAS

TWENTY-FIFTH SE

Boston S
Orch

96 Performers WILHE

TWENTY-FOU
On consecutive SATURDA
14, 1905, to April 28, 1906, omi
1905, January 13, February 17,

Twenty-four Pu
On consecutive FRIDAY A
13, 1905, to April 27, 1906, o
8, 1905, January 12, February

BY SPECIAL INVITATION T
M. VINCE
WILL CONDUCT THE CON

SOL

¶ Mme. Emma Eames, Mm
Homer, Mr. Ben Davies, Mr. E
ham, Miss Adele Aus Der Oh
Reisenauer, Mr. Harold Bau
Rudolph Ganz, Mr. Ernest
Henri Marteau, Professor V
Mr. Felix Winternitz, Mr. Jac
Mr. Heinrich Warnke.

¶ TICKETS for the series o
REHEARSALS, $12.00

¶ The $12 Seats for the F
at Symphony Hall, MONDA
¶ The $7.50 Seats for the
at Symphony Hall, TUESI
¶ The $12 Seats for the C
Symphony Hall on THURS
¶ The $7.50 Seats for the C
at the same place on FRIDA
¶ Bids will be accepted fo
and not for the choice; and on one bid. The seats open diagram, and will be marked

TICKETS WILL BE DELIVERE
FOR AS SOON AS BOUGHT, OR

BOSTON SYMPHON
FOUNDED EIGHTEEN HUNDR
WILHELM GERIC

DEAR SIR:

As a subscriber to the concerts by at Carnegie Hall last season, we should b
for you before the public subscription is o

Should you desire to renew your sub

FIVE CONCERTS

THURSDAY EVENINGS AT 8.15

NOVEMBER 9
DECEMBER 7
JANUARY 11
FEBRUARY 15
MARCH 15 and

FIVE MATINEES

SATURDAY AFTERNOONS AT 2.30

NOVEMBER 11
DECEMBER 9
JANUARY 13
FEBRUARY 17
MARCH 17

Season tickets, with reserved seats for the series of five matinees or five concerts, $7.50, $6, $5, and $3, and boxes $50 and $40, according to location. Programme books, with descriptive notes on the works to be performed, will be mailed in advance of each concert to purchasers of season tickets.

☞ The programmes for the afternoon and evening series will be entirely different.

By special invitation the eminent French composer

M. VINCENT D'INDY

will conduct the concerts of December 7 and 9

SOLO ARTISTS

MME. GADSKI

MR. ELLISON VAN HOOSE

MR. ALFRED REISENAUER

MR. HAROLD BAUER

MR. WALDEMAR LUSTCHG

MISS MARIE HALL

MR. HENRI MARTEAU

PROFESSOR WILLY HESS

AND OTHERS

NEW YORK, September 28, 1905.

I hereby subscribe for.....season tickets for the series of five { Thursday Evening / Saturday Afternoon } Concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall.

.....

.....

Location desired, as near as possible.....

.....

☞ Unless you wish to subscribe for both, please indicate your choice between the Afternoon and Evening series.

SYMPHON
HUNTINGTON AND MAS

TWENTY-FIFTH SE
Th
Boston S
Orch

96 Performers WILHE

TWENTY-FOU
On consecutive SATURDAY
14, 1905, to April 28, 1906, omi
1905, January 13, February 17,

Twenty-four Pu
On consecutive FRIDAY A 13, 1905, to April 27, 1906, or
8, 1905, January 12, February

BY SPECIAL INVITATION T
M. VINCE
WILL CONDUCT THE CON

SOL
¶ Mme. Emma Eames, Mm
Homer, Mr. Ben Davies, Mr. E
ham, Miss Adele Aus Der Oh
Reisenauer, Mr. Harold Bau
Rudolph Ganz, Mr. Ernest
Henri Marteau, Professor V
Mr. Felix Winternitz, Mr. Jac
Mr. Heinrich Warnke.

¶ TICKETS for the series o
REHEARSALS, $12.00

¶ The $12 Seats for the F
at Symphony Hall, MONDA
¶ The $7.50 Seats for the
at Symphony Hall, TUESD
¶ The $12 Seats for the Co
Symphony Hall on THURS
¶ The $7.50 Seats for the C
at the same place on FRIDA
¶ Bids will be accepted fo
and not for the choice; and on one bid. The seats open diagram, and will be marked

TICKETS WILL BE DELIVERE
FOR AS SOON AS BOUGHT, OR

BOSTON SYMPHON
FOUNDED EIGHTEEN HUNDR
WILHELM GERIC

DEAR SIR:

As a subscriber to the concerts by t
at Carnegie Hall last season, we should b
for you before the public subscription is o
Should you desire to renew your sub

FIVE CONCERTS

THURSDAY EVENINGS AT 8.15

NOVEMBER 9
DECEMBER 7
JANUARY 11
FEBRUARY 15
MARCH 15 and

FIVE MATINEES

SATURDAY AFTERNOONS AT 2.30

NOVEMBER 11
DECEMBER 9
JANUARY 13
FEBRUARY 17
MARCH 17

Season tickets, with reserved seats for the series of five matinees or five concerts, $7.50, $6, $5, and $3, and boxes $50 and $40, according to location. Programme books, with descriptive notes on the works to be performed, will be mailed in advance of each concert to purchasers of season tickets.

☞ The programmes for the afternoon and evening series will be entirely different.

By special invitation the eminent French composer

M. VINCENT D'INDY

will conduct the concerts of December 7 and 9

SOLO ARTISTS

MME. GADSKI

MR. ELLISON VAN HOOSE

MR. ALFRED REISENAUER

MR. HAROLD BAUER

MR. WALDEMAR LUSTCHG

MISS MARIE HALL

MR. HENRI MARTEAU

PROFESSOR WILLY HESS

AND OTHERS

NEW YORK, September 28, 1905.

I hereby subscribe for.....season tickets for the series of five { Thursday Evening / Saturday Afternoon } Concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall.

.....

.....

Location desired, as near as possible.....

.....

☞ Unless you wish to subscribe for both, please indicate your choice between the Afternoon and Evening series.

SYMPHO
HUNTINGTON AND MA
TWENTY-FIFTH S
Boston
Orch
96 Performers WILH

TWENTY-FOU
On consecutive SATURDA
14, 1905, to April 28, 1906, om
1905, January 13, February 17
Twenty-four Pu
On consecutive FRIDAY A
13, 1905, to April 27, 1906, o
8, 1905, January 12, February

BY SPECIAL INVITATION T
M. VINC
WILL CONDUCT THE CON

SOL
¶ Mme. Emma Eames, Mm
Homer, Mr. Ben Davies, Mr. E
ham, Miss Adele Aus Der Ohe
Reisenauer, Mr. Harold Bau
Rudolph Ganz, Mr. Ernest
Henri Marteau, Professor W
Mr. Felix Winternitz, Mr. Jac
Mr. Heinrich Warnke.

¶ TICKETS for the series of
REHEARSALS, $12.00
¶ The $12 Seats for the R
at Symphony Hall, MONDA
¶ The $7.50 Seats for the F
at Symphony Hall, TUESD
¶ The $12 Seats for the Co
Symphony Hall on THURS
¶ The $7.50 Seats for the Co
at the same place on FRIDA
¶ Bids will be accepted fo
and not for the choice; and on one bid. The seats open diagram, and will be marked

TICKETS WILL BE DELIVERE
FOR AS SOON AS BOUGHT, OR

BOSTON SYMPHONY
FOUNDED EIGHTEEN HUNDRE
WILHELM GERICK

DEAR SIR:

As a subscriber to the concerts by th at Carnegie Hall last season, we should be for you before the public subscription is op
Should you desire to renew your subs

I hereby subscribe for ..... season tickets for the series of five { Thursday Evening / Saturday Afternoon } Concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall.

.....

.....

.....

Location desired, as near as possible .....

.....

☞ Unless you wish to subscribe for both, please indicate your choice between the Afternoon and Evening series.

.....

.....

The novelties to be played will be chosen from the following list.

ELGAR	Overture, "In the South"
ELGAR	{ Chanson de Nuit / Chanson de Matin
GLAZOUNOW	"Le Kremlin," Symphonic Poem
CESAR FRANCK	"Psyche"
GUSTAV MAHLER	Symphony No. 5.
ERNST BOEHE	"Odysseus Ausfahrt und Schiffbruck," Symphonic Poem
BUSONI	"Lustspiel" Overture
BUSONI	"Geharnischte" Suite
WEBBER	Symphony in E major
CONVERSE	Ballade
P...	Prel... "The Birds of Aristophanes"

BOSTON SYMPHONY O
FOUNDED EIGHTEEN HUNDRED
WILHELM GERICKE

DEAR SIR:

As a subscriber to the concerts by the at Carnegie Hall last season, we should be pl for you before the public subscription is opene

TICKETS WILL BE DELIVERED
FOR AS SOON AS BOUGHT, OR TH

¶ TICKETS for the series of C
REHEARSALS, $12.00 an

¶ The $12 Seats for the Reh
at Symphony Hall, MONDAY
¶ The $7.50 Seats for the Re at Symphony Hall, TUESDA
¶ The $12 Seats for the Conc
Symphony Hall on THURSD
¶ The $7.50 Seats for the Conc at the same place on FRIDAY, ¶ Bids will be accepted for s and not for the choice; and no on one bid. The seats open to diagram, and will be marked o

Mr. Heinrich Warnke.

¶ Mme. Emma Eames, Mme.
Homer, Mr. Ben Davies, Mr. Eli
ham, Miss Adele Aus Der Ohe,
Reisenauer, Mr. Harold Bauer
Rudolph Ganz, Mr. Ernest H
Henri Marteau, Professor Wi
Mr. Felix Winternitz, Mr. Jacqu
Mr. Heinrich Warnke.

SOLO

WILL CONDUCT THE CONCE

BY SPECIAL INVITATION TH
M. VINCEN

On consecutive FRIDAY AF
13, 1905, to April 27, 1906, omi
8, 1905, January 12, February

TWENTY-FOUR PU

On consecutive SATURDAY
14, 1905, to April 28, 1906, omitt
1905, January 13, February 17,

Twenty-four

Boston S

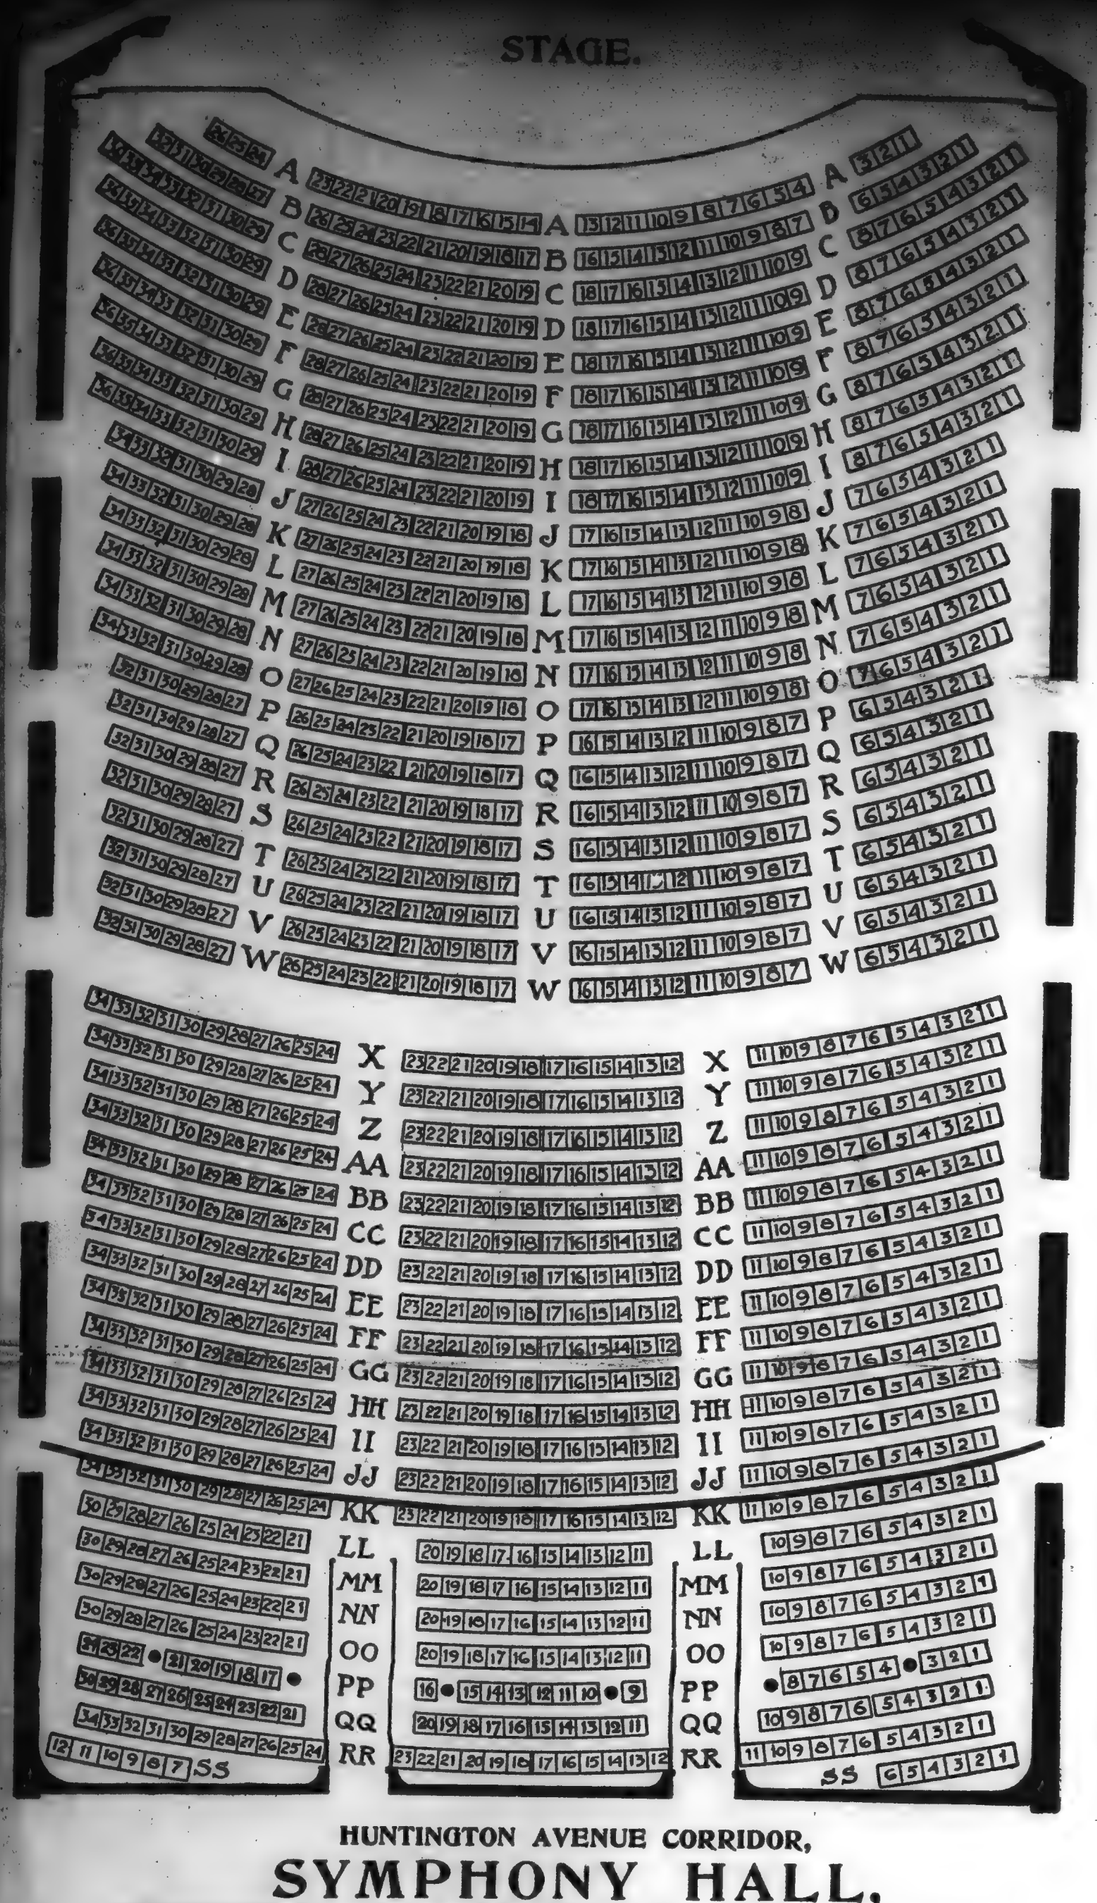
Orch

TWENTY-FIFTH SE

HUNTINGTON AND MASS

SYMPHON

96 performers WILHEL



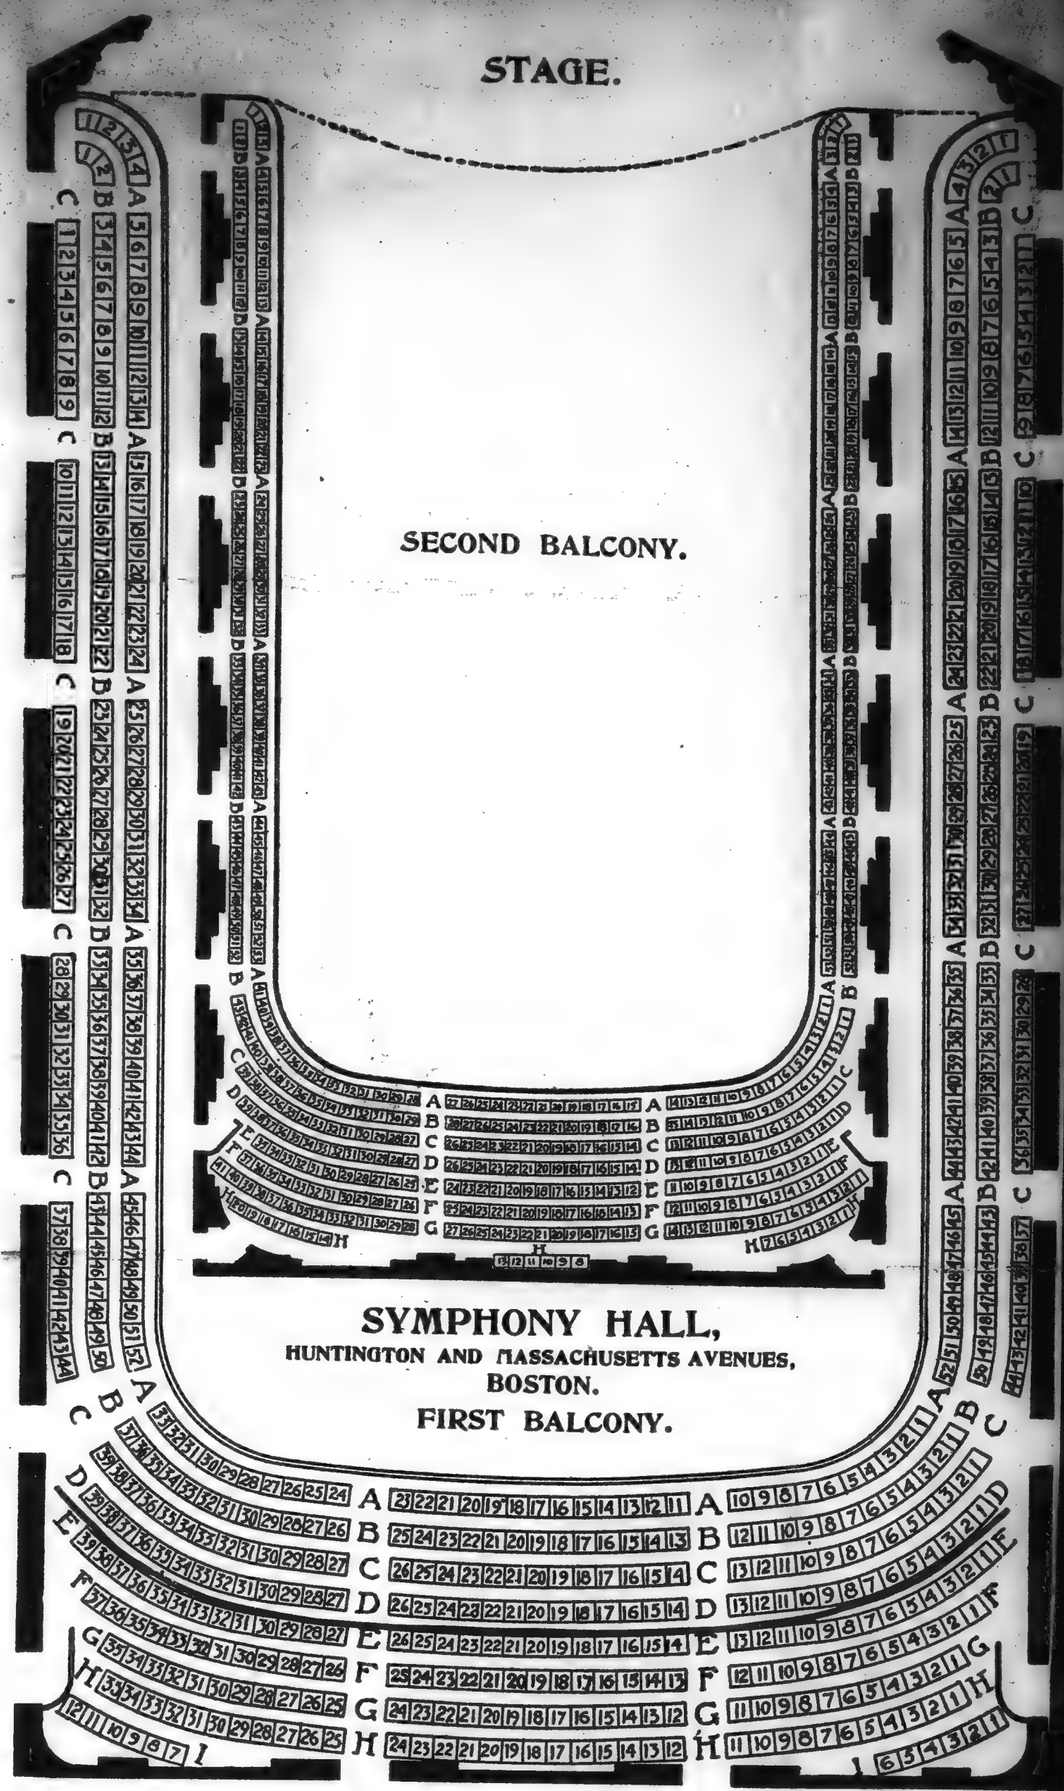
HUNTINGTON AVENUE CORRIDOR,

SYMPHONY HALL,

HUNTINGTON AND MASSACHUSETTS AVENUES, BOSTON.

FLOOR PLAN.

The red line marks the division between the $12 and $7.50 seats.



SYMPHONY HALL,

HUNTINGTON AND MASSACHUSETTS AVENUES,
BOSTON.

FIRST BALCONY.

The red line marks the division between the $12 and $7.50 seats.

☞ Unless you wish to subscribe for both, please indicate your choice between the Afternoon and Evening series.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

FOUNDED EIGHTEEN HUNDRED AND EIGHTY-ONE

WILHELM GERICKE, CONDUCTOR

SYMPHONY HALL, BOSTON.

DEAR SIR:

As a subscriber to the concerts by the BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA at Carnegie Hall last season, we should be pleased to reserve the same seats for you before the public subscription is opened.

Should you desire to renew your subscription, please sign and mail enclosed order before October 14, indicating the location of seats.

Yours respectfully,

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

FOUNDED EIGHTEEN HUNDRED AND EIGHTY-ONE

WILHELM GERICKE, CONDUCTOR

SYMPHONY HALL, BOSTON.

DEAR MADAM:

As a subscriber to the concerts by the BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA at Carnegie Hall last season, we should be pleased to reserve the same seats for you before the public subscription is opened.

Should you desire to renew your subscription, please sign and mail enclosed order before October 14, indicating the location of seats.

Yours respectfully,

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.

Carnegie Hall, New York

The Boston Symphony

NEW YORK, September 28, 1905.

I hereby subscribe for.....season tickets for the series of five { Thursday Evening / Saturday Afternoon } Concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall.

.....

.....

Location desired, as near as possible.....

.....

☞ Unless you wish to subscribe for both, please indicate your choice between the Afternoon and Evening series.

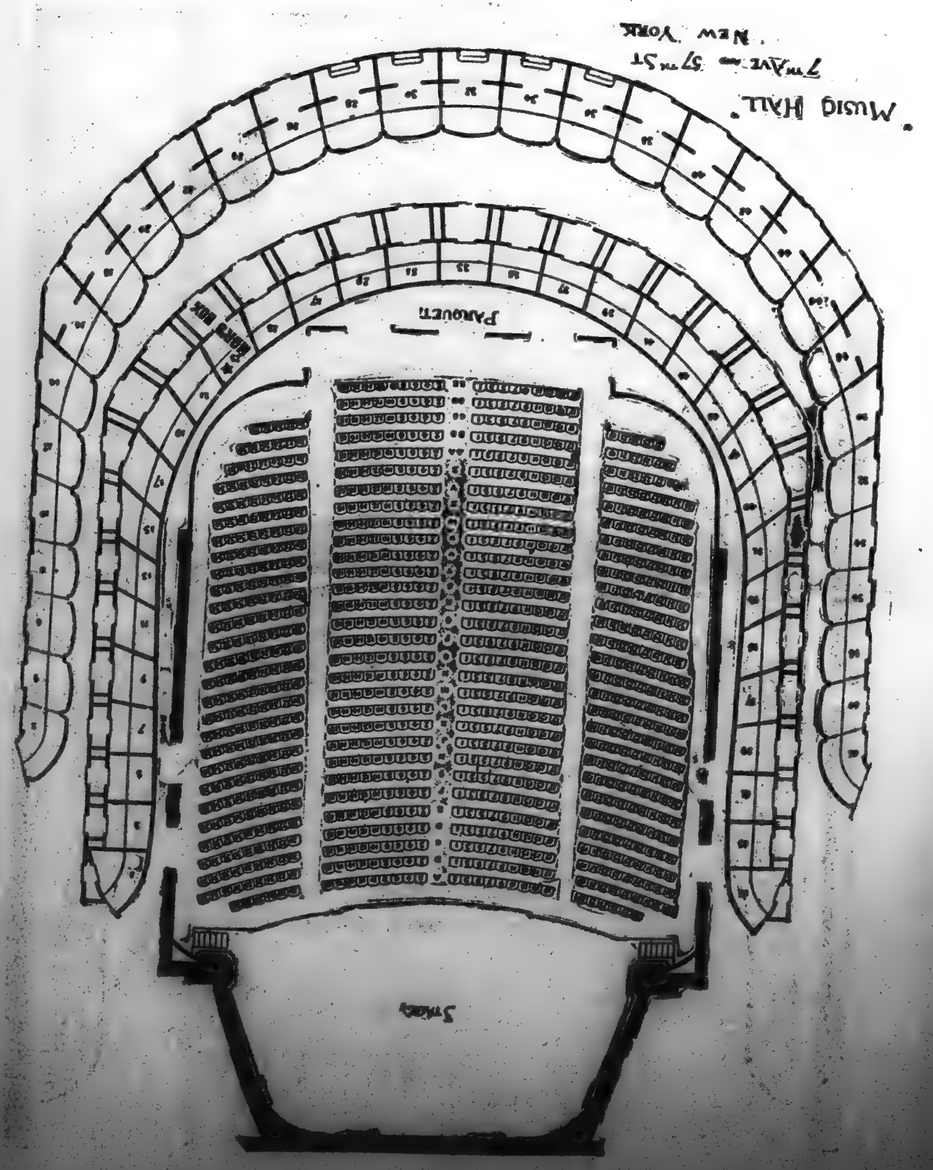
DIAGRAM



SYMPHONY HALL

HUNTINGTON AND MASSACHUSETTS AVENUES

TWENTY-FIFTH SEASON, 1905-1906

The Boston Symphony Orchestra

96 Performers WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor

TWENTY-FOUR CONCERTS

On consecutive SATURDAY EVENINGS from October 14, 1905, to April 28, 1906, omitting November 11, December 9, 1905, January 13, February 17, and March 17, 1906, and

Twenty-four Public Rehearsals

On consecutive FRIDAY AFTERNOONS from October 13, 1905, to April 27, 1906, omitting November 10, December 8, 1905, January 12, February 16, and March 16, 1906.

BY SPECIAL INVITATION THE EMINENT FRENCH COMPOSER

M. VINCENT D'INDY

WILL CONDUCT THE CONCERTS OF DECEMBER 1 AND 2

SOLOISTS

¶ Mme. Emma Eames, Mme. Johanna Gadski, Mme. Louise Homer, Mr. Ben Davies, Mr. Ellison Van Hoose, Mr. David Bispham, Miss Adele Aus Der Ohe, Mme. Olga Samaroff, Mr. Alfred Reisenauer, Mr. Harold Bauer, Mr. Waldemar Lutschg, Mr. Rudolph Ganz, Mr. Ernest Hutcheson, Miss Marie Hall, Mr. Henri Marteau, Professor Willy Hess, Mr. T. Adamowski, Mr. Felix Winternitz, Mr. Jacques Hoffmann, Miss Elsa Ruegger, Mr. Heinrich Warnke.

¶ TICKETS for the series of CONCERTS and for the series of REHEARSALS, $12.00 and $7.50, according to location.

¶ The $12 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction at Symphony Hall, MONDAY, October 2, at 10 a.m.
¶ The $7.50 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction at Symphony Hall, TUESDAY, October 3, at 10 a.m.
¶ The $12 Seats for the Concerts will be sold at auction at Symphony Hall on THURSDAY, October 5, at 10 a.m.
¶ The $7.50 Seats for the Concerts will be sold in like manner at the same place on FRIDAY, October 6, at 10 a.m.
¶ Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.

TICKETS WILL BE DELIVERED IN THE HALL, AND MUST BE PAID FOR AS SOON AS BOUGHT, OR THEY WILL BE IMMEDIATELY RESOLD

(OVER)

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
FOUNDED EIGHTEEN HUNDRED AND EIGHTY-ONE
WILHELM GERICKE, CONDUCTOR

SYMPHONY HALL, BOSTON.

DEAR SIR:

As a subscriber to the concerts by the BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA at Carnegie Hall last season, we should be pleased to reserve the same seats for you before the public subscription is opened.

Should you desire to renew your subscription, please sign and mail enclosed order before October 14, indicating the location of seats.

Yours respectfully,

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
FOUNDED EIGHTEEN HUNDRED AND EIGHTY-ONE
WILHELM GERICKE, CONDUCTOR

SYMPHONY HALL, BOSTON.

DEAR MADAM:

As a subscriber to the concerts by the BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA at Carnegie Hall last season, we should be pleased to reserve the same seats for you before the public subscription is opened.

Should you desire to renew your subscription, please sign and mail enclosed order before October 14, indicating the location of seats.

Yours respectfully,

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.

[2360]

BLANK PAGE

[238]

MAR 17 1906

...as admirable ...orchestra are of ...been so wide as that ...colleagues, who seem to ...ink is a sign of excellence, ...been so unstable, and all ...he presented to the ob- ...prehension of the public ...clearness and inviting ...the ears of the lovers of ...still familiar with ...voice still exerts ...which lies in beauty ...fairness of intonation; ...to recognize the fact ...difference between musical ...If we are not all given ...that passion is most elo- ...is torn to tatters; if we are ...toward the belief that the ...object of artistic pursuit, ...credit is largely due ...and the ideals which he has ...a moment's defection, dur- ...thirteen years of his labor in ...It is much to be hoped that the ...which has seized upon the promo- ...orchestral enterprises will soon pass ...Orchestral concerts are the worst ...vehicles for musical sensationalism. ...in music is the most deplor- ...manifestations in art, and orches- ...concerts are the worst of all vehicles ...its propagation. When once all the old ...canons of beauty are abandoned, there ...is an end of music in the sense that ...vanished since the ecclesiastical art cul- ...minated in Palestrina, the symphonic in ...Beethoven and the dramatic in Wagner, ...thought is intolerable to all except ...mental and physical degenerates for ...in pure and normal pleasures have ...their attractiveness.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
COMMERCIAL
BUFFALO, N. Y.
MAR 3 - 1906

...Boston Symphony Orchestra must ...on the credit of breaking a record in ...So far as is known, the series of ...this season by this matchless or- ...are the only ones that have ...given here without financial loss; ...men and women who have made ...two splendid concerts have ...afforded Buffalo a great musical ...cannot be duplicated, but have ...without themselves being called ...make good a deficit. Tremendous ...the expense of bringing the Boston ...Orchestra to Buffalo, especially ...high-priced soloists added for the ...concert, the attendance was so ...that it was unnecessary to ask the ...for even a small part of the ...they had assumed. It is a great ...for the finest orchestra in Am- ...and the management is naturally ...Next season the orchestra will ...come here, giving two and perhaps ...concerts.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
COMMERCIAL
From BUFFALO N Y
Address
FEB 24 1906

Mr. Wilhelm Gericke has resigned his position as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra. His resignation will take effect at the end of this season, the 25th of the organization. The last concert of the season will be on April 28.

A reporter of the Boston Herald called on Mr. Gericke at his home in Brookline. Mr. Gericke received the reporter and when he was asked whether there was any foundation for the reports concerning his resignation and his consequent return to Europe, he courteously gave the desired information. It appears that Mr. Gericke ...ntered an engagement as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra for the season of 1906-1907. After due reflection he informed Maj. Henry L. Higginson that he would accept the offer on certain conditions, which he named. These conditions ...not agree with Maj. Higginson's ap- ...Mr. Gericke therefore felt obliged ...the offer. The correspondence ...Higginson and Mr. Gericke ...early this week.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
COMMERCIAL
From BUFFALO N Y
Address
FEB 24 1906

...ands of lovers of ...especially those ...to read ...resigned ...

From JOURNAL
Address DETROIT, MICH.
FEB 23 1906

BOSTON SYMPHONY LEADER HAS QUIT.

BOSTON, Feb. 23.—Wilhelm Gericke has resigned as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, his resignation to take effect at the end of the present season. Mr. Gericke was offered the position for the season of 1906-07, and informed Major H. L. Higginson, the head of the organization, that he would accept under certain conditions. Major Higginson did not approve them and Mr. Gericke declined the offer. He says he will return to Europe. Mr. Gericke was conductor of the symphony orchestra from 1884 to 1889 and from 1898 until the present time.

Mr. Gericke and his corps of brilliant instrumentalists last appeared in Detroit Nov. 5 last when they drew to the Light Guard armory one of the most select audiences of music lovers that had gathered in this city in years.

Leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Who is Unable to Agree Upon Terms With the Head of That Organization.

...Bureau in the World
NEWS
BUFFALO, N.Y.
MAR 4 - 1906

With deep gratification on the part of the managers, the announcement was sent out last week to the 40 men and women who were instrumental in bringing the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Buffalo for two superb concerts this season, that the generous patronage for both recitals rendered it unnecessary to call upon the guarantors to make good a deficit.

It was not until the October concert that it was thought possible to give two such expensive recitals here without financial loss. To bring the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Buffalo was a tremendous undertaking, especially when two high-priced soloists appeared with the orchestra in February, but Buffalo certainly arose to its opportunities with the result that the guarantors have the happy realization that they secured for this city two of the finest concerts ever given here, and this without personal loss.

Next season, encouraged by this winter's record, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will again come to Buffalo, giving two and perhaps three concerts. This is the first and only time that an orchestra has played here under a guarantee without necessitating a call upon its backers, and it required the greatest orchestra in America to establish the record.

...ILLUSTRATED EXPRESS
...om
...ddress BUFFALO, N.Y.
...te FEB 25 1906

The announcement of Wilhelm Gericke's resignation as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has caused a sensation. Mr. Gericke will go back to Europe to live next May.

...London, 1881; New York,

...Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
WASHINGTON, D. C. POST
MAR 18 1906

Boston Symphony Quartet at Willard's Hotel Monday Evening, March 26.

Boston's final contribution to Washington's present season of music will be made on next Monday week, March 26, when the Boston Symphony Quartet will give its third and last evening of chamber music in the ballroom of the New Willard Hotel. While the public attracted by chamber music, is necessarily much smaller than that by orchestral, the support given to the Boston Symphony Quartet in this its first season in Washington has been most gratifying, and in return the quartet may truly be said to have given adequate satisfaction to those who have gone to the concerts.

The next concert will bring as the assisting artist Mme. Olga Samaroff, whose playing here with the Philadelphia Orchestra recently made such a profound impression on Washington music lovers. With Prof. Willy Hess, she will play Richard Strauss' Sonata for pianoforte and violin in E flat major, op. 18. Week before last she played this work with Prof. Hess in New York, and the critics were most enthusiastic in their praise of the performance. The other works on the programme will be Mozart's Quartet in C major (K. 465) and Beethoven's Quartet in C major, op. 59, No. 3.

...Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
NEW YORK EV'G POST
...ss MAR 21 1906

"From a high official source," the Musical Courier hears that "the real reason for the resignation of Wilhelm Gericke as head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was not the refusal of Col. Higginson to raise the conductor's salary $3,000 yearly—as has been whispered about in New York by certain irresponsible music reporters. No such refusal ever emanated from Col. Higginson, for the very simple reason that no such demand was ever made by Mr. Gericke. The real reason for the resignation of that gentleman was this: With the expiration of Gericke's long contract this spring, Col. Higginson did not find himself in a position to renew Mr. Gericke's engagement in future for more than one year at a time, and was willing to retain him on that basis and to make a contract from season to season. Mr. Gericke, in justice to himself, could not accept such an arrangement, and held out for a contract that would cover five years, or, at the least, three. Col. Higginson remaining obdurate on the point of not binding himself further ahead than one year, Mr. Gericke was compelled, much to his regret, to tender his resignation. There was no break of any kind between the conductor and the owner of the orchestra, and at no point of the negotiations did the discussion become acrimonious or even warm. Mr. Gericke and Col. Higginson parted with mutual expressions of good will and hearty sympathy."

...Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
WASHINGTON, D.C.
...ess MAR 18 1906

Among the novelties included in the home concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season was the symphony in C minor, by Amherst Webber, the pianist and accompanist, who visited Washington this year with the Ysaye Concert Company. Other works performed for the first time at these concerts were Elgar's overture, "In the South," a ballad for barytone and orchestra, by F. Converse; the symphonic poem, "Odysseus," by Ernest Boehe; the violin concerto in F sharp minor of Strube, one of the first violinists of the orchestra; Dvorak's symphonic poem, "The Wood Dove;" Smetana's overture to the opera, "Libussa," Busoni's comedy overture in C major, Franck's "Psyche et Eros," Haydn's symphony in B flat (B. & H. No. 2) ...

...Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
SUN
...ss BALTIMORE, MD.
MAR 18 1906

Last Of Peabody Recitals.

The last of this season's series of Peabody recitals will be given Friday afternoon, April 6, when Henri Marteau, the eminent violinist, will be the soloist. Mr. Marteau appeared as soloist at the concluding concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra here last Wednesday evening, when he gave such a successful rendition of the Jacques-Dalcroze concerto in C minor.

Miss Annie S. Haines, a graduate of the Peabody Conservatory and an especially gifted young woman, will give the free organ recital at the Peabody this afternoon. Following will be the program: "Symphony No. 5," Widor; Adagio from "Symphony," Raff; "Christmas ...

Newspaper Cutting Bureau
THEIR LITTLE MISTAKE
PHILA. PA
MAR 18 1906

How a Couple Came to Lose Front Seats at the Revival.

Last Monday evening a tremendous crowd of music lovers waited patiently (as only music lovers can) for nearly an hour outside the Academy of Music where the Boston Symphony Orchestra was to give its final concert of the season.

As the long line poured into the door leading to the amphitheatre it came to a sudden halt, the reason for which created no little mirth and jollying among those who were near enough to witness the amusing incident.

It appears that a couple bought their tickets, and as they were handed their programs discovered, to their intense astonishment, that these bulky booklets showed no evidence of containing a single Torrey-Alexander sermon or hymn.

"Doesn't the revival meeting take place here to-night?" they asked the ticket taker, in surprised tone.

"I guess you've got into the wrong place," laughed the man in uniform, as he designated the place of the Torrey meeting. "You can have your money back."

Then the crowd laughed.

"Oh, we can use those tickets all right to-night and a good many more," remarked the box-office man as he continued to hand out the blue slips with lightning rapidity.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.

D'Harcourt—Overture to opera "Tasso." First time.
Liszt—Concerto in E-flat major, No. 1, for pianoforte and orchestra.
Mr. Rudolph Ganz, Soloist.
Macdowell—"Lancelot and Elaine," Symphonic Poem (after Tennyson), Op. 25.
Beethoven—Symphony, No. 8, in F major, Op. 93.

The concert was one of more than ordinary interest, and the programme excellently balanced. The presence of a new soloist, the performance of a new work, and the repetition of a great native composition combined to make the occasion noteworthy. D'Harcourt's "Tasso" overture, after an apparent start in the vein of modern dissonance, changed its character almost at once and displayed the most suave melodic style.

Its themes were attractive. Its orchestration always effective, if not strikingly powerful, and the many "cantilena" passages most pleasingly melodious. If the work had a fault, it leaned too much toward the light and popular vein. But this tendency is not a bad one, at present; for many modern composers have misled us into the idea that music is meant only to paint melodramatic subjects in glaring colors, or solve ethical problems with a hundred and twenty instruments. Be virtuous and you must be unhappy, according to the code of the dissonance-mongers; and a partial return to the simpler style is certainly welcome.

The great Liszt concerto, with its earnest opening and its serene beauty, afforded Mr. Ganz an excellent introduction to our concerts. Liszt's fame as a composer is of comparatively recent growth, but rests upon a sure foundation. The excessive embroidery of notes in his piano solos and transcriptions drew attention first to his technical attainments, though it was part of a definite plan, which has been alluded to as the orchestration of the pianoforte.

The best of his larger works, however, remain monuments of expressive power, and grow by repeated hearing. Mr. Ganz is a young Swiss composer of some note, now settled in Chicago. He gave the Liszt work with excellent command of expression though inclined to over-sentimentalize a trifle at first. He showed himself possessed of the utmost technical facility, and displayed excellent discretion in making it a means rather than an end. The many recalls he received were no more than his due.

"Lancelot and Elaine" proved itself a masterpiece. If Macdowell rates it less high than his later works, because of its descriptive programme tendencies, the public may not agree with him. The symphonic poem has become the chief modern form, and its very essence depends upon the programme idea. This does not necessarily imply deliberate tone-painting, such as the "Don Quixote" variations of Strauss, but may mean a more general picture of moods and feelings suggested by a well-chosen title.

Music is the language of emotion, not of description, and the subject of this work gives ample scope for the portrayal of beauty and chivalry without the need of minute explanatory details. The many phases of the poem are depicted with a master hand, and the work will hold its rank with the very best of its kind in all lands.

Incidentally, the orchestra gave it a rendering that seemed absolute perfection. Mr. Gericke's long training has given the orchestra a technical proficiency that enables him to obtain the most exquisite effects of delicacy in shading. Such readings as that of the Macdowell work last Saturday, or the "Tod und Verklärung" earlier in the season, are veritable triumphs, and prove that mere mastery is not the only method, nor even the best, in rendering the ...

COMMERCIAL
MAR 17 1906

The departure of Mr. Wilhelm Gericke from the musical life of America is a matter of profound regret. Most of the qualities which are looked upon as admirable in the Boston Symphony Orchestra are of his creation. For thirteen years he has set an example of devotion and zeal to a high conception that is quite without parallel. His horizon has not been so wide as that of some of his colleagues, who seem to think that fresh ink is a sign of excellence, but neither has it been so unstable, and all that lay within it he presented to the observation and comprehension of the public with marvellous clearness and inviting graciousness. If the ears of the lovers of orchestral music are still familiar with euphony; if the orchestral voice still exerts that elemental charm which lies in beauty of tone-quality and justness of intonation; if we are still able to recognize the fact that there is a difference between musical sonority and noise; if we are not all given over to the belief that passion is most eloquent when it is torn to tatters; if we are still skeptical toward the belief that the ugly is a fit object of artistic pursuit for its own sake,—the credit is laregly due to Mr. Gericke and the ideals which he has upheld without a moment's defection during the thirteen years of his labor in America. It is much to be hoped that the hysteria which has seized upon the promoters of orchestral enterprises will soon pass away. Orchestral concerts are the worst of all vehicles for musical sensationalism. Sensationalism in music is the most deplorable of manifestations in art, and orchestral concerts are the worst of all vehicles for its propagation. When once all the old standards of beauty are abandoned, there will be an end of music in the sense that has obtained since the ecclesiastical art culminated in Palestrina, the symphonic in Beethoven and the dramatic in Wagner. The thought is intolerable to all except those mental and physical degenerates for whom all pure and normal pleasures have lost their attractiveness.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
COMMERCIAL
MAR 3 1906

To the Boston Symphony Orchestra must be given the credit of breaking a record in Buffalo. So far as is known, the series of concerts this season by this matchless organization are the only ones that have ever been given here without financial loss; but the 40 men and women who have made possible these two splendid concerts have the gratification of knowing that they have not only afforded Buffalo a great musical treat which cannot be duplicated, but have done this without themselves being called upon to make good a deficit. Tremendous as was the expense of bringing the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Buffalo, especially with two high-priced soloists added for the February concert, the attendance was so large that it was unnecessary to ask the guarantors for even a small part of the amount they had assumed. It is a great triumph for the finest orchestra in America and the management is naturally elated. Next season the orchestra will again come here, giving two and perhaps three concerts.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
COMMERCIAL
From BUFFALO N Y
Address

Mr. Wilhelm Gericke has resigned his position as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra. His resignation will take effect at the end of this season, the 25th of the organization. The last concert of the season will be on April 28.

A reporter of the Boston Herald called on Mr. Gericke at his home in Brookline. Mr. Gericke received the reporter and when he was asked whether there was any foundation for the reports concerning his resignation and his consequent return to Europe, he courteously gave the desired information. It appears that Mr. Gericke was offered an engagement as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra for the season of 1906-1907. After due reflection he informed Maj. Henry L. Higginson that he would accept the offer on certain conditions, which he named. These conditions did not meet with Maj. Higginson's approval. Mr. Gericke therefore felt obliged to decline the offer. The correspondence between Maj. Higginson and Mr. Gericke was closed early this week.

COMMERCIAL
From BUFFALO
Address

It will interest thousands of lovers of good music in Buffalo, especially those who have attended the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—to read that Mr. Gericke has resigned. [illegible] lies the head of the man who [illegible] maintain an orchestra of [illegible] the balance-sheet [illegible] is very un-

From JOURNAL
Address DETROIT, MICH.
FEB 23 1906

GERICKE CROSSES OCEAN

BOSTON SYMPHONY LEADER HAS QUIT.

BOSTON, Feb. 23.—Wilhelm Gericke has resigned as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, his resignation to take effect at the end of the present season., Mr. Gericke was offered the position for the season of 1906-07, and informed Major H. L. Higginson, the head of the organization, that he would accept under certain conditions. Major Higginson did not approve them and Mr. Gericke declined the offer. He says he will return to Europe. Mr. Gericke was conductor of the symphony orchestra from 1884 to 1889 and from 1898 until the present time.

WILHELM GERICKE,
Leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Who is Unable to Agree Upon Terms With the Head of That Organization.

Mr. Gericke and his corps of brilliant instrumentalists last appeared in Detroit Nov. 5 last when they drew to the Light Guard armory one of the most select audiences of music lovers that had gathered in this city in years.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
MAR 4 1906

With deep gratification on the part of the managers, the announcement was sent out last week to the 40 men and women who were instrumental in bringing the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Buffalo for two superb concerts this season, that the generous patronage for both recitals rendered it unnecessary to call upon the guarantors to make good a deficit.

It was not until the October concert that it was thought possible to give two such expensive recitals here without financial loss. To bring the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Buffalo was a tremendous undertaking, especially when two high-priced soloists appeared with the orchestra in February, but Buffalo certainly arose to its opportunities with the result that the guarantors have the happy realization that they secured for this city two of the finest concerts ever given here, and this without personal loss.

Next season, encouraged by this winter's record, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will again come to Buffalo, giving two and perhaps three concerts. This is the first and only time that an orchestra has played here under a guarantee without necessitating a call upon its backers, and it required the greatest orchestra in America to establish the record.

WASHINGTON D C
ess
MAR 4 1906

Among the novelties included in the home concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season was the symphony in C minor, by Amherst Webber, the pianist and accompanist, who visited Washington this year with the Eames Concert Company. Other works performed for the first time at these concerts were Elgar's overture, "In the South," a ballad for barytone and orchestra, by F. Converse; the symphonic poem, "Odysseus," by Ernest Boehe; the violin concerto in F sharp minor of Strube, one of the first violinists of the orchestra; Dvorak's symphonic poem, "The Wood Dove;" Smetana's overture to the opera, "Libussa," Busoni's comedy overture in C major, Franck's "Psyche et Eros," Haydn's symphony in B flat (B. & H. No. 8), Chaussen's symphony in B flat, Mahler's C-sharp symphony (repeated by request), Paine's prelude to "The Birds" of Aristophanes, Sinding's violin concerto in A [illegible] Chapuisot's symphonic poem, om EXPRESS

ldress
te

The announcement of Wilhelm Gericke's resignation as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has caused a sensation. Mr. Gericke will go back to Europe to live next May.

[illegible] London, 1881; New York,

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
POST
MAR 18 1906

Boston Symphony Quartet at Willard's Hotel Monday Evening, March 26.

Boston's final contribution to Washington's present season of music will be made on next Monday week, March 26, when the Boston Symphony Quartet will give its third and last evening of chamber music in the ballroom of the New Willard Hotel. While the public attracted by chamber music is necessarily much smaller than that by orchestral, the support given to the Boston Symphony Quartet in this its first season in Washington has been most gratifying, and in return the quartet may truly be said to have given adequate satisfaction to those who have gone to the concerts.

The next concert will bring as the assisting artist Mme. Olga Samaroff, whose playing here with the Philadelphia Orchestra recently made such a profound impression on Washington music lovers. With Prof. Willy Hess, she will play Richard Strauss' Sonata for pianoforte and violin in E flat major, op. 18. Week before last she played this work with Prof. Hess in New York, and the critics were most enthusiastic in their praise of the performance. The other works on the programme will be Mozart's Quartet in C major (K. 465) and Beethoven's Quartet in C major, op. 59, No. 3.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
NEW YORK EV'G POST
ss

"From a high official source," the Musical Courier hears that "the real reason for the resignation of Wilhelm Gericke as head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was not the refusal of Col. Higginson to raise the conductor's salary $3,000 yearly—as has been whispered about in New York by certain irresponsible music reporters. No such refusal ever emanated from Col. Higginson, for the very simple reason that no such demand was ever made by Mr. Gericke. The real reason for the resignation of that gentleman was this: With the expiration of Gericke's long contract this spring, Col. Higginson did not find himself in a position to renew Mr. Gericke's engagement in future for more than one year at a time, and was willing to retain him on that basis and to make a contract from season to season. Mr. Gericke, in justice to himself, could not accept such an arrangement, and held out for a contract that would cover five years, or, at the least, three. Col. Higginson remaining obdurate on the point of not binding himself further ahead than one year, Mr. Gericke was compelled, much to his regret, to tender his resignation. There was no break of any kind between the conductor and the owner of the orchestra, and at no point of the negotiations did the discussion become acrimonious or even warm. Mr. Gericke and Col. Higginson parted with mutual expressions of good will and hearty sympathy."

SUN
BALTIMORE MD
ss
MAR 18 1906

Last Of Peabody Recitals.

The last of this season's series of Peabody recitals will be given Friday afternoon, April 6, when Henri Marteau, the eminent violinist, will be the soloist. Mr. Marteau appeared as soloist at the concluding concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra here last Wednesday evening, when he gave such a successful rendition of the Jacques-Dalcroze concerto in C minor.

Miss Annie S. Haines, a graduate of the Peabody Conservatory and an especially gifted young woman, will give the free organ recital at the Peabody this afternoon.

Following will be the program:

"Symphony No. 5," Widor; Adagio from "Lenore Symphony," Raff; "Christmas Musette," Mailly.

Miss Muriel Abbott will play two violin

[239]

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
RECORD
MAR 18 1906

THEIR LITTLE MISTAKE

How a Couple Came to Lose Front Seats at the Revival.

Last Monday evening a tremendous crowd of music lovers waited patiently (as only music lovers can) for nearly an hour outside the Academy of Music, where the Boston Symphony Orchestra was to give its final concert of the season.

As the long line poured into the door leading to the amphitheatre it came to a sudden halt, the reason for which created no little mirth and jollying among those who were near enough to witness the amusing incident.

It appears that a couple bought their tickets, and as they were handed their programs discovered, to their intense astonishment, that these bulky booklets showed no evidence of containing a single Torrey-Alexander sermon or hymn.

"Doesn't the revival meeting take place here to-night?" they asked the ticket taker, in surprised tone.

"I guess you've got into the wrong place," laughed the man in uniform, as he designated the place of the Torrey meeting. "You can have your money back."

Then the crowd laughed.

"Oh, we can use those tickets all right to-night and a good many more," remarked the box-office man as he continued to hand out the blue slips with lightning rapidity.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.

D'Harcourt—Overture to opera "Tasso." First time.
Liszt—Concerto in E-flat major, No. 1, for pianoforte and orchestra.
Mr. Rudolph Ganz, Soloist.
Macdowell—"Lancelot and Elaine." Symphonic Poem (after Tennyson). Op. 25.
Beethoven—Symphony, No. 8, in F major, Op. 93.

The concert was one of more than ordinary interest, and the programme excellently balanced. The presence of a new soloist, the performance of a new work, and the repetition of a great native composition combined to make the occasion noteworthy. D'Harcourt's "Tasso" overture, after an apparent start in the vein of modern dissonance, changed its character almost at once and displayed the most suave melodic style.

Its themes were attractive. Its orchestration always effective, if not strikingly powerful, and the many "cantilena" passages most pleasingly melodious. If the work had a fault, it leaned too much toward the light and popular vein. But this tendency is not a bad one, at present; for many modern composers have misled us into the idea that music is meant only to paint melodramatic subjects in glaring colors, or solve ethical problems with a hundred and twenty instruments. Be virtuous and you must be unhappy, according to the code of the dissonance-mongers; and a partial return to the simpler style is certainly welcome.

The great Liszt concerto, with its earnest opening and its serene beauty, afforded Mr. Ganz an excellent introduction to our concerts. Liszt's fame as a composer is of comparatively recent growth, but rests upon a sure foundation. The excessive embroidery of notes in his piano solos and transcriptions drew attention first to his technical attainments, though it was part of a definite plan, which has been alluded to as the orchestration of the pianoforte.

The best of his larger works, however, remain monuments of expressive power, and grow by repeated hearing. Mr. Ganz is a young Swiss composer of some note, now settled in Chicago. He gave the Liszt work with excellent command of expression though inclined to over-sentimentalize a trifle at first. He showed himself possessed of the utmost technical facility, and displayed excellent discretion in making it a means rather than an end. The many recalls he received were no more than his due.

"Lancelot and Elaine" proved itself a masterpiece. If Macdowell rates it less high than his later works, because of its descriptive programme tendencies, the public may not agree with him. The symphonic poem has become the chief modern form, and its very essence depends upon the programme idea. This does not necessarily imply deliberate tone-painting, such as the "Don Quixote" variations of Strauss, but may mean a more general picture of moods and feelings suggested by a well-chosen title.

Music is the language of emotion, not of description, and the subject of this work gives ample scope for the portrayal of beauty and chivalry without the need of minute explanatory details. The many phases of the poem are depicted with a master hand, and the work will hold its rank with the very best of its kind in all lands.

Incidentally, the orchestra gave it a rendering that seemed absolute perfection. Mr. Gericke's long training has given the orchestra a technical proficiency that enables him to obtain the most exquisite effects of delicacy in shading. Such readings as that of the Macdowell work last Saturday, or the "Tod und Verklaerung" earlier in the season, are veritable triumphs, and prove that mere blatancy is not the only method, nor even the best, in rendering the great modern works.

The eighth symphony, which brought the evening to a joyous conclusion, gave further evidence of orchestral excellence, and the clean-cut phrasing of the instruments brought fresh laurels to performers and conductor.

Arthur Elson.

Boston Transcript
324 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON, MASS.
SATURDAY, MARCH 24, 1906

IN THE WORLD OF MUSIC

EARLY MACDOWELL AT THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

Mr. Ganz Plays Liszt's Concerto with Tempered Brilliance—A New Overture—The Choral Art Society in Old Madrigals—Bauer's Farewell—Other Concerts to Come—Musical News

The grievous and irreparable fate that has stricken Mr. MacDowell in the ripening maturity of his powers has quickened curiosity about his music and esteem for it. Now, when he will write no more, we that profess an interest in serious music are lamenting him as the composer of just distinction that we should have hailed ten years and more ago—the composer, in fact, that Germans and Englishmen discovered at his true worth before some of us, his countrymen, did at home. MacDowell clubs are spreading knowledge and appreciation of his work; Mr. Hamlin Garland is much in earnest in the matter; and conductors are putting MacDowell's music on their programmes. Yet by its intrinsic force of imagination and its individual qualities of expression it was making its way, and will make its way, without any of these extraneous aids which the composer himself in his sincere and reliant heart but lightly esteemed. Moreover, it is not in his music for orchestra—hardly even in the "Indian suite," which excels all that went before, or in the piano concertos—that his most characteristic qualities run finest and shine clearest. They are in some of his songs and some of his piano pieces—most of all in his "Heroic" and his "Keltic" sonatas. Curiously, too, it is his earlier orchestral pieces that the conductors are oftenest choosing, and MacDowell's power to impart his imaginings as he himself saw and felt them, gathered strength and fineness slowly. Always his expression through an orchestra was individual, but for long it fell short of what he willed. The other day in New York it was the orchestral fragments, "The Fair Alda" and "The Saracens," that Mr. Damrosch chose for performance. And yesterday at our Symphony concert, it was "Launcelot and Elaine" that Mr. Gericke picked. Now all this music MacDowell wrote twenty years ago, when he was a very young man, and his friends recall how in later days he smiled gently at it as "youthful."

Persuade one's self as one may—and it is a time when one would think and write most warmly of MacDowell's music—the poetic and imaginative contents of "Lancelot and Elaine" and the musical expression of them do falter. Once and again, there is a poignant and vivid melody like the measures for the oboe that suggest Elaine, but soon the musical picture wavers or turns cloudy. There are passages in the tournament music and in the music of Lancelot's overthrow that catch the voice and glamor of chivalry, only to become halting or misty. There are details of exquisite imagination and of very felicitous expression in the close of the tone-poem as the dead Elaine, "as though she smiled" drifts past Lancelot's eyes. But they are details only, though it is easy to add twenty more, some very subtle and others very poignant. Elsewhere the music wavers. By some curious and evasive sympathy, under such a performance as Mr. Gericke and his men gave of it, the listener half catches the fine intensity of mood and clear delicacy of understanding that Tennyson's poem awoke in MacDowell. As often he wholly feels that the composer cannot put what he would into his tones. The design that should be fine and clear blurs vaguely. The atmosphere that should pervade becomes fitful and obscure. The composer's poetic sensibility expresses itself oftenest and most vividly only in poignant or subtle details. The music is very seldom quite sure, quite final. Rarely does it summon unerringly the image that it would raise and transport the hearer with it, as Wagner does, for example, in the twenty measures of "Parsifal" through which the knights troop along the forest. Perhaps, however, some of this vagueness lies in the musical evasiveness of the Arthurian legends themselves. They have fascinated many a composer—Chausson for example—as they did MacDowell. Then when he would put them into tones, they have evaded him. Somehow they seem musically bodiless. Yet Tennyson isolated them, as the chemists say, in his verse, and MacDowell was more than half a poet too. Perhaps, he of all composers has come nearest to such achievement in his "Sonata Eroica" with its sub-title of "Arthur, flower of kings."

The rest of the concert was brilliancy rampant. In New York poor MacDowell had his orchestral fragments thrust beside Beethoven's eighth symphony, and yesterday "Lancelot and Elaine" stood over against it again. And that symphony is all quick surety of invention and expression. The themes, the development, the figures spring to life before the listener's very ears. The mere ardor of it transports. The high spirits of it smite. For the instant you forget that music could ever falter or blur—it must go irresistibly onward, as Mr Gericke and the band played it, rippling up details and ornament out of the broad rush of the whole. The wind of fancy, almost a gale of it, blew through the music.

D'Harcourt's overture to his opera of "Tasso," the new music of the afternoon, went on and on, too; but it was a shallow stream, if it was turbulent now and then, and its brilliancy was altogether thin and superficial. How amiable the life of this Monsieur Le Comte d'Harcourt must be—"man of property," as the programme book respectfully called him—with the writing of music and the performing of it for his pastimes! He has mused on the formal [illegible] of Salvator Rosa, the long-drawn [illegible] and the hollow tonal knows the ways of the opera at Paris. And poor old Barbier, librettist to Gounod ages ago as it now seems, made him a libretto out of the story of Tasso, and Mr. Gericke, chronically hard pressed for new overtures that are even presentable, found d'Harcourt's and played it. Steadily it "sounded"—now pompously, now stridently, now in amorous or repining cantilena. There was much ingenious workmanship in it. There was some brilliancy of tone. It had intelligence. But there was not a real melodic idea or a real musical emotion. Tasso, poet, courtier, lover, madman, leaps out of Liszt's tone-poem. The glow of his time is over him. D'Harcourt's Tasso is an operatic tenor, striding down to the footlights to salute his Leonora—and the audience—with a romanza. He is as amiable as the count himself.

Liszt's first concerto as Mr. Ganz and Mr. Gericke played it had genuine brilliancy, but a curiously tempered brightness. A pianist, if he have the inspiration, imagination and power, may play the concerto as though it were a magnificent impromptu, a glorious improvisation that catches up the orchestra with it and sweeps the audience into it, until virtuoso, band and listeners are drunk with the music. Or, if he choose, he may play it as Mr. Joseffy does, shifting with the nicest hand a delicate kaleidoscope of soft tonal tints—the glaring and torrential Liszt subdued to half-lights in a windless chamber. Mr. Ganz and Mr. Gericke have found a third way. Their Liszt was all brilliancy, but it was cool, calm, ordered, detached. There was no heat of fiery improvisation in it. Neither was there an unduly soft and shadowed radiance. Pianist and conductor kept the coolest heads in the world. The one was master of his instrument and the other of his band. There were melting fusings, sparkling contrasts and clear and pliant interplay of piano and orchestra. There were the nicest and the surest modulations and adjustments of tone. Mr. Ganz and Mr. Gericke grasped the whole design, the large moods, the smallest detail and the merely momentary fancies of the music. They were intelligence personified. They were masterful with an unerring mastery. They made the music as brilliant as the stars on a clear autumn night—and as impersonal.

H. T. P.

/ / + / /

Concerts Next Week

Mr. Busoni's "Chivalric" suite for orchestra is to be played for the first time in America at the twentieth pair of Symphony concerts in Symphony Hall, next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. "Geharnischte," Mr. Busoni calls the suite in its German title—"In Harness," as the chroniclers used to say of the mediæval knights—and in the music he has sought to reflect something of the glamor and glory of their knighthood, as poets and romancers have pictured it. The other orchestral numbers of the programme are Brahms's fourth symphony, of which Mr. Gericke is a master, and Bach's suite in D major, which should reveal all the beauty of the string choir of our band. Mrs. Hissem de Moss is the singer for the two concerts, in the "Queen of the Night's" second air from Mozart's "Magic Flute" and "O, Had I Jubal's Lyre," from Händel's "Joshua"—both music that will show her skill in colortura.

The second concert of the orchestra for the increase of its pension fund takes place in Symphony Hall on Sunday evening, April 1, with a programme drawn wholly from Wagner's operas—the overture, spinning chorus and Senta's ballad from "The Flying Dutchman"; the introduction ("Tannhäuser's Pilgrimage") to Act III. and Elisabeth's prayer from "Tannhäuser"; fragments of "Siegfried" and "Götterdämmerung," probably Richter's arrangement of Siegfried's ascent to Brünnhilde's rock and his Rhine-journey; the feast of the Grail Knights from the first act of "Parsifal," and the prelude and final scene from "Tristan." Mrs. de Moss will sing Senta's and Elisabeth's music; the Thursday Morning Club the chorus of Senta's maidens, and the Apollo Club the choruses of the Grail Knights. How admirable a conductor Mr. Gericke is in operatic music we all know, and he has made no "Wagner programme" since last November.

After Mr. Gericke had appeared for the last times in New York, a week ago, some of his friends there entertained him at supper, and in the course of it he made a very sincere little speech to them—a speech which is at once the measure and the portrait of the man and the conductor. One of the company writes of it this way: "At the close of two hours of delightful and friendly companionship, Mr. Gericke said his words of good-by to the men who had met to do him honor, by telling the following story: 'Many years ago in Vienna I heard Heinrich Esser conduct Flotow's opera "Stradella." I had at that time the contempt of the young men of my school for this particular school of Italian music. As the opera proceeded I found to my astonishment that Esser was giving the score the same careful interpretation that he would give to one of the great works of music. After the opera was over I met him and expressed my astonishment, and asked him to explain how he could treat so trivial a work with so much respect. I have never forgotten his reply: "My friend," he said, "whatever I have to do I try to do with honesty and sincerity." This," continued Mr. Gericke, "made a deep impression upon me, and I have ever since endeavored to make it my rule of conduct in my professional life."

The Boston Post

19TH SYMPHONY CONCERT

Rudolf Ganz, pianist, was the soloist of the nineteenth Symphony concert last evening, and the following was the programme presented:

Overture to "Tasso".....D'Harcourt
Concerto for piano in E flat.....Liszt
Symphonic poem, "Lancelot and Elaine"....MacDowell
Symphony No. 8, in F major.....Beethoven

The "Tasso" overture was new to this city. The opera was first given at Monte Carlo three years ago. The overture is pleasing music, often brilliant, and effectively scored.

Eugene D'Harcourt, composer of "Tasso," is a French musician of whom little if anything is known in this country, excepting to a very few. Somewhat over 50 years of age, he is living in Paris, and has been active for many years there, either giving concerts, composing music in many forms or writing articles on musical subjects. He is one of abundant means, and unlike many eminent composers, his life has been cast for the most part in pleasant places. None of his works have become known here, and the overture heard at this concert is believed to have been given for the first time in this country, as well as in this city. It was most effectively performed, as was also Mr. MacDowell's symphonic poem, "Lancelot and Elaine," a most imaginative work, and one that deserves more frequent performances, for it has not been heard here for over seven years.

Mr. Ganz made an exceedingly favorable impression on his first appearance at these concerts. He has a superb technic, a sympathetic tone quality, and apparently temperamental qualities, possessed by few of the younger pianists. He played the showy Liszt concerto with overwhelming brilliancy, ease of manner and authoritative grasp that gained him an immense ovation and many recalls. He is one of the best pianists heard here for some time, and his recital on Monday afternoon will be awaited with much interest.

PENSION FUND CONCERT

The approaching end of the season of Symphony concerts is always signalled by the announcement of the pension fund concert, given for the benefit of the fund to protect members of the Symphony Orchestra when they have become disabled by age or other causes and are no longer fit for their work.

The concert will be given on next Sunday night, April 1. For this Mr. Gericke has arranged a programme made up entirely of excerpts from Wagner's operas and music dramas, but the selections will show a considerable departure from those which are usually found in such programmes.

The purely orchestral numbers will be the overture to "The Flying Dutchman," selections from "Siegfried" and "Dusk of the Gods," and the introduction and "Love's Death" from "Tristan and Isolde."

Even more interesting will be the vocal part of the programme. Both the Thursday Morning Club and the Apollo Club have volunteered their services for this concert, which will make possible the performance of excerpts rarely heard on the concert stage. The soloist will be Mrs. Hissem de Moss, a soprano who is one of the most popular native artists now in the concert field.

The Boston Journal

SYMPHONY GIVES NEW OVERTURE

"Tasso," by a French Nobleman, Programmed — Rudolf Ganz, Soloist, Aroused Enthusiasm.

A new overture by a rich French nobleman, more than a mere dilettante in his art, was an interesting feature of the nineteenth Symphony concert. Count D'Harcourt, when he wrote his opera, "Tasso," was, of course, impressed by the tragic nature of his theme, and yet his overture sounds no prevailing note of gloom or sorrow. It does not prepare the hearer for an opera of large and elemental passion; perhaps purposely it is intended to put one into a mood of pomp and circumstance, and then let the onmarch of tragedy make its own special appeal. At any rate, the noble gentleman has produced something that is eminently respectable, rather tinkling and smooth as to its orchestral colors, and uninspiring so far as any deep emotions go. It arouses no special desire to hear the whole opera.

MacDowell's "Launcelot and Elaine" symphonic poem, the fruit of his early and perhaps unsettled years, still holds its own as a piece of imaginative beauty. After the French count's superficiality, it sounded like the clear call of a nature filled to the brim with poetry and bubbling over with the spirit of enthusiastic youth. MacDowell, stricken down, will compose no more—and great is the loss to American art—but what he has done already is still vital and seems likely long to remain so. The tone-poem was played sympathetically and with rare perfection—rare except to this orchestra, that is.

The soloist was Rudolf Ganz, and he chose Liszt's sparkling and sonorous E flat concerto. It was just the vehicle for his special gift, that of brilliant and crisp technique and a dashing style. He made the hackneyed work nobly impressive once more and aroused merited enthusiasm.

Beethoven's jovial Eighth Symphony brought the concert to a close, full of simple beauty. Its performance was admirable in every way.

Boston Sunday
SUNDAY, MARCH 25, 1906

MUSICAL MATTERS

Rudolph Ganz, Soloist at the Symphony.

Second of the Season's Concerts by Choral Art Society.

Bauer's Farewell Recital—Preludes and Echoes.

D. Harcourt's overture to the opera, "Tasso" was the orchestral novelty on the Symphony program last week; Mr Rudolph Ganz made his debut at these concerts as soloist in Liszt's E-flat major piano concerto, Mr E. A. MacDowell was represented by his symphonic poem, "Lancelot and Elaine" and Beethoven's eighth symphony completed the list. The "Tasso" overture is composed of brief excerpts from the opera and gives hints of various episodes in the story without attempting to utilize new thematic material to any great extent. Melodies of the opera are merely suggested, there is no extended development and the work is clearly an overture and not specially intended as a program piece. It was given an effective interpretation, the homogeneous work of the orchestra being up to its usual standard.

Liszt's piano concerto at the hands of Mr Ganz was a brilliant and refined performance, despite the almost monotonous character of the solo part. His finger work was charmingly crisp and delicate in the opening and closing portions, very tender, yet perfectly clear, in the legato passages in the slow movement. His pianissime playing was notably distinct and the perfect accord between soloist and orchestra made the performance one fully deserving the enthusiastic plaudits given at the termination. Mr Ganz gives a recital here this week which will afford further opportunity to judge of his abilities as a pianist.

"Cut is the branch that might have grown full straight, and burned is Apollo's laurel bough," is the touchingly appropriate couplet on the program page referring to Mr MacDowell's intention to write an opera on an Arthurian legend, a purpose never to be consummated by reason of the sad affliction which has closed his career as a composer. Mr MacDowell's poem, "Lancelot and Elaine," is generally accepted to be a musical picture of scenes in which the knight, Guinevere and Elaine figure, closing with the well-known incident pictured as "the dead steered by the dumb." The plaintive nature of the work, as a whole, and the beautiful orchestration with its many contrasting motifs, make a very appealing composition and the sad associations connected with the performance made the piece sound unusually impressive. It was magnificently played. And the grand Eighth symphony of Beethoven was also a fine example of ensemble work. The audience was lavish with plaudits for Mr Gericke, as well as the orchestra and soloist.

Mrs Hissem de Moss will be this week's soloist, singing arias from Handel's oratorio, "Joshua" and Mozart's "Magic Flute." The orchestral selections will include Bach's D major suite, Busoni's "Geharnischte" suite, and Brahms' Fourth symphony.

[240]

The Standard.
TUESDAY, MARCH 20, 1906.

STON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA PLAYS BEFORE VERY APPRECIATIVE AUDIENCE.

llness of Herr Gericke Made It Necessary For Concertmeister Hess to Act as Conductor, Which Change Left a Vacancy in the Violin Section of the Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony orchestra has me and gone, and the aftermath of scussion which usually follows such ents now reigns in full sway. The neral tone of the audience as it left e theatre last evening was one of gh satisfaction with the concert, hich is much of a tribute to the or hestra in view of the difficulties en countered by the audience in reaching e theatre.

Owing to the unexpected illness of rr Wilhelm Gericke, the conductor's aton was entrusted to Concertmeister Villy Hess. Prof. Hess is no novice in he art of conducting, and has gained a plendid reputation for his work. His osition as concertmeister of the or chestra naturally makes him the one on whom Gericke's mantle should fall. Be fore the magic horn of Oberon had sounded its final note in the overture, he audience had completely recovered from its momentary disappointment and Prof. Hess was recognized at his rue value; a conductor second to none in the country.

On the other hand, Hess as conductor left a deplorable vacancy in the ranks of the first violins. In the Tschaikowski selection at the end of the programme there is a somewhat lengthy violin solo, which was necessarily omitted. This was much of a disappointment to those in the audience who were familiar with the work of Prof. Hess with the violin, on which instrument he is little short of a wizard.

The first selection on the programme was the overture to Weber's fairy opera, "Oberon," a number which is not very familiar in this country. The open ng of the overture is light and dreamy, nd contains many beautiful passages or the wood-wind instruments. The rumpet call of Oberon, king of the fai ies, is heard softly and answered by the strings. The main portion of the overture begins with a crashing chord, and the tempo, allegro con fuoco, is continued to the end. The finale of the overture is dramatic and spirited and last evening carried the audience off its feet. The applause was spontaneous and long continued and showed a true appreciation of the music.

The soprano solo of Mme. Charlotte Maconda proved a pleasant variation from the orchestral numbers. Her first number was an exquisitely beautiful aria from Mozart's "Il Re Pastore," but this was not appreciated as much as a more forceful and dramatic selection from the French opera "Louise," by Charpentier. Mme. Maconda's temperament and voice seemed more suited to the latter selection and the audience answered it with thunders of applause. She was recalled three or four times, but did not fulfill the audience's hope of an encore.

The symphony selected for the concert was Beethoven's second, in D major, op. 36. A foot note in the programme explains that this symphony "is full of innocent pleasure and frank gayety," although written at a time when Bethoven was almost in despair from his deafness which was growing upon him, and from acute illness. The second and third movements, Larghetto, and Scherzo, in particular are graceful and gay and full of surprising effects. The themes are delicate and soft, and skip lightly from instrument to instrument. Throughout the scherzo there is a feeling as of suppressed laughter struggling to express itself, and the whole symphony is characterized by a total lack of grandeur and tragic effects so often found in Beethoven's later works.

Liszt's symphonic poem, "The Lament and Triumph of Tasso," is indeed tragic and gloomy in marked contrast to the symphony. The "symphonic poem" is a form of music invented by Liszt and, as the name indicates, is a poem in music. "The Lament of Tasso" depicts the ill-fated Italian poet brooding over his misfortunes. The theme is uttered by the deeper instruments, and is weird and melancholy. There are strange outbursts with jarring discords, as of anger, and wailing chromatic runs in the strings and wood-wind. The second portion of the "Lament" portrays a scene at the court of Ferarra. A menuet is given lightly, and the theme is worked out at great length. A long and extended crescendo, characteristic of Liszt, leads to a tremendous climax, Tasso's "Triumph." The selection closes with the full blare of the brass instruments, and crashing cymbals and drums. Even in Tasso's triumph the note is not happy, but grand, and rather tragic than otherwise.

The concluding number of the programme was a theme with variations by Tschaikowski. The simple theme is given out by the strings, and is developed and carried at different times by all the principal instruments of the orchestra. The most enjoyable portion of this number is the finale which is in Tschaikowski's best vein.

The playing of the orchestra throughout the evening was, as usual, above criticism. About two-thirds of the full orchestra was present.

The concert demonstrated conclusively that Smith's theatre is not a good edifice for acoustic effects, for the tone of the orchestra is much more brilliant under better surroundings. The criticism was heard last evening that the programme was too classical for a Bridgeport audience but if so, it is hard to account for the tremendous and sustained applause which followed every number.

There were many vacant seats, notably in the galleries, which would have been filled under better weather conditions. Last evening's concert was the most important musical event in the history of the city, and it is to be hoped that the Boston Symphony orchestra's first concert here is not also to be its last.

BRIDGEPORT EVENING POST, TUESDAY, MARCH 20, 1906.

THE BASS DRUMMER'S TRIBUTE TO THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Realization in Regard to Last Night's Concert Surpassed Anticipation.

The old saying that the greatest pleasure that one derives from any given event lies in the anticipation of it does not quite apply to last evening's concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and yet this morning finds us regretting the fact that it is over, and we shall have no more of it for this season at least.

When the announcement was first made that the orchestra was coming, most of us were non-believers. It seemed next to impossible that we, here in Bridgeport, should have the extreme pleasure of listening to the magic strains of Mozart, Weber, Beethoven and other of the classic masters, performed by one of the finest and best-drilled bodies of musicians in the world.

"Little Mamo in Slumberland" should awake with a jar and rub our eyes, saying "Wouldn't it have been lovely, if it had only ben true."

But it was true, and this morning we are, figuratively speaking, rubbing our eyes to think that despite the worst storm of years, Smith's theatre, large as it is, was literally "packed to the roof."

I saw the musicians look in what seemed to me a wondering sort of way to the immense orchestra floor and balconies, closely packed with eager listeners and imagine they thought that poor despised Bridgeport, a place formerly to be shunned by such as they, had at last begun to "arrive." In fact had arrived, for the great audience was most attractive and seemingly most appreciative; showering applause upon each and every effort of the artists, from the first magic strains of Weber's inspired overture to "Oberon," until the last chord of the spirited Polacca which closed the G major variations of Tschaikowsky.

There were some who were disappointed that the full instrumentation of the orchestra (about 95 men) were not here. As it was about 60 men played the program. It should be remembered that "balance" is what counts, and that sixty men are as good as one hundred except in immense halls where greater volume of sound is desired. Consequently no one need feel bad because he did not hear the complete orchestra.

Others were regretful of the fact that Mr. Gericke's indisposition prevented his appearance, and that Mr. Willy Hess, the "concert-meister" was obliged to conduct.

I cannot see that there was anything to regret (aside from a pardonable desire to see Gericke) because Mr. Hess is an expert director, and if there was any preliminary doubt as to his fitness, it was soon dispelled by his masterly control of the orchestra his thorough conversance with the score (which he hardly referred to) and is unusual ease and grace. Besides all this Mr. Hess is very distinguished in appearance and looks part of the great artist to perfection.

Mr. Otto Roth, usually at the second desk, and formerly second violin of the Kneisel quartet, took Mr. Hess's seat as "chef d'attaque."

The Oberon overture was charmingly played, and the sprightly and ever vernal D major symphony of Beethoven was given a rather novel reading. Mr. Gericke conducts Beethoven in a rather cold and forbidding manner. Not so Mr. Hess. Beethoven sparkled with mirth, and his scherzo was a real joke; not an imitation when was there such a superb body of strings as that of the Boston band? Such warmth of tone; such a pure, melting and luscious quality and how ravishingly they sang every sustained theme, and daintily and piquantly they "bowed" the speccata passages.

The second symphonic poem of Liszt was played in a broad, dignified and sonorous manner which elicited much applause. The symphonic poems of Liszt are program music or what might be termed descriptive music of the highest class, and its exceeding dramatic coloring makes it unusually interesting to the listener.

The variations of Tschaikowsky which had violin solos and cadenza were omitted, presumably because Mr. Hess, who would probably have played them, was otherwise occupied.

The soloist of the evening, Madame Charlotte Maconda is a stranger to Bridgeport, although she is well known to the American concert stage as its greatest colorature soprano. I have heard her in songs which I thought displayed her voice to better advantage, although she sang beautifully last evening in both her numbers. She excelled in the Aria from Charpentici's "Louise" which she sang exquisitely, but I think she pleased the greater number with the air from Mozart's "Il Re Pastore" in which she shared the honors with Emanuel Fieldler who played the difficult violin obligato with exquisite quality of tone and perfect intonation.

I have taken it for granted that those who are interested in a critical analysis of the compositions comprising the program, were present last evening and if they so wished, could read the admirable sketches by Philip Hale, one of the world's foremost authorities on matters pertaining to music. Consequently I have not attempted any dissection of the music, nor have I felt it necessary to quote Mr. Hale. Much credit has been given before and it may not be amiss to say again, that thanks are due the Wednesday Afternoon Musical club for giving us a chance to enjoy last evening's concert.

And now that the good work has begun, let it go on, until we have become solidly grounded as a musical community.

THE BASS DRUMMER.

Support Appreciated.

The Wednesday Afternoon Musical club is deeply sensible of the magnificent support given it by the people of Bridgeport in the greatest musical undertaking the club has ever attempted. The concert of last evening fully repaid the efforts of the club. It was to be regretted that Mr. Geuede, was through illness, forced to be absent, but the great concert-master of the Symphony orchestra, Mr. Hess, left nothing to be desired in his interpretation of the numbers. The club left the sale of seats to others, and some mistakes had occured which can, with the experience gained, be avoided another year.

Our acknowledgements are due Messrs. Steinert & Sons, for having so ably and gratuitously assisted the club.

On account of the illness of Wilhelm Gericke, the conductor, who was detained in New York, his place was taken by Willy Hess, the concertmeister of the organization, whose reputation as a conductor is as well known in Europe as in this country. This was not a new venture for him, for he has conducted the orchestra on numerous occasions, and only last week did it in Troy, N. Y. There was no disappointment in the change, as Herr Hess' interpretation of the masters was brilliant and full of temperament. He had full control of the orchestra and the men responded to his baton with vigor and precision. There was naturally some disappointment in not seeing Mr. Gericke conduct, as many who were present desired to see him, as the present is his last season with this famous band of musicians, and they supposed that they would see him on his farewell tour. However, from a musical standpoint, there was no disappointment.

Ranks With the World's Finest.

The Boston Symphony orchestra takes rank with the finest in the world; and the players sustained their reputation last evening. This body of musicians is the best to be had on their respective instruments and years of ensemble playing makes them an ideal body for the interpretation of the highest form or music—the symphony. The tone coloring of the different sections of instruments was beautiful, and the interpretation of the masters by Herr Willy Hess was faultless.

The Beautiful "Oberon" Overture.

The concert opened with the ever pleasing overture from the opera "Oberon," by Weber, which was written under contract for an English manager in 1826 and finished a year later. Weber was a very sick man when he wrote it, and did it against the advice of his physicians, and the effort cost him his life, for shortly after its completion he was found dead in his bed in London. Weber was the founder of the school of romantic opera, and the overture of "Oberon" is considered one of the most beautiful that he wrote. The wood wind especially in this number showed marvelous technique ability and delightful tone color.

Mme. Maconda's Selections.

The second number was an aria from Mozart's "Il Re Pastore," sung by Mme. Charlotte Maconda, who was the soloist of the evening. This composition is very ungrateful for the performers on account of its technical difficulties. Mme. Maconda sang evidently with effort, and did not appear to be in sympathy with the orchastra. The violin obligato to this number was the enjoyable feature. Her second number on the program was an aria from the opera "Louise," which is at present all the rage in Europe. This is by the French composer, Charpentier. This selection showed Mme. Maconda to very much better advantage. She possesses a soprano voice of sympathetic quality, full and round. Mme. Maconda sang with more warmth in the last number, and the orchestra showed more familiarity with the [illegible]

The third number on the program, and the most important, was Beethoven"s famous symphony, No. 2, in D major, op 36 ,and was rendered only as this body of artists can play it. The different shadings were marvelous, especially the third movement. which was played as daintily by the 60 performers, as it would have been by an individual player. The fourth movement, the allegro molto, went off with a dash, and a musical spirit only possible in a great orchestra.

The Liszt Number.

The number by Liszt from the Tasso's symphonic poem, No. 2, "Lament and Triumph,'" was one of the delightful selections of the program. Its orchestration is quite heavy, and the instruments of percussion take quite a prominent part. The brass section of this number showed beautiful tone quality, especially the trumpets. The clarionet solo was one of the most artistic renderings ever heard in concert. The tone quality of the instrument being both full and round.

Tschaikowsky's Theme and Variations

The last number on the program was from Tschaikowsky's "Theme and Variations" from suite No. 3, in G. major, op. 55. This composition revealed the mind of the master, and was a revelation to the students of theory. The theme was worked out in various forms. First by the strings. then the wood, followed by the brass in all conceivable forms—in fuges, chorals, and dance forms ending in a polonaise in which all the instruments have snatches of the theme. which come and go, and ending with a tremendous forte. In this number the orchestra showed its fine technique abilities. The interpretation of Herr Hess in the different variations was full of temperament. He worked the musicians up to a climax that thrilled the great audience. This piece was a grand finale and it brought out the full applause of the audience.

Credit for Musical Club.

Now that the Boston Symphony orchestra has paid a visit to Bridgeport, and it has been found that it is no risk, it is honed that this splendid organization will come annually. For its initial appearance Bridgeport is under deep obligation to the ladies of the Wednesday Afternoon Musical club, which was instrumental in bringing the orchestra here. The club made the venture and succeeded better than was anticipated. It is now demonstrated that Bridgeport will re[illegible]

the Board of County Commission- [illegible]

MORNING TELEGRAM-UNION.
TUESDAY, MARCH 20, 1906.

FIRST VISIT OF BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Magnificent Audience Greets the Famous Organization at Smith's Theatre—A Program of Wonderful Merit—Orchestra Brilliantly Conducted by Herr Willy Hess in the Absence of Conductor Gericke, Who was Detained in New York.

The concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra at Smith's theatre last night will rank as the most notable musical event in the history of the city. It was the first visit of this group of artists in this city, and they could not have chosen a worse night. While all was serene in the theatre building there raged outside the worst storm of the winter. Bridgeport people were not to be daunted by the storm, for every seat in the large theatre was taken and there was a row of listeners standing in the lobby back of the seats. The weather was no drawback to the enthusiasm that greeted the orchestra, and although on many of the trolley lines there was a blockade by snow, there was a line of carriages to the [illegible] before and after the concert [illegible] something out

[241]

The Standard.
TUESDAY, MARCH 20, 1906.

STON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA PLAYS BEFORE VERY APPRECIATIVE AUDIENCE.

llness of Herr Gericke Made It Necessary For Concertmeister Hess to Act as Conductor, Which Change Left a Vacancy in the Violin Section of the Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony orchestra has me and gone, and the aftermath of iscussion which usually follows such ents now reigns in full sway. The eneral tone of the audience as it left e theatre last evening was one of ugh satisfaction with the concert, hich is much of a tribute to the or-hestra in view of the difficulties en-ountered by the audience in reaching e theatre.

Owing to the unexpected illness of err Wilhelm Gericke, the conductor's aton was entrusted to Concertmeister Villy Hess. Prof. Hess is no novice in he art of conducting, and has gained a plendid reputation for his work. His osition as concertmeister of the or-hestra naturally makes him the one on whom Gericke's mantle should fall. Be-ore the magic horn of Oberon had ounded its final note in the overture, he audience had completely recovered rom its momentary disappointment nd Prof. Hess was recognized at his rue value; a conductor second to none n the country.

On the other hand, Hess as conductor left a deplorable vacancy in the ranks of the first violins. In the Tschaikowski selection at the end of the programme there is a somewhat lengthy violin solo, which was necessarily omitted. This was much of a disappointment to those in the audience who were familiar with the work of Prof. Hess with the violin, on which instrument he is little short of a wizard.

The first selection on the programme was the overture to Weber's fairy opera, "Oberon," a number which is not very familiar in this country. The open-ng of the overture is light and dreamy, nd contains many beautiful passages or the wood-wind instruments. The rumpet call of Oberon, king of the fai-ies, is heard softly and answered by the strings. The main portion of the overture begins with a crashing chord, and the tempo, allegro con fuoco, is continued to the end. The finale of the overture is dramatic and spirited and last evening carried the audience off its feet. The applause was spontaneous and long continued and showed a true appreciation of the music.

The soprano solo of Mme. Charlotte Maconda proved a pleasant variation from the orchestral numbers. Her first number was an exquisitely beautiful aria from Mozart's "Il Re Pastore," but this was not appreciated as much as a more forceful and dramatic selection from the French opera "Louise," by Charpentier. Mme. Maconda's temper-ament and voice seemed more suited to the latter selection and the audience answered it with thunders of applause. She was recalled three or four times, but did not fulfill the audience's hope of an encore.

The symphony selected for the con-cert was Beethoven's second, in D ma-jor, op. 36. A foot note in the pro-gramme explains that this symphony "is full of innocent pleasure and frank gayety," although written at a time when Bethoven was almost in despair from his deafness which was growing upon him, and from acute illness. The second and third movements, Larghet-to, and Scherzo, in particular are grace-ful and gay and full of surprising ef-fects. The themes are delicate and soft, and skip lightly from instrument to in-strument. Throughout the scherzo there is a feeling as of suppressed laughter struggling to express itself, and the whole symphony is character-ized by a total lack of grandeur and tragic effects so often found in Beetho-ven's later works.

Liszt's symphonic poem, "The La-ment and Triumph of Tasso," is in-deed tragic and gloomy in marked con-trast to the symphony. The "symphonic poem" is a form of music invented by Liszt and, as the name indicates, is a poem in music. "The Lament of Tasso" depicts the ill-fated Italian poet brood-ing over his misfortunes. The theme is uttered by the deeper instruments, and is weird and melancholy. There are strange outbursts with jarring discords, as of anger, and wailing chromatic runs in the strings and wood-wind. The second portion of the "Lament" por-trays a scene at the court of Ferarra. A menuet is given lightly, and the theme is worked out at great length. A long and extended crescendo, charac-teristic of Liszt, leads to a tremendous climax, Tasso's "Triumph." The selec-tion closes with the full blare of the brass instruments, and crashing cym-bals and drums. Even in Tasso's tri-umph the note is not happy, but grand, and rather tragic than otherwise.

The concluding number of the pro-gramme was a theme with variations by Tschaikowski. The simple theme is given out by the strings, and is devel-oped and carried at different times by all the principal instruments of the or-chestra. The most enjoyable portion of this number is the finale which is in Tschaikowski's best vein.

The playing of the orchestra through-out the evening was, as usual, above criticism. About two-thirds of the full orchestra was present.

The concert demonstrated conclusive-ly that Smith's theatre is not a good edifice for acoustic effects, for the tone of the orchestra is much more brilliant under better surroundings. The criti-cism was heard last evening that the programme was too classical for a Bridgeport audience but if so, it is hard to account for the tremendous and sustained applause which followed every number.

There were many vacant seats, nota-bly in the galleries, which would have been filled under better weather condi-tions. Last evening's concert was the most important musical event in the history of the city, and it is to be hop-ed that the Boston Symphony orches-tra's first concert here is not also to be its last.

BRIDGEPORT EVENING POST, TUESDAY, MARCH 20, 1906.

THE BASS DRUMMER'S TRIBUTE TO THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Realization in Regard to Last Night's Concert Surpassed Anticipation.

The old saying that the greatest pleasure that one derives from any given event lies in the anticipation of it does not quite apply to last even-ing's concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and yet this morning finds us regretting the fact that it is over, and we shall have no more of it for this season at least.

When the announcement was first made that the orchestra was coming, most of us were non-believers. It seem-ed next to impossible that we, here in Bridgeport, should have the extreme pleasure of listening to the magic strains of Mozart, Weber, Beethoven and other of the classic masters, per-formed by one of the finest and best-drilled bodies of musicians in the world.

"Little Mamo in Slumberland" should awake with a jar and rub our eyes, saying "Wouldn't it have been lovely, if it had only ben true."

But it was true, and this morning we are, figuratively speaking, rubbing our eyes to think that despite the worst storm of years, Smith's theatre, large as it is, was literally "packed to the roof."

I saw the musicians look in what seemed to me a wondering sort of way to the immense orchestra floor and balconies, closely packed with eager listeners and imagine they thought that poor despised Bridgeport, a place formerly to be shunned by such as they, had at last begun to "arrive." In fact had arrived, for the great audience was most attractive and seemingly most appreciative; showering applause upon each and ev-ery effort of the artists, from the first magic strains of Weber's inspired ov-overture to "Oberon," until the last chord of the spirited Polacca which closed the G major variations of Tschaikowsky.

There were some who were disap-pointed that the full instrumentation of the orchestra (about 95 men) were not here. As it was about 60 men played the program. It should be re-membered that "balance" is what counts, and that sixty men are as good as one hundred except in immense halls where greater volume of sound is desired. Consequently no one need feel bad because he did not hear the complete orchestra.

Others were regretful of the fact that Mr. Gericke's indisposition pre-vented his appearance, and that Mr. Willy Hess, the "concert-meister" was obliged to conduct.

I cannot see that there was any-thing to regret (aside from a pardon-able desire to see Gericke) because Mr. Hess is an expert director, and if there was any preliminary doubt as to his fitness, it was soon dispelled by his masterly control of the orchestra his thorough conversance with the score (which he hardly referred to) and is unusual ease and grace. Be-sides all this Mr. Hess is very dis-tinguished in appearance and looks part of the great artist to perfection.

Mr. Otto Roth, usually at the sec-ond desk, and formerly second violin of the Kneisel quartet, took Mr. Hess's seat as "chef d'attaque."

The Oberon overture was charming-ly played, and the sprightly and ever vernal D major symphony of Beethov-en was given a rather novel reading. Mr. Gericke conducts Beethoven in a rather cold and forbidding manner. Not so Mr. Hess. Beethoven sparkled with mirth, and his scherzo was a real joke; not an imitation when was there such a superb body of strings as that of the Boston band? Such warmth of tone; such a pure, melting and lus-cious quality and how ravishingly they sang every sustained theme, and daintily and piquantly they "bowed" the speccata passages.

The second symphonic poem of Liszt was played in a broad, dignified and sonorous manner which elicited much applause. The symphonic poems of Liszt are program music or what might be termed descriptive music of the highest class, and its exceeding dramatic coloring makes it unusually interesting to the listener.

The variations of Tschaikowsky which had violin solos and cadenza were omitted, presumably because Mr. Hess, who would probably have played them, was otherwise occupied.

The soloist of the evening, Madame Charlotte Maconda is a stranger to Bridgeport, although she is well known to the American concert stage as its greatest colorature soprano. I have heard her in songs which I thought displayed her voice to better advantage, although she sang beauti-fully last evening in both her num-bers. She excelled in the Aria from Charpentici's "Louise" which she sang exquisitely, but I think she pleased the greater number with the air from Mozart's "Il Re Pastore" in which she shared the honors with Emanuel Fieldler who played the difficult vio-lin obligato with exquisite quality of tone and perfect intonation.

I have taken it for granted that those who are interested in a critical analysis of the compositions compris-ing the program, were present last evening and if they so wished, could read the admirable sketches by Philip Hale, one of the world's foremost au-thorities on matters pertaining to music. Consequently I have not at-tempted any dissection of the music, nor have I felt it necessary to quote Mr. Hale. Much credit has been given before and it may not be amiss to say again, that thanks are due the Wed-nesday Afternoon Musical club for giving us a chance to enjoy last even-ing's concert.

And now that the good work has begun, let it go on, until we have be-come solidly grounded as a musical community.

THE BASS DRUMMER.

Support Appreciated.

The Wednesday Afternoon Mu-sical Club is deeply sensible of the ... fice ... support given it by the people of Bridgeport in the greatest musical undertaking the club has ever at-tempted. The concert of last evening fully repaid the efforts of the club. It was to be regretted that Mr. Geuedc, was through illness, forced to be absent, but the great concert-master of the Symphony orchestra, Mr. Hess, left nothing to be desired in his interpretation of the numbers. The club left the sale of seats to others, and some mistakes had oc-cured which can, with the experience gained, be avoided another year.

Our acknowledgements are due Messrs. Steinert & Sons, for having so ably and gratuitously assisted the club.

On account of the illness of Wil-helm Gericke, the conductor, who was detained in New York, his place was taken by Willy Hess, the con-certmeister of the organization, whose reputation as a conductor is as well known in Europe as in this country. This was not a new ven-ture for him, for he has conducted the orchestra on numerous occasions, and only last week did it in Troy, N. Y. There was no disappointment in the change, as Herr Hess' inter-pretation of the masters was bril-liant and full of temperament. He had full control of the orchestra and the men responded to his baton with vigor and precision. There was natu-rally some disappointment in not see-ing Mr. Gericke conduct, as many who were present desired to see him, as the present is his last season with this famous band of musicians, and they supposed that they would see him on his farewell tour. However, from a musical standpoint, there was no disappointment.

Ranks With the World's Finest.

The Boston Symphony orchestra takes rank with the finest in the world; and the players sustained their reputation last evening. This body of musicians is the best to be had on their respective instruments and years of ensemble playing makes them an ideal body for the interpretation of the highest form or music—the sym-phony. The tone coloring of the dif-ferent sections of instruments was beautiful, and the interpretation of the masters by Herr Willy Hess was faultless.

The Beautiful "Oberon" Overture.

The concert opened with the ever pleasing overture from the opera "Oberon," by Weber, which was writ-ten under contract for an English manager in 1826 and finished a year later. Weber was a very sick man when he wrote it, and did it against the advice of his physicians, and the effort cost him his life, for shortly after its completion he was found dead in his bed in London. Weber was the founder of the school of ro-mantic opera, and the overture of "Oberon" is considered one of the most beautiful that he wrote. The wood wind especially in this number showed marvelous technique ability and delightful tone color.

Mme. Maconda's Selections.

The second number was an aria from Mozart's "Il Re Pastore," sung by Mme. Charlotte Maconda, who was the soloist of the evening. This com-position is very ungrateful for the performers on account of its technical difficulties. Mme. Maconda sang evi-dently with effort, and did not appear to be in sympathy with the orchastra. The violin obligato to this number was the enjoyable feature. Her sec-ond number on the program was an aria from the opera "Louise," which is at present all the rage in Europe. This is by the French composer, Char-pentier. This selection showed Mme. Maconda to very much better advan-tage. She possesses a soprano voice of sympathetic quality, full and round. Mme. Maconda sang with more warmth in the last number, and the orchestra showed more ... with the ...

The third number on the program, and the most important, was Beet-hoven"s famous symphony, No. 2, in D major, op 36 ,and was rendered only as this body of artists can play it. The different shadings were marvel-ous, especially the third movement, which was played as daintily by the 60 performers, as it would have been by an individual player. The fourth movement, the allegro molto, went off with a dash, and a musical spirit only possible in a great orchestra.

The Liszt Number.

The number by Liszt from the Tasso's symphonic poem, No. 2, "La-ment and Triumph,'" was one of the delightful selections of the program. It's orchestration is quite heavy, and the instruments of percussion take quite a prominent part. The brass sec-tion of this number showed beautiful tone quality, especially the trumpets. The clarionet solo was one of the most artistic renderings ever heard in con-cert. The tone quality of the instru-ment being both full and round.

Tschaikowsky's Theme and Variations

The last number on the program was from Tschaikowsky's "Theme and Variations" from suite No. 3, in G. major, op. 55. This composition re-vealed the mind of the master, and was a revelation to the students of theory. The theme was worked out in various forms. First by the strings, then the wood, followed by the brass in all conceivable forms—in fuges, chorals, and dance forms ending in a polonaise in which all the instruments have snatches of the theme, which come and go, and ending with a tre-mendous forte. In this number the orchestra showed its fine technique abilities. The interpretation of Herr Hess in the different variations was full of temperament. He worked the musicians up to a climax that thrilled the great audience. This piece was a grand finale and it brought out the full applause of the audience.

Credit for Musical Club.

Now that the Boston Symphony or-chestra has paid a visit to Bridgeport, and it has been found that it is no risk, it is honed that this splendid or-ganization will come annually. For its initial appearance Bridgeport is un-der deep obligation to the ladies of the Wednesday Afternoon Musical club, which was instrumental in bringing the orchestra here. The club made the venture and succeeded bet-ter than was anticipated. It is now demonstrated that Bridgeport will re-spond to the best in ... ha...

the Board of County Commission-...

MORNING TELEGRAM-UNION.
TUESDAY, MARCH 20, 1906.

FIRST VISIT OF BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Magnificent Audience Greets the Famous Organization at Smith's Theatre—A Program of Wonderful Merit—Orchestra Brilli-antly Conducted by Herr Willy Hess in the Absence of Conductor Gericke, Who was Detained in New York.

The concert by the Boston Sym-phony orchestra at Smith's theatre last night will rank as the most no-table musical event in the history of the city. It was the first visit of this group of artists in this city, and they could not have chosen a worse night. While all was serene in the theatre building there raged outside the worst storm of the winter. Bridge-port people were not to be daunted by the storm, for every seat in the large theatre was taken and there was a row of listeners standing in the lobby back of the seats. The weather was no drawback to the en-thusiasm that greeted the orchestra, and although on many of the trolley lines there was a blockade by snow, there was a line of carriages to the ... before and after the concert ... something out

[241]

SUNDAY HERALD

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Boston Symphony Orchestra Delights Throng of Music Lovers.

Wednesday Afternoon Musical Club Gives Park City the Finest Musical Event in Its History--Willy Hess, Concert Meister, Conducts in Absence of Wilhelm Gericke--Mme. Charlotte Maconda's Superb Solos.

Hundreds of local music lovers braved the most disagreeable snow, sleet and wind storm of the year last night to attend the first concert ever given in this city by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at Smith's Theatre. That Bridgeport is not a musically inclined city was not borne out by the enthusiasm of the large number present last night, for the applause at the conclusion of each number was hearty and prolonged. Scarcely a seat in the entire house was vacant, and the few that were unoccupied had been sold and the unkind elements had prevented the purchasers from venturing out.

In the absence of Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, the famous conductor of the organization, Mr. Willy Hess, concert-meister, led the orchestra. Mr. Hess often relieves Mr. Gericke, hence the unexpected change last night was by no means a new venture. Mr. Hess has a splendid conception of the selections chosen for the programme of last evening, and under the magic of his baton the various sections of the orchestra gave to the numbers admirable interpretations.

Mme. Charlotte Maconda, the soloist, was accorded widespread admiration for her superb rendition of two exceedingly difficult selections, for the proper interpretation of which the artist must exert her voice to the utmost. Mme. Maconda's brilliant soprano voice enthralled her auditors with its matchless purity and excellent range and power.

The programme opened with Von Weber's "Oberon" overture, a light selection that proved enjoyable to even those not well versed in music. In the opening strains, where Oberon's horn is answered by the muted strings, the sweet soft melody at once held the audience spellbound, and as the composition progressed through the varying themes to the spirited end the audience listened with ever increasing delight. When at length the selection closed there was a storm of applause.

Mr. Hess bowed his acknowledgements again and again, but in accordance with the unvarying custom of the orchestra no encores were given.

The second selection, Mozart's Aria from "Il Re Pastore," marked Mme. Maconda's first appearance. The voice of the artist was tried by the difficult runs and the wide range of this selection, but she was fully equal to its requirements. In spite of the deficiency in acoustic properties of the theatre, Mme. Maconda's voice was so full, so clear and pure, that its volume apepared to fill the entire structure. Returning several times in answer to unceasing plaudits Mme. Maconda very gracefully bowed her appreciation and finally on returning for the last time in response to this applause she touched the neck of the violin of the artist who accompanied her on an obligato during the number and assisted him to her side. This unexpected and pretty act satisfied the audience.

Perhaps the most pretentious selection of the evening was the Symphony No. 2, Opus 36 of Beethoven, in four numbers. This noted opera, containing perhaps as much individuality of the composer as the work of any great artist, is among the most difficult of the orchestrations of any works of the masters. Throughout the four numbers the orchestra followed Mr. Hess with excellent rythmic and melodic spirit through the varying themes.

Mme. Maconda's voice was displayed to even more delightful manner in her second selection, an Aria from Charpentier's now universally popular "Louise." In this she got on better with the orchestral accompaniment than during the first selection, and the trilling runs of the first selection were supplanted by more easily executed passages. Mme. Maconda's reception was flattering, but it signified appreciation for the faultless accompaniment of the orchestra as well as the exquisite sweetness of the soloist's voice.

The last number was the impassioned selection of Liszt, the symphonic poem, Tasso: Lamento and Triumph. Those unfamiliar with this [illegible] were able to discern the [illegible] aid of [illegible]

DISCHARGED FROM BANKRUPTCY

SUNDAY HERALD

Published Every Day in the Year.
VOL. CXIX., NO. 84.

SUNDAY, MARCH 25, 1906.

NEW OVERTURE BY D'HARCOURT

Played for First Time in Boston at the 19th Symphony Concert—Is Prelude to the Opera "Tasso."

MR. GANZ'S BRILLIANT LISZT PERFORMANCE

Virtuoso and Permanent Conductors Are Compared—A Note on Orchestral Euphony—Coming Concerts.

The 19th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, conductor, was given last night in Symphony Hall. Mr. Rudolph Ganz was the pianist. The programme was as follows:

Overture to the opera, "Tasso" ..... D'Harcourt
Piano concerto in E flat major ..... Liszt
Symphonic poem, "Lancelot and Elaine" ..... MacDowell
Symphony No. 2 ..... Beethoven

The overture was played here for the first time. It is a prelude to an opera in which Tasso and his Leonora are the hero and heroine and the ending is, of course, tragic. There is little of bodement in the overture; there is no warning note; there is little to put the hearer in the fitting mood. On the contrary, much of the music is of a festal nature, and the chief theme of the main section of the overture has an operetta character. Perhaps Count d'Harcourt takes his operatic sorrows gayly. He is a man who has studied seriously, and, as an organizer and conductor of concerts, he has shown a fine taste and a high purpose in the selection of programmes. He has evidently a certain facility in scoring, but what he scores in this overture is commonplace.

The musical thought is superficial, and its brilliance is a jingle or simply decorative. Mr. Gericke, as is his custom, took the utmost pains with the performance. Perhaps either one of the symphonies of d'Harcourt would give a more favorable idea of his musical nature, but something whispers low that the experiment would be a risky one. Yet it is pleasant to think of a French count of wealth doing the best he can in art.

There is now a pathetic interest in MacDowell's music, but the interest need not be wholly one of sentiment. The composer told us a few years ago that he purposed to rewrite "Lancelot and Elaine," for he was by no means satisfied with it; that the music as he remembered it was "full of horns, horns, horns, nothing but horns." Yet there are some who prefer this symphonic poem to his "Indian" suite and find it more emotional and imaginative. The question, how closely MacDowell followed in music episodes in Tennyson's poem need not be discussed. The musical contents are more to the purpose than is any accurate transliteration of literary thought, and however MacDowell himself judged his work, there is much that is both beautiful and poetic in the music.

The "tournament" scene was no doubt inevitable, the lesson of a needed contrast [illegible] weakest part of the [illegible] much, considered apart [illegible]

Last night we heard the Boston Symphony Orchestra, led by Wilhelm Gericke. The Philharmonic has been without a permanent conductor for three years. Foreign conductors have been imported and they chose programmes which they believed would best display their own most pronounced characteristics as orchestral leaders. Little by little the Philharmonic audience has had its taste debauched until now, by the confession of some of the best friends of the orchestra, the listeners go to Carnegie Hall simply to be thrilled. If the conductor does not thrill them, if he does not make them sit up, they are restless, they yawn, or they leave the hall. The more sensational of the conductors exert their spell only for a season. The dram that intoxicated in 1904-5 is as slippery-elm tea in 1905-6. Furthermore the orchestra suffers without the discipline of a permanent conductor.

It suffers in perfection of ensemble, in the proportions of expression, in rhetoric, in euphony.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gives a great many more concerts in the season and it has been for several years under a most accomplished and indefatigable disciplinarian. Mr. Gericke is much more than a disciplinarian, but the first duty of a conductor is to drill his men, however loudly they may protest, until they have absolute mechanical proficiency, until the orchestra is a superb virtuoso. Last night the exquisite sense of proportion, the inimitable euphony, the virtuoso qualities of this rare orchestra were never so fully appreciated by The Herald as after a hearing of the long-established Philharmonic orchestra, with its honorable record of concerts.

The "virtuoso" conductor who asks and receives great sums for his peculiar "interpretation" of a celebrated work is an interesting and exciting apparition, and it is a good thing for orchestra and audience that he occasionally visits us and raises the vibrations of the hearers to an extremely high and nervous pitch. The man who by his steady and intelligent labor and by his indomitable will brings his orchestra to such a state of perfection that 24 concerts in a season are a delight to ear and understanding is, after all, the true orchestral leader that works for musical righteousness. Orchestral technic is quickly lost where there is not eternal vigilance. The "virtuoso" conductor may excite wonder for three or four concerts, but how about the other concerts in the long series?

Mr. Rudolph Ganz gave a brilliant performance of Liszt's concerto, which does not lose in brilliance with the passing years. His performance was on a higher plane than that of the magic worker exulting in strength and speed. It was thoughtfully considered; it was musically eloquent. He did not arrogantly call attention to his bravura; he did not show his physical power by brutal assaults on the keyboard. The concerto was presented as an organic whole, and episodes seemed natural and necessary. Technically and esthetically Mr. Ganz's playing was individual, charming, and impressive. The appreciation of the audience was expressed in no uncertain or perfunctory terms.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau of the World

AMERICAN

BALTIMORE, MD.

MAR 22 1906

GIFT APPRECIATED BY MR. GERICKE

Letter Received by Prof. Randolph From Leader of Boston Symphony Orchestra.

At the last Boston Symphony Orchestra concert given in this city Wilhelm Gericke, its picturesque leader, appeared for the last time before a Baltimore audience, and the esteem in which he has been held was expressed in the enthusiastic ovation which was given this farewell appearance. In a letter addressed to Mr. Harold Randolph, director of the Peabody Conservatory of Music, Director Gericke expressed his appreciation of the good will felt toward him in Baltimore. The letter follows:

My Dear Mr. Randolph: Ever and anon the scenes of last Wednesday come crowding again upon my memory and I am overwhelmed anew with a consciousness of the great honor done me and the utter inadequacy of the effort which I made then to give expression to my appreciation and gratitude.

I wish it were in my power to speak my thanks in person to everyone of the hundreds who joined themselves together to give me so great a happiness; but that is impossible. May I not, therefore, ask you to put this utterance before the many who could neither hear my voice nor find in my words an echo of the deep sense of obligation which I feel toward the people of Baltimore who have approved my services and those of the Boston Symphony Orchestra so highly. Their overwhelming kindness toward me and their cordial appreciation of the labors of the orchestra have been of incalculable value in the attainment of the artistic results which, more than anything else, were celebrated by their applause. I shall carry the memory of that kindness and consideration with me ever, and it, no less than the beautiful gift, shall tell me as long as I live how greatly I am beholden to the kind, generous music-loving people of Baltimore.

Believe me, dear Mr. Randolph,
Yours most faithfully,
WILHELM GERICKE.

n
BALTIMORE, MD.
ress
MAR 21 1906

Writes Mr. Randolph Of Association Of Musicians

Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, the director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, whose engagement this year was marked [illegible] presentation of a loving cup [illegible] concert, has written Mr. Harold Randolph as follows:

My Dear Mr. Randolph: Ever and anon the scenes of last Wednesday come crowding again upon my memory and I am overwhelmed anew with a consciousness of the great honor done me and the utter inadequacy of the effort which I made then to give expression to my appreciation and gratitude.

I wish it were in my power to speak my thanks in person to everyone of the hundreds who joined themselves together to give me so great a happiness, but that is impossible. May I not, therefore, ask you to put this utterance before the many who could neither hear my voice nor find in my words an echo of the deep sense of obligation which I feel toward the people of Baltimore who have approved my services and those of the Boston Symphony Orchestra so highly. Their overwhelming kindness toward me and their cordial appreciation of the labors of the orchestra have been of incalculable value in the attainment of the artistic results which, more than anything else, were celebrated by their applause. I shall carry the memory of that kindness and consideration with me ever, and it, no less than the beautiful gift, shall tell me as long as I live how greatly I am beholden to the kind, generous, music-loving people of Baltimore.

Believe me, dear Mr. Randolph, yours most faithfully, WILHELM GERICKE.

NEWS
BALTIMORE, MD.
MAR 21 1906

MR. GERICKE APPRECIATIVE

Extends Thanks For Loving Cup From Baltimore Admirers.

Mr. Harold Randolph, director of the Peabody Conservatory of Music, has received the following letter from Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who was presented a loving cup by his admirers in Baltimore at the final of the series of concerts held here last week. Mr. Gericke retires this year as director of the Orchestra.

My Dear Mr. Randolph—Ever and anon the scenes of last Wednesday come crowding again upon my memory, and I am overwhelmed anew with a consciousness of the great honor done me, and the utter inadequacy of the effort which I made then to give expression to my appreciation and gratitude.

I wish it were in my power to speak my thanks in person to every one of the hundreds who joined themselves together to give me so great a happiness; but that is impossible. May I not, therefore, ask you to put this utterance before the many who could neither hear my voice nor find in my words an echo of the deep sense of obligation which I feel toward the people of Baltimore who have approved my services and those of the Boston Symphony Orchestra so highly? Their overwhelming kindness toward me and their cordial appreciation of the labors of the Orchestra have been of incalculable value in the attainment of the artistic results which, more than anything else, were celebrated by their applause.

I shall carry the memory of that kindness and consideration with me ever, and it, no less than the beautiful gift, shall tell me as long as I live how greatly I am beholden to the kind, generous music loving people of Baltimore.

Believe me, dear Mr. Randolph, your most faithfully,
WILHELM GERICKE.

POST
WASHINGTON, D. C.
MAR 22 1906

Boston Symphony Quartet Concerts

Boston's final contribution to Washington's present season of music will be made next Monday, when the Boston Symphony Quartet will give its third and last evening of chamber music in the ballroom of the New Willard. While the public attracted by chamber music is necessarily much smaller than that by orchestral, the support given the Boston Symphony Quartet in the first season in Washington has been gratifying, and in return the [illegible] may truly be said to have given satisfaction to those who have gone to the concerts. The next concert will [illegible] the assisting artist Mme. Olga [illegible] whose playing here with the Philharmonic Orchestra, recently made a strong impression on Washington music [illegible] With Prof. Willy Hess she will play Richard Strauss' sonata for piano and violin in E flat major, op. [illegible] other works on the programme [illegible] Mozart's quartet in C major, [illegible] Beethoven's quartet in C [illegible]

[242]

TUESDAY, MARCH 20, 1906.

SUPERB SYMPHONY CONCERT

Boston Symphony Orchestra Delights Throng of Music Lovers.

Wednesday Afternoon Musical Club Gives Park City the Finest Musical Event in Its History--Willy Hess, Concert Meister, Conducts in Absence of Wilhelm Gericke--Mme. Charlotte Maconda's Superb Solos.

Hundreds of local music lovers braved the most disagreeable snow, sleet and wind storm of the year last night to attend the first concert ever given in this city by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at Smith's Theatre. That Bridgeport is not a musically inclined city was not borne out by the enthusiasm of the large number present last night, for the applause at the conclusion of each number was hearty and prolonged. Scarcely a seat in the entire house was vacant, and the few that were unoccupied had been sold and the unkind elements had prevented the purchasers from venturing out.

In the absence of Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, the famous conductor of the organization, Mr. Willy Hess, concertmeister, led the orchestra. Mr. Hess often relieves Mr. Gericke, hence the unexpected change last night was by no means a new venture. Mr. Hess has a splendid conception of the selections chosen for the programme of last evening, and under the magic of his baton the various sections of the orchestra gave to the numbers admirable interpretations.

Mme. Charlotte Maconda, the soloist, was accorded widespread admiration for her superb rendition of two exceedingly difficult selections, for the proper interpretation of which the artist must exert her voice to the utmost. Mme. Maconda's brilliant soprano voice enthralled her auditors with its matchless purity and excellent range and power.

The programme opened with Von Weber's "Oberon" overture, a light selection that proved enjoyable to even those not well versed in music. In the opening strains, where Oberon's horn is answered by the muted strings, the sweet soft melody at once held the audience spellbound, and as the composition progressed through the varying themes to the spirited end the audience listened with ever increasing delight. When at length the selection closed there was a storm of applause.

Mr. Hess bowed his acknowledgements again and again, but in accordance with the unvarying custom of the orchestra no encores were given.

The second selection, Mozart's Aria from "Il Re Pastore," marked Mme. Maconda's first appearance. The voice of the artist was tried by the difficult runs and the wide range of this selection, but she was fully equal to its requirements. In spite of the deficiency in acoustic properties of the theatre, Mme. Maconda's voice was so full, so clear and pure, that its volume apepared to fill the entire structure. Returning several times in answer to unceasing plaudits Mme. Maconda very gracefully bowed her appreciation and finally on returning for the last time in response to this applause she touched the neck of the violin of the artist who accompanied her in an obligato during the number and assisted him to her side. This unexpected and pretty act satisfied the audience.

Perhaps the most pretentious selection of the evening was the Symphony No. 2, Opus 36 of Beethoven, in four numbers. This noted opera, containing perhaps as much individuality of the composer as the work of any great artist, is among the most difficult of the orchestrations of any works of the masters. Throughout the four numbers the orchestra followed Mr. Hess with excellent rythmic and melodic spirit through the varying themes.

Mme. Maconda's voice was displayed in even more delightful manner in her second selection, an Aria from Charpentier's now universally popular 'Louise." In this she got on better with the orchestral accompaniment than during the first selection, and the trying runs of the first selection were supplanted by more easily executed passages. Mme. Maconda's reception was most flattering, but it signified appreciation for the faultless accompaniment of the orchestra as well as the exquisite sweetness of the soloist's voice.

The fifth number was the impassioned composition of Liszt, the symphonic poem No. 2, "Tasso: Lament and Triumph." Those unfamiliar with this composition were able to discern the moods of the composer with the aid of the programme which practically mounted to a libretto containing an explanation and notes on each number.

[illegible] of this composition and it predominates with various [illegible] throughout the selection. The final passages, exemplifying the triumph of Tasso at the Roman court, were rendered with a spirit and impressive rythm that moved the audience as no other number had done during the evening.

The final selection was the theme and variations from Suite Three, Opus 55 of Tschaikowsky. The faultless technique of the big orchestra was apparent in this number more than in any other. Through the difficult passages in the variations, when the theme was taken up by the various sections with accompanying rapid passages by the other sections, twelve variations in all being embraced in the selection, all leading to the brilliant finale, the selection progressed smoothly and elegantly. The final variation gave the orchestra an opportunity for marvelous work. The closing notes reechoed a few seconds and the audience manifested its genuine admiration by a protracted outburst of spontaneous applause.

The concert, given under the auspices of the Wednesday Afternoon Musical Club, was the greatest musical in the annals of the city, and the debt that Bridgeporters owe to this energetic and flourishing club is one that it will be difficult to repay. The appreciative audience, filling the playhouse despite the storm, signified the co operation that Bridgeporters are willing and anxious to extend to all undertakings of this nature, and bespoke the advisability of frequent similar concerts.

DISCHARGED FROM BANKRUPTCY

SUNDAY HERALD

Published Every Day in the Year.
VOL. CXIX., NO. 84.

SUNDAY, MARCH 25, 1906.

NEW OVERTURE BY D'HARCOURT

Played for First Time in Boston at the 19th Symphony Concert—Is Prelude to the Opera "Tasso."

MR. GANZ'S BRILLIANT LISZT PERFORMANCE

Virtuoso and Permanent Conductors Are Compared—A Note on Orchestral Euphony—Coming Concerts.

The 19th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, conductor, was given last night in Symphony Hall. Mr. Rudolph Ganz was the pianist. The programme was as follows:

Overture to the opera, "Tasso".....D'Harcourt
Piano concerto in E flat major.....Liszt
Symphonic poem, "Lancelot and Elaine," .....MacDowell
Symphony No. 8.....Beethoven

The overture was played here for the first time. It is a prelude to an opera in which Tasso and his Leonora are the hero and heroine and the ending is, of course, tragic. There is little of bodement in the overture; there is no warning note; there is little to put the hearer in the fitting mood. On the contrary, much of the music is of a festal nature, and the chief theme of the main section of the overture has an operetta character. Perhaps Count d'Harcourt takes his operatic sorrows gayly. He is a man who has studied seriously, and, as an organizer and conductor of concerts, he has shown a fine taste and a high purpose in the selection of programmes. He has evidently a certain facility in scoring, but what he scores in this overture is commonplace.

The musical thought is superficial, and its brilliance is a jingle or simply decorative. Mr. Gericke, as is his custom, took the utmost pains with the performance. Perhaps either one of the symphonies of d'Harcourt would give a more favorable idea of his musical nature, but something whispers low that the experiment would be a risky one. Yet it is pleasant to think of a French count of wealth doing the best he can in art.

There is now a pathetic interest in MacDowell's music, but the interest need not be wholly one of sentiment. The composer told us a few years ago that he purposed to rewrite "Lancelot and Elaine," for he was by no means satisfied with it; that the music as he remembered it was "full of horns, horns, horns, nothing but horns." Yet there are some who prefer this symphonic poem to his "Indian" suite and find it more emotional and imaginative. The question, how closely MacDowell followed in music episodes in Tennyson's poem need not be discussed. The musical contents are more to the purpose than is any accurate transliteration of literary thought, and however MacDowell himself judged his work, there is much that is both beautiful and poetic in the music.

The "tournament" scene was no doubt inevitable by reason of a needed contrast, but it is the weakest part of the symphonic poem, which, composed about 20 years ago, has the freshness, the spontaneity, the enthusiasm of early manhood. It was a pleasure to hear the poem again, and to hear it, as the composer himself would wish, in a concert given without the slightest thought of deliberate boosting of American composers. MacDowell believed that if a composition written by an American is good enough to be played it should be [illegible]

It should stand by the side of works of composers with French, German, Russian or Scandinavian names. And this is the only opinion for an American composer to hold if he wishes to maintain his personal dignity and that of the art he serves.

We heard on Friday afternoon the Philharmonic concert in New York led by Mr. Steinbach and the impression made by him with the orchestra under necessarily unfavorable conditions was recorded in The Herald of yesterday morning. Last night we heard the Boston Symphony orchestra led by Mr. Gericke. The Philharmonic has been without a permanent conductor for three years. Foreign conductors have been imported and they chose programmes which they believed would best display their own most pronounced characteristics as orchestral leaders. Little by little the Philharmonic audience has had its taste debauched until now, by the confession of some of the best friends of the orchestra, the listeners go to Carnegie Hall simply to be thrilled. If the conductor does not thrill them, if he does not make them sit up, they are restless, they yawn, or they leave the hall. The more sensational of the conductors exert their spell only for a season. The dram that intoxicated in 1904-5 is as slippery-elm tea in 1905-6. Furthermore the orchestra suffers without the discipline of a permanent conductor.

It suffers in perfection of ensemble, in the proportions of expression, in rhetoric, in euphony.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gives a great many more concerts in the season and it has been for several years under a most accomplished and indefatigable disciplinarian. Mr. Gericke is much more than a disciplinarian, but the first duty of a conductor s to drill his men, however loudly they may protest, until they have absolute mechanical proficiency, until the orchestra is a superb virtuoso. Last night the exquisite sense of proportion, the inimitable euphony, the virtuoso qualities of this rare orchestra were never so fully appreciated by The Herald as after a hearing of the long-established Philharmonic orchestra, with its honorable record of concerts.

The "virtuoso" conductor who asks and receives great sums for his peculiar "interpretation" of a celebrated work is an interesting and exciting apparition, and it is a good thing for orchestra and audience that he occasionally visits us and raises the vibrations of the hearers to an extremely high and nervous pitch. The man who by his steady and intelligent labor and by his indomitable will brings his orchestra to such a state of perfection that 24 concerts in a season are a delight to ear and understanding is, after all, the true orchestral leader that works for musical righteousness. Orchestral technic is quickly lost where there is not eternal vigilance. The "virtuoso" conductor may excite wonder for three or four concerts, but how about the other concerts in the long series?

Mr. Rudolph Ganz gave a brilliant performance of Liszt's concerto, which does not lose in brilliance with the passing years. His performance was on a higher plane than that of the magic worker exulting in strength and speed. It was thoughtfully considered; it was musically eloquent. He did not arrogantly call attention to his bravura; he did not show his physical power by brutal assaults on the keyboard. The concerto was presented as an organic whole, and episodes seemed natural and necessary. Technically and esthetically Mr. Ganz's playing was individual, charming, and impressive. The appreciation of the audience was expressed in no uncertain or perfunctory terms.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

AMERICAN

BALTIMORE, MD

MAR 22 1906

GIFT APPRECIATED BY MR. GERICKE

Letter Received by Prof. Randolph From Leader of Boston Symphony Orchestra.

At the last Boston Symphony Orchestra concert given in this city Wilhelm Gericke, its picturesque leader, appeared for the last time before a Baltimore audience, and the esteem in which he has been held was expressed in the enthusiastic ovation which was given this farewell appearance. In a letter addressed to Mr. Harold Randolph, director of the Peabody Conservatory of Music, Director Gericke expressed his appreciation of the good will felt toward him in Baltimore. The letter follows:

My Dear Mr. Randolph: Ever and anon the scenes of last Wednesday come crowding again upon my memory and I am overwhelmed anew with a consciousness of the great honor done me and the utter inadequacy of the effort which I made then to give expression to my appreciation and gratitude.

I wish it were in my power to speak my thanks in person to everyone of the hundreds who joined themselves together to give me so great a happiness; but that is impossible. May I not, therefore, ask you to put this utterance before the many who could neither hear my voice nor find in my words an echo of the deep sense of obligation which I feel toward the people of Baltimore who have approved my services and those of the Boston Symphony Orchestra so highly. Their overwhelming kindness toward me and their cordial appreciation of the labors of the orchestra have been of incalculable value in the attainment of the artistic results which, more than anything else, were celebrated by their applause. I shall carry the memory of that kindness and consideration with me ever, and it, no less than the beautiful gift, shall tell me as long as I live how greatly I am beholden to the kind, generous music-loving people of Baltimore.

Believe me, dear Mr. Randolph,
Yours most faithfully,
WILHELM GERICKE.

SUN

BALTIMORE, MD.

MAR 21 1906

MR. GERICKE'S THANKS FOR CUP

Writes Mr. Randolph Of His Appreciation Of Musicians' Gift.

Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, the director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, whose retirement this year was marked last week by the presentation of a loving cup at the last concert, has written Mr. Harold Randolph as follows:

My Dear Mr. Randolph: Ever and anon the scenes of last Wednesday come crowding again upon my memory and I am overwhelmed anew with a consciousness of the great honor done me and the utter inadequacy of the effort which I made then to give expression to my appreciation and gratitude.

I wish it were in my power to speak my thanks in person to everyone of the hundreds who joined themselves together to give me so great a happiness, but that is impossible. May I not, therefore, ask you to put this utterance before the many who could neither hear my voice nor find in my words an echo of the deep sense of obligation which I feel toward the people of Baltimore who have approved my services and those of the Boston Symphony Orchestra so highly. Their overwhelming kindness toward me and their cordial appreciation of the labors of the orchestra have been of incalculable value in the attainment of the artistic results which, more than anything else, were celebrated by their applause. I shall carry the memory of that kindness and consideration with me ever, and it, no less than the beautiful gift, shall tell me as long as I live how greatly I am beholden to the kind, generous, music-loving people of Baltimore.

Believe me, dear Mr. Randolph, yours most faithfully, WILHELM GERICKE.

NEWS

MAR 22 1906

MR. GERICKE APPRECIATIVE.

Extends Thanks For Loving Cup From Baltimore Admirers.

Mr. Harold Randolph, director of the Peabody Conservatory of Music, has received the following letter from Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who was presented a loving cup by his admirers in Baltimore at the final of the series of concerts held here last week. Mr. Gericke retires this year as director of the Orchestra.

My Dear Mr. Randolph—Ever and anon the scenes of last Wednesday come crowding again upon my memory, and I am overwhelmed anew with a consciousness of the great honor done me, and the utter inadequacy of the effort which I made then to give expression to my appreciation and gratitude.

I wish it were in my power to speak my thanks in person to every one of the hundreds who joined themselves together to give me so great a happiness; but that is impossible. May I not, therefore, ask you to put this utterance before the many who could neither hear my voice, nor find in my words an echo of the deep sense of obligation which I feel toward the people of Baltimore who have approved my services and those of the Boston Symphony Orchestra so highly? Their overwhelming kindness toward me and their cordial appreciation of the labors of the Orchestra have been of incalculable value in the attainment of the artistic results which, more than anything else, were celebrated by their applause.

I shall carry the memory of that kindness and consideration with me ever, and it, no less than the beautiful gift, shall tell me as long as I live how greatly I am beholden to the kind, generous music-loving people of Baltimore.

Believe me, dear Mr. Randolph, yours most faithfully,
WILHELM GERICKE.

POST

WASHINGTON, D. C.

MAR 22 1906

Boston Symphony Quartet Concert.

Boston's final contribution to Washington's present season of music will be made next Monday, when the Boston Symphony Quartet will give its third and last evening of chamber music in the ballroom of the New Willard Hotel. While the public attracted by chamber music is necessarily much smaller than that by orchestral, the support given to the Boston Symphony Quartet in this, its first season in Washington, has been most gratifying, and in return the quartet may truly be said to have given adequate satisfaction to those who have gone to the concerts. The next concert will bring as the assisting artist Mme. Olga Samaroff, whose playing here with the Philadelphia Orchestra recently made a strong impression on Washington music-lovers. With Prof. Willy Hess she will play Richard Strauss' sonata for pianoforte and violin in E flat major, op. 18. The other works on the programme will be Mozart's quartet in C major (K. 465) and Beethoven's quartet in C major, op. 59, No. 3.

[242]

AMERICAN.
BALTIMORE, MD
MAR 18 1904

Gleanings From the World of Music

[illegible] than four weeks it will be 20 [illegible] since Mr. William Gericke came [illegible] Boston Symphony Orchestra to [illegible]more. Their first concert was given [illegible] Academy of Music, April 12, 1886. [illegible]rchestra had been giving concerts [illegible]ston for five years previous, two of [illegible] had been given under Mr. Gericke, [illegible] the first three seasons had been con- [illegible] by Mr. Georg Henschel.

[illegible] two years under Mr. Gericke, [illegible] Ellis, the manager for Mr. Higgin- [illegible] concluded to try an experiment with [illegible] concerts outside. He arranged with [illegible] York and Philadelphia, and then [illegible]uded the orchestra might go as far [illegible]ltimore, and perhaps Washington.

[illegible] knew of the Peabody concerts al- [illegible] going on, and thought the Peabody [illegible]ight be obtained, but soon found the [illegible] impracticable. Then he thought of [illegible]g a concert with the aid of the Ora- [illegible] Society, or of selling an orchestral [illegible]ert to the Oratorio Society. He ap- [illegible]ed to its president, the late Otto Su- [illegible] who said that from experience in [illegible]more he could not advise the Ora- [illegible] Society to give more than $500 for [illegible] receipts of an orchestral concert by [illegible] organization. Mr. Sutro suggested [illegible]t might help in getting up a concert. [illegible] Mr. Ellis came to me. I undertook [illegible] him, got subscriptions from musical [illegible] and the recipts for the concert [illegible]nted to over $1,200.

[illegible] Ellis then arranged for a series of [illegible] during the season of 1886-1887. [illegible] proposed to give them at the [illegible] of Music. But during the sum- [illegible] the management of the Academy of [illegible] Mr. Patrick Har- [illegible]ming the lessee.

[illegible]sive and very injurious altera- [illegible] were made, so as to accommodate [illegible] audiences at low prices. The beau- [illegible]tiers and stalls were removed and [illegible] reduced, by a cut across the [illegible] of a dozen feet depth. Low prices [illegible]lled for admission to all kinds of [illegible]. But when the Boston Symphony [illegible]estra applied, Mr. Harries did not [illegible] the organization at all, as it would [illegible]e his business by keeping away the [illegible] of people he wanted to patronize [illegible] house.

[illegible] finally agreed to give up one night [illegible]500. And that one concert was held [illegible]e. After that the Concordia Club [illegible]a House was secured for a couple [illegible]easons until it burned. The Academy [illegible]ert Hall was then reluctantly en- [illegible]d and packed for several concerts. [illegible]he fall of 1892 one record-breaking [illegible]ert was given at Ford's Opera House, [illegible]t the house could not be had for any [illegible]e that year. The next year the [illegible]eum Theater was used for a season, [illegible] until Music Hall was finished, when [illegible]as opened by the orchestra with a [illegible] cast of soloists, including Melba, [illegible]on and others, and Music Hall has [illegible] the home of the orchestra in Balti- [illegible]ever since. Whether it will con- [illegible]to be so is now one of the problems [illegible]t the future only can solve.

[illegible] Gericke gave up his position as di- [illegible] for several years; and was suc- [illegible]d first by Mr. Arthur Nikisch, and [illegible] by Mr. Emil Pawe. On regaining [illegible]s with Mr. Gericke returned and was [illegible]ly welcomed in Baltimore as well as [illegible]ston.

[illegible] Gericke's present retirement had [illegible] anticipated for more than a year, [illegible]t musical people were not at all [illegible] by surprise. It was noticeable at [illegible]st concert that Mr. Gericke did not [illegible] even the Schubert symphony with [illegible]igor and precision that he was wont [illegible]ploy formerly.

[illegible] concert organizations have their ups [illegible]owns; and so far no insurance com- [illegible] have started up to guarantee per- [illegible] success. The Peabody Orchestra [illegible] be regarded as one of the settled [illegible]tions of Baltimore. [illegible] music lovers looked to it for a [illegible] number of educational entertain- [illegible] and the Baltimore musicians [illegible]d on the Peabody pay as a regular [illegible]l asset. But times change, and [illegible]o change with them.

[illegible] the Boston Symphony first came [illegible]timore it was advertised that there [illegible]d be 60 fine musicians. This idea was [illegible]ently discounted by music lovers, [illegible] not accustomed to accept trav- [illegible]ng statements at their face value. [illegible]e musicians did all come, and [illegible] little to apologize for as far as [illegible] was concerned. But there [illegible] trouble about soloists. First [illegible] was engaged. But she had to [illegible] Madame Fursch-Madi was [illegible]d for, but she could not appear. [illegible]s finally arranged that Mr. Franz [illegible], concert master, should play [illegible] violin concerto. Mr. Ellis [illegible] it would be, but he was [illegible]timore public might not be [illegible] especially the unknown [illegible] when the concert came [illegible]ulated on my going up with [illegible] circle, where we could [illegible] the concerto favorably. While [illegible] the middle of the entertain- [illegible], the ticket-seller, sent a [illegible] Mr. Ellis to come to the [illegible] settle up. Mr. Ellis an- [illegible] that he would be there. [illegible] Talbot grew impatient, [illegible] messenger, who up- [illegible] climax of the "Gondo." [illegible] delay to give him a [illegible] until the concerto [illegible] box office, [illegible]

[illegible] ed the money as only an experienced banker could do. He said to Talbot: "Do you think your statement quite correct?" "I know it is," said Talbot, "I've counted it twice." "Well," said Mr. Ellis, "I don't want to cheat you. You've given me this $100 too much," as he handed him over a package of the smaller bills. Mr. Talbot's impatience quickly changed to a feeling of thankfulness that he was dealing not only with a person of culture and refinement, but with a straightforward, honest man.

WILLARD C. DAY.

TIMES
WASHINGTON, D. C.
MAR 22 1904

New Willard—Boston Symphony Quartet.

Boston's final contribution to Washington's present season of music will be made on next Monday, March 26, when the Boston Symphony Quartet will give its third and last evening of chamber music in the ballroom of the New Willard Hotel.

The concert will bring as the assisting artist Mme. Olga Samaroff whose playing here with the Philadelphia Orchestra recently made such a profound impression on Washington music-lovers. With prof. Willy Hess she will play Richard Strauss' sonata for pianoforte and violin in E-flat major, op. 18.

NEW YORK PRESS
MAR 26 1904

SONGS AND SINGERS.

Whether "programme notes" are entitled to a place beside the list of compositions to be played or sung at a concert, and whether they have any real value is always a debatable or at least debated question. At the outset of this discussion of some of the notes that have appeared on recent programmes we range ourselves under the flag of those who believe in these short cuts to the royal road of musical knowledge. Their usefulness is of the double-barreled sort. They not only are informative, but when they are as prolix—and as entertaining—as those in the books of the Boston Symphony Orchestra they often help to while away the tedium of some uninteresting number.

"Do you believe in these things?" asked one man of another at a recent concert, flipping his programme that bore one of these notes.

"No," replied the man addressed. "After all, they are only one man's opinion."

Such was Schumann's viewpoint, to which he gave expression in a rhapsody he wrote on hearing a performance of Schubert's Symphony in C major in Leipsic. After telling how the music affected him, how it brought before his mental vision a picture of the city of Vienna, he added, "I will not try to extol and interpret the symphony; men in the different stages of life take such different views of the impressions they derive from artistic fancies, and the youth of eighteen often discovers in a symphony the echo of some world-wide event where the mature man sees only a local matter, whereas the musician never has thought of either the one or the other, and has merely poured forth from his heart the very best music he could give." That last expression of Schumann's is full of meaning to music-lovers, to students and to the makers of these "notes" if they would only take warning from it. The habit of trying to read strange things into such music as this symphony is as strongly implanted in the mind of the average writer on musical topics as is that of explaining away Shakespeare's meanings. Great good might be done if all harkened to that pregnant phrase of Schumann. For one thing there might be an end to such absurdities as the tradition that the last movement of this work illustrates the episode of Phaeton and his trials in driving Apollo's chariot, which is of a piece with many of the things that have been "read into" music of this sort by foolish commentators. That these musical doctors do not agree on the symptoms is pointed out, in the same programme, in the case of the "Sakuntala" overture, in which one writer finds that one movement is a "love theme," while another suggests that this, with another theme, pictures Sakuntala in the sacred grove.

It is not the conventional thing to connect humor with such compositions as are written by the masters and performed by such organizations as the Bostonians, the Philharmonic or the Kneisels; yet these "programme notes" unconsciously lend themselves to this effect. In the midst of the grave description of the "Sakuntala" overture, for example, the commentator has added to his already exuberant quantity of serious matter a description of a performance of that work in dramatic form culled from a contemporary whose chief aim is flippancy. The incongruity of the thing apparently never struck the compiler of the notes. Again, in the note for [illegible] Smetana's quartet, "Aus [illegible] there is a quotation from [illegible] of the com- [illegible] of the means. Smetana set down in black and white the story of his life as it was told in these four movements, and all in that spirit of unconscious frankness, or egregious vanity, which is the mark of the average Continental artist. The composer takes 300 words—and his utterances are indescribably vain—to tell what the quartet means, and he adds: "Further than this, nothing." After reading the "note" one may well wonder what more he could have told of his life save such details as his favorite drink or whether he preferred fair women to brunettes. Another, and more cryptic, bit of humor is to be found in Sir Edward Elgar's description of his "Variations on an Original Theme," played by the Philharmonic on last Friday and Saturday. From the composer's own words we learn that one theme of this composition suffers from the "absent treatment," since "through and over the whole set another and larger theme 'goes,' but is not played." Time will show what the commentators make of this unplayed, and consequently unheard, theme. That such a task is not beyond them a glance at any of the notes in existence shows.

We believe in these notes; yet they have their faults, particularly when the writers drag in art terms to try to make their meanings clearer. A particularly glaring illustration of this was seen in the programme of the last concert of the New York Symphony Orchestra. To elucidate the "meaning" of MacDowell's "The Saracens" and "The Fair Alda" the writer of the note said, "both may be taken as musical portraiture or as delineations of moods, as the listener chooses." No one will quarrel with this allowance of latitude. The point to which we object is the calling of "The Saracens," for instance, a piece of musical portraiture. The melody of the composition is as clear in its meaning, its anecdotal quality, as the printed page or one of Schreyer's paintings of Arab horsemen. To glance at the title of the work and then to sit back and listen to it is to have evoked a mental picture of a band of barbaric soldiers marching in picturesque confusion under some strangely colored banner with the light of fanatics glowing in their eyes. To call such music "the delineation of a mood" is frankly absurd. And to speak of it as "portraiture" is no less a case of the ill-advised use of a technical word lifted bodily from another, and less mystifying, art. Portraiture has nothing to do with genre painting or historical scenes. If art terms are to be used in connection with music then "The Fair Alda" should be ranked as a genre picture.

In a recent article in Harper's Weekly, Lawrence Gilman has some remarks pertinent to this discussion in his essay on "A Remarkable Symphony," by which he means Gustave Mahler's fifth symphony. That the director of the Vienna Opera House does not believe in these "programme notes" is made clear by one of his utterances quoted by Gilman. "Away with programme books that breed false ideas," the composer shouted in passionate tones. "The audience should be left to its own thoughts over the work that is being performed." Neither Gilman nor any reasonable student of music agrees with Mahler in this opinion. Gilman goes on to say: "The fatuity of this attitude, which is not assumed by Mr. Mahler alone, consists in the fact that it invites one to listen to music that is essentially programmatic as if it were absolute music—that is, as if it has been composed with no thought of a poetic or dramatic subject. For it is not denied that Mr. Mahler in his symphonies has shaped his inspiration upon sequences of ideas external to the music itself; yet he requires us to listen to this music in entire ignorance of the ideas upon which it is based—a demand which is as unreasoned as it is fatuous and obstructive. For [illegible]

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
OUTLOOK.
From
Address NEW YORK CITY.
Date MAR 24 1904

plete answer for the popular demand for publicity have either misread the decision or have sadly mistaken the nature of that demand. The Supreme Court makes clear that the law as it stands does not open the books of all corporations to public view; it simply enables the Government to inspect those books when there is reasonable ground for suspecting something amiss. Throughout the decision a definite object to discover an offense is presupposed in justifying inquiry. The Court specifically says: "It is not intended to intimate, however, that it [the General Government] has a general visitatorial power over State corporations." In other words, the decision does not answer the question, How may the people best exercise control over corporations? It has now been established that publicity may be obtained in special cases by special

Wilhelm Gericke

The announcement that Mr. Wilhelm Gericke has resigned his post as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and will return in May to Austria to make his home again in Vienna, has been received with universal regret by lovers of music in this country—and that means by a very large body of men and women, for the love of good music and the appreciation of genuine musicians has grown almost by leaps and bounds since Mr. Gericke first came to these shores in 1880, a quarter of a century ago. The cause of orchestral music has been helped forward in America by Mr. Gericke perhaps more than by any other one man, with the possible exception of Theodore Thomas. In saying this we do not forget Karl Bergmann, Dr. Leo-

[illegible]ork, 1884

[illegible] and wholesomeness of taste, his very wide range of musical knowledge, his capacity to understand, deeply enjoy, and sympathetically interpret all kinds of music—[illegible] pold Damrosch, or Anton Seidl, to all of whom New York must be ever grateful for the work which they did in developing and cultivating the musical taste of

LIFE
From
Address Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date MAR 24 1904

IN spite of the bad going caused by the snowstorm of the day before, which put a heavy tax upon the facilities of livery stable, perhaps the largest audience of the season paid its farewell respects to William Gericke at the fifth and last of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts in the Baptist Temple last week, Friday evening. At the close of a very beautiful program consisting of Mozart's Symphony in G minor, Dvorak's concerts in B minor for violincello and Beethoven's Heroic symphony rendered with the exquisite precision and refinement of expression for which the orchestra under Mr. Gericke's leadership is proverbial, the conductor received a flattering ovation from the audience. Previously during the Dvorak number he had also been presented with a wreath, a fact, however, which became apparent only after a polite controversy between the leader and the soloist, Mr. Heinrich Warneke, for whom the former supposed it was intended. The melodious daintiness and sweetness of the Mozart Symphony was peculiarly suited to the style of interpretation characteristic of Mr. Gericke and a more satisfying rendering could scarcely be imagined. The rendering of the Dvorak and Beethoven compositions, however, was more or less open to the usual objection that vigor and fire were subordinated to nicety of expression and perfection of technique, and this extended to the work of the soloist whose playing was as unexceptional as it was undistinguished. As for the Heroic symphony there was certainly nothing very suggestive of the heroic in the orchestra's treatment of it. All said and done, however, it was a concert of such rare beauty that criticism seems ungracious. One could go much farther and fare worse in looking for a conductor, and it is not improbable that future Boston symphony audiences may be sighing for the return of the conductor who has so long been identified with the orchestra. In the large attendance were noticed: Mr. John F. Praeger, Mrs. William F. Dudley, Mr. Frank J. Price, Mrs. George A. Price, Mr. and Mrs. Edward H. Jewell, Mr. Samuel K. Probasco, Mrs. Francis L. Eames, Mrs. Richard P. Merritt, Miss Grace Merritt, Miss Anna Merritt, Mr. and Mrs. John E. Leech, Miss Charlotte Leech, Miss Harriette Low, Miss Adele Church, Miss Nathalie Wierum, Mr. and Mrs. Charles D. Meneely, Dr. Franklin W. Hooper, Miss Perkins, Mr. Thomas S. Perkins, Mr. Walter Perkins, Miss Katherine Blossom, Mr. Henry Adams, junior, Mr. F. C. Bates, Miss Mabel Murray, Miss Sallie Ingalls, Miss Annie Ingalls, Mr. and Mrs. Stephen M. Griswold, Mr. and Mrs. John D. Snedeker, Mr. Edwin L. Snedeker and Mr. and Mrs. James H. Merritt.

[243]

AMERICAN.
BALTIMORE, MD.
MAR 18 1906

Gleanings From the World of Music

In less than four weeks it will be 20 years since Mr. William Gericke came with the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Baltimore. Their first concert was given at the Academy of Music, April 12, 1886. The orchestra had been giving concerts in Boston for five years previous, two of which had been given under Mr. Gericke, after the first three seasons had been conducted by Mr. Georg Henschel.

After two years under Mr. Gericke, Mr. Ellis, the manager for Mr. Higginson, concluded to try an experiment with some concerts outside. He arranged with New York and Philadelphia, and then concluded the orchestra might go as far as Baltimore, and perhaps Washington.

He knew of the Peabody concerts already going on, and thought the Peabody Hall might be obtained, but soon found the idea impracticable. Then he thought of giving a concert with the aid of the Oratorio Society, or of selling an orchestral concert to the Oratorio Society. He applied to its president, the late Otto Sutro, who said that from experience in Baltimore he could not advise the Oratorio Society to give more than $500 for the receipts of an orchestral concert by any organization. Mr. Sutro suggested that I might help in getting up a concert, and Mr. Ellis came to me. I undertook it for him, got subscriptions from musical people, and the recipts for the concert amounted to over $1,200.

Mr. Ellis then arranged for a series of events during the season of 1886-1887. It was proposed to give them at the Academy of Music. But during the summer the management of the Academy of Music changed hands, Mr. Patrick Harris becoming the lessee.

Extensive and very injurious alterations were made, so as to accommodate larger audiences at low prices. The beautiful loges and stalls were removed and the stage reduced, by a cut across the front of a dozen feet depth. Low prices prevailed for admission to all kinds of shows. But when the Boston Symphony Orchestra applied, Mr. Harries did not want the organization at all, as it would injure his business by keeping away the class of people he wanted to patronize his house.

He finally agreed to give up one night for $500. And that one concert was held there. After that the Concordia Club Opera House was secured for a couple of seasons until it burned. The Academy Concert Hall was then reluctantly engaged and packed for several concerts. In the fall of 1892 one record-breaking concert was given at Ford's Opera House, but the house could not be had for any more that year. The next year the Lyceum Theater was used for a season, and until Music Hall was finished, when it was opened by the orchestra with a great cast of soloists, including Melba, Plancon and others, and Music Hall has been the home of the orchestra in Baltimore ever since. Whether it will continue to be so is now one of the problems that the future only can solve.

Mr. Gericke gave up his position as director for several years; and was succeeded first by Mr. Arthur Nikisch, and then by Mr. Emil Pawe. On regaining his health Mr. Gericke returned and was gladly welcomed in Baltimore as well as in Boston.

Mr. Gericke's present retirement had been anticipated for more than a year, so that musical people were not at all taken by surprise. It was noticeable at the last concert that Mr. Gericke did not direct even the Schubert symphony with the vigor and precision that he was wont to employ formerly.

All concert organizations have their ups and downs; and so far no insurance companies have started up to guarantee perpetual success. The Peabody Orchestra used to be regarded as one of the settled institutions of Baltimore.

The music lovers looked to it for a certain number of educational entertainments; and the Baltimore musicians counted on the Peabody pay as a regular annual asset. But times change, and people change with them.

When the Boston Symphony first came to Baltimore it was advertised that there would be 60 fine musicians. This idea was naturally discounted by music lovers, who were not accustomed to accept traveling show statements at their face value. But the 60 musicians did all come, and there was little to apologize for as far as the orchestra was concerned. But there had been trouble about soloists. First Nordica was engaged. But she had to give up. Then Madame Fursch-Madi was bargained for, but she could not appear. It was finally arranged that Mr. Franz Kneisel, the concert master, should play the Beethoven violin concerto. Mr. Ellis knew how fine it would be, but he was afraid the Baltimore public might not be willing to accept cordially the unknown concert master. When the concert came off Mr. Ellis insisted on my going up with him to the dress circle, where we could both hear the concerto favorably. While we were in the middle of the entertainment Mr. Talbot, the ticket-seller, sent a messenger to Mr. Ellis to come to the box office and settle up. Mr. Ellis answered gently that he would be there pretty soon. Mr. Talbot grew impatient and sent another messenger, who appeared just at the climax of the "rondo." Mr. Ellis did not deign to give him a word or even a look until the concerto was over, when he went to the box office, hastily run over the piles of tickets for him to count and then count ed the money as only an experienced banker could do. He said to Talbot: "Do you think your statement quite correct?" "I know it is," said Talbot, "I've counted it twice." Well," said Mr. Ellis, "I don't want to cheat you. You've given me this $100 too much," as he handed him over a package of the smaller bills. Mr. Talbot's impatience quickly changed to a feeling of thankfulness that he was dealing not only with a person of culture and refinement, but with a straightforward, honest man. WILLARD G. DAY.

TIMES
WASHINGTON, D. C.
MAR

New Willard—Boston Symphony Quartet.

Boston's final contribution to Washington's present season of music will be made on next Monday, March 26, when the Boston Symphony Quartet will give its third and last evening of chamber music in the ballroom of the New Willard Hotel.

The concert will bring as the assisting artist Mme Olga Samaroff whose playing here with the Philadelphia Orchestra recently made such a profound impression on Washington music-lovers. With prof. Willy Hess she will play Richard Strauss' sonata for pianoforte and violin in E-flat major, op. 18.

W YORK PRESS
MAR 26 1906

SONGS AND SINGERS.

Whether "programme notes" are entitled to a place beside the list of compositions to be played or sung at a concert, and whether they have any real value is always a debatable or at least debated question. At the outset of this discussion of some of the notes that have appeared on recent programmes we range ourselves under the flag of those who believe in these short cuts to the royal road of musical knowledge. Their usefulness is of the double-barreled sort. They not only are informative, but when they are as prolix—and as entertaining—as those in the books of the Boston Symphony Orchestra they often help to while away the tedium of some uninteresting number.

"Do you believe in these things?" asked one man of another at a recent concert, flipping his programme that bore one of these notes.

"No," replied the man addressed. "After all, they are only one man's opinion."

Such was Schumann's viewpoint, to which he gave expression in a rhapsody he wrote on hearing a performance of Schubert's Symphony in C major in Leipsic. After telling how the music affected him, how it brought before his mental vision a picture of the city of Vienna, he added, "I will not try to extol and interpret the symphony; men in the different stages of life take such different views of the impressions they derive from artistic fancies, and the youth of eighteen often discovers in a symphony the echo of some world-wide event where the mature man sees only a local matter, whereas the musician never has thought of either the one or the other, and has merely poured forth from his heart the very best music he could give." That last expression of Schumann's is full of meaning to music-lovers, to students and to the makers of these "notes" if they would only take warning from it. The habit of trying to read strange things into such music as this symphony is as strongly implanted in the mind of the average writer on musical topics as is that of explaining away Shakespeare's meanings. Great good might be done if all harkened to that pregnant phrase of Schumann. For one thing there might be an end to such absurdities as the tradition that the last movement of this work illustrates the episode of Phaeton and his trials in driving Apollo's chariot, which is of a piece with many of the things that have been "read into" music of this sort by foolish commentators. That these musical doctors do not agree on the symptoms is pointed out, in the same programme, in the case of the "Sakuntala" overture, in which one writer finds that one movement is a "love theme," while another suggests that this, with another theme, pictures Sakuntala in the sacred grove.

It is not the conventional thing to connect humor with such compositions as are written by the masters and performed by such organizations as the Bostonians, the Philharmonic or the Kneisels; yet these "programme notes" unconsciously lend themselves to this effect. In the midst of the grave description of the "Sakuntala" overture, for example, the commentator has added to his already exuberant quantity of serious matter a description of a performance of that work in dramatic form culled from a contemporary whose chief aim is flippancy. The incongruity of the thing apparently never struck the compiler of the notes. Again, in the note for explaining away Smetana's quartet, "Aus meinem Leben," there is a quotation from the composer's own description of the composition. There can be no question of the means. Smetana set down in black and white the story of his life as it was told in these four movements, and all in that spirit of unconscious frankness, or egregious vanity, which is the mark of the average Continental artist. The composer takes 300 words—and his utterances are indescribably vain—to tell what the quartet means, and he adds: "Further than this, nothing." After reading the "note" one may well wonder what more he could have told of his life save such details as his favorite drink or whether he preferred fair women to brunettes. Another, and more cryptic, bit of humor is to be found in Sir Edward Elgar's description of his "Variations on an Original Theme," played by the Philharmonic on last Friday and Saturday. From the composer's own words we learn that one theme of this composition suffers from the "absent treatment," since "through and over the whole set another and larger theme 'goes,' but is not played." Time will show what the commentators make of this unplayed, and consequently unheard, theme. That such a task is not beyond them a glance at any of the notes in existence shows.

We believe in these notes; yet they have their faults, particularly when the writers drag in art terms to try to make their meanings clearer. A particularly glaring illustration of this was seen in the programme of the last concert of the New York Symphony Orchestra. To elucidate the "meaning" of MacDowell's "The Saracens" and "The Fair Alda" the writer of the note said, "both may be taken as musical portraiture or as delineations of moods, as the listener chooses." No one will quarrel with this allowance of latitude. The point to which we object is the calling of "The Saracens," for instance, a piece of musical portraiture. The melody of the composition is as clear, in its meaning, its anecdotal quality, as the printed page or one of Schreyer's paintings of Arab horsemen. To glance at the title of the work and then to sit back and listen to it is to have evoked a mental picture of a band of barbaric soldiers marching in picturesque confusion under some strangely colored banner with the light of fanatics glowing in their eyes. To call such music "the delineation of a mood" is frankly absurd. And to speak of it as "portraiture" is no less a case of the ill-advised use of a technical word lifted bodily from another, and less mystifying, art. Portraiture has nothing to do with genre painting or historical scenes. If art terms are to be used in connection with music then "The Fair Alda" should be ranked as a genre picture.

In a recent article in Harper's Weekly, Lawrence Gilman has some remarks pertinent to this discussion in his essay on "A Remarkable Symphony," by which he means Gustave Mahler's fifth symphony. That the director of the Vienna Opera House does not believe in these "programme notes" is made clear by one of his utterances quoted by Gilman. "Away with programme books that breed false ideas," the composer shouted in passionate tones. "The audience should be left to its own thoughts over the work that is being performed." Neither Gilman nor any reasonable student of music agrees with Mahler in this opinion. Gilman goes on to say: "The fatuity of this attitude, which is not assumed by Mr. Mahler alone, consists in the fact that it invites one to listen to music that is essentially programmatic as if it were absolute music—that is, as if it has been composed with no thought of a poetic or dramatic subject. For it is not denied that Mr. Mahler in his symphonies has shaped his inspiration upon sequences of ideas external to the music itself; yet he requires us to listen to this music in entire ignorance of the ideas upon which it is based—a demand which is as unreasoned as it is fatuous and obstructive. For as Ernest Newman has lucidly observed, if melody, harmony and development are shaped and directed by certain pictures in the musician's mind, we get no further than the mere outside of the music unless we are familiar with those pictures."

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
OUTLOOK.
From NEW YORK CITY.
Address
Date MAR 24 1906

Wilhelm Gericke

The announcement that Mr. Wilhelm Gericke has resigned his post as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and will return in May to Austria to make his home again in Vienna, has been received with universal regret by lovers of music in this country—and that means by a very large body of men and women, for the love of good music and the appreciation of genuine musicians has grown almost by leaps and bounds since Mr. Gericke first came to these shores in 1880, a quarter of a century ago. The cause of orchestral music has been helped forward in America by Mr. Gericke perhaps more than by any other one man, with the possible exception of Theodore Thomas. In saying this we do not forget Karl Bergmann, Dr. Leopold Damrosch, or Anton Seidl; to all of whom New York must be ever grateful for the work which they did in developing and cultivating the musical taste of ork, 1884

LIFE
From
Address
Date MAR 29 1906

IN spite of the bad going caused by the snowstorm of the day before, which put a heavy tax upon the facilities of livery stable, perhaps the largest audience of the season paid its farewell respects to William Gericke at the fifth and last of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts in the Baptist Temple last week, Friday evening. At the close of a very beautiful program consisting of Mozart's Symphony in G minor, Dvorak's concerts in B minor for violincello and Beethoven's Heroic symphony rendered with the exquisite precision and refinement of expression for which the orchestra under Mr. Gericke's leadership is proverbial, the conductor received a flattering ovation from the audience. Previously during the Dvorak number he had also been presented with a wreath, a fact, however, which became apparent only after a polite controversy between the leader and the soloist, Mr. Heinrich Warneke, for whom the former supposed it was intended. The melodious daintiness and sweetness of the Mozart Symphony was peculiarly suited to the style of interpretation characteristic of Mr. Gericke and a more satisfying rendering could scarcely be imagined. The rendering of the Dvorak and Beethoven compositions, however, was more or less open to the usual objection that vigor and fire were subordinated to nicety of expression and perfection of technique, and this extended to the work of the soloist whose playing was as unexceptional as it was undistinguished. As for the Heroic symphony there was certainly nothing very suggestive of the heroic in the orchestra's treatment of it. All said and done, however, it was a concert of such rare beauty that criticism seems ungracious. One could go much farther and fare worse in looking for a conductor, and it is not improbable that future Boston symphony audiences may be sighing for the return of the conductor who has so long been identified with the orchestra. In the large attendance were noticed: Mr. John F. Praeger, Mrs. William F. Dudley, Mr. Frank J. Price, Mrs. George A. Price, Mr. and Mrs. Edward H. Jewell, Mr. Samuel K. Probasco, Mrs. Francis L. Eames, Mrs. Richard P. Merritt, Miss Grace Merritt, Miss Anna Merritt, Mr. and Mrs. John E. Leech, Miss Charlotte Leech, Miss Harriette Low, Miss Adele Church, Miss Nathalie Wierum, Mr. and Mrs. Charles D. Meneely, Dr. Franklin W. Hooper, Miss Perkins, Mr. Thomas S. Perkins, Mr. Walter Perkins, Miss Katherine Blossom, Mr. Henry Adams, junior, Mr. F. C. Bates, Miss Mabel Murray, Miss Sallie Ingalls, Miss Annie Ingalls, Mr. and Mrs. Stephen M. Griswold, Mr. and Mrs. John D. Snedeker, Mr. Edwin L. Snedeker and Mr. and Mrs. James H. Merritt.

[243]

[343]

LITT
From
Address Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date MAR 24 1904

IN spite of the bad going caused by the snowstorm of the day before, which put a heavy tax upon the facilities of livery stable, perhaps the largest audience of the season paid its farewell respects to William Gericke at the fifth and last of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts in the Baptist Temple last week, Friday evening. At the close of a very beautiful program consisting of Mozart's Symphony in G minor, Dvorak's concerts in B minor for violincello and Beethoven's Heroic symphony rendered with the exquisite precision and refinement of expression for which the orchestra under Mr. Gericke's leadership is proverbial, the conductor received a flattering ovation from the audience. Previously during the Dvorak number he had also been presented with a wreath, a fact, however, which became apparent only after a polite controversy between the leader and the soloist, Mr. Heinrich Warneke, for whom the former supposed it was intended. The melodious daintiness and sweetness of the Mozart Symphony was peculiarly suited to the style of interpretation characteristic of Mr. Gericke and a more satisfying rendering could scarcely be imagined. The rendering of the Dvorak and Beethoven compositions, however, was more or less open to the usual objection that vigor and fire were subordinated to nicety of expression and perfection of technique, and this extended to the work of the soloist whose playing was as undistinguished as it was indistinguishable. As for the Heroic symphony there was certainly nothing very suggestive of the heroic in the orchestra's treatment of it. All said and done, however, it was a concert of such rare beauty that criticism seems ungracious. One could go much farther and fare worse in looking for a conductor, and it is not improbable that future Boston symphony audiences may be sighing for the return of the conductor who has so long been identified with the orchestra. In the large attendance were noticed: Mr. John F. Praeger, Mrs. William F. Dudley, Mr. Frank J. Price, Mrs. George A. Price, Mr. and Mrs. Edward H. Jewell, Mr. Samuel K. Probasco, Mrs. Francis L. Eames, Mrs. Richard P. Merritt, Miss Grace Merritt, Miss Anna Merritt, Mr. and Mrs. John E. Leech, Miss Charlotte Leech, Miss Harriette Low, Miss Adele Church, Miss Nathalie Wierum, Mr. and Mrs. Charles D. Meneely, Dr. Franklin W. Hooper, Miss Perkins, Mr. Thomas S. Perkins, Mr. Walter Perkins, Miss Katherine Blossom, Mr. Henry Adams, junior, Mr. F. C. Bates, Miss Mabel Murray, Miss Sallie Ingalls, Miss Annie Ingalls, Mr. and Mrs. Stephen M. Griswold, Mr. and Mrs. John D. Snedeker, Mr. Edwin L. Snedeker and Mr. and Mrs. James H. Merritt.

In a recent article in Harper's Weekly, Lawrence Gilman has some remarks pertinent to this discussion in his essay on "A Remarkable Symphony," by which he means Gustave Mahler's fifth symphony. That the director of the Vienna Opera House does not believe in these "programme notes" is made clear by one of his utterances quoted by Gilman. "Away with programme books that bread tales ideas," the composer shouted in pantomime tones. "The audience should be left to its own thoughts over the work that is being performed." Neither Gilman nor any reasonable student of music agrees with Mahler in this opinion. Gilman goes on to say: "The faculty of the attitude, which is not assumed by Mr. Mahler alone, consists in the fact that it invites one to listen to music that is essentially programmatic as if it were absolute music—that is, as if it had been composed with no thought of a poetic or dramatic subject. For it is not denied that Mr. Mahler in his symphonies has shaped his inspiration upon sequences of ideas external to the music itself; yet he [illegible] us to listen to this music in exactly the same manner as we should listen to a symphony by Beethoven or Brahms, which has been composed without any such extraneous aid." Gilman then goes on to point out that the symphonies of Mahler are "symphonies of life," and that "the attempt to separate the purely musical from the literary and pictorial elements in the work of Mahler is foredoomed to failure." The melody of the composition is as clear in its meaning, its anecdotal quality, as the printed page or one of Scheyer's paintings of Arab horsemen. To glance at the title of the work and then to sit back and listen to it is to have evoked a mental picture of a band of barbaric soldiers marching in picturesque confusion under some strangely colored banner with the light of tentless glowing in their eyes. To call such music "the delineation of a mood" is frankly absurd. And to speak of it as "portraiture" is no less a case of the ill-advised use of a technical word lifted bodily from another, and less mystifying, art. Portraiture has nothing to do with genre painting or historical scenes. If art terms are to be used in connection with music then "The Fair Alda" should be ranked as a genre picture.

We believe in these notes; yet they have their faults, particularly when the writers drag in art terms to try to make their meanings clearer. A particularly glaring illustration of this was seen in the programme of the last concert of the New York Symphony Orchestra. To elucidate the "meaning" of MacDowell's "The Saracens" and "The Fair Alda" the writer of the note said, "both may be taken as musical portraiture or as delineations of moods, as the listener chooses." No one will quarrel with this elsewhere of latitude. The point to which we object is the calling of "The Saracens," for instance, a piece of musical portraiture. The melody of the composition is as clear in its meaning, its anecdotal quality, as the printed page or one of Scheyer's paintings of Arab horsemen. To glance at the title of the work and then to sit back and listen to it is to have evoked a mental picture of a band of barbaric soldiers marching in picturesque confusion under some strangely colored banner with the light of tentless glowing in their eyes. To call such music "the delineation of a mood" is frankly absurd. And to speak of it as "portraiture" is no less a case of the ill-advised use of a technical word lifted bodily from another, and less mystifying, art. Portraiture has nothing to do with genre painting or historical scenes. If art terms are to be used in connection with music then "The Fair Alda" should be ranked as a genre picture.

It is not the conventional thing to comment by the masters and performed by such organizations as the Boston[illegible], the Philharmonic or the Kneisels. Yet these "programme notes" unconsciously lend themselves to this effect. In the midst of the grave description of the "Saharuntala" overture, for example, the commentator has added to his already exuberant quantity of serious matter a description of a local matter, whereas the musician never has thought of either the one or the other, and has merely poured forth from his heart the very best music he could give." That last expression of Schumann's is full of meaning to music-lovers, to students and to the makers of these "notes." If they would only take warning from it. The habit of trying to read strange things into such music as this symphony is as strongly implanted in the mind of the average writer on musical topics as is that of explaining away Shakespeare's meanings. Great good might be done if all backsliding to that prevalent phrase of Schumann. For one thing there might be an end to such absurdities as the tradition that the last movement of this work illustrates the episode of Phaeton and his trials in driving Apollo's chariot, which is of a piece with many of the things that have been "read into" music of this sort by foolish commentators. That these musical doctors do not agree on the symptoms is pointed out, in the same programme, in the case of the "Sakuntala" overture. In which one writer finds that one movement is a "love theme," while another suggests that this, with another theme, pictures Sakuntala in the sacred grove.

"Do you believe in these things?" asked one man of another at a recent concert, clipping his programme that bore one of these notes.

"No," replied the man addressed. "After all, they are only one man's opinion."

Such was Schumann's viewpoint, in which he gave expression in a rhapsody he wrote on hearing a performance of Beethoven's Symphony in C major in Leipsic. After telling how the music affected him, how it brought before his mental vision a picture of the city of Vienna, he added, "I will not try to extol and interpret the symphony; mean in the different stages of life take such different views of the impressions they derive from artistic fancies, and the youth of eighteen often discovers in a symphony the echo of some world-wide event where the mature man sees only a local matter, whereas the musician never has thought of either the one or the other, and has merely poured forth from his heart the very best music he could give." That last expression of Schumann's is full of meaning to music-lovers, to students and to the makers of these "notes." If they would only take warning from it. The habit of trying to read strange things into such music as this symphony is as strongly implanted in the mind of the average writer on musical topics as is that of explaining away Shakespeare's meanings. Great good might be done if all backsliding to that prevalent phrase of Schumann. For one thing there might be an end to such absurdities as the tradition that the last movement of this work illustrates the episode of Phaeton and his trials in driving Apollo's chariot, which is of a piece with many of the things that have been "read into" music of this sort by foolish commentators. That these musical doctors do not agree on the symptoms is pointed out, in the same programme, in the case of the "Sakuntala" overture. In which one writer finds that one movement is a "love theme," while another suggests that this, with another theme, pictures Sakuntala in the sacred grove.

Whether "programme notes" are entitled to a place beside the list of compositions to be played or sung at a concert, and whether they have any real value is always a debatable or at least debated question. At the outset of this discussion of some of the notes that have appeared on recent programmes we range ourselves under the banner of those who believe in these short cuts to the royal road of musical knowledge. Their usefulness is of the double-edged sort. They not only are informative, but when they are as prolix—and as entertaining—as those in the books of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, they often help to while away the tedium of some uninteresting number.

SONGS AND SINGERS

MAR 24 1904

NEW YORK PRESS

WASHINGTON, D. C.
TIMES
MAR 22 1904

New Willard—Boston Symphony Quartet.

Boston's final contribution to Washington's present season of music will be made on next Monday, March 28, when the Boston Symphony Quartet will give its third and last evening of chamber music in the ballroom of the New Willard Hotel.

The concert will bring as the assisting artist Mme Olga Samaroff whose playing here with the Philadelphia Orchestra recently made such a profound impression on Washington music-lovers. With prof. Willy Hess she will play Richard Strauss' sonata for pianoforte and violin in E-flat major, op. 18.

AMERICAN
BALTIMORE, MD.
MAR 18 1904

Gleanings From the World of Music

pold Damrosch, or Anton Seidl, to all of whom New York must be ever grateful for the work which they did in developing and cultivating the musical taste of this community. But, Mr. Gericke not only possesses the genius, temperament, and training of a great conductor, but has had the advantage of having a perfectly equipped orchestra put into his hands, with full control to give it the impress of his own artistic mold, and yet has been relieved of the financial and commercial burdens which so often distract, harass, and obstruct great musicians in their work.

Those who have attended the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the last twenty-five years are more or less conversant with Mr. Gericke's history, so far as it is connected with this country. He came to Boston in 1884, when he was thirty-nine years of age, at the invitation of Major Higginson, the founder and generous supporter of the Boston Orchestra. After five years' work he returned to Europe, but again took up the baton in Boston in 1898, and has since remained there.

The Outlook has little sympathy with those who declare that art should be pursued solely for art's sake, that it is to be judged merely by standards of sensuous beauty, that its purpose is solely to give pleasure to the eye, ear, or the mind, that it consists exclusively of color and form in painting, of tone in music, and of style in literature. Of course beauty is the prime and fundamental element in art, but too many artists forget that line in Keats's immortal "Ode on a Grecian Urn" which tells us that beauty is truth, truth beauty. It is this element of truth or character in art that makes it something more than a mere pastime and source of pleasure. The truest art is an educating, civilizing, spiritualizing force, as well as a vehicle of the supremest beauty. The greatest and most perfectly rounded artists as long as art has existed have recognized this, and an artist is to be judged great by the success and balance with which he mingles these two elements. Judged in this way, Mr. Gericke seems to us to be a great artist. His modesty, his freedom from personal vanity and uncharitableness, his sanity and wholesomeness of taste, his very wide range of musical knowledge, his capacity to understand, deeply enjoy, and sympathetically interpret all kinds of music—a Bach fugue, a Beethoven symphony, a Brahms concerto, a Strauss waltz, or a Debussy tone-poem—are manifestations of that personality and character which, after all, is the source of his power. Mr. Gericke himself, at a supper given in his honor after his farewell evening concert in New York last week, gave expression to this view of the artist's moral responsibility. At the close of two hours of delightful and friendly companionship and merrymaking, he said his words of good-by to the men who had met to do him honor, by telling the following story: "Many years ago in Vienna I heard Heinrich Esser conduct Flotow's opera 'Stradella.' I had at that time the contempt of the young men of my school for this particular school of Italian music. As the opera proceeded I found to my astonishment that Esser was giving the score the same careful interpretation that he would give to one of the great works of music. After the opera was over I met him and expressed my astonishment and asked him to explain how he could treat so trivial a work with so much respect. I have never forgotten his reply: 'My friend,' he said, 'whatever I have to do I try to do with honesty and sincerity.' This," continued Mr. Gericke, "made a deep impression upon me, and I have ever since endeavored to make it my rule of conduct in my professional life."

It is perhaps too soon to form a perfectly just estimate of Mr. Gericke's genius in that field of art in which he has worked, but it is not too soon to express feelings of gratitude and appreciation to him for the sincerity, faithfulness, high purpose, and catholicity of spirit and taste with which he has served this country while he has been one of her adopted—unfortunately temporarily adopted—citizens. This is also a suitable occasion for saying a word in defense of the belief that the highest art and the highest morality have something in common—especially when this belief is so well exemplified in the personality and achievements of one of the great orchestral conductors of modern times.

TOWN & COUNTRY
NEW YORK CITY.
MAR 24 1906

MUSICAL EVENTS

Mr. Gericke's Farewell—The Marteau Gerardy Concert—Pianists Heard This Season.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's concerts at Carnegie Hall on March fifteenth and seventeenth, marked the farewell appearances in this city of Mr. Wilhelm Gericke as conductor of that famous organization, and the large and appreciative audiences did all that was possible to express their regard for him, and their regret at his departure, by storms of applause; and at the end of the second concert, when the audience would not depart, Mr. Gericke was obliged to make a short speech in which he expressed his gratitude for the sympathy and kindness shown him in this city, saying that it would always be remembered.

The programme on March fifteenth comprised Bach's orchestral suite in D minor, which was played with all the variety of moods in which it so delightfully abounds; Debussy's prelude "The Afternoon of a Faun," an exquisite woodland picture, which was recently performed here by the New York Symphony Orchestra under Mr. Damrosch, and Beethoven's wonderful Eroica which was splendidly rendered. Mr. Henry Marteau was the soloist, playing a violin concert dedicated to him by its composer, Emile Jacques-Dalerôge, a Swiss, who is not largely known here. The work shows some fine imagination, and is very skillfully worked out. Mr. Marteau played it magnificently, with fine spirit, and splendid tone.

On March seventeenth, Mr. David Bispham was the soloist, singing a ballad by Frederick S. Converse which is a setting for baritone voice and orchestra of Keat's poem "La Belle Dame Sans Merci," and "An jenem Tag," an air from Marschmer's opera "Hans Heiling." Mr. Bispham has always the interpretations of a great artist, and his style is splendid, but his voice on this occasion was not always under his usual control, and not always true as to tone.

The orchestral numbers were the dramatic "Der Freischutz" overture by Weber, the charming, graceful "Sakuntala" overture by Goldmark and Schubert's marvelous symphony in C which has not been heard here before for a long time. The numbers were all performed as the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Mr. Gericke could perform them when at their best, and that is saying all that could be said.

The Boston Post

20TH SYMPHONY CONCERT

Mary Hissem De Moss, soprano, was the soloist at the symphony concert last evening and the programme was as follows:

Suite in D major, No. 3.....Bach
Aria from "Joshua".....Handel
Suite for orchestra, "Geharnischte".....Busoni
Aria from "The Magic Flute".....Mozart
Symphony No. 4, op. 98.....Brahms

The orchestral suite, "Geharnischte," by the pianist Ferruccio Busoni, was played at this concert for the first time. The composer for a time lived at Helsingfors in Finland during his early life, and over 10 years later, in 1897, wrote this suite, in reference to his stay in Finland, for he inscribed each of the four movements to a friend in Helsingfors.

On a first hearing the suite impressed mainly as a clever exhibition of modern orchestral technic. The march rhythm of the first movement has a certain interest, and elsewhere there are occasional flashes of spontaneity of thought with the scoring often ingenious and imaginative. But as a whole Mr. Busoni's suite made but little more impression than did an overture of his played earlier in the season. It was played with great care and finish.

Bach's familiar suite, the Air and Gavotte of which were made popular years ago by the late Theodore Thomas, was admirably played, both orchestra and conductor receiving a special ovation for the performance of the Air, the best known portion of the work.

Mme. Hissem De Moss sang "O, had I Jubal's Lyre," from Handel's "Joshua," with much beauty of tone and artistic finish. In the aria from Mozart's "Magic Flute" she was less successful, for the piece demands a soprano of extraordinary range, and the singer in this respect was not equal to the demands. In consequence the extreme upper notes were considerably off pitch, and this marred what was otherwise an excellent performance. Mme. De Moss was heartily applauded and recalled after each number, and the concert ended with Brahms' fourth symphony in E minor, op. 98.

BOSTON SYMPHONY QUARTET

Miss Susan Metcalfe, who will be the soloist with the Boston Symphony Quartet at its sixth and last concert in Jordan Hall on Monday evening, April 9, is generally regarded as one of the most artistic singers of songs now before the public.

Paragon Park will open for the summer season on June 10, and remain open until Labor Day.

PENSION FUND CONCERT

The last opportunity lovers of music in Boston will have to hear a Wagner programme played by the Symphony Orchestra under Mr. Gericke's direction will be the pension fund concert which takes place in Symphony Hall this evening at 8 o'clock. For those who are not regular subscribers of the Symphony concerts, and for the strangers in the city, this concert will also afford one of the rare opportunities of the year to hear the orchestra. Incidentally, the cause for which the concert is given is a most admirable one, for it is an important element, this pension fund, in the maintenance of the orchestra at its present high standard.

How important the local musical world regards it is found in the fact that two of the leading musical organizations of the city, the Thursday Morning Club, of women's voices, and the Apollo Club, of men's voices, have volunteered their services for the evening.

The soloist of the evening will be Mrs. Hissem de Moss, who sang at the Symphony concerts of yesterday and the day before. With the Thursday Morning Club she will sing Senta's ballade from "The Flying Dutchman," and her second number will be Elizabeth's prayer from "Tann-

---

SUNDAY, APRIL 1, 1906.

MRS. DE MOSS AT THE SYMPHONY

Sings for the First Time at These Concerts and Delightfully—Not a Mere Declaimer.

NEW "GEHARNISCHTE" SUITE BY BUSONI

Work Characteristic of the Author—Moments When He Almost Succeeds in Establishing a Heroic Mood.

The 20th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Gericke, conductor, was given last night in Symphony Hall. Mrs. Mary Hissem de Moss, soprano, sang for the first time at these concerts. The programme was as follows:

Suite in D major, No. 3.....Bach
"Oh, Had I Jubal's Lyre".....Handel
"Geharnischte" Suite (first time).....Busoni
Symphony in E minor, No. 4.....Brahms

Bach, Brahms and—Busoni! Here are three "B's" with a vengeance.

The wonder is that Busoni, a close student of Bach and a transcriber for the piano of many of his works, has not learned to lead the various voices in his own orchestral compositions with greater ease and with more effect.

This "Geharnischte" suite is characteristic of Busoni. The word means "armored," "in harness"; it also means "vigorous," "defiant." Busoni as pianist and composer suggests the defiant knight impatient to rush on the foe—and this foe, alas, is Beauty. The chief feature of his piano playing is aggressiveness. He does not coax, woo, persuade, charm. A piece of music composed for the piano interests him as long as it contains great difficulties to be mastered. He is happiest when he arranges for an audience a formidable, stupendous, time-defying programme. He has uncommon precision and accuracy in the dissection of a work; he can play very fast and with amazing loudness; he can be brilliant, but his brilliance is as coldly remote as that of the northern lights.

A recital by Busoni reminds one of the verses in Nahum: "The noise of a whip and the noise of the rattling of the wheels and of the prancing horses and of the jumping chariots. The horse man lifteth up both the bright sword and the glittering spear; and there is a multitude of slain and a great number of carcasses."

Not that he is for a moment a poseur. The pity of it is that he is terribly in earnest. He is profoundly unhappy because there are no technical problems for him as a pianist to solve, no difficulties for him to conquer. He is the Alexander of pianists.

And therefore he contrives transcriptions that may possibly baffle others; he unites a concerto for piano, orchestra and chorus, a work that consumes an hour or possibly an hour and a half in performance; he has the mania of composing.

Mr. Anatole France says of contemporaneous literature that it has two deadly sins, avarice and pride. "We are dying from pride. We know enough. We are skilful, curious, restless, bold. We still know how to write, and if we do not reason so well as our forefathers, we perhaps feel more keenly. But pride kills us. We wish to astonish, and this is all we do wish. There is only one praise that touches us, that which asserts our originality; as though originality were something desirable in itself; as though there were not bad as well as good originality."

These words of France may be applied to certain contemporaneous composers, and in part to Busoni. We remember Busoni's "Tone Poem," played at one of the Symphony concerts a dozen years ago, and we also remember the consternation of the hearers. The piece was scored for all the instruments of percussion, and also other instruments, and as Mr. Apthorp used to say in the programme books, it defied technical analysis. Early this season Mr. Gericke produced a "comedy overture" by Busoni. It was as light as a boiled New England dinner.

In the "Geharnischte" suite, composed in 1895, revised in 1903, and first performed Dec. 1, 1904, at Berlin, we recognize certain characteristics of Busoni, the pianist, and the truth of Anatole France's saying. The suite is in four movements: "Introduction," "War Dance," "Funeral Monument" and "Onset." Each movement is dedicated to a musical friend in Halsingfors where Busoni once lived as a teacher.

When Mr. Busoni plays the piano he generally plays the thoughts of others. In this suite the thoughts are chiefly his own. It would be cruel to others even to hint that he had their thoughts in mind. What a poverty of melodic invention there is in this music! How weak the average phrase! And any phrase that gives promise is quickly tortured out of shape. Passing over the scrappy first movement, we come to the war dance! First there is an unmeaning unison; then comes a chromatic and wholly incongruous tune for the trumpet, and then there is music that is fit only for a tingle-tangle hall. Do such strains recall to mind the savage dance of old Finnish warriors? The music given to the Cambodgians in "Wang" has much more character.

In the third movement Busoni evidently had in his mind an impressive musical scheme. There are moments when he almost succeeds in establishing a heroic and sombre mood, but his thoughts are fugitive and scattering; he has not the skill to build his monuments with scanty or abundant material. And, pray, what could any one do, however great his constructive skill, with was less successful as a whole in the bravura aria of the mysterious Queen of Night, yet for the most part she sang it well. It was a pleasure to hear once more a singer at a symphony concert, not a mere declaimer, not a woman of "dramatic intensity" and little vocal art, not a Wagnerphone.

---

[244]

---

MUSIC NOTES.

The fourth and last in Miss Orvis' series of concerts took place yesterday morning in Huntington Chambers Hall. The musicians were Mme. Antoinette Szumowska, pianist, and Mr. Josef Adamowski, 'cellist. The programme included two movements from Rubinstein's sonata in D major for piano and violin, solos for 'cello by Rubinstein, Converse and Popper and piano solos by Handel, Chopin, Paderewski, Wagner and Liszt. There was an audience of moderate size that applauded heartily.

Mr. H. Nelson Raymond, bass, has resigned his position in the choir of the Shawmut Congregational Church to join the choir of the First Church of Newton.

Boston Transcript
324 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON, MASS.
SATURDAY, MARCH 31, 1906

Symphony Concert

Music of lightness were a desideratum, certainly, at this end of a symphony season which Mr. Gericke has crowded with important works, that have piqued curiosity and excited interest and given pleasure, truly, albeit with some tax on the intellect. And lightness Mr. Gericke very properly sought, and achieved, with his programme of yesterday afternoon. Bach began it with the suite containing, for one thing, the Air, upon which everybody dotes, and much pleasant music else.

Bach, the man prodigiously fecund of ideas. If we could but borrow some of John Tanner's method with himself, how many of us might not be got to make some rather shocking confessions of what we really, in our very inmost souls, think of Bach. Would not many of us—emboldened to frank and fearless speech—put Bach down as a man who might well have kept better watch of his pen? It seemed never to rest with comfort to itself. It had mastered, with almost over-great completeness, the mechanism of music. Wherever it trod vegetation sprang up in its footprints—some of this flowers, and some of it—not. Whatever it wrote it preserved. It is we who listen who have to perform for ourselves as we hark, a service that a keener editorial sense in Bach might have saved us the performing. We have to weed Bach's garden for ourselves, so to say, and wade through wastes of vegetation sometimes, to arrive at the flowers. These are Tanneresque sentiments, and the Suite of yesterday provoked their utterance chiefly by differing from others of Bach's compositions that do invite such complaints of their composer. The Suite of yesterday was all brightness, sweetness, humor and grace. Light and sweet were the arias that Mrs. Hissem de Moss sang out of Handel and Mozart. And Busoni had loosed the rein on his powers of burlesque in the Suite we had of his making. Only Brahms, at the end, was permitted to be tender and grave, and a little downcast, in his Symphony in E minor, number four.

Mrs. de Moss has a voice and a method that are light and airy. She seems to be [illegible]

[illegible] "Hell" from the [illegible] this vein. And so all [illegible] together yesterday afternoon [illegible] erate every flaw from [illegible] agreeable singing.

Busoni waxes very gay in [illegible] perhaps more spirited than re[illegible] there seem spaces in his merr[illegible] where he forgets the saving qua[illegible] which wit is reputed to obtain its [illegible] Here and there, just in spots, and f[illegible] a flash of a moment, the fun p[illegible] itself till it ceases to realize its [illegible] tions, and forgets that sweetness [illegible] only quality that can endure b[illegible] drawn out. But Busoni's is dra[illegible] and quite gay enough all the while [illegible] lasts.

But Brahms—Brahms the tender, [illegible] grave, and slightly melancholy in [illegible] Fourth Symphony. Time was [illegible] Brahms was thought an extreme [illegible] vanced man, exalted, cold, unre[illegible] high on his pinnacles of mystery [illegible] speculation. It promptly became [illegible] fashion to roll the eyes toward the cei[illegible] ing when Brahms was played. To dote on Brahms was to proclaim one's self an extremely superior person. By now Brahms has become how intimate and understandable! His chill and recondite daring has become how warm and simple!

This is because we have lived and learned to understand Brahms; we have come abreast of him and have mastered him. It is also because we have listened to Strauss and D'Indy, Debussy and Reger. The world has walked beyond Brahms, as it will walk beyond Strauss, and as we shall look back upon the tempestuous music of Strauss and think it as primitive and tame as the once revolutionary Wagner has become.

And what is all this but a testimony to the great minds we have today? The complaint is that we just now have no great minds in music or in anything else. But when did any present ever have any great mind? And were not Beethoven and Wagner in their time denounced for their abstruseness and eternal experimentalizing, even as Debussy and Strauss are berated for the self-same offences now? It may be no positive proof, but it affords at least grounds for suspicion, that the men we are sending out of our own day into the future may not there deport themselves so ill as many of us think they will.

But this is far from the Symphony concert of yesterday afternoon, and its matchless performance of the symphony by Brahms. Mr. Gericke gave it romance, and its slow movement he invested with the tenderness that always finds Brahms at his best.

B. K.

/ / + / /

Concerts Next Week

César Franck, the first time this season when Mr. Gericke has been conducting, has a place on the programme for the twenty-first pair of Symphony concerts on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening next. Then the third and the fourth movements of his suite, "Psyche," will be played—the former for the first and the latter for the second time here. Originally Franck wrote "Psyche" as a symphony for orchestra and chorus. He did not follow the classic legend, but chose rather to regard Eros and Psyche as disembodied and idealized passions and aspirations. The first movement pictures the slumber of Psyche. Then in the second, the zephyrs bear her to the gardens of Eros. In the third the passion of the pair mounts and subsides. The fourth, which the orchestra played under Mr. d'Indy last December, portrays the happiness of the lovers, now ecstatic, and now calm. "Eros and Psyche," says the programme book, "do not appear as individuals. The orchestra interprets their feelings, and for this reason; the two are in this poem not individuals. Franck, forgetting the legendary personages, looks on them as symbols of the human soul and supreme love. Music, absolute music without words, because its notes do not have a definite meaning, is of all the forms of art the most adequate expression of these immaterial realities. The orchestra translates the longings, the regrets, the final joy of Psyche, and it is easily to be seen that the whole work is charged with the spirit of Christian mysticism." The other new music on the programme is the introduction to the third act of "Der Pferfertag," an opera by Max Schillings, the young German composer, whose music is steadily making its way at home and abroad. The symphony in Schumann's fourth, and Mr. Gericke is at his best in Schumann's music. The concerto is Goldmark's for violin, with Jaques Hoffmann, of the first violins, to play the solo part.

For the orchestra's concert for the benefit of its Pension Fund tomorrow evening at eight, comes the second Wagner programme of the year, and, thanks to the choruses of the Apollo and the Thursday Morning Clubs, two numbers among it that are seldom heard outside the [illegible] in their respective operas. The Apollo Club has given its services for the scene in the sanctuary of the Grail from the first act of "Parsifal," and the Thursday Morning Club is to assist in the spinning scene from the second act of "The Flying Dutchman." In it Mrs. Hissem de Moss is to sing Senta's ballad, and the concert begins with the overture of the opera. Mrs. de Moss will also sing Elisabeth's prayer from the second act of "Tannhäuser," and the [illegible] will play the long introduction [illegible] tures Tannhäuser's pilgrimage [illegible] excerpts from the music-drama [illegible] ter's arrangement of Siegfried's [illegible] Brunnhilde's rock and [illegible] Gunther's hall, and the [illegible] ing scene from "Tristan."

[illegible] little of Wagner that [illegible] our theatres and at concerts

TOWN & COUNTRY
om
dress NEW YORK CITY.
te MAR 24 1906

MUSICAL EVENTS

Mr. Gericke's Farewell—The Marteau Gerardy Concert—Pianists Heard This Season.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's concerts at Carnegie Hall on March fifteenth and seventeenth, marked the farewell appearances in this city of Mr. Wilhelm Gericke as conductor of that famous organization, and the large and appreciative audiences did all that was possible to express their regard for him, and their regret at his departure, by storms of applause; and at the end of the second concert, when the audience would not depart, Mr. Gericke was obliged to make a short speech in which he expressed his gratitude for the sympathy and kindness shown him in this city, saying that it would always be remembered.

The programme on March fifteenth comprised Bach's orchestral suite in D minor, which was played with all the variety of moods in which it so delightfully abounds; Debussy's prelude "The Afternoon of a Faun," an exquisite woodland picture, which was recently performed here by the New York Symphony Orchestra under Mr. Damrosch, and Beethoven's wonderful Eroica which was splendidly rendered. Mr. Henry Marteau was the soloist, playing a violin concert dedicated to him by its composer, Emile Jacques-Daleröge, a Swiss, who is not largely known here. The work shows some fine imagination, and is very skillfully worked out. Mr. Marteau played it magnificently, with fine spirit, and splendid tone.

On March seventeenth, Mr. David Bispham was the soloist, singing a ballad by Frederick S. Converse which is a setting for baritone voice and orchestra of Keat's poem "La Belle Dame Sans Merci," and "An jenem Tag," an air from Marschmer's opera "Hans Heiling." Mr. Bispham has always the interpretations of a great artist, and his style is splendid, but his voice on this occasion was not always under his usual control, and not always true as to tone.

The orchestral numbers were the dramatic "Der Freichutz" overture by Weber, the charming, graceful "Sakuntala" overture by Goldmark and Schubert's marvelous symphony in C which has not been heard here before for a long time. The numbers were all performed as the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Mr. Gericke could perform them when at their best, and that is saying all that could be said.

The Boston Post

20TH SYMPHONY CONCERT

Mary Hissem De Moss, soprano, was the soloist at the symphony concert last evening and the programme was as follows:

Suite in D major, No. 3.....Bach
Aria from "Joshua".....Handel
Suite for orchestra, "Geharnischte".....Busoni
Aria from "The Magic Flute".....Mozart
Symphony No. 4, op. 98.....Brahms

The orchestral suite, "Geharnischte," by the pianist Ferruccio Busoni, was played at this concert for the first time. The composer for a time lived at Helsingfors in Finland during his early life, and over 10 years later, in 1897, wrote this suite, in reference to his stay in Finland, for he inscribed each of the four movements to a friend in Helsingfors.

On a first hearing the suite impressed mainly as a clever exhibition of modern orchestral technic. The march rhythm of the first movement has a certain interest, and elsewhere there are occasional flashes of spontaneity of thought with the scoring often ingenious and imaginative. But as a whole Mr. Busoni's suite made but little more impression than did an overture of his played earlier in the season. It was played with great care and finish.

Bach's familiar suite, the Air and Gavotte of which were made popular years ago by the late Theodore Thomas, was admirably played, both orchestra and conductor receiving a special ovation for the performance of the Air, the best known portion of the work.

Mme. Hissem De Moss sang "O, had I Jubal's Lyre," from Handel's "Joshua," with much beauty of tone and artistic finish. In the aria from Mozart's "Magic Flute" she was less successful, for the piece demands a soprano of extraordinary range, and the singer in this respect was not equal to the demands. In consequence the extreme upper notes were considerably off pitch, and this marred what was otherwise an excellent performance. Mme. De Moss was heartily applauded and recalled after each number, and the concert ended with Brahms' fourth symphony in E minor, op. 98.

BOSTON SYMPHONY QUARTET

Miss Susan Metcalfe, who will be the soloist with the Boston Symphony Quartet at its sixth and last concert in Jordan Hall on Monday evening, April 9, is generally regarded as one of the most artistic singers of songs now before the public.

Paragon Park will open for the summer season on June 10, and remain open until Labor Day.

PENSION FUND CONCERT

The last opportunity lovers of music in Boston will have to hear a Wagner programme played by the Symphony Orchestra under Mr. Gericke's direction will be the pension fund concert which takes place in Symphony Hall this evening at 8 o'clock. For those who are not regular subscribers of the Symphony concerts, and for the strangers in the city, this concert will also afford one of the rare opportunities of the year to hear the orchestra. Incidentally, the cause for which the concert is given is a most admirable one, for it is an important element, this pension fund, in the maintenance of the orchestra at its present high standard.

How important the local musical world regards it is found in the fact that two of the leading musical organizations of the city, the Thursday Morning Club, of women's voices, and the Apollo Club, of men's voices, have volunteered their services for the evening.

The soloist of the evening will be Mrs. Hissem de Moss, who sang at the Symphony concerts of yesterday and the day before. With the Thursday Morning Club she will sing Senta's ballade from "The Flying Dutchman," and her second number will be Elisabth's prayer from "Tannhauser."

SUNDAY HERALD
Published Every Day in the Year.
VOL. CXIX., NO. 91.
SUNDAY, APRIL 1, 1906.

MRS. DE MOSS AT THE SYMPHONY

Sings for the First Time at These Concerts and Delightfully—Not a Mere Declaimer.

NEW "GEHARNISCHTE" SUITE BY BUSONI

Work Characteristic of the Author—Moments When He Almost Succeeds in Establishing a Heroic Mood.

The 20th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Gericke, conductor, was given last night in Symphony Hall. Mrs. Mary Hissem de Moss, soprano, sang for the first time at theso concerts. The programime was as follows:

Suite in D major, No. 3.....Bach
"Oh, Had I Jubal's Lyre".....Handel
"Geharnischte" Suite (first time).....Busoni
Symphony in E minor, No. 4.....Brahms

Bach, Brahms and—Busoni! Here are three "B's" with a vengeance.

The wonder is that Busoni, a close student of Bach and a transcriber for the piano of many of his works, has not learned to lead the various voices in his own orchestral compositions with greater ease and with more effect.

This "Geharnischte" suite is characteristic of Busoni. The word means "armored," "in harness"; it also means "vigorous," "defiant." Busoni as pianist and composer suggests the defiant knight impatient to rush on the foe—and this foe, alas, is Beauty. The chief feature of his piano playing is aggressiveness. He does not coax, woo, persuade, charm. A piece of music composed for the piano interests him as long as it contains great difficulties to be mastered. He is happiest when he arranges for an audience a formidable, stupendous, time-defying programme. He has uncommon precision and accuracy in the dissection of a work; he can play very fast and with amazing loudness; he can be brilliant, but his brilliance is as coldly remote as that of the northern lights.

A recital by Busoni reminds one of the verses in Nahum: "The noise of a whip and the noise of the rattling of the wheels and of the prancing horses and of the jumping chariots. The horse man lifteth up both the bright sword and the glittering spear; and there is a multitude of slain and a great number of carcasses."

Not that he is for a moment a poseur. The pity of it is that he is terribly in earnest. He is profoundly unhappy because there are no technical problems for him as a pianist to solve, no difficulties for him to conquer. He is the Alexander of pianists.

And therefore he contrives transcriptions that may possibly baffle others; he unites a concerto for piano, orchestra and chorus, a work that consumes an hour or possibly an hour and a half in performance; he has the mania of composing.

Mr. Anatole France says of contemporaneous literature that it has two deadly sins, avarice and pride. "We are dying from pride. We know enough. We are skilful, curious, restless, bold. We still know how to write, and if we do not reason so well as our forefathers, we perhaps feel more keenly. But pride kills us. We wish to astonish, and this is all we do wish. There is only one praise that touches us, that which asserts our originality; as though originality were something desirable in itself; as though there were not bad as well as good originality."

These words of France may be applied to certain contemporaneous composers, and in part to Busoni. We remember Busoni's "Tone Poem," played at one of the Symphony concerts a dozen years ago, and we also remember the consternation of the hearers. The piece was scored for all the instruments of percussion, and also other instruments, and, as Mr. Apthorp used to say in the programme books, it defied technical analysis. Early this season Mr. Gericke produced a "comedy overture" by Busoni. It was as light as a boiled New England dinner.

In the "Geharnischte" suite, composed in 1895, revised in 1903, and first performed Dec. 1, 1904, at Berlin, we recognize certain characteristics of Busoni, the pianist, and the truth of Anatole France's saying. The suite is in four movements: "Introduction," "War Dance," "Funeral Monument" and "Onset." Each movement is dedicated to a musical friend in Halsingfors where Busoni once lived as a teacher.

When Mr. Busoni plays the piano he generally plays the thoughts of others. In this suite the thoughts are chiefly his own. It would be cruel to others even to hint that he had their thoughts in mind. What a poverty of melodic invention there is in this music! How weak the average phrase! And any phrase that gives promise is quickly tortured out of shape. Passing over the scrappy first movement, we come to the war dance. First there is an unmeaning unison; then comes a chromatic and wholly incongruous tune for the trumpet, and then there is music that is fit only for a tingle-tangle hall. Do such strains recall to mind the savage dance of old Finnish warriors? The music given to the Cambodgians in "Wang" has much more character.

In the third movement Busoni evidently had in his mind an impressive musical scheme. There are moments when he almost succeeds in establishing a heroic and sombre mood, but his thoughts are fugitive and scattering; he has not the skill to build his monument with scanty or abundant material. And, pray, what could any one do, however great his constructive skill, with the feeble themes in the finale?

desire to do something that is original and great, when the composer has not mastered the essential elements of technic. There is no more true color in his orchestral combinations than in his piano playing. The figures given at times to the strings when the other instruments are busy—and busy to no purpose—might come from some instruction book. It would be a waste of time to point out the lack of genuine thematic development, a lack which is not atoned for by any brilliant or beautiful or heroic impressionistic pages.

The "Geharnischte" suite came between the works of two masters of musical architecture. It is true that with the flight of years only the first two movements of Bach's suite have vital interest today, and that the structural ability of Brahms far exceeded his emotional thought and expression. But it is not necessary to judge Busoni's suite by such works; it would have seemed equally futile and jejune had it been sandwiched between the overture to "The Bronze Horse" and a symphony by a lesser man than Brahms.

The air by Bach was finely read. The pace was a fortunate one and the interpretation was refreshingly free from sentimentalism. Mr. Gericke did all that was possible for the "Geharnischte" suite, and he led the symphony in a musically eloquent spirit, not after the manner of an imported "Brahms specialist" who feels it his duty to instruct the audience.

Mrs. de Moss sang "Oh, Had I Jubal's Lyre" from Handel's "Joshua"—for Handel wrote other oratorios than the "Messiah" although the Handel and Haydn Society has apparently forgotten the fact. How pleasant it was to hear English sung at a Symphony concert, especially as enunciated by Mrs. de Moss! For after all English is the language that is spoken in business and at home by the great majority of the Symphony audience. It is the language in which the New Englander buys, sells, prays, quarrels, lies, makes love. It is the language of Marlowe and Shakespeare, Shelley and Keats, Collins and Poe, Tennyson and Swinburne. Poets in their singing-robes have not disdained it.

Yet American-born singers seem ashamed to use it, possibly because nine-tenths of them have never learned to enunciate it clearly and pronounce it correctly in song. It is true that the Rev. Thomas Morell, who served more than once as Handel's librettist, was not an inspired bard. He preached sermons and Englished the classics; he sang a good song, told a good story, dressed shabbily and was always in debt, but he was not a "boss poet," to borrow Artemus Ward's phrase, and Morell's contemporaries flouted his verses. Nevertheless, Mrs. de Moss sang an air with English words, as Mr. Bispham recently sang "La Belle Dame Sans Merci" of Keats and Converse in English, so this season may well be set apart for this fact and for the extraordinary brilliance of many of the concerts.

Mrs. de Moss, one of the few highly accomplished American sopranos now on the concert stage, sang Handel's air delightfully, with the appropriate purity and fleetness of expression. She was less successful as a whole in the bravura aria of the mysterious Queen of Night, yet for the most part she sang it well. It was a pleasure to hear once more a singer at a symphony concert, not a mere declaimer, not a woman of "dramatic intensity" and little vocal art, not a Wagnerphone.

MUSIC NOTES.

The fourth and last in Miss Orvis' series of concerts took place yesterday morning in Huntington Chambers Hall. The musicians were Mme. Antoinette Szumowska, pianist, and Mr. Josef Adamowski, 'cellist. The programme included two movements from Rubinstein's sonata in D major for piano and violin, solos for 'cello by Rubinstein, Converse and Popper and piano solos by Handel, Chopin, Paderewski, Wagner and Liszt. There was an audience of moderate size that applauded heartily.

Mr. H. Nelson Raymond, bass, has resigned his position in the choir of the Shawmut Congregational Church to join the choir of the First Church of Newton.

Boston Transcript

324 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON, MASS.

SATURDAY, MARCH 31, 1906

Symphony Concert

Music of lightness were a desideratum, certainly, at this end of a symphony season which Mr. Gericke has crowded with important works, that have piqued curiosity and excited interest and given pleasure, truly, albeit with some tax on the intellect. And lightness Mr. Gericke very properly sought, and achieved, with his programme of yesterday afternoon. Bach began it with the suite containing, for one thing, the Air, upon which everybody dotes, and much pleasant music else.

Bach, the man prodigiously fecund of ideas. If we could but borrow some of John Tanner's method with himself, how many of us might not be got to make some rather shocking confessions of what we really, in our very inmost souls, think of Bach. Would not many of us—emboldened to frank and fearless speech—put Bach down as a man who might well have kept better watch of his pen? It seemed never to rest with comfort to itself. It had mastered, with almost over-great completeness, the mechanism of music. Wherever it trod vegetation sprang up in its footprints—some of this flowers, and some of it—not. Whatever it wrote it preserved. It is we who listen who have to perform for ourselves as we hark, a service that a keener editorial sense in Bach might have saved us the performing. We have to weed Bach's garden for ourselves, so to say, and wade through wastes of vegetation sometimes, to arrive at the flowers. These are Tanneresque sentiments, and the Suite of yesterday provoked their utterance chiefly by differing from others of Bach's compositions that do invite such complaints of their composer. The Suite of yesterday was all brightness, sweetness, humor and grace. Light and sweet were the arias that Mrs. Hissem de Moss sang out of Handel and Mozart. And Busoni had loosed the rein on his powers of burlesque in the Suite we had of his making. Only Brahms, at the end, was permitted to be tender and grave, and a little downcast, in his Symphony in E minor, number four.

Mrs. de Moss has a voice and a method that are light and airy. She seems to be most at her ease in the things of lighter sentiment and manner, and indulges her instinct to cleave to such things mainly. The aria she sang from Handel's "Joshua," and the "Pangs of Hell" from the Magic Flute, are both in this vein. And so all these matters came together yesterday afternoon to obliterate every flaw from her perfectly agreeable singing.

Busoni waxes very gay in his Suite—perhaps more spirited than refined. And there seem spaces in his merrymaking where he forgets the saving quality from which wit is reputed to obtain its soul. Here and there, just in spots, and for but a flash of a moment, the fun prolongs itself till it ceases to realize its intentions, and forgets that sweetness is the only quality that can endure being long drawn out. But Busoni's is droll music and quite gay enough all the while that it lasts.

But Brahms—Brahms the tender, the grave, and slightly melancholy in his Fourth Symphony. Time was when Brahms was thought an extreme and advanced man, exalted, cold, unreachably high on his pinnacles of mystery and speculation. It promptly became the fashion to roll the eyes toward the ceiling when Brahms was played. To dote on Brahms was to proclaim one's self an extremely superior person. By now Brahms has become how intimate and understandable! His chill and recondite daring has become how warm and simple!

This is because we have lived and learned to understand Brahms; we have come abreast of him and have mastered him. It is also because we have listened to Strauss and D'Indy, Debussy and Reger. The world has walked beyond Brahms, as it will walk beyond Strauss, and as we shall look back upon the tempestuous music of Strauss and think it as primitive and tame as the once revolutionary Wagner has become.

And what is all this but a testimony to the great minds we have today? The complaint is that we just now have no great minds in music or in anything else. But when did any present ever have any great mind? And were not Beethoven and Wagner in their time denounced for their abstruseness and eternal experimentalizing, even as Debussy and Strauss are berated for the self-same offences now? It may be no positive proof, but it affords at least grounds for suspicion, that the men we are sending out of our own day into the future may not there deport themselves so ill as many of us think they will.

But this is far from the Symphony concert of yesterday afternoon, and its matchless performance of the symphony by Brahms. Mr. Gericke gave it romance, and its slow movement he invested with the tenderness that always finds Brahms at his best.

B. K.

/ / + / /

Concerts Next Week

César Franck, the first time this season when Mr. Gericke has been conducting, has a place on the programme for the twenty-first pair of Symphony concerts on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening next. Then the third and the fourth movements of his suite, "Psyche," will be played—the former for the first and the latter for the second time here. Originally Franck wrote "Psyche" as a symphony for orchestra and chorus. He did not follow the classic legend, but chose rather to regard Eros and Psyche as disembodied and idealized passions and aspirations. The first movement pictures the slumber of Psyche. Then in the second, the zephyrs bear her to the gardens of Eros. In the third the passion of the pair mounts and subsides. The fourth, which the orchestra played under Mr. d'Indy last December, portrays the happiness of the lovers, now ecstatic, and now calm. "Eros and Psyche," says the programme book, "do not appear as individuals. The orchestra interprets their feelings, and for this reason; the two are in this poem not individuals. Franck, forgetting the legendary personages, looks on them as symbols of the human soul and supreme love. Music, absolute music without words, because its notes do not have a definite meaning, is of all the forms of art the most adequate expression of these immaterial realities. The orchestra translates the longings, the regrets, the final joy of Psyche, and it is easily to be seen that the whole work is charged with the spirit of Christian mysticism." The other new music on the programme is the introduction to the third act of "Der Pferfertag," an opera by Max Schillings, the young German composer, whose music is steadily making its way at home and abroad. The symphony in Schumann's fourth, and Mr. Gericke is at his best in Schumann's music. The concerto is Goldmark's for violin, with Jaques Hoffmann, of the first violins, to play the solo part.

For the orchestra's concert for the benefit of its Pension Fund tomorrow evening, at eight, comes the second Wagner programme of the year, and, thanks to the choruses of the Apollo and the Thursday Morning Clubs, two numbers appear on it that are seldom heard outside their places in their respective operas. The Apollo Club has given its services for the scene in the sanctuary of the Grail from the first act of "Parsifal," and the Thursday Morning Club is to assist in the spinning scene from the second act of "The Flying Dutchman." In it Mrs. Hissem de Moss is to sing Senta's ballad, and the concert begins with the overture of the opera. Mrs. de Moss will also sing Elisabeth's prayer from the third act of "Tannhäuser," and the orchestra will play the long introduction that pictures Tannhäuser's pilgrimage. The other excerpts from the music-dramas are Richter's arrangement of Siegfried's ascent to Brunnhilde's rock and his journey to Günther's hall, and the prelude and closing scene from "Tristan." And it is very little of Wagner that we have heard in our theatres and at concerts this season.

Boston Sunday Globe.
SUNDAY, APRIL 1, 1906.

MUSICAL MATTERS

Symphony Pension Fund Benefit Tonight.

Interesting Program Played by the Orchestra Last Night.

Cecilia, Apollo and Other Concerts of the Week.

The last opportunity lovers of music in Boston will have to hear a Wagner program played by the Symphony orchestra under Mr Gericke's direction will be at the pension fund concert, which takes place in Symphony hall this evening at 8 o'clock. For those who are not regular subscribers of the Symphony concerts and for the strangers in the city this concert will also afford one of the rare opportunities of the year to hear the orchestra. These two facts make it one of the most interesting musical events of the season. Incidentally, it is an important element, this pension fund, in the maintenance of the orchestra at its present high standard.

How important the local musical world regards it is found in the fact that two of the leading musical organizations of the city, the Thursday Morning club of women's voices and the Apollo club of men's voices, have volunteered their services for the evening, thus enabling Mr Gericke to give the "Spinning Wheel" chorus from "The Flying Dutchman" and the impressive "grail scene" from the first act of "Parsifal."

The soloist of the evening will be Mrs Hissem de Moss, who sang at the Symphony concerts yesterday and the day before. With the Thursday Morning club she will sing Senta's "Ballade" from "The Flying Dutchman," and her second number will be Elizabeth's prayer from "Tannhauser." The entire program is as follows: Overture, "The Flying Dutchman"; "Spinning" chorus and "Ballade," from "The Flying Dutchman"; introduction and prayer, act III, "Tannhauser"; selections from "Siegfried" and "Gotterdammerung"; "Grail Scene," act I, "Parsifal"; "Vorspiel and Liebestod," "Tristan and Isolde."

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The 20th Symphony program had for soloist Mrs Hissem de Moss, who has been quite prominent in the local musical world of late, her singing with the Cecelia, Handel and Haydn, Apollo and other organizations being highly commended and her work giving great satisfaction because of the diversified abilities shown by the artist. She sang with the orchestra the soprano arias, "O, Had I Jubal's Lyre," from Handel's oratorio, "Joshua," and "The Pangs of Hell," from Mozart's "Magic Flute." Busoni's orchestral suite, "Geharnischte," was played for the first time at these concerts and Bach's D major suite for orchestra and Brahms' fourth symphony completed the selections. Mrs Moss has a high soprano voice, flexible, brilliant and light and admirably suited to bravura work, for her execution is very smooth and true, and she shows her artistic training by the skilful manner in which she uses the mezzo voice, an accomplishment that is all too rare even with some of our most famous singers. Handel's brief aria was delivered with considerable fervor, and although Mrs Moss was lacking in dramatic strength to fully illustrate the text, the sweetness of her song was undeniably attractive. In the pyrotechnics of the Mozart aria she was excellent, with but a shade of deviation from the pitch in the high staccato phrases. Mrs Moss was received with great favor.

The Busoni suite is in four movements, each one dedicated to a friend and titled in turn, "Prelude," "War Dance," "Funeral Monument" and "Onset." The name "Geharnischte" conveys little meaning as to the character of the music or the relation of one part to the other, for the word has several synonyms. Despite its peculiar character the composition is quite interesting, in spots, the boldness and barbaric tone of the introduction being a capital example of instrumental juggling as a theme is passed about in the different choirs of the band. The brasses deserve particular praise for uniformly good tone. The "War Dance" has a chromatic motif that is rather odd in character, also a batch of unison phrases for strings in forte that is very effective. Both of these were played with splendid verve. The somber third part and the impetuous fourth received characteristic treatment. The brass instruments are very prominent in the score, and this part of the orchestra certainly maintained its high standard in every way.

The five movements of Bach's D major suite and Brahms' E minor symphony, straightforward good music, were played with the usual finish and interpretative skill expected of this great orchestra. In the Bach number the beautiful quality and unity of performance by the strings, which have the bulk of the work to do, again demonstrated the great proficiency of the body. The melancholy and passionate nature of the Brams symphony was perfectly preserved, making its interpretation very impressive. Mr Gericke's receptions of late have been exceedingly cordial, and yesterday and Friday were not exceptions.

This week's program will have for a novelty the introduction to the third act of "Der Pfeifertag," an opera by Max Schillings. Cesar Franck will be represented by two movements from his [illegible], which have already been heard here. The symphony will be [illegible] No. 4 in D minor. Mr [illegible] of the orchestra will [illegible] Dvorak's A minor [illegible] Susan Metcalfe, who will be the soloist with the Boston Symphony quartet at its sixth and last concert in Jordan hall Monday evening, April 2, is generally regarded as one of the most artistic singers of songs now before the public. While she has sung in private in Boston, this will be her first public appearance. She has already sung with the quartet in Washington and New York.

---

Prof Hess is preparing a quartet and an octet for this concert. The quartet is the one in D minor by the talented but unfortunate Hugo Wolf. It has never been played in this city. The octet will be Svendsen's in A major. The assisting artists in this will be Messrs Kuntz, Krafft, Zach and Nagel of the orchestra.

The Boston Journal

SINGS ENGLISH WITH SYMPHONY

Mrs. De Moss Delights Audience With Old Classics—Freak Music on Program.

Mrs. Mary Hissem de Moss sang from Handel's "Joshua" the aria, "Oh, Had I Jubal's Love" and "The Pangs of Hell" from Mozart's "Magic Flute" at the Symphony concert Saturday night. She used the English word version and the result was satisfactory She is a pleasing singer, although her voice is perhaps a trifle light for so large a hall.

Brahms' E minor symphony was presented to Mr. Gericke's most gracious mood, which expression may well be accepted as a synonym for perfection. A freak number was Busoni's "Geharnischte" suite for orchestra, played for the first time here. It is freakish throughout, with little to interest beyond the appreciation of the hard work of the players.

John Sebastion Bach's D major suite for orchestra opened the program.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.

Bach—Suite for Orchestra, in D major.
Handel—Air, "O, had I Jubal's Lyre," from the oratorio "Joshua."
Soloist, Mrs. Mary Hissem De Moss.
Busoni—"Geharnischte" Suite: second orchestral suite, No. 2, op. 34, A. I. Prelude. II. War Dance. III. Funeral Monument. IV. Onset. (First time at these concerts.)
Mozart—Aria, "The Pangs of Hell," from the opera, "The Magic Flute."
Mrs. Hissem de Moss.
Brahms—Symphony No. 4, in E minor, op. 98.

It was a hopeful sign that Bach and Brahms received the most applause in this concert, spontaneous and hearty applause that showed that the public still appreciates symmetry of design and melody. The Bach Suite had, however, one of the defects of the old school. The presentation of all the movements in the same key becomes irksome in these modulatory times. It is probable that this course was forced upon Bach by the avoidance of the tempered scale upon keyed instruments, inculcating a habit of restricted modulation which seems strange to the modern auditor.

We may remember, however, that it was Bach himself who broke these fetters, for his "well-tempered clavichord," presenting a free use of all the 24 major and minor keys (Part I.—1722, Part II.—1742), was the musician's Declaration of Independence,—"We hold that all keys are created free and equal!"

It was the beautiful "air" of this Suite that won the chief applause, causing the conductor to bow several times and finally to order his string orchestra to rise and join him in obeisances. And it is a noble tune. How any one who is familiar with this tune, or the air for the G string of the violin, or "Around thy tomb here sit we weeping," can say that Bach was unmelodic, passes comprehension. He had a loftiness of tune that no other composer achieved.

The suite was finely played and its three dances reminded the auditor that our symphony form is descended from dancing. Here is the genealogy:—a contrast of dances begat the partita, the partita begat the suite de danses, the suite begat the sonata and symphony. The cycle forms of music owe much to Terpsichore, and they also owe something to Spain (a debt which is not acknowledged in the musical histories), for many of the chief dances of the suite had their origin among the Moors and Spaniards, and the southern country sent its instrumental forms into France, and thence into northern Europe, in very early times.

Mrs. Hissem De Moss sang the Handelian selection with most agreeable voice, with easy flexibility and with admirable phrasing. One might have demanded more breadth however. She was recalled at the close of the aria. In the succeeding number, "The Pangs of Hell," she was very brilliant in the staccato passages, although she flatted decidedly in the highest register. As this flatting, however, was exactly a semi-tone each time it may have been an intentional alteration of the passage to avoid the highest notes. Mrs. De Moss was recalled with much enthusiasm after this number.

After the Bach suite there came a suite of very different order. Mr. Ferruccio Busoni has proved himself such a great student of Bach that we may assume that if he adopts the ultra-modern vein in his compositions he does it from choice and not from any inability to work in the accepted shapes. We can only say therefore that we wish he had kept to the musical highway and not struck off through the brambles.

The suite was intended as a "Heroic" composition, dealing with military heroism much as Strauss and Beethoven have done, but the word "Heroic" having been overused in music Mr. Busoni took refuge in the less usual term of "Harnessed," used in the sense that Shakespeare applies it in the last act of "Macbeth":—

"At least we'll die with harness on our back."

It is a Mahleresque work. It employs a tremendous orchestra and Mr. Busoni shows great brilliancy in laying on his tone-colors. There are even glimpses of attractive melody, but they remain only glimpses, for these tuneful infants are promptly strangled after the most modern manner.

The war-dance might have applied to Ojibwa Indians quite as well as to armored knights, while at the beginning of the "funeral monument" the long rumblings of the contra-bassoon suggested a dissatisfied cow rather than the tomb. But here, too, there were some very strong contrasts and many dramatic touches. The final assault (and battery) was a finable offence, considering that Strauss had already achieved trouble enough upon the battlefield.

Sherman once said—"War is Hell"—and this sounded like it. Yet the galloping steeds in the beginning of the movement and the march-like themes were not altogether without their effect.

While we emphatically do not like the school, we demand for Busoni the same respect that is accorded to other modern dissonancists. The more we get of this rambling, difficult, "impressionist" school, the better, for the fever will have sooner run its course. By-and-bye, when most of the conductors have suffered nervous collapse, and all the musicians are killed by extra rehearsals, matters will quiet down again and Music resume her normal path.

We were delighted when the long Andante of the Brahms symphony received enthusiastic applause. That cool, calm opening phrase, in its peculiar "major-minor" mode, came like a lotion to bruised ears. But we begin to believe that the final "Passacaglia" variations are too long in spite of their great ingenuity. Brahms (like Beethoven) had such tremendous skill in varying a theme that it often led him too far.

Oh, it is excellent to have a giant's strength,
But it is tyrannous to use it like a giant.

Louis C. Elson.

The Boston Post

PENSION FUND CONCERT

The concert in aid of the pension fund of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was held last evening at Symphony Hall and proved a pleasing event in many ways. There was a gratifyingly large audience, which meant a goodly addition to the worthy cause, and it was also a farewell to Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, whose association with the orchestra will be severed at the close of the present season. Mr. Gericke will, of course, conduct at the remaining concerts, but last evening's affair was in the line of an adieu between the popular leader and his men.

Again the programme was composed exclusively of Wagnerian selections, and in addition to the orchestra there were Mrs. Hissem de Moss, Lilla Ormond, Sullivan Sargent and John F. Daniels as soloists, and the Thursday Morning and Apollo clubs, all of whom volunteered their services.

The overture and a scene from the second act of "The Flying Dutchman" opened the programme. The latter number included the spinning song and the "Legend," sung by Mrs. de Moss. The introduction and prayer in the third act of "Tannhauser" followed, and there were also selections from "Siegfried," "Gotterdammerung," the Grail scene from the first act of "Parsifal" and the vorspiel and liebestod of "Tristan and Isolde."

It was a pleasing programme throughout and one of the most delightful of any given at these concerts. Mr. Gericke received quite an ovation and led his forces with even more than his wonted skill and artistry.

Mrs. de Moss' voice, although of great purity, was scarcely of sufficient volume for the Senta song, but was heard to much better advantage in Elizabeth's prayer from "Tannhauser." The chorus was adequate and the work of the orchestra in the "Parsifal" number a positive delight.

Boston Daily Globe.
MONDAY, APRIL 2, 1906.

WAGNERIAN PROGRAM.

Apollo and Thursday Morning Clubs Assist in Music Seldom Heard Outside Grand Opera.

The pension fund concert, which has now come to be an eagerly anticipated feature of Boston's musical season, this time took the form of a Wagnerian festival, and had anyone any vestige of doubt about the vigor or earnestness of the cult here, such questioning must have been definitely silenced in the face of last night's splendid audience.

True, many came partly to testify to the sterling worth of the orchestra and its leader, but there was undoubtedly a generous showing of those who were also out because it was Wagner night. These latter had a superb treat. For breadth and dignity—for exemplification of those qualities which show interpretation and keen, scholarly insight to massive themes often bordering upon mysticism—this concert has not had an equal in recent years. Masterly adequateness was as much as any other one thing the keynote of the event; and it will be remembered prominently among the many commendable things about the second regime of Wilhelm Gericke.

---

loves the phrase, applied to any of its artistic possessions, transient or permanent. Herr Conreid may give it the cold shoulder in grand opera for a time, but it has still "the finest" in the realm of orchestral music. How great is the degree of its indebtedness to the 13 years of splendid endeavor on the part of conductor Gericke future annalists will willingly testify. Weingartner of Berlin, Nikisch of Leipsig, Steinbach of Meiningen, Mahler of Vienna or any other talked of eligible for the maestro's place will find an organization as nearly perfect as any; which was far from true when Mr Gericke began with it. This labor, when one pauses to think of it, has been little short of appalling. And through it all there has been the commendable catholicity which not only gave a hearing to every recognized school of composition, but which had the calibre of real genius.

The famous overture to "The Flying Dutchman" opened the program, and hearers were still under the spell of its beauty when the superb "Spinning Chorus" from the second act of the opera was begun. The women of the Thursday Morning club sang it delightfully, but it was particularly noteworthy for the introduction of narrative sentences by "Mary," sung with uncommon clearness and power by Miss Lilla Ormonde. The distinctness and intelligence displayed not only in this number, but in her very brief phrase for contralto in the "Parsifal" selection which followed were worthy of especial commendation. It is not given to every one to make a few short tonal paragraphs so conspicuously successful.

Mrs Hissem De Moss sang with excellent effectiveness the story by "Senta" of a storm at sea and the sailor who was compelled, like "the wandering Jew," to keep on forever. She sang with equal approval the prayer of Elizabeth from the third act of "Tannhauser," her voice, like Miss Ormonde's, being fully equal to the requirements of so great a hall. The climax of the beautiful tone picture of maidenly devotion was distinctly memorable.

The assistance by the Apollo club was, of course, adequate, the attack and maintenance of volume in the "Knights of the Grail" chorus being given with Mollenhauer-like fidelity. The parts for boys' voices were here taken by the female chorus, and in this instance also the effect, with orchestral suggestions of harp and chime, was most effective. The reading given by Mr Gericke and his players to the lovely prelude from "Tristan," first given in Boston by the Thomas orchestra in 1873, was full of poetic and reverent power. The beautiful legend took on new meanings under such conducting, as it always will.

John F. Daniels and Sullivan A. Sargent took the male voice solo parts in the "Parsifal" selection.

The program was the second exclusively Wagnerian effort this season by the symphony orchestra. The audience was large and appreciative, and substantial financial aid to a most deserving cause must have been the result. The benefit concert to Mr Gericke, one of the few remaining opportunities Boston will have for a long while to testify to the public appreciation of his great work in giving the city its present musical status, is announced for Tuesday evening, April 24.

THE PENSION FUND CONCERT.

The critic has altered the old Latin proverb to his purpose: "Speak nothing but good of the beneficent concert." Yet even were this saying not in force it would be difficult to say anything adverse regarding a Wagner programme given by our symphony men. They have been bred up to Wagner by each of their conductors, and Mr. Gericke has continued the Wagnerian cult which Henschel, Nikisch and Paur began. There was a time when Wagner was considered difficult, but now he is only a half-way house between Haydn and Strauss, or Mozart and Mahler.

The programme:—

Overture, "The Flying Dutchman."
Spinning Chorus and Ballade from Act II., "The Flying Dutchman."
Introduction and Prayer from Act III., "Tannhauser."
Selections from "Siegfried" and "Dusk of the Gods."
Grail Scene from Act I., "Parsifal."
Vorspiel and Liebestod from "Tristan and Isolde."

Mrs. Mary Hissem De Moss and the choruses of the Thursday Morning Club and the Apollo Club assisted. One can imagine the charm of the "Spinning Chorus" from the "Flying Dutchman" as given by our orchestra and the sweet voices of the Thursday Morning Club and the clear tones of Mrs. Hissem De Moss. Mrs. De Moss was at her best in this and in the prayer from "Tannhauser," in both of which the delicate quality of her voice was especially appropriate.

The Apollo Club were a magnificent chorus for the "Parsifal" selection. There was the greatest enthusiasm over "Parsifal," and Messrs. Daniles and Sargent did excellently in solos. In the "Flying Dutchman" Miss Lilla Ormonde was an excellent foil to Mrs. De Moss. The occasion was a decided success in every way. There was a very large audience present, large in spite of the fact that concert-goers might be jaded from a long season and an important orchestral concert for the benefit of our departing conductor, Mr. Gericke, had been announced for the immediate future. The whole occasion was the most signally successful of any of the pension fund concerts ever given in this city.

---

224 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON, MASS.

MONDAY, APRIL 2, 1906

A Wagner Concert

The more signs that we in Boston give of our liking for opera, the sooner and the more surely we shall have the Metropolitan company back again, and last night we were unusually clear and emphatic. There was a "Wagner programme" for the concert of the Symphony Orchestra for the increase of its pension fund. Except the overture to "The Flying Dutchman" and the prelude to "Tristan," every number on it was music of the scene—Senta's ballad and her dialogue with the spinning girls in the second act of "The Flying Dutchman," the introduction to the third act of "Tannhäuser" and Elisabeth's prayer before the wayside cross in the autumn twilight; Siegfried's ascent to Brünnhilde's rock, and his coming to Gunther's hall, the approach of Parsifal and Gurnemanz to the castle of the Grail and the eucharist of the knights; and for ending, Isolde's song of love and death. In the fragments from "The Flying Dutchman," "Tannhäuser" and "Parsifal," there were singers in evening coats and frocks for the music allotted to the characters of each opera. Elsewhere there was only the orchestra. Throughout it was Wagner "in concert form," with all its drawbacks and disillusions. Yet Symphony Hall was filled almost to the last seat. The audience listened intently eager, and its applause was quick and hearty. If we do these things for a "Wagner concert," would we not do as much and more for Wagner in his full and proper place, the theatre, and for opera in general? Last night we underscored the signs that we have been giving at every opportunity, the season through, of our liking for opera. They are so plain now that even Mr. Conreid might descry them afar off.

Orchestrally, however, it was Wagner such as neither the Metropolitan nor hardly any opera house in the world may give. Mr. Gericke and his men seemed to come to the music as eagerly as did the audience. It is an old story how Wagner gains in tonal beauty, in sheer musical power, in dramatic subtlety, when such a band and such a conductor plays his music. It is good to hear in absolute purity of tone the virginal quality of Senta's music in the overture to "The Flying Dutchman," and in such tone to follow the light that pours from the Grail. It is good to hear a Wagnerian climax rise in instrumental as well as in emotional proportion, for the two are more closely united than some of the thrashing "Wagner conductors" guess. It is good as well to hear every upper and under strand in the instrumental webs that he weaves and each in the adroitest euphony with the rest. But there were more than these things in the orchestra's performance last night. They were the perfect means to Wagner's ends. They gave the beauty which conductor and band made instinct with the power. There have been times when Mr. Gericke seemed to take Wagner's sea music in the overture to "The Flying Dutchman" tamely. Last night it pitched and curled. The music of Venus and her train came like fiery beckonings through the fragment from "Tannhäuser." Siegfried mounted to Brunnhilde's rock more vividly through such tones than he does through all the steamy fire and gauzy mists of the stage. It was tonal splendor and not moving scenery that carried Parsifal and Gurnemanz into the hall of the Grail. The orchestra sung the fate of Tristan and Isolde and then made their passion leap and flame against it. For once it was not languorous as it is the fashion of many a conductor to make it in these days of slow pace. It was too hot for that and too heroic. Throughout the concert there was the union of entire surety and proportion of detail, and of the perfection of musical means, with largeness and intensity of feeling. Mr. Gericke united them in his "Wagner concert" last November. He fused and heightened them last night. Not once seemingly did his men fail him. Every impulse of the music touched them as with a spark. At moments we that listened heard the Wagner of our ideals—the Wagner that is not tingling neurotic sensation, but is the power and the beauty of sound made poignant because they are controlled.

H. T. P.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau ... REVIEW

NEW YORK CITY.
ress
APR 1 - 1906

Nach Meldungen aus Wien soll der Direktor des dortigen Hofoperntheaters, Gustav Mahler, nach Ablauf seines dortigen Vertrages, d. zw. im Oktober 1907, an Stelle Wilhelm Gericke's die Leitung des Boston Symphonie-Orchesters übernehmen.

Herr Gericke wird am 26. April sein Abschieds-Concert dirigiren. Das Interregnum zwischen Gericke und Mahler dürfte vielleicht doch Fritz Steinbach ausfüllen. Und es scheint selbst die Möglichkeit nicht ausgeschlossen, daß Herr Gericke sich für ein weiteres Jahr wird engagiren lassen.

An Stelle Mahler's wird Felix Mottl von München nach Wien gehen, während Felix Weingartner Mottl's Stelle in München übernehmen dürfte.

Gustav Mahler gilt für einen der besten Opern-Dirigenten, doch auch seine Compositionen haben weitgehendes Interesse erweckt. 1860 in Böhmen geboren, war er erst Theater-Kapellmeister in kleineren österreichischen Städten, dann Vereins-Dirigent in Kassel, Musikdirector in Prag, leitete längere Zeit [illegible] die Oper in Leipzig, [illegible] Opernbirector in Pest, 1891 [illegible] Theaters am Ham[illegible] und folgte 1897 ei[illegible]

Newspaper ... Theatre
NEW YORK CITY.
ress
APR - 1906

THE end of the music season is easily within hailing distance, and a cry of relief arises from the music-saturated multitude. It has been a long and—to use a national word—a strenuous music season. The end is not quite yet, and this is hardly the time for a tonal retrospect. Rather are we concerned with what has belabored the ears of music-lovers and music-haters during the past four weeks.

Principal among the events of the concert room was the first performance in this city of Mahler's Fifth Symphony, exquisitely played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the conscientious baton of Wilhelm Gericke. This monumental work originally took an hour and twenty minutes in performance; but since then the shears and pruning knives of both the composer and Mr. Gericke were set a-snipping until the length of performance of the five movements was reduced to a bit less than an hour. Mahler, who is the czar of the Vienna Imperial Opera, is known to be one of the best conductors among the great ones, and in this phase of his art praise is not withheld from him. But as a composer he has done more than his share of Alpine climbing to reach public favor. We have heard his Fourth Symphony played by the New York Symphony Orchestra, and its success seemed a very doubtful one; but the recent performance of his Fifth symphonic work seemed to make an impression even less favorable. The principal fact that it impresses upon its hearers is that of unnecessary repetition of theme. Then the work seems but sparsely supplied with big moments; and the beginning is so impressive that the balance of it spells disappointment. It sounds, at first hearing, a work not at all difficult to understand—in fact it is, after some of the Strauss masterpieces, a work of but reasonable complexity. Oddly enough, it opens with a Funeral March that promises very much, but not during the course of this work is the height of the opening attained again. The Adagietto is pretty but reminiscent of Wagner; and the Waltz movement is also charming but suffers from repetition. The Boston band played this composition with a finish that was well nigh breath-taking. It is an interesting symphony, one t should be heard again; but it is far from being a colossal work. In fact, those who know the entire literature of the Mahler symphonies declare that this Fifth is not among his best writings.

Copyright, Burr McIntosh SIGNOR CAMPANARI AS

NEW YORK SUN
MAR 31 19

TO HAVE GERICKE'S PLACE.

Gustav Mahler of Vienna May Conduct Boston Symphony Orchestra.

According to advices received here yesterday from Vienna Gustav Mahler, now conductor of the Imperial Opera House in Vienna, is to be the next conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Mahler will not be at liberty, however, to come here until a year from next October. It has been announced that the orchestra's plans will not be divulged until after the farewell concert of Wilhelm Gericke on April 26.

It is probable that Fritz Steinbach, in spite of his denials, will come for the interregnum. The possibility th[illegible]

Gericke may still be engaged for another year is by no means excluded from consideration. If Col. Higginson will accept his terms Mr. Gericke will be able to remain.

The decision of Felix Weingartner not to return to the New York Symphony Orchestra next winter is closely connected with Gustav Mahler's call to Boston. Mr. Weingartner will, in accordance with present plans, be called to Munich to succeed Felix Mottl at the [illegible]

POST
TON, D. C.
MAR 27 190

QUARTET PLAYS DIVINELY

Boston Symphony Presents a Most Pleasing Programme.

Mozart, Grieg, and Strauss Compositions Delight a Fashionable and Art-loving Audience.

The third and last concert of the Boston Symphony Quartet at the Willard Hotel last night provided a fashionable and art-loving audience with a programme which has hardly been surpassed in Washington this season. It opened with one of the three Mozart quartets, which caused Haydn to declare that composer the greatest he had ever known, and closed with one of Grieg's best contributions to chamber music.

[246]

HERALD
BALTIMORE, J
MAR 31 1906

Will Not Succeed Geri[illegible]

The musical critic of the Tribune says: "There has been no foundation [illegible] for the persistent rumors that have come from Boston to the effect that Major Higginson was contemplating the engagement of Mr. Weingartner, the eminent German composer, as leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. 'It may be accepted without the slightest reservation that Major Higginson never made a proposition to Mr. Weingartner looking to an engagement. Mr. Weingartner has not entered into his calculations. In fact, Major Higginson's plans have not yet been formulated with anything like definiteness. He has neither decided to engage a conductor of eminence and celebrity nor a younger man of talent who would grow with the experience gained at the head of the organization which Mr. Gericke has brought to so high a degree of perfection.

The merits of Mr. Steinbach were strongly urged by some of his friends, especially by Mr. Willy Hess, the concert master of the Boston orchestra, and Major Higginson came to New York and listened to both public rehearsals last week. He went so far as to express a high degree of admiration for Mr. Steinbach's talent, but there was no approach of minds on the subject of an engagement, whereas Mr. Steinbach persisted in saying that he had no intention of leaving his post in Cologne, which, in addition to other things which made it eminently satisfactory, promised a handsome pension on a retirement, the date of which was brought near by the municipal authorities of Cologne on his engagement, they counting in the years of his service as music director general of the

The Boston Post

21ST SYMPHONY CONCERT

Jacques Hoffmann, violinist, was the soloist at the Symphony Concert last evening, and the programme was as follows:

Prelude to Act III. of "The Piper's Holiday" ..... Schillings
Concerto for violin, Op. 28 ..... Goldmark
Two movements from "Rosche" ..... Franck
Symphony No. 4 ..... Schuman

BOSTON SYMPHONY QUARTET

For the sixth and last concert of the Boston Symphony Quartet, which will be given in Jordan Hall tomorrow morning, Professor Hess has prepared what may be considered the most important novelty of chamber music of the season, Hugo Wolf's quartet for strings in D minor. It is rather curious that this work has never been played here in Boston, considering the vast amount of recognition its unfortunate composer has had in the last few years and the uncommon popularity which has been given to his songs. But an explanation may possibly be found in the extraordinary difficulty of the work, which demands much deeper and more thoughtful study than most of its kind.

The other instrumental work of the evening will be Svendsen's octet for strings in A major, op. 3. In this the quartet will have the assistance of Messrs. Kuntz and Krafft, violins; Mr. Zach, viola, and Mr. Nagel, [illegible] all of the orchestra.

The assisting artist will be Miss [illegible] Metcalfe, a soprano who will [illegible] her first public appearance [illegible] though she is not unknown [illegible] having sung in private [illegible] the past few years.

MR. GERICKE'S [illegible]

The sale of seats for Mr. Ger[illegible] well benefit concert, to be [illegible] phony Hall on Tuesday [illegible] will begin at the box [illegible] Hall on next Thursday [illegible] instead of on Friday [illegible] originally announced. [illegible] yet ready to announce [illegible] the programme of [illegible] now assured [illegible] she will [illegible]

Boston Transcript
624 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON, MASS.
MONDAY, APRIL 2, 1906

A Wagner Concert

The more signs that we in Boston give of our liking for opera, the sooner and the more surely we shall have the Metropolitan company back again, and last night we were unusually clear and emphatic. There was a "Wagner programme" for the concert of the Symphony Orchestra for the increase of its pension fund. Except the overture to "The Flying Dutchman" and the prelude to "Tristan," every number on it was music of the scene—Senta's ballad and her dialogue with the spinning girls in the second act of "The Flying Dutchman," the introduction to the third act of "Tannhäuser" and Elisabeth's prayer before the wayside cross in the autumn twilight; Siegfried's ascent to Brünnhilde's rock, and his coming to Gunther's hall, the approach of Parsifal and Gurnemanz to the castle of the Grail and the eucharist of the knights; and for ending, Isolde's song of love and death. In the fragments from "The Flying Dutchman," "Tannhäuser" and "Parsifal," there were singers in evening coats and frocks for the music allotted to the characters of each opera. Elsewhere there was only the orchestra. Throughout it was Wagner "in concert form," with all its drawbacks and disillusions. Yet Symphony Hall was filled almost to the last seat. The audience listened intently eager, and its applause was quick and hearty. If we do these things for a "Wagner concert," would we not do as much and more for Wagner in his full and proper place, the theatre, and for opera in general? Last night we underscored the signs that we have been giving at every opportunity, the season through, of our liking for opera. They are so plain now that even Mr. Conreid might descry them afar off.

Orchestrally, however, it was Wagner such as neither the Metropolitan nor hardly any opera house in the world may give. Mr. Gericke and his men seemed to come to the music as eagerly as did the audience. It is an old story how Wagner gains in tonal beauty, in sheer musical power, in dramatic subtlety, when such a band and such a conductor plays his music. It is good to hear in absolute purity of tone the virginal quality of Senta's music in the overture to "The Flying Dutchman," and in such tone to follow the light that pours from the Grail. It is good to hear a Wagnerian climax rise in instrumental as well as in emotional proportion, for the two are more closely united than some of the thrashing "Wagner conductors" guess. It is good as well to hear every upper and under strand in the instrumental webs that he weaves and each in the adroitest euphony with the rest. But there were more than these things in the orchestra's performance last night. They were the perfect means to Wagner's ends. They gave the beauty which conductor and band made instinct with the power. There have been times when Mr. Gericke seemed to take Wagner's sea music in the overture to "The Flying Dutchman" tamely. Last night it pitched and curled. The music of Venus and her train came like fiery beckonings through the fragment from "Tannhäuser." Siegfried mounted to Brunnhilde's rock more vividly through such tones than he does through all the steamy fire and gauzy mists of the stage. It was tonal splendor and not moving scenery that carried Parsifal and Gurnemanz into the hall of the Grail. The orchestra sung the fate of Tristan and Isolde and then made their passion leap and flame against it. For once it was not languorous as it is the fashion of many a conductor to make it in these days of slow pace. It was too hot for that and too heroic. Throughout the concert there was the union of entire surety and proportion of detail, and of the perfection of musical means, with largeness and intensity of feeling. Mr. Gericke united them in his "Wagner concert" last November. He fused and heightened them last night. Not once seemingly did his men fail him. Every impulse of the music touched them as with a spark. At moments we that listened heard the Wagner of our ideals—the Wagner that is not tingling neurotic sensation, but is the power and the beauty of sound made poignant because they are controlled.

H. T. P.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau of the World
REVIEW
1
ress
APR 1 - 1906
e

Nach Meldungen aus Wien soll der Direktor des dortigen Hofoperntheaters, Gustav Mahler, nach Ablauf seines dortigen Vertrages, u. zw. im Oktober 1907, an Stelle Wilhelm Gericke's die Leitung des Boston Symphonie-Orchesters übernehmen.

Herr Gericke wird am 26. April sein Abschieds-Concert dirigiren. Das Interregnum zwischen Gericke und Mahler dürfte vielleicht doch Fritz Steinbach ausfüllen. Und es scheint selbst die Möglichkeit nicht ausgeschlossen, daß Herr Gericke sich für ein weiteres Jahr wird engagiren lassen.

An Stelle Mahler's wird Felix Mottl von München nach Wien gehen, während Felix Weingartner Mottl's Stelle in München übernehmen dürfte.

Gustav Mahler gilt für einen der besten Opern-Dirigenten, doch auch seine Kompositionen haben weitgehendes Interesse erweckt. 1860 in Böhmen geboren, war er erst Theater-Kapellmeister in kleineren österreichischen Städten, dann Vereins-Dirigent in Kassel, Kapellmeister in Prag, leitete längere Zeit an Stelle Nikisch's die Oper in Leipzig, wurde 1888 Operndirektor in Pest, 1891 bis 1897 erster Kapellmeister am Hamburger Stadttheater und folgte 1897 einem Rufe an die Kaiserliche Oper in [illegible], erst als Kapellmeister, dann als

Newspaper Cutting Bureau
m
Theatre
NEW YORK CITY
lress
APR - - 1906
te

THE end of the music season is easily within hailing distance, and a cry of relief arises from the music-saturated multitude. It has been a long and—to use a national word—a strenuous music season. The end is not quite yet, and this is hardly the time for a tonal retrospect. Rather are we concerned with what has belabored the ears of music-lovers and music-haters during the past four weeks.

Principal among the events of the concert room was the first performance in this city of Mahler's Fifth Symphony, exquisitely played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the conscientious baton of Wilhelm Gericke. This monumental work originally took an hour and twenty minutes in performance; but since then the shears and pruning knives of both the composer and Mr. Gericke were set a-snipping until the length of performance of the five movements was reduced to a bit less than an hour. Mahler, who is the czar of the Vienna Imperial Opera, is known to be one of the best conductors among the great ones, and in this phase of his art praise is not withheld from him. But as a composer he has done more than his share of Alpine climbing to reach public favor. We have heard his Fourth Symphony played by the New York Symphony Orchestra, and its success seemed a very doubtful one; but the recent performance of his Fifth symphonic work seemed to make an impression even less favorable. The principal fact that it impresses upon its hearers is that of unnecessary repetition of theme. Then the work seems but sparsely supplied with big moments; and the beginning is so impressive that the balance of it spells disappointment. It sounds, at first hearing, a work not at all difficult to understand—in fact it is, after some of the Strauss masterpieces, a work of but reasonable complexity. Oddly enough, it opens with a Funeral March that promises very much, but not during the course of this work is the height of the opening attained again. The Adagietto is pretty but reminiscent of Wagner; and the Waltz movement is also charming but suffers from repetition. The Boston band played this composition with a finish that was well nigh breath-taking. It is an interesting symphony, one t should be heard again; but it is far from being a colossal work. In fact, those who know the entire literature of the Mahler symphonies declare that this Fifth is not among his best writings.

Copyright, Burr McIntosh SIGNOR CAMPANARI AS

NEW YORK SUN
ess
1 9
TO HAVE GERICKE'S PLACE.
Gustav Mahler of Vienna May Conduct Boston Symphony Orchestra.
According to advices received here yesterday from Vienna Gustav Mahler, now conductor of the Imperial Opera House in Vienna, is to be the next conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Mahler will not be at liberty, however, to come here until a year from next October. It has been announced that the orchestra's plans will not be divulged until after the farewell concert of Wilhelm Gericke on April 26.
It is probable that Fritz Steinbach, in spite of his denials, will come for this interregnum. The possibility [illegible]
Gericke may still be engaged for another year is by no means excluded from consideration. If Col. Higginson will accept his terms Mr. Gericke will be able to remain.
The decision of Felix Weingartner not to return to the New York Symphony Orchestra next winter is closely connected with Gustav Mahler's call to Boston. Mr. Weingartner will, in accordance with present plans, be called to Munich to succeed Felix Mottl at the Prinz Regent Theater there. Mr. Mottl is expected to [illegible] successor of Mahler in Vienna.

s
D. C.
7 190
QUARTET PLAYS DIVINELY
Boston Symphony Presents a Most Pleasing Programme.
Mozart, Grieg, and Strauss Compositions Delight a Fashionable and Art-loving Audience.
The third and last concert of the Boston Symphony Quartet at the Willard Hotel last night provided a fashionable and art-loving audience with a programme which has hardly been surpassed in Washington this season. It opened with one of the three Mozart quartets, which caused Haydn to declare that composer the greatest he had ever known, and closed with one of Grieg's best contributions to chamber music.
[246] between [illegible] violin sonata, performed in this city two years ago by Anton Kaspar and Strauss himself, made a spicy and well-flavored filling for the sandwich. Mme. Olga Samaroff, fresh from the triumphs of an extended concert tour, and Mr. Willy Hess, director of the quartet and concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, were equally successful in interpreting the Strauss music.

In listening to the Mozart number last night, observing its simplicity, and noting how well it fits into accepted forms, one could hardly realize that when first heard it shocked the purists of that day. The players last evening brought out the charm of the minuet movement no less than the vivacity of the closing bars.
The Strauss Sonata following was full of melody. When Strauss wrote this work he had traveled only a short way toward his present development, and the thought of writing opposing parts, as though each were in a separate key, had apparently not yet occurred to him. Mr. Hess played his part of this composition with discriminative shading and full emotional expression, and the portion allotted to Mme. Samaroff was in every way a complement to the work. She played the delicate parts with a perfection of detail of which she is past mistress, and accented the bravura passages with vigor and precision.
Excellent quartet scoring was manifest in every bar of the closing number. Grieg fears not to make his violins speak in a way that would have made Mozart dizzy. The sumptuousness of this quartet, its melody and instrumental effects, are such that ordinary chamber music pales in comparison. It was happily placed at the end of the programme, and was the last strain at one of the most enjoyable concerts of the year.

HERALD
BALTIMORE, M
ss
MAR 31 1906

Will Not Succeed Gericke.

The musical critic of the Tribune says: "There has been no foundation whatever for the persistent rumors that have come from Boston to the effect that Major Higginson was contemplating the engagement of Mr. Weingartner, the eminent German composer, as leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It may be accepted without the slightest reservation that Major Higginson never made a proposition to Mr. Weingartner looking to an engagement. Mr. Weingartner has not entered into his calculations. In fact, Major Higginson's plans have not yet been formulated with anything like definiteness. He has neither decided to engage a conductor of eminence and celebrity nor a younger man of talent who would grow with the experiences gained at the head of the organization which Mr. Gericke has brought to so high a degree of perfection.

The merits of Mr. Steinbach were strongly urged by some of his friends, especially by Mr. Willy Hess, the concert master of the Boston orchestra, and Major Higginson came to New York and listened to both public rehearsals last week. He went so far as to express a high degree of admiration for Mr. Steinbach's talent, but there was no approach of minds on the subject of an engagement, whereas Mr. Steinbach persisted in saying that he had no intention of leaving his post in Cologne, which, in addition to other things which made it eminently satisfactory, promised a handsome pension on a retirement, the date of which was brought near by the municipal authorities of Cologne on his engagement, they counting in the years of his service as music director general of the Duke of [illegible]

The Boston Post

21ST SYMPHONY CONCERT

Jacques Hoffmann, violinist, was the soloist of the Symphony Concert last evening, and the programme was as follows:

Prelude to Act III. of "The Piper's Holiday" ..... Schillings
Concerto for violin, Op. 28 ..... Goldmark
Two movements from "Psyche" ..... Franck
Symphony No. 4 ..... Schumann

BOSTON SYMPHONY QUARTET

For the sixth and last concert of the Boston Symphony Quartet, which will be given in Jordan Hall tomorrow morning, Professor Hess has prepared what may be considered the most important novelty of chamber music of the season, Hugo Wolf's quartet for strings in D minor. It is rather curious that this work has never been played here in Boston, considering the vast amount of reclame its unfortunate composer has had in the last few years and the uncommon popularity which has been given to his songs. But an explanation may possibly be found in the extraordinary difficulty of the work, which demands much deeper and more thoughtful study than most of its kind.

The other instrumental work of the evening will be Svendsen's octet for strings in A major, op. 3. In this the quartet will have the assistance of Messrs. Kuntz and Krafft, violins; Mr. Zach, viola, and Mr. Nagel, violincello, all of the orchestra.

The assisting artist will be Miss Susan Metcalfe, a soprano who will then make her first public appearance in Boston, although she is not unknown to our public, having sung in private several times in the past few years.

MR. GERICKE'S BENEFIT

The sale of seats for Mr. Gericke's farewell benefit concert, to be given in Symphony Hall on Tuesday evening, April 24, will begin at the box office of Symphony Hall on next Thursday morning, April 12, instead of on Friday morning, the 13th, as originally announced. Mr. Gericke is not yet ready to announce his programme, but the presence of Mme. Gadski as soloist is now assured, for she has sent word that she will sing with great pleasure.

Unless all signs fail, Mr. Gericke will receive at this concert a tender public esteem which will surprise his best friends, for the demand for [illegible] considering the fact that the event

SATURDAY, APRIL 7, 1906.

THE WORLD OF MUSIC

CESAR FRANCK'S "PSYCHE" AT THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

Intimately Characteristic Music of the Finest Purpose—Mr. de Gogorza's Song Recital—Liszt's "Faust" Symphony for Next Week—Marteau's Recital—Other Concerts to Come—Musical News

"The day when Franck's pure soul, amorous of beauty, sang Psyche, the chosen one of the sensual Eros, it perhaps sang itself," said Mr. Jean Marnold at the dedication of a statue of the composer two years ago in Paris. Yesterday, when Mr. Gericke played two excerpts from that same "Psyche," it seemed the most intimately characteristic and expressive of all Franck's music that has found a place in our Symphony concerts. Originally Franck wrote the tone-poem for orchestra and a choir "of invisible beings" that sing in few words at some turning point in the mystical drama, and it was so performed before his death. Ten years afterwards four fragments of it were republished as an orchestral suite, with the one choral song in them omitted. It begins with "the slumber of Psyche." Then "the Zephyrs bear her to the gardens of Eros." The third movement takes title from those gardens, and the fourth, "Psyche and Eros," hymns the happiness of the lovers. Last December our orchestra, with Mr. d'Indy conducting, played the final fragment for the first time. Yesterday Mr. Gericke repeated it, and played the third excerpt, "The Garden of Eros," as well. The use of a choir makes the whole tone-poem impracticable at our concerts, though music by Franck may reasonably deserve a hearing in its entirety, but it was a pity not to play the four orchestral fragments. Mystery hovers through the prelude of Psyche's sleep—faint, shadowy, evanescent suggestion. The undulating breath of the Zephyrs in the second fragment has very delicate tonal imagination. But the whole suite, and, still more, the whole tone-poem, is long, and the pervading ecstatic mood and the persistently tremulous instrumental coloring become monotonous. To hear the two excerpts of yesterday by themselves is, perhaps, to hear Franck's music most sensitively.

Franck has in no wise sought to translate the classic legend into tones. Some day it may appeal to some composer—perhaps there have been ventures at it already—and we shall hear, or be asked to hear, the jealous rage of Venus, the tortures of Psyche, the passion that wakes in her as she lifts the lamp above the sleeping Eros, and all the rest. Franck has barely caught an idea here and there from the old myth, and labels for the divisions of his tone-poem. The rest, and it is nearly the whole of his music, is the prompting of his own soul. The passion is the passion for beauty, the longing is the pursuit of the ideal, the rapture is the solemn joy and the high ecstacy of its attainment. Thereafter in the omitted parts comes the fading of the vision and its return. For us, who listen to the two excerpts, the "gardens of Eros" are the abode of that ideal beauty, and the love of Psyche and Eros is the delight of it. Throughout, the music is summoning the intangible and spiritual things that no other art may allure so poignantly. It is exquisitely delicate and sensitive music. The melodies rise and fall, enlace and separate in gentle and tremulous undulations. The modulations are of a subtle and almost impalpable fineness. The instrumental coloring shimmers as with a clear remote light.

Others have sought to command beauty, to attain it by earnest striving, to seize and hold their ideal. So Schumann seems to be laboring in his sympnony that ended the concert. Franck's spirit was too gentle to command the beauty that it sought. He would woo it to him and to his music, as the soul of his Psyche sought the soul of his Eros. His ideal should come for the eager tenderness of his pursuit. He would enter into its house all trembling expectancy, as Psyche comes into the gardens of Eros, and for the moment the brightness should caress him. Then should come the pure ecstacy of attainment, the exquisitely penetrating delight of beauty face to face; of longing, hesitating at the moment when it touches the ideal it seeks, and last the solemn joy of it all.

Of such in Franck's tones is the music that labels and analysts call the happiness of Psyche and Eros. It is the music of dreams and visions of the beauty that hovered before Franck's imagination. He had contemplated it so long, he had pursued it so eagerly and tenderly, that at last he could put the reflection of it into his tones. No wonder that reflection takes musical form in evanescent melodies, subtle cadences and sensitive modulations. To touch it with more than the fingertips were to dull and blur it, till it fade and vanish. And yet there was the glow of it, and the calm rapture of it. They, too, are in Franck's music of this Psyche and Eros, that mask so thinly the quest of ideal beauty. Purer, loftier music it would be hard to imagine. It is the music of disembodied things made poignant, of impalpable things made real. It invokes not the passion of Eros and Psyche, but the spiritual ardor of the ideal. Other composers are making music summon and picture material things or burn hot with specific emotions and sharply outlined moods. There are other arts that serve the first purpose better, and they may share as well in the second. Franck—and that is the deepest source of his power—held music to the immaterial essences and to the spiritual passions that it can fathom and express as can no other art. In none of his music does the bond seem closer or the expression more searching than in these fragments of "Psyche." As Mr. Marnold said, "his spirit sang itself," and yesterday it had the shimmer and the ... of the string choir of our orches... quality of song in our

Concerts Next Week

As next Friday is Good Friday, the twenty-second Symphony rehearsal has been shifted to Thursday afternoon, with the concert following, as usual, on Saturday evening. On the programme, too, stands the "Good Friday Spell," from "Parsifal"—music of the coming of spring, if ever there were such, and music of Wagner's prime that he wrote years before the oprea in which he finally placed it took shape in his imagination. Thus, perhaps, it makes the most spontaneous and sensuously beautiful pages in it. The singer for the two concerts is Ben Davies, the English tenor, who is paying another visit to America, and his numbers are Max's air, "Through the Forest," from Weber's "Der Freischütz," and "Onaway! Awake," from Coleridge-Taylor's "Hiawatha." Rather exceptionally Mr. Wallace Goodrich is to play on the organ Bach's Toccata in F major, the first composition without orchestra to appear on Mr. Gericke's programmes this season. For a symphony come the three "character pictures" after Goethe—Faust, Gretchen and Mephistopheles—that Liszt drew in tones. The fourth movement of the "Faust" symphony, as he called the whole, is necessarily omitted, since it requires a male chorus. Mr. Gericke intended to play the symphony last autumn. Then the programme upon which it stood gave place to another in memory of Mrs. Josephine Shaw Lowell. Next week he is fulfilling his original purpose. The "Faust," and the "Dante" symphony, which is still more seldom played, are the most considerable of Liszt's orchestral compositions. Perhaps it is worth while to quote what Weingartner writes of the one that we are to hear in his book on the symphony since Beethoven:

"The 'Faust Symphony' is not intended to embody musically Goethe's poem, but gives, as its title promises, three character sketches—'Faust,' 'Gretchen' and 'Mephistopheles.' The third movement shows us with what art and imagination Liszt has used and developed the dramatic psychological variation of a theme (the inventor of which I have already designated as Berlioz). Mephistopheles is 'the spirit that evermore denies;' for the principle of his actions is, 'for whatever has come into life deserves to be reduced to naught again.' Hence, Liszt could not give him a theme of his own, but built up the whole movement from caricatures of previous themes, particularly from those belonging to 'Faust.' For this reason ignorant critics have been even more ready to reproach Liszt than they did Berlioz for lack of invention. I ask, if our great masters have built up long movements by manifold variations of themes of a few bars, why should not a composer today do the same, if a perceptible poetical thought is his guiding principle? Is there no invention in these characteristic variations, and, forsooth, invention of the same degree that the old masters possessed? And just the last movement of the 'Faust Symphony' best reveals to us Liszt's deep insight into the true nature of music. When the infernal, diabolical spirit has risen to its most brilliant power, there appears, as if soaring in bright clouds, the main theme of the Gretchen movement in virgin beauty. By this motive the power of the demon is shattered, and it sinks back into nothingness. The poet could let Gretchen perish, and even become a transgressor; the musician, in accordance with the ideal, subtle nature of his art, preserved for her the exalted, heavenly form. Mighty trombone sounds are heard through the discordant hell-music as it dies away; a male chorus softly intones Goethe's sublime words, 'All that is transitory is only illusion;' and in the clearly recognizable notes of the Gretchen theme, continues a tenor voice, 'The Ever-Feminine draweth us on.' One can identify this tenor voice with Goethe's Doctor Marianus, and imagine Gretchen transfigured into Mater Gloriosa. . . . So in great pieces of music golden threads, spun from sunshine, are woven lightly and airily, between the music and the inspiring poetry, making both more beautiful, but confining neither. . . . In both these works [the "Faust" and the "Dante" symphonies] Liszt has given the highest art of which he was capable. They can be compared only with the creations of the great masters. They mark not only the highest point in Liszt's work, but also, with Berlioz's symphonies, are the ripest fruits, thus far, of artistic programme music."

The Symphony Quartet—Messrs. Hess, Roth, Férir and Warnke—gives the sixth and last of its series of chamber concerts on Monday evening, at eight, in Jordan Hall. For the first time here they are to play Hugo Wolf's quartet in D minor, three movements of which were written when he was in the fulness of his powers, and one, perhaps, when the blight of the nervous disease that ended in madness had begun to descend upon him. Wolf's songs, of course, most fully disclose his individual qualities. He indeed re-created the song for his own time, as Strauss has re-created the symphonic poem. But in this quartet the intellectual qualities that he brought to the writing of music are particularly and very individually apparent. Little by little the songs are establishing themselves in concerts, but the quartet has made its way even more slowly. In another column we are printing parts of Ernest Newman's account of Wolf, a singularly pathetic and little understood figure among the composers of our time. In all his music, and especially in this quartet, there is the man. The other instrumental number of the concert is Svendsen's octet for strings in which Messrs. Kuntz and Krafft double the violins; Mr. Zach, the viola, and Mr. Nagel, the 'cello. For the first time at these chamber concerts there is to be a singer, Miss Susan Metcalfe, one of the few in America who has cultivated songs with fine and individual artistry. She is a singer with imagination and with the vocal skill to bring it to adroit and searching expression. Her songs are Mozart's "Das Veilchen," Schubert's "Der Neugierige" and "Ungeduld," and Brahms's "Die Mainacht" and "Liebliche Wangen." She begins with the air from Händel's "Serse," that violins play as Händel's "Largo."

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
Established 1813.

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.

Max Schillings—Prelude to Act III. of "The Piper's Holiday."
Goldmark—A minor Concerto for Violin.
Soloist, Mr. Jaques Hoffmann.
Cesar Franck—Two Movements from "Psyche."
Schumann—Symphony in D minor.

It was a modern programme presenting two kinds of modernity. The work by Schillings was of one kind, those by Goldmark and Franck of another. The first point that impressed the auditor in the Piper's Prelude was the powerful orchestration. The world has progressed marvellously in this field in 50 years. A half century ago a Berlioz was a marvel; today we have a score of composers who can handle the orchestra as well or better than he did.

But many of these Schillings are bad pennies when it comes to melody. And all of this type of modern composers have a cuttle-fish habit of darkening the musical waters by great complexities and technical difficulties when their ideas run short. How long the brasses can stand this pace we do not know. One would think their lips pretty well blown off by this time.

Like most of the ultra-moderns, Schillings does not know when he has ended, but goes on for some time longer. Everybody knows the type of after-dinner speaker who has no ideas to express. How he rambles on and on in the hope that by some miracle he will stumble upon something by and by! But he never does, and he generally sits down at the weakest point of his speech. Thus it is with many a modern composer. Let no one suppose that we are of "the good-old-times" order of fossils, for we hold many works of Wagner and some of Richard Strauss among the greatest of musical achievements, but we certainly condemn the chromo reproductions of their striving imitators.

Schillings' introduction of the new instrument, the violetta (substituted by viola or cello almost everywhere) reminds us how many attempts have been made to invent an instrument between the viola and the violoncello. Bach invented the Viola Pomposa, which became obsolete; Ritter brought forth the "Ritter Viola," which could not come into use until men became of giant stature, and now Dr. Alfred Stelzner tries his hand at the violotta which will follow its predecessors down the path of obsolescence.

Yet the days of new instruments are not yet past. Besson's Pedal Clarinette may stand, and Massenet once spoke to the present writer of the chances of inventing deeper flutes, particularly a bass flute which should stand with the deeper clarinettes or the bassoon, yet have a totally different tone-color.

Goldmark's violin concerto is not a very grateful work for the soloist and lacks that sensuous glow which pervades much of that composer's music. The strict classical form does not sit easily upon Goldmark and in spite of the fugal touches by which he proves his contrapuntal knowledge there is more of attempt than achievement in this concerto. It ends showily enough with something that suggests Lalo and Boleros, but the work as a whole intimates less of inspiration than of padding.

But Mr. Hoffmann played it in such a reliable manner that there was much applause, which we imagine was meant rather for the artist than for the concerto. In the first movement his bowing was broad and his intonation in the difficult high positions remarkably pure. In his cadenza in the finale he gave a splendid exhibition of double-stopping without a suspicion of a flaw or inequality. He was recalled twice with abundant enthusiasm and certainly deserved the tribute.

The two movements from Cesar Franck's "Psyche" were noble music nobly played. Especially was the second, "Psyche and Cupid," a fine example of figure development. Some of Franck's pupils are developing figures with assiduous pedantry, but their teacher was able, like Beethoven, to demonstrate the poetry of such evolutions.

Franck knew what he wanted to do, when he was composing, and also knew how to achieve the end which he had in view. As a consequence he is not rambling and never diffuse. His disciples are generally both; they laboriously thresh out their figures without obtaining much grain. Each of these chickens, hatched out by the eagle, imagined that—

"These growing feathers, plucked from Cesar's wing,
Will make him fly an ordinary pitch."

Therefore just as Wagner has left a legacy of evil to music, Cesar Franck is responsible for a considerable amount of posthumous boredom.

In spite of the undeniable power of the last movement of this work one must confess that it does not speak the language of burning passion as Wagner could have voiced it. If there had only been a little streak of Bizet in Franck!

Schumann's symphony was by far the greatest music of this concert. Liszt once characterized Schumann as "The greatest music-thinker since Beethoven," but for a long time he stood in advance of his public. Now the public seem to have grown up to him and to appreciate him as never before. It was a great delight to have the symphony given continuously, as the composer desired, and not one of the audience interrupted by any applause at the end of the first three movements.

But at the close there was an enthusiasm refreshing to see. Yet all of the preceding works of the programme had been far greater in orchestration than this symphony. But in sweetness of melody, in poetry of musical thought, they paled before this older work. And how effective the syncopations seemed (Schumann was the master of syncopation) compared with the latter-day rickets! Only the finale seemed to have faded a little, for here the more modern and more sumptuous orchestration would have been an advantage.

But such a symphony may still teach the lesson that beauty of musical thought outweighs the most skillful technique.

Louis C. Elson.

SUNDAY HERALD
Published Every Day in the Year.
VOL. CXIX., NO. 98.
SUNDAY, APRIL 8, 1906.

SYMPHONY HEARD IN NEW NUMBERS

A Prelude by Max Schillings and Cesar Franck's "Gardens of Cupid" Heard Here for the First Time.

SCHUMANN SYMPHONY GIVES MUCH PLEASURE

Mr. Jacques Hoffmann, Solo Violinist, Gave a Careful and Polished Performance of Goldmark's Work.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Gericke conductor, gave its 21st concert last night in Symphony Hall. Mr. Jacques Hoffmann was the solo violinist. The programme was as follows:

Prelude to act 3 of "The Pipers' Holiday" ..... Schillings Concerto for violin ..... Goldmark
"Cupid's Gardens" and "Psyche and Cupid," from "Psyche" ..... Franck Symphony in D minor ..... Schumann

The prelude to act III. of Schillings' opera was performed here for the first time, but the composer's name is not unknown to the Symphony audience. The prelude to act II. of his "Ingwelde" was performed here nearly 10 years ago, and his prologue to Sophocles' "Oedipus Rex" was played at a symphony concert early in the spring of 1902. These pieces did not commend the composer to us. The "Ingwelde" prelude heard without any reference to what had preceded in the opera, heard as purely absolute music, was a fair example of the "Kapellmeister Musik," industriously manufactured by the followers of Wagner. The prologue to Sophocles' masterpiece did not breathe the spirit of the antique. There was neither classic intensity, frozen passion, nor modern tragic fury and despair. Even the introduction of a gong did not save this music.

When Mr. Bispham was engaged to sing at a recent Symphony concert, he wished to recite Ernst von Wildenbruch's ballad, "The Witch's Song," to the accompaniment of Schillings' melodramatic music, but Mr. Gericke made reasonable objection. No doubt he had heard and seen Mr. Bispham reading "Enoch Arden" to Richard Strauss' music.

The prelude played last night contains thematic material that has been used in the preceding acts and will be used in the third act; but it may be judged fairly as music without any thought or knowledge of the opera itself. Nor did the absence of a violotta probably make a material difference in the general effect of the prelude. The music is entitled "The Minstrel's Joy and Woe." There is an attempt to characterize in tones the career of a mediaeval piper, to sum up his life as in a discriminative funeral oration.

This prelude has more interest and general significance than have the other pieces of the composer that have been played here. The themes have more individuality and substance, the developments are more eloquent, there is a warmer, more poetic expression. The opening section is picturesque with its suggestion of the mediaeval pipers; the climax of the middle section is well worked up, and the close is effective by reason of its shifting modes and true simplicity. All in all, this prelude, which was well played, is one of the most favorable examples of the ultra-modern German school that we have heard.

Mr. Henri Marteau, the violinist, a Frenchman by birth and musical education, spoke slightingly some weeks ago of the music of his own land. He said in a fine burst that Germany is today the centre of music. "When I go to Paris I do not spend any time at the Opera or at the Opera-Comique or in any music there. I see my friends, I talk of literature or politics. That is all." Claude Debussy, Gabriel Faure, Vincent d'Indy do not exist. Mr. Marteau finds true music only in Germany. Let us leave Richard Strauss out of the question, for the fiercest dispute over his talent or genius is in Germany. There is Reger, Mr. Max Reger, an exceedingly industrious person who counts that day lost on which he has not begun and completed an important work. Mr. Reger who lately announced his intention of rewriting much of Bach's music.

There is von Hausegger; there is young Mr. Boehe who has endeavored to put "the surge and thunder of the Odyssey" into music. There is Klose, of whom we know nothing; there are Siegfried, Wagner, d'Albert, Roessler, Humperdinek, Busoni, a German by adoption, and other earnest men of pith of whom we know too much. Then there is Schillings, who is ranked among the leading German composers of today. Does Mr. Marteau contend seriously that these men, however well trained musicians they may be, are to be compared for a moment with the Frenchmen just named for originality and subtlety of thought, for poetic fancy or high imagination?

It is a pity that Mr. Gericke did not see his way clear to produce Cesar Franck's whole suite taken from his "Psyche" music. "Psyche and Cupid" was first played here at the concert led by Mr. d'Indy. "The Sleep of Psyche" was played last month at a concert of the New England Conservatory. Last night "Psyche and Cupid" was repeated and "The Gardens of Cupid" was played for the first time. The latter has much charm, but its character resembles so closely the movement "Psyche and Cupid" that either one of the other two movements would have formed a more striking contrast. When the whole suite is played "The Gardens of Cupid" may well serve as a decided step in the ...faster pace than is suggested either by the composer's indication of by the character and treatment of the themes. The reading was injurious to the effect of the music, for there was no longer the long sweep of the phrases constantly rising in majestic intensity, and there was no time for the full expression of the noble sensuousness and ecstatic passion. The nervous, feverish spirit due to the undue speed was not in keeping with the spirit of Franck's lovers, and this movement, one of the most eloquent and at the same time serenely majestic pages in the literature of music, lost sadly in beauty and grandeur.

Mr. Hoffmann played for the first time as a soloist at these concerts. Goldmark's concerto needs an interpreter of strong individuality if the attention of the hearer is to be fastened and riveted. Mr. Hoffmann gave a careful, smooth and polished performance that was highly respectable, but never engrossing, never appealing. He was warmly applauded.

It was a pleasure to hear Schumann's symphony again. It is the one of the four that is most romantic and dramatic. The tender beauty of the romanze and the melancholy grace of the trio in the scherzo will not soon fade away. We should have liked more dramatic fervor in the first movement and a little more elasticity in the trio, which is an expression of the thought of days that are no more—an expression the more singular for the music was composed when Schumann was peculiarly happy.

...the Boston Symphony quartet in Jordan hall tomorrow evening Prof Hess has prepared what may be considered the most important novelty of chamber music of the season, Hugo Wolf's quartet for strings in D minor. This work has never been played in Boston. It has been played in Vienna, Berlin and Leipsic and possibly in a few other cities, and always has aroused much discussion; but the obstacles which the composer has placed before the performers are so great that it is never likely to be popular. It requires too much work of preparation.

The other instrumental work of the evening will be Svendsen's octet for strings in A major, op. 3. In this the quartet will have the assistance of Messrs Kuntz and Krafft violins, Mr Zach viola and Mr Nagel cello, all of the orchestra.

The assisting artist will be Miss Susan Metcalfe, a soprano, who will make her first public appearance in Boston, although she is not unknown to our public, having sung in private several times in the past few years. She will sing an air from Handel's "Serse," Mozart's "Das Veilchen," Schubert's "Der Neugierige" and "Ungeduld" and Brahm's "Die Mainacht" and "Liebliche Wangen."

MR GERICKE'S BENEFIT.

The sale of seats for Mr Gericke's farewell benefit concert, to be given in Symphony hall, Tuesday evening, April 24, will begin Thursday morning, April 12, instead of on Friday morning as originally announced. Mr Gericke is not yet ready to announce his program, but the presence of Mme Gadski as soloist is now assured, for she has sent word that she will sing. Mme Gadski is now in the west, where she has been since the early part of the year.

Unless all signs fail Mr Gericke will receive at this concert a testimonial of public esteem which will surprise even his best friends, for the demand for seats, considering the fact that the concert is two and a half weeks away, exceeds that of any concert which has been given here this winter.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY. APRIL 8. 1906.

MUSICAL MATTERS

Jacques Hoffmann, Symphony Soloist.

Handel and Haydn Concert---Mr Gericke's Benefit.

Recitals and Concerts of the Current Week.

Mr Jacques Hoffman, the soloist at last week's Symphony rehearsal and concert, has been prominent in the musical life of Boston for the past 15 years, having joined the orchestra in 1890. Since 1892 he has been the leader of the admirable group of players known as the Hoffman quartet. For his debut as a soloist with the Symphony orchestra he selected Goldmark's A minor concerto for violin and orchestra. The other program numbers were the prelude to the third act of "The Pipers' Holiday," by Max Schillings; two movements from Cesar Franck's "Psyche," and Schumann's fourth symphony. The scheme of the Schillings opera relates to a "joke" by a minstrel who feigns death in order to win the hand of his lady love and to abolish a tax levied by her father on the guild of pipers. The minstrel is supposed to be killed in a storm, but comes to life at the touch of his sweetheart's hand. The ruse is successful and "all ends happily." It is very clever descriptive music, the contrasting episodes in the story giving opportunities for suggestions which make the musical picture easily understood. The opening, which indicates the grief of friends for the death of the minstrel, was played with splendid dignity by the heavier instruments.

The tender motif by the solo violin and violas and the wood-winds in the mournful phrases gave a somber color of great effectiveness, soon relieved, though, by the sprightly measures given the horns and lighter strings. The alternations of joy and grief, doubt and happy anticipations are admirably shown in the instrumentation, and each phase was vividly illustrated under Mr Gericke's guidance.

Mr Hoffman played the difficult Goldmark concerto in a way to win him prompt recognition as a violinist of great technical skill, whose tone, though not very large, was pure, and who impressed an auditor very favorably by reason of the absence of mannerisms and by the serious and conscientious style of his performance. The long first movement, though physically taxing, was admirably played throughout, the several brilliant episodic passages being managed deftly and easily by the soloist. In the canonical form of the second part Mr Hoffmann's legato was beautifully sustained, and the unaccompanied cadenza in the closing movement also deserves commendatory mention. His associates provided adequate accompaniment to Mr Hoffmann's work, which was received with favor by the audience.

The excerpts from Franck's "Psyche," two dainty little love episodes between Psyche and Cupid, were fantastic bits, charming in orchestral treatment and equally delightful in interpretation. The first one, "Gardens of Cupid," was played for the first time here. The Schillings prelude also was a novelty at these concerts. Schumann's grand symphony, the four movements played without a break, was given with splendid effect.

Next Friday being Good Friday, according to the custom of past years, the public rehearsal of the Symphony orchestra will be moved forward one day and given Thursday afternoon, the concert taking place as usual Saturday evening. The season will be commemorated by the performance of the "Good Friday Spell" from the third act of "Parsifal." There will be two soloists, and in one number, the opening one, the orchestra will take no part. Mr Wallace Goodrich, the organist, will play Bach's Toccata in F major. The other soloist will be Mr Ben Davies, who will sing "Through the Woods," from Weber's "Der Freischutz," and "Onaway Awake!" from Coleridge-Taylor's "Hiawatha." The "Faust" symphony by Liszt will close the program.

BOSTON EVENING RECORD

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.

Max Schillings—Prelude to Act III. of "The Piper's Holiday."
Goldmark—A minor Concerto for Violin.
Soloist, Mr. Jaques Hoffmann.
Cesar Franck—Two Movements from "Psyche."
Schumann—Symphony in D minor.

It was a modern programme presenting two kinds of modernity. The work by Schillings was of one kind, those by Goldmark and Franck of another. The first point that impressed the auditor in the Piper's Prelude was the powerful orchestration. The world has progressed marvellously in this field in 50 years. A half century ago a Berlioz was a marvel; today we have a score of composers who can handle the orchestra as well or better than he did.

But many of these Schillings are bad pennies when it comes to melody. And all of this type of modern composers have a cuttle-fish habit of darkening the musical waters by great complexities and technical difficulties when their ideas run short. How long the brasses can stand this pace we do not know. One would think their lips pretty well blown off by this time.

Goldmark's violin concerto is not a very grateful work for the soloist and lacks that sensuous glow which pervades much of that composer's music. The strict classical form does not sit easily upon Goldmark and in spite of the fugal touches by which he proves his contrapuntal knowledge there is more of attempt than achievement in this concerto. It ends showily enough with something that suggests Lalo and Boleros, but the work as a whole intimates less of inspiration than of padding.

But Mr. Hoffmann played it in such a reliable manner that there was much applause, which we imagine was meant rather for the artist than for the concerto. In the first movement his bowing was broad and his intonation in the difficult high positions remarkably pure. In his cadenza in the finale he gave a splendid exhibition of double-stopping without a suspicion of a flaw or inequality. He was recalled twice with abundant enthusiasm and certainly deserved the tribute.

Louis C. Elson.

Fitchburg Daily Sentinel

FRIDAY. APRIL 6, 1906.

FRIDAY, APRIL 6, 19

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Magnificent Audience in City Hall To Hear Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony orchestra long ago reached the point where the higher criticism concluded to let it alone. It is accustomed to admiration, even where musical connoisseurs most abound. In this city the appetite for the best music has not become palled by over-gratification. So the Symphony orchestra may often play to hearers wiser in the wisdom of the schools than it did, Thursday night, but not often to hearers more impressionable and sympathetic. Used as the orchestra may be to the unqualified praise of the critical and to the unstinted homage of the public, it could not be indifferent to the eager and earnest audience that listened to its concert in city hall, Thursday evening. In mere numbers, the audience was impressive, filling, as it did, every seat in the hall. Better than mere size was the atmosphere of intense interest in that which was to be offered, the quick and alert response to every beautiful impression produced by the exquisite tone-coloring of the orches-

The artistic success of the concert was a matter of course. That was assured as soon as the orchestra was engaged to appear here. But the success of the undertaking in other respects at its beginning, was not so much to be taken for granted. It needed energy and courage, great faith that public support would be forthcoming—an unknown and long untried quantity—in order to make the venture. These qualities the members of the Fitchburg Smith college club had, and they have a rightful claim to appropriate to themselves most of the felicitations upon the auspicious appearance of the Symphony orchestra here.

The magnificent audience that assembled in city hall for this concert, was a tangible evidence of a growth in musical appreciation for which a word of congratulation may be pardoned. The people of New England are not by heredity a musical people. In training until perhaps within the last 10 or 15 years, they are not very far removed from the kindergarten stage. Their musical limitations have had a struggle against the rigorous spirit of Puritanism. The memory of many can run back to the time when the singing school was almost the ultimate expression of musical art. Between that and a concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra is quite a gap, and last night, there was a gratifying manifestation of the fact that people hereabouts have crossed over to the better side, guided thereto, undoubtedly by the persuasive influence of the chamber concerts from year to year.

The audience upon entering the hall received a smiling welcome from the members of the Smith college club, under whose auspices the concert was given. The young ladies, gowned in white, which is the college color, and wearing hats, ushered to the seats, gracefully and efficiently. The front of the stage was decorated with a screen of laurel upon a background of white.

The virtuosity of the Boston Symphony orchestra is an every-day affair. Its display in this city belongs to the unusual and the response from the public bore so many surprising evidences of appreciation that one may well be excused for dwelling upon this feature of the concert in a spirit of congratulation, instead of reviewing the performance at great length.

The program subjected the capabilities of the orchestra to no tremendous strain. The illness of Willy Hess, compelled a change in the soloist, and Jacques Hoffmann played the Goldmark violin concerto in place of Mr. Hess for the Mendelssohn concerto. Mr. Hoffmann has long been one of the first violinists of the orchestra, is the founder and leader of the Hoffmann quartet, whose playing of chamber music has commanded the admiring respect of the public. The Goldmark concerto is a larger work than the Mendelssohn and by way of contrast fitted better into the scheme of the program. Mr. Hoffmann played the concerto freely and broadly, with beautiful quality of tone, and with easy mastery of the most difficult passages. He will play the same concerto for the solo number at today's rehearsal and tomorrow's concert of the orchestra in Boston. Mr. Hoffmann was recalled twice to bow his acknowledgments to the applauding audience.

The theme with variations from the Tschaikowsky suite was played with magnificent swing and verve, especially the brilliant polacca of the last variation. This and other numbers of the program happened to bring into unusual prominence Mr. Maquarre, the unrivalled flute soloist of the orchestra. Beethoven's 5th symphony made an impressive ending to the concert, Mr. Gericke conducting his forces with easy, authority and bringing out every nuance so clearly that no shade of meaning was lost. The opportunity to see this great conductor lead the organization which he has moulded into one of the great orchestras of the world before he takes his leave, was particularly pleasing.

Looking toward the future it is to be hoped that the success of this appearance of the orchestra may lead to an annual visit from it.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY QUARTETTE CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.

Hugo Wolf. String Quartette in D minor.
Group of Songs. Handel, Mozart, Schubert and Brahms.
Soloist, Miss Susan Metcalf.
Svendsen. Octette for strings. A major.

There was a large audience in Jordan hall last night, in spite of the storm, and they remained to the end of a very long programme.

As the Svendsen Octette called for two string quartettes, Messrs. Kuntz, Krafft, Zach and Nagel were added to the regular forces. This octette is a good addition to chamber-music, even if it is not such a masterpiece as young Mendelssohn achieved when he was but 17 years of age. The two octettes are written for the same forces,—two first violins, two seconds, two violas and two violoncellos.

creation of a young man, for Svendsen was about 25 years old when he composed it. It was one of the productions of his student days in Leipsic and contains almost nothing of that national flavor which is one of the great charms of Grieg's works.

It is interesting, conservative and conservatory music. Nothing much more than this can be said of it, although it was very well played, and good melody, good counterpoint and good form ought to count for something.

Miss Susan Metcalfe, of New York, gave a number of songs of the German "Lied" character, although the first number was that song about horticulture, in "Xerxes," which gave rise to the much-played "Largo" for strings. Spite of its utterly vapid words the melody is a splendid exhibition of "Bel Canto" and can only be thoroughly interpreted by an artist who has perfect control of breath and emission of tone.

Miss Metcalfe impressed us very favorably in this, although the opening recitative was too spasmodic. Her work in the Schubert songs was intelligent, but rather unequal. Nevertheless "Impatience" was effective in its full-toned outbursts on "Dein ist mein Herz," and Brahms' "Leibliche Wangen" was so well sung that it won an imperative encore,—and deserved it.

Like the two octettes alluded to at the beginning of this article, the Wolf quartette was also the production of a young man. It was certainly composed before he was 25 years old (possibly before he was 20), and before the clouds of insanity had begun to settle upon his mind, but not, alas, before he had begun to taste the bitterness of injustice and neglect.

The motto of the work shows this clearly enough; it runs: "Entbehren sollst du, sollst entbehren." This means something more than "renunciation," by which word it was translated upon the programme. It means to forego, to do without, and poor Wolf had to forego many things that he deserved, and to do without many a necessity.

Not the story of Goetz, unable to hear his symphony in Vienna because he had no railroad fare, and playing in public while in the advanced stages of consumption, not the story of Schubert selling his later songs at 20 cts. each, not the tales of the privations of Lortzing, of Mozart, or of Wm. Friedmann Bach, approach in pathos the story of this great composer (perhaps a Genius) hounded to death by much lesser men. "Homunculi quanti sunt!"

But at least the unfair treatment of a Wolf or a Bizet might teach gentleness, and an occasional doubt of their own omniscience, to the critics of musical pioneers.

Yet one cannot cordially agree with all that is presented in this work. Spite of the fact that Wolf's intellect was clear at the time of its composition, the quartette seems to present a nature in wild ferment, and in the "Sturm und Drang," the "Storm and Stress" period. Much is bizarre, much is impatient; resignation seems to play no great part in the scheme of this composer.

Beethoven was able to picture combat, striving, agony, without leaving clear musical form, in his "Sonate Pathetique" (first movement), and then presented heavenly consolation in the second movement. Not so this modern Prometheus, who seems to sorrow without consolation and yet to defy.

The first movement is impressive in its "Grave" introduction—which recurs later—and, in spite of some very ugly progressions, has a strong ending.

The slow movement has an almost continuous dialogue between the violins played "ppp" in the highest register, and the violoncello, played "forte" in its deepest tessitura. The contrasts are of the sharpest, and are at least original. The Scherzo is by no means playful, but is fierce and resolute.

The finale is the best part of the work; it is intelligible, has some earnest counterpoint, and is at times beautiful, although fragmentary. The work was most carefully interpreted. It is not entirely effective. There is too much "aspera" and too little "astra" in it for a good exemplification of the old Latin proverb.

Louis C. Elson.

Boston Daily Globe.

TUESDAY, APRIL 10, 1906.

CLOSES CONCERT SEASON.

Boston Symphony Quartet's Last Program Proved a Treat.

Storm did not diminish the number of the faithful at the concluding concert of the Boston Symphony quartet's season last night in Jordan hall. The program repaid them, for it began with Hugo Wolf's weird quartet in D minor, played here for the first time, continued with six familiar songs by Miss Susan Metcalfe, a soprano with a fine voice and charming personality, and concluded with the sturdy, blood-stirring octet for four violins, two violas, two celli, in A major, by John S. Svendsen.

The audience could not let Miss Metcalfe go without an encore number, nor the quartet without an ovation which was manifestly meant for Prof Willy Hess.

The Wolf number begins with a long movement, "grave" and "allegro molto appassionato." Then follows an adagio of wonderful construction; a choral of the birds, sung in highest, furthest treetops, with a heart-searching melody of pain, abrupt as though one stopped in grief to listen for the comforting from heaven o'erhead. A tricky third movement is marked "allegro energetico," and is cunningly doubled in its harmonies until one hears a whole string choir playing. The fourth movement, still allegro, is diabolical in its waywardness, and an elaborate fugue quarrels through it in ingenious melodic twistings.

Miss Metcalfe sang songs ranging through Handel, Mozart, Schubert and Brahms, every one of them the well-known.

The Svendsen number, the octet, held everybody to its long-distant end. Never did it go with more spirit, and never with more beauty of shading, its unusually fine viola passages getting their values well shown, a not too frequently granted favor.

Boston Transcript
24 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON, MASS.
TUESDAY, APRIL 10, 1906

HUGO WOLF'S QUARTET

Mr. Hess and His Men Play It for the First Time in Boston—Traits and Impressions —Miss Metcalfe and Her Singing

The Boston Symphony Quartet gave the sixth and last of their concerts this season in Jordan Hall, last evening. They were assisted by Miss Susan Metcalfe, soprano, and by Messrs. Kunst, Krafft, Zach and Nagel in presenting this programme:

Hugo Wolf: Quartet, in D minor—
Grave. Allegro molto appassionato.
Adagio.
Allegro energetico.
Allegro molto vivace.
(First time here.)

Songs with piano—
Händel: Aria, "Serse."
Mozart: "Das Veilchen."
Schubert: "Der Neugierige."
Schubert: "Ungeduld."
Brahms: "Die Mainacht."
Brahms: "Liebliche Wangen."

Svendsen: Octet for four violins, two violas and two violoncellos, in A major, op. 3.

Hugo Wolf put, for motto to this quartet of his—the last important work of his neglected life—the line from Goethe, "Ent behren sollst du, sollst entbehren." His short history tells the person of imagination that poor Wolf must have heard that line, and read it, and met with it, in every corner of the not very glittering world he was doomed to inhabit. And in this quartet Wolf seems to take pen in hand, himself to speak to the person of imagination, to tell of this eternal "Entbehren" command that he heard through his life, and to recount what he felt as he heard it.

To any person of any so ever feeling, this music that Wolf has set down must make a telling report of what it is to live one of those lives that are so oddly and yet so commonly picked out for endless abuse and denial. But to anybody who knows Wolf's own particularly pinched life—knows that the last movement itself of this quartet was done in that brokenness of mind whose approach cast its shadow long before—this writing in which Wolf records what he was living speaks in some of its moments with an almost unbearable poignance.

Whatever quality of world Wolf lived in, he certainly did his thinking in another world than this. His music—and especially this quartet—gives the impression that it might have been done by a man who was deaf and dumb. Genius Wolf had—the capacity for feeling everybody's feelings and thinking their thoughts, all with that extraordinary vividness that goes with genius. But he might have been deaf and dumb, he speaks his mind so absolutely after his own fashion and so absolutely without reference to the accepted terms of speech. As his speech, so is his view of things—his view of himself—distinctly his own. By nature and by necessity he was set apart—against his liking and against his will. And when he comes to sum up his peculiar round of experience we are listening to an impassioned prisoner who tells us all that he had hoped for and all that he has missed. Deliverance has come to him, yes; but hardly the deliverance he had hoped for!

This is what we hear through the whole of this quartet. In the first movement it is the rebellion of a prisoner who still is of earth, who has something improving to impart to his fellows, and is unready and unwilling for this deliverance of eternal silence that stands by. In the adagio it is the renunciation of a man who is on the other side of his act, who has given up as completely as was required of him. His strife is over; he has renounced. And if you would know what renunciation is to the man who has wished. . . .

The other two movements but convey other moods of the doom. How wonderfully and vividly all four movements convey it is not to be told. Puzzling at first—so intense is the individuality of their statement—the sense they would impart descends from them at last as naturally as rain, vivid, poignant, a bit of human experience burningly told. And all that Wolf had set to the paper the Symphony Quartet made speak from their fiddles. They overleaped immense difficulties of rhythm, and intricacies of form that might have been hopeless in hands of scantier skill they made luminous and telling. Technically at ease with their music, they were free to catch and convey its feeling. They found the flavor of Wolf's strange individuality, and at moments might have been Wolf himself in inspired delivery of his lines.

Miss Susan Metcalfe, as much a picture as singer, and equally quaint and charming as either, sang her Handel and Mozart like the lady of a portrait out of spinet days stepped graciously down for a moment to delight us. Not but that her voice and art were as gracious and poetic in Schubert and Brahms. But in the little Mozart trifle and in the fine old aria from "Serse" her personality, her art, and the old music, all of quaint and rare flavor, found themselves in especially perfect and refreshing union. The richer colors predominate in Miss Metcalfe's voice. They come to us as the stronger, more warmly colored and more strikingly original tone of a da Salo violin rather than in the insolently cool, rounded calm of a Stradivarius. And if sometimes, in the stress of her feeling, in her anxiety to make her poet and composer clear, Miss Metcalfe is at times a very slight shade off the pitch and very slightly forces her tone, why, that is a small and willing price we pay to have these delicate intentions of Mozart or Brahms lifted from their pages and sung into our heads and hearts so simply, so straightly, and with such skill and charm as hers. Her singing is quaintly flavored perfection, all the more natural and real because of its very slight and very occasional flaws. And her audience liked her to the exaction of another song to these bits of her polished and poetic singing.

B. K.

Boston Transcript
24 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON, MASS.
SATURDAY, APRIL 14, 1906

IN THE WORLD OF MUSIC

THE MATURE NIKISCH: HIS WORK AND HIS TRAITS

A London Reviewer's Impression of Him —His Ways with His Orchestra—A Concert by "the Kneisels"—Orchestral, Choral and Chamber Concerts Next Week—"Aida" in Concert Form—The Waning Season—Musical News

Mr. Nikisch may or may not return to Boston to lead our orchestra—the mature Nikisch and not the conductor that we knew when he was making his way here fifteen years ago. The telegrams rumor and predict—Berlin and Leipsic are at such a safe distance for the pastime. The gossips chatter and make their inferences, but the official and the confirming word has yet to come. Perhaps, when it does, it will not be a confirming word. Meanwhile Mr. Nikisch has displaced Mr. Steinbach as the possibility of the hour in the succession to Mr. Gericke. Most of us remember him more or less vaguely as he was when he first conducted in Boston. A few of us have seen and heard him in the fullness of the ripened powers that have made him with Weingartner and Richard Strauss, the most eminent of European conductors. In many respects he is a new Nikisch. The traits of the old remain, but they are stronger, finer and ampler now. Even in physical externals the conductor has changed much. A mustache and imperial have replaced the beard, the hair is no longer tumbled. The figure has the strength and surety of middle-age. The lines under the eyes and from the nostrils to the mouth are deeply marked. Rigid and alert, it is a face to command. Relaxed and contemplative, it is full of sensitive feeling. And the eyes still brighten and deepen as they used to do. Two years ago Mr. Nikisch was conducting at a few concerts in London. Mr. Baughan of the Daily News wrote of him then as a man and as a conductor, and the article is a clearer impression of the mature Nikisch than we can find elsewhere. At the moment it is worth repeating:

"At a distance his face seems almost statuesque in its calm. Close at hand you are first struck by the dreaminess of his eyes. But an idea breaks up the serenity; the eyes gleam with vitality. In other moods they have intense concentration. The whole man becomes a nervous expression of a thought. I dwell on his personality because it is that which gives him the power of command. Nikisch is nervously magnetic to the finger tips of his eloquent hands. Our conversation drifted to the art of conducting. I gave him a rough idea of the manner in which many of our musicians view the art, especially the theories of those who think that all must be done at rehearsal.

"'Of course preparation is made at rehearsal,' he replied. 'One tells the orchestra one's intentions. At the concert I heighten the inspiration, as it were. It is a question of mood. The conductor must make himself felt by his players; he has them under his hand, and they—how shall I say?—(here Nikisch made a gesture which had so much meaning that it is untranslatable). There is a feeling that goes from the conductor to his orchestra and back from them to him. The orchestral players react on the conductor—inspire him. No, the rehearsal is not everything, but it is the preparation. I always try to let the players have perfect freedom—so that they do not feel they are bound in chains. Within limits, of course, I like my orchestra to play with the expression of soloists—as if they were human beings and not machines.'

"Mr. Nikisch has always been famous for his intimate knowledge of the scores he conducts and for the keenness of his musical memory. I reminded him of the legend that in his early days at Leipzig he conducted 'Tristan and Isolde' without a score. He smiled the dreamy smile which is so characteristic of him. 'Ah, well, I conduct always without looking at a score, although I have one on the desk. I do not think that you can conduct well unless you know a work by heart or nearly by heart. How can you obtain a beautifully growing crescendo—symmetrical in shape, and rising to a great, a very great climax—if you have to keep looking at the score? You cannot watch the players; you lose the—what shall I say? You lose the magnetism; you cannot look them in the eyes and make them play as you want. I had always the power of learning a score by heart. Now I read them as you read a book. In my early Leipzic days—when I was only twenty-two—I conducted my first opera by heart. The orchestral players smiled; it was a joke. But it went well.'

"It is a commonplace of criticism that Mr. Nikisch is at his best in music of the romantic school. I mentioned this to him. 'No, I admire all kinds of music,' he replied. 'I cannot understand the musicians who dislike one composer and worship another. It is ridiculous how some conductors will not direct a single work of Brahms and others are cold toward Wagner. A conductor must be—what do you say?—yes catholic. But he makes the great masterpieces his own. They must pass through his brain. He must study them for himself. His business is to bring out all that seems most beautiful in the scores. Are not the great masters human? That is how I view their music. The interpretation must not be pedantic, square, expressionless, cold. One makes the compositions one's own, in a sense. As to rubato, I do not see why a pianist or a violinist should be allowed to give individual expression to a Beethoven sonata and the conductor be blamed for doing the same thing in one of the symphonies. And why should a conductor be given this license in modern music and not in classical? Because Bach did not notate marks of expression, did he wish his music to be performed without feeling? He relied on the artistic insight of his performers.

cannot be written down. There is no musical term to express them. No composer ever has notated all his intentions; he cannot. We artists must interpret them. Perhaps in the old days when orchestral technique was not as perfect as now Beethoven's symphonies could not be played with all the expression the composer dreamed of. There must be that expression to make the music sing. All music is more or less a big song.'

"I heard him prepare Tschaikovski's fifth symphony. The first point that struck me was his power of placing himself en rapport with his players. He speaks to his men as a brother artist, and impresses them first by his musical grasp of the work in hand and then by his artistic insight. When a passage is done well he praises the playing as if he were merely the audience. He is gifted with a finely expressive voice, and his singing of a passage makes his intentions quite clear. Technical skill is taken for granted—are not all the players artists in their own way? Nikisch seldom employs merely musical terms to express his meaning—he is an example in this respect to some musical critics I know. 'More passion, great passion, if you please, gentlemen.' His phrasing is that of an inspired singer. 'There are two halves to this melody. Before you begin the second, pause so'—and then the conductor puts his hands to his chest and draws in his breath, as if emotion were too powerful. The gesture expressed everything. To the soloists he gives perfect freedom, as if they were singers in an opera. His main care is that the accompaniment shall not be too loud or rough. The beautiful horn solo at the opening of the Andante cantabile was a case in point. 'Gentlemen, Mr. Borsdorf has played beautifully, very beautifully; but let us keep our accompaniment even more pianissimo.' The orchestra applauds; they feel they are artists being directed by an artist. All the rehearsal was directed towards expression. The perfection of the orchestra's playing came from that."

Concerts Next Week

Richard Strauss's tone-poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra," which our orchestra has not played for six years, is the most important number on the programme for the twenty-third pair of Symphony concerts on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening next. No composition of Strauss has been so fiercely debated. None in its musical structure, and in its relation to the ideas and the moods behind is more difficult to understand. In "Zarathustra" he has written his most intellectual, his most "cerebral" music, and in another column there is some account of it and of its relations to the chapters of Nietzsche's "Zarathustra" which suggested it. Nietzsche's is even more strange and puzzling than Strauss's and both are unfamiliar here. By way of contrast Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony and Weber's overture to his opera of "Euryanthe" begin and end the concert, and not before this season has Mr. Gericke chosen a symphony by Mendelssohn. For a virtuoso, Mme. Samaroff, the most individual, the most interesting, and the most promising of the younger American pianists plays Grieg's concerto in A minor. But her promise is already achievement.

On Thursday evening, in Sanders Theatre, at 7.45, the orchestra gives the last of its concerts at Cambridge. Again Mme. Samaroff assists it, playing Liszt's first concerto. For the rest of the programme come Brahms's fourth symphony, Beethoven's overture to "Egmont," and in interesting conrast, the prelude and Isolde's death-song from Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde."

A Voice from the Symphony Audiences—Their Due to Mr. Higginson and Mr. Gericke—The Impressions of a Manager—Virtuosi and America—The Lottery of Concerts

It is so seldom that any of those who make the audiences week after week, and season after season, at the Symphony concert will testify publicly to their appreciation of Mr. Gericke's work at them, and of Mr. Higginson's generous devotion in maintaining them, that it is good to receive and print a note from one such. Reticence is our New England—even our Bostonian—way; and the approaching change in the conductor, and the fact that the concerts have never been so catholic and so excellent as they have this season, have not unsealed our lips. Our correspondent who has happily broken the habit speaks—or rather writes—for many besides himself:

"On April 24 comes the benefit concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for Mr. Gericke. This is an opportunity for us to express anew to Mr. Gericke our appreciation of his careful, artistic and successful services as conductor during the last eight continuous years. Under him the orchestra has improved each year—until today it is one of the most perfect in the world, all parts playing together as one mighty instrument responsive to a single touch. With the orchestra, made up as it is of picked artists many of whom are not to be excelled by individual artists anywhere, Mr. Gericke has developed into a truly notable conductor. It is this which we all recognize—and for which we wish to do him honor.

"It is also fitting for us to recognize the great achievement of Mr. Henry L. Higginson in creating and maintaining this orchestra for more than a quarter of a century. A private citizen, a lover of music and, even more, a lover of his fellowmen, with faith in their ever-increasing power to appreciate beauty and high ideals, he founded the Symphony Orchestra that all might hear the best orchestral music under the best conditions. Freely he has given from his daily labors at his office, his money, his time, his sympathy, his constant care, his skill in selecting men. Few of us realize that otherwise this great orchestra would not be possible. Nor do we realize the immense tact and discernment needed to select and secure the various artists to make up this orchestra, and particularly the conductor; the great sympathy and wisdom needed to explain to the members—of differing nationalities, experiences and talents—how to work harmoniously together; how to adjust themselves to this Western world so different from conti[illegible] Europe, and how [illegible] of American audiences.

"We Americans are appreciative, and particularly so of this very Boston Symphony Orchestra, as witness our constant attendance through these twenty-five years, our ever-increasing pride in it, and our feeling that it is ours almost by right. Yet we are singularly reserved in expressing our admiration, both for the orchestra and for Mr. Higginson. At this time, when he is brought face to face with greater responsibility than ever before in maintaining the orchestra and finding an eminently qualified conductor, let us renew our allegiance and, as opportunity serves, express our gratitude to Mr. Higginson."

Once in a very long while, say between seasons or at the end of a prosperous one, the manager of singers and virtuosi—the impresario, as we used to call him—will talk of his work, his "artists" and his public. Mr. Wolfsohn, the ablest and busiest manager of the pianists, the violinists and the concert singers who come to us from Europe or that make their way in their own country, did speak of these things the other day in the New York Sun, and sometimes interestingly.

"I have been asked many times," he said, for example, "if I had any difficulty in getting these world-famed artists to come to America, and I have to laugh whenever I answer. In the experience of a quarter of a century there are only two names that occur to me as belonging to celebrities who even hesitated. Both of these were afraid of the long ocean voyage. One was Joachim and the other Hans Richter. Distances in Europe are short; an artist can travel from one city to another and fulfil his engagements without loss of sleep and without becoming irritated by the thousand and one little things that rasp the nerves here. Considering what they have to endure, even now, and what they used to put up with here twenty years or so ago, it is a marvel that the American dollar has proved so potent.

"Rubinstein was one of the first European celebrities that ever came to this country in my day. Naturally when he returned he was asked that ever original question as to how he had enjoyed his tour, and he replied that the best thing about it was the knowledge that he had made so much money that he would never have to come back. He lived up to the privilege gained. There is no doubt that the pioneers, like Rubinstein, looked on coming to America as a pilgrimage, an exile, something to be endured for the sake of furture peace. Many of them, not finding it as bad as it was painted came back, and today the American tour is looked forward to eagerly."

And this again, further on in Mr. Wolfsohn's talk:

"In engaging stars, many things have to be taken into account. An artist's personal appearance goes for a great deal. He must know how to come on a stage, how to leave, for he must appeal. If he sets his audience on edge in the beginning, no matter how well he plays or sings, he will be a failure. I have had that experience over and over. Engaging stars is a gamble. You have absolutely nothing to work on. You cannot depend on press notices, you cannot depend on hearsay, you cannot even depend on the audiences of the past, for they are notoriously fickle. I have made many blunders, not so many now as I used to, but when I was more inexperienced I took greater chances. Besides, the musical taste of the public at large has steadily increased and the difficulty has become proportionately great of making successful tours with any but the best-known talent.

"Nearly all cities of any size have a series of orchestral concerts, and for these season tickets are largely sold. At these concerts the most celebrated singers appear, and when an artist attempts to travel on his own account he has that competition. We have today the best artists and the most appreciative audiences in the world. My own experience has been that we are more critical and just in our criticisms than any other country."

THUS SPAKE ZARATHUSTRA

RICHARD STRAUSS, NIETZSCHE AND A TONE-POEM

The Composer's Music at the Next Symphony Concerts—The Three Zarathustras —Nietzsche's Text and Strauss's Tones—Passages That Might Be a "Programme" —Unfamiliar Music and an Unfamiliar Book

At the next pair of Symphony concerts, Mr. Gericke and our orchestra are to play for the first time in six years Richard Strauss's tone-poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra." The composer's musical speech, cast of imagination and qualities of mind are more familiar and better understood now than they were when Mr. Paur originally put "Zarathustra" on one of his programmes, or when Mr. Gericke repeated it; but except the "Sinfonia Domestica" it is still the least known in Boston of Strauss's tone-poems. And it is the boldest and most puzzling of them all. None has excited more controversy. "The philosophy of Friedrich Nietzsche set to music!" cried the classicists scornfully; and many a good old-fashioned "Kapellmeister" shook his troubled head and wondered what the young musical barbarian was plotting. On the other hand, the admirers of Strauss greeted the composition as the conquest of a new world. Neither in conception nor in the shaping of poetic material to musical purposes has it an equal among Strauss's tone-poems. To express philosophical convictions in music is certainly a higher aim than programme music has heretofore pursued. The contention that it is absurd beyond measure to translate a philosophic idea into music can well be dismissed as superficial and presumptuous. Even classic composers have endeavored to express distinct ideas and convictions in tones. Furthermore, in Nietzsche's own books it is ...a system of ... a world of feeling and of the poetically prophetic apotheosis of the new "Over-Man" as the future law-giver of the world.

Nietzsche's "prose-poem," also with the title "Thus Spake Zarathustra," is the source, the inspiration, and the "programme" of Strauss's music. On the fly-leaf of the score, seemingly by way of preface, stands the following passage from the "introductory speech" that Nietzsche wrote for his Zarathustra. It runs in the English of Alexander Tille, whose translation of the book is neither well known nor easily accessible:

"Having attained the age of thirty, Zarathustra left his home and the lake of his home and went into the mountains. There he rejoiced in his spirit and his loneliness, and for ten years did not grow weary of it. But at last his heart turned, One morning he got up with the dawn, stepped into the presence of the sun and thus spake unto him: 'Thou great star! What would be thy happiness, were it not for those for whom thou shinest? For ten years thou hast come up here to my cave. Thou wouldst have got sick of thy light and thy journey but for me, mine eagle and my serpent. But we waited for thee every morning, and receiving from thee thine abundance, blessed thee for it. Lo! I am weary of my wisdom, like the bee that hath collected too much honey; I need hands reaching out for it. I would fain grant and distribute until the wise among men could once more enjoy their folly, and the poor once more their riches. For that end I must descend to the depth, as thou dost at even, when sinking behind the sea, thou givest light to the lower regions, thou resplendent star! I must, like thee, go down, as men say—men to whom I would descend. Thou bless me, thou impassive eye, that canst look without envy even upon over-much happiness. Bless the cup which is about to overflow, so that the water golden-flowing out of it may carry everywhere the reflection of thy rapture. Lo! this cup is about to empty itself again, and Zarathustra will once more become a man.' Thus Zarathustra's going down began."

Who Zarathustra was, and how Nietzsche saw him, wrote of him, what manner of "philosophy" he contrived for him, Mr. Tille indicates in his own preface:

"The work," he says, "takes its title from the mythological founder or reformer of the Avestic religion, Zarathustra, whose name, in its Greek mutilated form, Zoroaster, is familiar to British readers. . . . Nietzsche had made some studies in Oriental religious literature, . . . yet he either neglected Persian religious tradition or purposely in his prose poem made no use of any knowledge he possessed in that field. The modern Zarathustra is neither killed in the battle nor has he any sons who might carry on his work after his death. He stands quite alone, his only permanent companions being two animals, an eagle and a serpent. He is neither a historical nor a mythical person, but a 'ghost,' as Nietzsche would have called him, a type existing nowhere, and yet the incorporation of wishes and aspirations; an ideal reflected in a human image; a man as man should be in Nietzsche's opinion, and as he would have liked to be himself. . . . The scene of 'Thus Spake Zarathustra' is laid, as it were, outside of time and space, and certainly outside of countries and nations, outside of this age, and outside of the main condition of all that lives—the struggle for existence. Zarathustra has not to work for his bread, but has it without effort. His eagle and his serpent provide him with all he needs, and whenever they are not with him he finds men who supply him. . . . True, in his story there appear cities and mob, kings and scholars, poets and cripples, but outside of their realm there is a province which is Zarathustra's own, where he lives in his cave amid the rocks, and whence he thrice goes to men to teach them his wisdom, pointing away from all that unites and separates men at present. This Nowhere and Nowhen, over which Nietzsche's imagination is supreme, is a province of boundless individualism, in which a man of mark has free play, unfettered by the tastes and inclinations of the multitude."

Or as Nietzsche himself makes Zarathustra put it as he preaches in the marketplace: "I teach you beyond man. Man is a something that shall be surpassed. . . . Beyond-man is the significance of earth. . . . I conjure you, my brethren, remain faithful to earth and do not believe those who speak unto you of superterrestrial hopes! . . . Once soul looked contemptuously upon body; that contempt then being the highest ideal, soul wished the body meagre, hideous, starved. Thus soul thought it could escape body and earth. . . . It is time for man to mark out his goal. It is time for man to plant the germ of his highest hope. His soil is still rich enough for that purpose. But one day that soil will be impoverished and tame, no high tree being any longer able to grow from it."

Strauss's tone-poem begins with an introduction that is one of the mightiest passages in the whole range of ultra-modern music. The trumpets give out a theme—Zarathustra's—that is majesty and strength, and Strauss marshals it in long-drawn and surging measures to a climax of tonal splendor that is almost sublime. It is the rising of the great sun upon Zarathustra's mountains. Is he also rising in the might of the Over-man to solve the riddle of the universe and to proclaim the solution to all men? Then, presumably Zarathustra "goes down," to be the teacher and the exemplar of mankind. Here Strauss begins to scatter short captions through the score, which are no other than the titles of sundry charters (or "speeches") in Nietzsche's book. In the substance of those chapters, again presumably, lie the programme and the intended suggestion of the music. Thus immediately after the introduction, Strauss inserts the caption "Of Back-Worlds-Men"—those who seek consolation in religion, and to whom Zarathustra has gone down to teach the "Beyond-man." Now, Zarathustra also once had been a dweller of the "back-world."

"Then the world seemed to me the work of a suffering and tortured god. A dream then the world appeared to me, and a god's fiction; colored smoke before the king Kings and his satellites, who, contrary to astronomical principles, has eclipsed our Northern regent, or rather crowded him from his orbit; however, altho' the eclipse is total, its duration will be short, and the first fair day this intruding planet will disappear.

The enemy's advance has been slow, perplexing and singular, indicating, on the whole, an attack of some consequence. They now appear to be erecting Barracks at Ty [Ticonderoga] and establishing a fort there, to the great mortification of our line, as it will detain us in this desolate country the whole winter. The great distance of the enemy from us and their advantage of water-carriage have occasioned very hard [work] in scouting, and an unusual flux and reflux of the militia. You know they increase and decrease like the moon, which affords us the most light in fair weather; they are now all dismissed and our force consists of three Continental and two State regiments. I yesterday returned from a scout of twenty miles northwest to the bend of Hudson's River, and on my return was charmed with the discharge of fourteen cannon, in consequence of official intelligence that Cornwallis with three thousand five hundred men surrendered to the allied army on the 19th ult. A series of fortunate events has attended our arms this campaign. I need not particularize, as you must long before this reaches you hear of General Green's most important battle and success, with that of Colonel Willet on the Mohawk. We strut like turkey cocks in all their vernal pride, notwithstanding we are naked and moneyless, destitute of women and wine.

It appears that previous to Cornwallis's surrender the two light corps of our armies stormed two important redoubts of the enemy, with little loss, which commanded their main works, and in which one hundred cannon and mortars were placed immediately, the music of which soon lulled the vied most—I, the loneliest! For I have had you, and ye have me still. . . ."

Zarathustra turns for wisdom and solace to learning. "Of Science" is Strauss's caption for a fugal episode—and these are Nietzsche's words in the preaching: "Thou seducest, thou false one, thou refined one, unto unknown desires and wilderness. . . . Alas for all free spirits, who are not on their guard against such wizards! Gone is their freedom. Thou teachest and thereby allures back into prisons! We seem to be very different. And, verily, we spake and thought enough together . . . to enable me to know we are different. We seek different things, . . . ye and I. For I seek more security. . . . But, when I see the eyes ye make, me thinketh almost ye seek more insecurity. . . ."

Still tonal tortures rack Zarathustra; but the orchestral violence begins to subside. His eyes are opening. Not through learning in the old sense, but through the new Nietzschean gospel of joy will he set himself free. Behold him "The Convalescent": "One morning . . . Zarathustra fell down like one dead, and remained long like one dead. But, when he again became conscious he was pale and trembled and remained lying, and for a long while would neither eat nor drink. . . . At last, after seven days, Zarathustra rose on his couch, took a rose apple in his hand, smelt it, and found its odor sweet. Then his animals thought the time had come for speaking unto him. . . . 'Speak not further, thou convalescent one! . . . but go out where the world waiteth for thee like a garden. Go out unto the roses and bees and flocks of doves! But especially unto the singing birds, that thou mayest learn singing from them! . . . Speak no further, . . . rather, thou convalescent one, make first a lyre, a new lyre! Sing and foam over, O Zarathustra; heal thy soul with new songs.'"

"A god danceth through Zarathustra, and forthwith he breaks into his song of joy—'The Dance Song'—when Eros and the wood nymphs danced together in the meadow: One night Zarathustra went through the forest with his disciples, and when seeking for a well, behold! he came unto a green meadow which was surrounded by trees and bushes. There girls danced together. As soon as the girls knew Zarathustra, they ceased to dance; but Zarathustra approached them with a friendly gesture and spake these words: 'Cease not to dance, ye sweet girls! . . . And I think ye will also find the tiny god whom girls like best. Beside the well he lieth, still with his eyes shut. Verily, in broad daylight he fell asleep, the sluggard! Did he, perhaps, try to catch too many butterflies? Be not angry with me, ye beautiful dancers, if I chastise a little the tiny god! True, he will probably cry and weep; but even when weeping he causeth laughter! And with tears in his eyes shall he ask you for a dance; and I myself shall sing a song unto his dance.' . . . And this is the song sung by Zarathustra when Eros and the girls danced together. And there is 'holy laughter.'

And last Zarathustra sings his song of solemn triumph—"The Night-Wanderer's Song." Twelve times the bell sounds heavily:

ONE!
O man! Lose not sight!
TWO!
What saith the deep midnight?
THREE!
"I lay in sleep, in sleep;
FOUR!
From deep dream I woke to light.
FIVE!
The world is deep,
SIX!
And deeper than ever day thought it might.
SEVEN!
Deep is its woe—
EIGHT!
And deeper still than woe—delight."
NINE!
Saith woe: "Pass, go!
TEN!
Eternity is sought by all delight—
ELEVEN!
Eternity deep—by all delight!"
TWELVE!

...ing—the riddle is insoluble, after all, and the tone-poem ends enigmatically on a mysterious discord—the violins and some of the wood-winds in B major, while the basses sound C natural pizzicato; as if Zarathustra had lost himself in perplexity, in the conviction that his philosophy, after all, had brought him nothing, and that he was no more master of the secrets of life in the end than at the beginning. "I did not intend to write philosophical music," says Strauss, "or portray Nietzsche's great work musically. I meant to convey musically an idea of the development of the human race from its origin through the various stages of its progress, religious as well as scientific, up to Nietzsche's 'Superman.'" There is no adjective for such a task.

/ / + / /

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, APRIL 15, 1906.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The performance of the "Faust" symphony, Liszt's great work, was the feature of the 23d Symphony program; a performance that was glorious in every way and aroused the audience to such an unusual amount of enthusiasm at the close of the concert that Mr Gericke was obliged to return to the platform before the plaudits ceased. The program opened with Bach's toccata in F major, for organ, Mr Wallace Goodrich being the soloist. Mr Ben Devies sang an aria from "Der Freischutz" and Coleridge-Taylor's "Hiawatha's Wedding Feast," and the orchestral selections were the "Good Friday Spell" from "Parsifal" and the Liszt symphony, the latter without the solo and choral in the third part. The organ toccata was given admirably by Mr Goodrich, the skilful use of the pedals probably showing his well-known abilities in a more prominent light than did his straight "finger" manipulation of the key banks.

Mr Davies sang his two arias most acceptably, although the shades of expression in the "Der Freischutz" selection might have been better observed, his vocalizing running rather too evenly for the contrasts indicated in the score. So far as his tones are to be considered they were as pure and vibrant as ever, and the sentiments of the "Onaway" number enabled him to appear to great advantage. The audience expressed great delight at Mr Davies' work and recalled him several times.

The orchestra interpreted the "Good Friday" music from "Parsifal" very beautifully, following Mr Gericke's masterly reading in perfect accord, and with a sympathetic harmony of execution that gave to the composition that suggestion of religious import which makes this scene, when properly done, so impressive. The "Faust" symphony was exquisite in its entirety, for all three movements, "Faust," "Gretchen" and "Mephistopheles," were each characterized so clearly that no one could fail to comprehend the tonal pictures. Every theme was significantly set forth and in the "Mephistopheles" finale the haunting mockery of the instrumentation was something uncanny, as given by the orchestra in one of their greatest interpretations of the season. The men played as if inspired.

This week's program, the last but one of the present season, will have Mme Olga Samaroff for soloist in Grieg's A minor concerto for piano. The other selections will be Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony, the symphonic poem by Richard Strauss, "Thus Spake Zarathustra" and Weber's "Euryanthe" overture.

MR GERICKE'S BENEFIT.

Mr Gericke has arranged a most attractive program for his benefit concert which will take place in Symphony hall Tuesday evening, April 24. The first number will be the "Leonore" overture, No. 3, one of Mr Gericke's "war horses." Then will come Cesar Franck's symphony in D minor, the work which marks the highest point of achievement by the younger school of French composers. Mme Gadski will sing an aria, yet unnamed, then follows Goldmark's popular "Sakuntala" overture and finally the "Immolation Scene," so-called, from "Dusk of the Gods," in which Mme Gadski will sing the music allotted to Brunnhilde. The sale of seats for this concert opened on last Thursday, and while there are desirable seats still to be had, they are going very rapidly.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.

Bach—Toccata in F Major, for Organ.
Mr. Wallace Goodrich.
Weber—Aria, "Through the Forests."
Mr. Ben Davies.
Wagner—Good Friday Spell.
Coleridge-Taylor—"Onaway, Awake Beloved."
Mr. Ben Davies.
Liszt—Faust Symphony.

Adamowski was concert-meister, as he has been since the famous Hessian retreat, and the orchestra played with a fervor that demonstrated their appreciation of their conductor. The audiences, too, in these latter days take every opportunity to show their affection for Mr. Gericke, and at the end of each orchestral number he was recalled with fervor.

It was a new departure to open a symphony concert with an organ solo, but all the circumstances justified it; the religious instrument fitted well at this religious season; the organ itself is a noble-sounding instrument in Symphony Hall—in spite of one stop that wheezed a little, and Mr. Wallace Goodrich is one of the best Bach players in America. Therefore, this number was thoroughly effective and was greatly applauded, Mr. Goodrich being recalled twice.

It is much to be desired that Boston should cultivate a taste for the organ as a concert instrument. While our public is well educated in the domain of Symphony, String Quartette, Piano, Recital, etc., there is but a slight tendency towards the organ repertoire.

Then came Mr. Davies with a most tuneful Weber selection. We found him rather prosaic in the melodic sections of this "Freischuetz" aria, and we missed the Teutonic sentiment, but the singer was always secure in his intonation, and he made an effective dramatic climax, which, with a Weber aria, atones for almost every shortcoming. Mr. Davies did excellently in Coleridge-Taylor's "Onaway, awake Beloved!" which he gave with commendable enunciation and dramatic effect.

In this matter of pronunciation our singers can learn much from British artists. It is a delight to be able to follow the text of a song without referring to the programme-book—but a delight which we very seldom experience in our concerts. Mr. Davies demi-falsetto in the final cadence was as clear as crystal. He was recalled twice with much enthusiasm.

We were glad to hear this work by the great negro composer given, for once, with perfect orchestral support. The small orchestra of the Cecelia concerts, with its one or two rehearsals, has only given us an outline of the luxuriant effects of the composer. On this occasion the song made its full effect, both vocally and instrumentally. But we were again impressed with the close resemblance of some of the most passionate phrases to Gounod's effects in "Romeo and Juliet."

We have come to expect Bach's "Pastorale" at Christmas, and Wagner's "Good Friday Spell" during Holy Week, in our symphony concerts, and both compositions fit their frames properly. But both also have their intrinsic greatness apart from any especial season. This present number is the finest part of 'Parsifal,' and has none of that reiteration which is the chief defect of that opera.

The "Knight Parsifal," "Compassion," "Grail" and "Faith" motives, lead up to and culminate in the beautiful "Good Friday" motive, in a manner that places the old composers "Hors Concours" with his modern imitators, whose constant use of "Leit-motiven" is only dull, while not one of them could invent such figures as the ones mentioned above. Yet "Parsifal," as a whole, is not an example of the greatest Wagner. There is much padding, repetition and dulness in the work, and we believe that the near future will find the world confirming this verdict.

The concert ended with a notably brilliant performance of a very difficult work. Never have we heard the Liszt symphony made so clear and intelligible. The Ghost, in "Hamlet," shudderingly exclaims—"Liszt, Liszt, oh Liszt," and the concert auditor can re-echo the cry as regards the prolixity of the tale that is unfolded, but the work is by no means tiresome, as many of the long narratives of Debussy, D'Indy, Mahler & Co. are apt to become. Spite of repetitions and of undue length this symphony is full of ideas. It is not, perhaps, as sustainedly great as "Les Preludes," which we hold to be Liszt's chief orchestral work, but it presents tangible thoughts and much beauty of theme.

It is interesting to see what a quarry later composers have made of this symphony. Wagner's "St. John's Day" figure, which Pogner uses so copiously in the "Mastersingers of Nuremburg," is clearly discernible, and Gounod has helped himself liberally to Gretchen's music. All through the work Liszt shows his power in working up grand climaxes, but in the first movement, which is the military rather than the amative Faust, he does not stop at the best climax, but continues unnecessarily.

The second movement, "Gretchen," is a masterpiece. Beauty of melody, clearness of treatment, poetic inspiration, are in every measure.

But after this sweet movement there was the devil to play. And the orchestra played to excellent purpose, "a la Berlioz." If that eminent Frenchman had not existed it would have been Liszt who would have founded the modern school of orchestral coloring. If he at times resembles Berlioz he at least never copies or plagiarizes. He is not an experimenter, as Berlioz sometimes was, but every new effect is made with a sure hand, from the ingenious parody of the themes of the first movement, to the uncanny fugue which proves Mephistopheles a very good contrapuntist.

The very fact of assigning no definite themes to Satan, but causing him to represent the destructive principle by distorting previous melodies of beauty, is a touch of philosophy which may outrank "Zarathustra" and all of Strauss' musical philosophizing. And the presentation of the "Gretchen" theme, unsullied and beyond the power of Satan's pollutions, and the final transfiguration, were points of ethical power, precluding the necessity of a long explanatory chorus (omitted on this occasion) with which Liszt ends the work and which is but another example of his passing by a climax and ending with an anti-climax.

In summing up we cannot too emphatically state that this was the finest Liszt orchestral performance that we can remember, and we can only pay renewed homage to our great orchestra and its great conductor.

Louis C. Elson.

[250] major for orga to Wallace Goodrich. 'The occasionally used at thes in connection with the orches but never so far as memory serve distinctly solo instrument. Mr ich, who is an admirable interprete n, played with his usual technica ency and judicious registration an warmly applauded, and recalled.

e other soloist was Ben Davies, th lish tenor, who has appeared severa s at these concerts within recen
s. Last evening he sang the aria hrough the Forests," from the firs of Weber's "Der Freischutz," also "Onaway! Awake Beloved," from ridge Taylor's "Hiawatha's Wedding

Davies at first appeared to be hard his best voice, but in the latter he sang with all his old-time ar nish and purity of tone. Mr. Da received an immense ovation and y recalls. The orchestra gave an performance of the "Good Friday from Wagner's "Parsifal," and the g number was Liszt's "Faust" sym

the rehearsal and concert this com k Olga Samaroff will be the soloist concerto by Edward Grieg.

MR. GERICKE'S BENEFIT.

Mr. Gericke has arranged a most at tive programme for his benefit con which will take place in Symphony on Tuesday evening, April 24. The t number will be the "Leonore" over
No. 3, one of Mr. Gericke's "war s." Then will come Cesar Franck's phony in D minor, the work which s the highest point of achievement by the younger school of French com sers. Then will come an aria, yet un med, which Mme. Gadski will sing, Goldmark's popular "Sakuntala" over ure, and finally the "Immolation Scene," called, from "Dusk of the Gods," in hich Mme. Gadski will sing the music otted to Brunnhilde.

SUNDAY HERALD

Published Every Day in the Year.
VOL. CXIX., NO. 105.

SUNDAY, APRIL 15, 1906.

ORGAN SOLO WAS SYMPHONY TREAT

Wallace Goodrich's Playing of Bach's Toccata in F Major at 22d Orchestra Concert Proves a Delight.

"PARSIFAL" EXCERPT ESPECIALLY APROPOS

Liszt's Faust Symphony Presented with Continuity of Thought, Despite Barren Stretches and Repetitions.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Gericke conductor, gave its 22d concert last night in Symphony Hall. Messrs. Ben Davies, tenor, and Wallace Goodrich, organist, assisted. The programme was as follows:

"Toccata in F major for organ.....Bach
Max's aria from "Der Freischuetz".....Weber
"Good Friday Spell" from "Parsifal"..Wagner
"Onaway! Awake!".....Coleridge-Taylor
"Faust" symphony.....Liszt

It is a good thing to hear occasionally the organ as a solo instrument at these concerts. Organ recitals are considered by many as a bore unless there be mu- imitative of a thunder storm or the other phenomenon of nature or description of the overture to "Wil- Tell" or the gavotte from "Mig- A long work for solo organ with orchestral accompaniment is seldom successful as music or as a piece for display. Mr. Widor has taken pains to protest against the well known opinion Berlioz to this effect, but Berlioz's statement remains true, as do many other statements of the creator of mod- orchestration, whose instrumenta- is still wonderful and the despair would-be imitator, in whatever they play the part of the sed- Bach's toccata is good music the same time a brilliant virtu- and it was a pleasure to hear written and not as a tran- by Esser for the orchestra. Goodrich played as a musician-vir- greatly to the pleasure of excerpt from "Parsifal" was course, with reference to but the beautiful music gratefully at any time to this music in answer to that Wagner was a tired sat down to compose that the vein of his inven- though exhausted. They that this charge smile a su- This Good Friday admire was writ- within 20 years or more be- began to touch the third

But here Kundry has washed the feet of Parsifal, anointed them with precious oil and dried them with the hairs of her head. There is inevitably the thought of the Saviour and the woman that was a sinner; the thought of the supreme tragedy of all the ages. Nor is there any doubt that Wagner whose head in the fifties was full of a music drama in which the Saviour should be loved with an earthly and passionate love by Mary Magdalene, wrote the music of this scene then or afterward as though his Parsifal and Kundry were in very truth those characters.

Liszt's "Faust" Symphony has not been played so frequently at these concerts that the music suffers from familiarity. When the work was first performed in this country, at New York in 1863, it was dismissed with scanty attention by the Tribune reviewer, not because the concert was in war time, for the same reviewer wrote long notices of the first performances in the city of Verdi's "Aroldo" and Gluck's "Orpheus," with Vestvali as the chief singer. No, the reviewer dismissed the "Faust" contemptuously and had something to say about the chirping of birds and the grunting of swine.

But what has not been written about this music? Liszt's staunchest admirers differ as to his intentions. One commentator says that the composer abstained rigorously from any musical allusion to a particular scene or episode of the drama. Another finds several episodes, as though the music were a row of pictures. Another names the motives in the first movement Doubt, Longing, Love, Pride, etc. Still another prefers to believe that Liszt presents his symphony as though it were in a bottle neatly labelled "Extract of 'Faust.'"

Now Liszt himself refused to give even a short motto to any one of the movements; the titles, "Faust," "Gretchen," "Mephistopheles," were enough, he thought, and so they are. His music may be psychological, as some of his partisans insist, but surely it is better that the hearers should be left to their own psychological ingenuity in listening and determining. It is enough to be reminded by the music of Faust's conviction of the emptiness of art, of his doubts and questionings, of the conflict in his breast between rebellious and meditative feelings; of the touching simplicity, purity and passion of Gretchen; and as for Mephistopheles, he is the mocking spirit that denies, not an amusing pantomime devil, not an affable person who chucks Martha under the chin and uses the latest electrical device concealed in a flower bed to aid Faust in his awkward task of overcoming Gretchen's innocence.

The question, then, is this: Does the music impress, charm, move, thrill? Even if for the most part it should excite a feeling of repulsion, it would have a positive quality.

Liszt is slowly coming into his own kingdom as an acknowledged ruler. Long overshadowed by Wagner, who owed much to him, musically as in other ways, he was looked on chiefly as a piano virtuoso who had written much for his instrument. As the years go by he is more and more understood as a composer who created forms and moods. There are some who still object to this symphony because, forsooth, there is "little or no development." Thus they prove that they do not see any salvation for Faust, Gretchen and Liszt outside the strict sonata form. They are no doubt estimable persons in family life and social relations; they would serve with dignity as pallbearers, and would no doubt be impressive on a platform seated near the presiding officer and the orator of the evening; but they are unwholesome companions in the orgies of the Muses, nor would any person sensitive to impressions of art seek them out to crush a cup of two with them.

The performance last night had been carefully studied and prepared, and in spite of one or two trifling slips—even trifling slips are rare at these concerts—it was generally effective and often eloquent.

Surely there can be no dispute over the beauty of the "Gretchen" movement. This is, indeed, the music for Gretchen. As Mr. Newman once said, Gounod's music, charming as it is, is not peculiarly characteristic of Faust and Marguerite; it is for any Edwin and Angelina. Marguerite as depicted by Berlioz is more picturesque, more mediaeval than the Gretchen of Liszt, and yet it is hardly fair to compare the vocal-orchestral with the purely orchestral. Liszt never was more emotionally sincere and poignantly emotional than in this movement, and the apparition of Gretchen in the "Mephistopheles" movement is a fine feat of imaginative expression.

Yet it must be confessed that although Mr. Gericke succeeded in giving a convincing continuity of thought to the "Faust" movement, there are exasperating and barren stretches and futile repetitions of ideas. Faust is at times a bore. Probably the philosopher himself was one. The two chief themes are happily imagined, and the Love Theme is a haunting one, but the grandiose motive is inherently cheap and Liszt, when he endeavors to be grandiose, falls easily into circus pomp.

It matters not whether Liszt borrowed his idea of Mephistopheles parodying and mocking the themes of Faust from Berlioz's finale of the Fantastic Symphony. His task was a greater one in strict parody, and he performed it with much cleverness. The final chorus, however, is needed for the full effect. Mephistopheles does not have the least word in this world or the next, and the mystical chorus restores the balance and completes the work in all its fulness. The symphony should be heard at closer intervals of time. Mr. Scheel conducted it here two years ago at a Richard Strauss concert, but he muttered in detail and much of the first movement sounded worse than it really is.

Mr. Ben Davies is well known to the Symphony audience. He sang at one of these concerts for the first time 10 years ago this month. Inasmuch as he sings with unfailing good nature, in a breezy manly way, with infinite gusto, the people hear him gladly. He reminds us, however, of Charles Incledon as described by Hazlitt: "He is a true old English singer, and there is nobody who goes through a drinking song, a hunting song, or a sailor's song like him. He makes a very loud and agreeable noise without any meaning."

DAS STAATSZEITUNG

APR 8 - 1906

Musikalische Angelegenheiten.

Der verflossene Konzertwinter.

Wohl steht uns noch eine Anzahl von Konzerten bevor, und manche davon werden gar nicht unwichtig sein, aber die musikalische Hauptarbeit des Winters 1905—1906 ist, soweit New York in Betracht kommt, geschehen. Was jetzt noch kommt, wird an der Physiognomie der Saison nichts mehr ändern können. Wer aber stets mit dabei gewesen ist, hat sicherlich keinen Grund gehabt, sich über ein Zuwenig zu beklagen: er wird die Erinnerung an manches genußreiche Konzert mit in den musikarmen Sommer zu nehmen trachten, und die weniger erfreulichen Stunden, die er in den verschiedenen Konzertsälen hat absitzen müssen, wird er zu vergessen sich bemühen.

Faßt man das Dargebotene zusammen, so ergiebt sich eine Zunahme von Orchester- und Kammermusik-Konzerten, und eine, wenn auch nur geringe Abnahme von Einzelkonzerten, sogenannten Recitals. Das ist an und für sich gewiß ein recht erfreuliches Faktum, denn es sollte sich daraus folgern lassen, daß sich unser Publikum mehr den ernsteren musikalischen Aufgaben zuwendet, und dem Personenkultus geringeres Interesse entgegenbringt. Aber eine solche Schlußfolgerung wäre nur dann zutreffend, wenn Angebot und Nachfrage sich bei diesen Konzerten deckten, und wenn jene Orchester- und Kammermusik-Konzerte frei von Personenkultus wären. Wer der Sache nun auf den Grund geht, wird finden, daß weder das Eine noch das Andere der Fall war, und daher mag es wohlgethan sein, unserem Publikum nicht so ohne Weiteres zu seinem musikalischen Fortschritt zu gratuliren.

Ob Angebot und Nachfrage bei unseren Konzerten in einem gesunden Verhältnis zu einander stehen, läßt sich nach dem bloßen Augenschein nicht beurtheilen. Wie oft schien Carnegie Hall ausverkauft zu sein, wenn es in Wirklichkeit nur ausverschenkt war! Orchesterkonzerte haben in jenem Saale stattgefunden, die weit über tausend Dollars Unkosten verursachten, während an der Kasse weniger als ein paar hundert Dollars eingingen. Es ist unerquicklich, bei Künstlerangelegenheiten stets deren finanzielle Einträglichkeit zu erörtern, und es ist unstreitig wahr, daß die besten musikalischen Darbietungen durchaus nicht immer das zahlreiche Publikum heranziehen. Aber in einer Zeit und in einem Lande, wo das Geld als universaler Werthmesser angesehen wird, läßt sich eine dahingehende Erörterung garnicht zurückweisen. Was umsonst dargeboten wird, mag an sich noch so werthvoll sein, es verliert dennoch an allgemeiner Werthschätzung. Und das ist so ziemlich das Schlimmste, was Kunstleistungen passiren kann. —

Von den Instituten, die uns New Yorker mit Orchestermusik versorgen, scheint nur ein einziges ohne Subvention bestehen zu können, und das ist kein New Yorker Institut: das Bostoner Symphonieorchester. Ob Mayor Higginson am Schluß des Rechnungsjahres doch noch drauf zu zahlen hat, mag dahingestellt bleiben, — wenn er es thun muß, hängt er's wenigstens nicht an die große Glocke. Sicher ist, daß die New Yorker Konzerte des Bostoner Orchesters kein Defizit verursachen. Und das ist um so höher anzuschlagen, als der bisherige Dirigent dieses Orchesters, Wilhelm Gericke, gewiß keine persönliche Zugkraft ausübte. Man geht zu diesen Konzerten thatsächlich der Orchestermusik wegen, und daher findet sich in Carnegie Hall niemals ein feinsinnigeres musikalisches Publikum ein, als wenn das Bostoner Symphonieorchester dort spielt. Das sollte allen Denen die Augen öffnen, die da meinen, ein Aufsehen erregender Dirigent ist die Hauptsache, das Instrument, auf dem er spiele, das Orchester, komme erst in zweiter Linie in Betracht.

Die Existenz sämmtlicher New Yorker Orchester aber hängt von der Generosität einiger reicher Mitbürger und Mitbürgerinnen ab, die ihren Wohlthätigkeitssinn nach der musikalischen Seite hin zu bethätigen wünschen. Das Philharmonische Orchester hatte Jahrzehnte lang seinen Stolz darin gefunden, daß es finanziell durchaus auf eigenen Füßen stand. Als die Mitglieder vor drei Jahren einsahen, daß ihre orchestralen Leistungen allein nicht mehr die erforderliche Anziehungskraft ausübten, verfielen sie auf die kostspielige Importation europäischer Gastdirigenten, und nahmen die Unterstützung einiger Mäcene an. Als Uebergangsstadium hätte man sich das Experiment immerhin gefallen lassen können. Jetzt heißt es aber, daß die Subvention eine noch viel beträchtlichere und regelmäßige werden soll. Nun, das Philharmonische Orchester war insofern glücklicher daran, als ihm reichliche Subventionen auch dazu verhelfen wurde, das Orchester selbst quantitativ und qualitativ zu stärken. Gleichwohl scheint auch die Bedingung gestellt worden zu sein, für einen kleinen Theil der Saison einen europäischen Gastdirigenten zu verpflichten. Da aber die Wahl auf Felix Weingartner gefallen war, konnte man sich jene Bedingung schon gefallen lassen; sicherlich ist es allseitig bedauert worden, daß Weingartner seine ferneren Verpflichtungen aus Gesundheitsrücksichten hat rückgängig machen müssen. Ob statt seiner ein anderer Dirigent von drüben eingeladen werden soll, oder ob das Symphonieorchester mit Walter Damrosch als einzigen Dirigenten weiter bestehen wird, darüber ist vorläufig noch nichts bekannt gegeben worden.

Das russische Symphonieorchester, das Volkssymphonieorchester, u. s. w. sie alle sind auf milde Beiträge angewiesen, und wenn man nun auch anerkennt, daß die Popularisirung guter Orchestermusik ein Kulturfaktor ist und ohne solche milde Gaben kaum begonnen werden kann, so ist doch auch die Frage erlaubt, ob die aufgewendeten Gelder und Anstrengungen wirklich den angestrebten Segen stiften. Es ist sicher, daß für manche dieser Konzerte erst das Bedürfnis geschaffen werden muß, und daß sie vor der Hand kaum mehr bezwecken, als den persönlichen Ehrgeiz des Dirigenten zu befriedigen. Und wenn man nun gezwungen ist, fortgesetzt Freibillets in großen Quantitäten auszugeben, entwöhnt man eben das Publikum von der heilsamen Pflicht, für seine Kunstgenüsse zu bezahlen. Es ist wohlgethan, für gute Konzerte den Preis so niedrig wie möglich anzusetzen, freien Eintritt zu gestatten heißt aber: das Publikum demoralisiren.

From Vogt Brooklyn, N. Y.

Address

Date APR 10 1906

WHAT NIKISCH WANTS.

He Asks $50,000 a Year and a Life Insurance of $125,000 to Come Here.

(Special Cable.)

LONDON STANDARD TO BROOKLYN EAGLE.

Berlin, April 10—Professor Arthur Nikisch, the celebrated musician, has just resigned his position of director of the Leipzig Opera House. Negotiations are proceeding with a view of his becoming director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The sole difficulty is that Nikisch demands a salary equal to his aggregate possible earnings in Europe, namely $50,000, in addition to the purchase of a life insurance of $125,000. It is expected that Mr. Higginson's aid will enable Boston to acquire Nikisch's services.

GERMAN HERALD

NEW YORK CITY.

APR 11 1906

$50,000 jährlich will Herr Nikisch für seine Dienste als Dirigent des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters haben — „excusez du peu"! Die Kunst geht heutzutage nach Kuchen und Braten . . .

NEW YORK SUN

APR 10 1906

Nikisch May Be Boston Symphony Leader

Special Cable Despatch to THE SUN.

BERLIN, April 9.—Arthur Nikisch, who has given up his place as conductor of the Leipsic Opera and intends to settle in the United States, is negotiating with the Symphony Orchestra of Boston.

[251]

Boston Post

22D SYMPHONY CONCERT

The program of the Symphony concert last evening offered something of an innovation, for the first number was the familiar toccata in F major for organ solo, played by Wallace Goodrich. The organ has been occasionally used at these concerts in combination with the orchestra, but never so far as memory serves as a distinctly solo instrument. Mr. Goodrich, who is an admirable interpreter of Bach, played with his usual technical proficiency and judicious registration and was warmly applauded, and recalled.

The other soloist was Ben Davies, the English tenor, who has appeared several times at these concerts within recent seasons. Last evening he sang the aria, "Through the Forests," from the first act of Weber's "Der Freischutz," also the "Onaway! Awake Beloved," from Coleridge Taylor's "Hiawatha's Wedding Feast."

Mr. Davies at first appeared to be hardly in his best voice, but in the latter number he sang with all his old-time artistic finish and purity of tone. Mr. Davies received an immense ovation and many recalls. The orchestra gave an ideal performance of the "Good Friday Spell" from Wagner's "Parsifal," and the closing number was Liszt's "Faust" symphony.

At the rehearsal and concert this coming week Olga Samaroff will be the soloist in the concerto by Edward Grieg.

MR. GERICKE'S BENEFIT

Mr. Gericke has arranged a most attractive programme for his benefit concert, which will take place in Symphony Hall, on Tuesday evening, April 24. The first number will be the "Leonore" overture, No. 3, one of Mr. Gericke's "war horses." Then will come Cesar Franck's symphony in D minor, the work which marks the highest point of achievement by the younger school of French composers. Then will come an aria, yet unnamed, which Mme. Gadski will sing, Goldmark's popular "Sakumala" overture, and finally the "Immolation Scene," so called, from "Dusk of the Gods," in which Mme. Gadski will sing the music allotted to Brunnhilde.

SUNDAY HERALD
Published Every Day in the Year.
VOL. CXIX., NO. 105.
SUNDAY, APRIL 15, 1906.

ORGAN SOLO WAS SYMPHONY TREAT

Wallace Goodrich's Playing of Bach's Toccata in F Major at 22d Orchestra Concert Proves a Delight.

"PARSIFAL" EXCERPT ESPECIALLY APROPOS

Liszt's Faust Symphony Presented with Continuity of Thought, Despite Barren Stretches and Repetitions.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Gericke conductor, gave its 22d concert last night in Symphony Hall. Messrs. Ben Davies, tenor, and Wallace Goodrich, organist, assisted. The programme was as follows:

Toccata in F major for organ.....Bach
Max's aria from "Der Freischuetz".....Weber
"Good Friday Spell" from "Parsifal"..Wagner
"Onaway! Awake!".....Coleridge-Taylor
A Faust symphony.....Liszt

It is a good thing to hear occasionally the organ as a solo instrument at these concerts. Organ recitals are considered by many as a bore unless there be music imitative of a thunder storm or some other phenomenon of nature or a transcription of the overture to "William Tell" or the gavotte from "Mignon." A long work for solo organ with orchestral accompaniment is seldom successful as music or as a piece for display. Mr. Widor has taken pains to protest against the well known opinion of Berlioz to this effect, but Berlioz's statement remains true, as do many other statements of the creator of modern orchestration, whose instrumentation is still wonderful and the despair of his would-be imitator, in whatever country they play the part of the sedulous ape. Bach's toccata is good music and at the same time a brilliant virtuoso piece, and it was a pleasure to hear it as it was written and not as a transcription by Esser for the orchestra. Mr. Goodrich played as a musician-virtuoso and greatly to the pleasure of the audience.

The excerpt from "Parsifal" was chosen, of course, with reference to Holy Week, but the beautiful music may be heard gratefully at any time. Some point to this music in answer to the charge that Wagner was a tired man when he sat down to compose "Parsifal"; that the vein of his invention was wellnigh exhausted. They that bring forward this charge smile a superior smile and say: "This Good Friday music that you justly admire was written near Zurich 20 years or more before Wagner began to sketch the third act of 'Parsifal' on the Christmas of 1878." But did Wagner in the fifties sketch the music as it exists today? Is it fully established that he wrote near Zurich, in the cottage put at his disposal by Otto Wesendonck, both the [illegible]

Good Friday music appeals strongly to those who may say with Tschaikowsky: "I cannot understand how any one can listen without laughter, or without being bored, to those endless monologues in which Parsifal or Kundry and the rest bewail their misfortunes. Can we sympathize with them? Can we love or hate them? Certainly not; we remain aloof from their passions, sentiments, triumphs and misfortunes."

But here Kundry has washed the feet of Parsifal, anointed them with precious oil and dried them with the hairs of her head. There is inevitably the thought of the Saviour and the woman that was a sinner; the thought of the supreme tragedy of all the ages. Nor is there any doubt that Wagner whose head in the fifties was full of a music drama in which the Saviour should be loved with an earthly and passionate love by Mary Magdalene, wrote the music of this scene then or afterward as though his Parsifal and Kundry were in very truth those characters.

Liszt's "Faust" Symphony has not been played so frequently at these concerts that the music suffers from familiarity. When the work was first performed in this country, at New York in 1863, it was dismissed with scanty attention by the Tribune reviewer, not because the concert was in war time, for the same reviewer wrote long notices of the first performances in the city of Verdi's "Aroldo" and Gluck's "Orpheus," with Vestvali as the chief singer. No, the reviewer dismissed the "Faust" contemptuously and had something to say about the chirping of birds and the grunting of swine.

But what has not been written about this music? Liszt's stanchest admirers differ as to his intentions. One commentator says that the composer abstained rigorously from any musical allusion to a particular scene or episode of the drama. Another finds several episodes, as though the music were a row of pictures. Another names the motives in the first movement Doubt, Longing, Love, Pride, etc. Still another prefers to believe that Liszt presents his symphony as though it were in a bottle neatly labelled "Extract of 'Faust.'"

Now Liszt himself refused to give even a short motto to any one of the movements; the titles, "Faust," "Gretchen," "Mephistopheles," were enough, he thought, and so they are. His music may be psychological, as some of his partisans insist, but surely it is better that the hearers should be left to their own psychological ingenuity in listening and determining. It is enough to be reminded by the music of Faust's conviction of the emptiness of art, of his doubts and questionings, of the conflict in his breast between rebellious and meditative feelings; of the touching simplicity, purity and passion of Gretchen; and as for Mephistopheles, he is the mocking spirit that denies, not an amusing pantomime devil, not an affable person who chucks Martha under the chin and uses the latest electrical device concealed in a flower bed to aid Faust in his awkward task of overcoming Gretchen's innocence.

The question, then, is this: Does the music impress, charm, move, thrill? Even if for the most part it should excite a feeling of repulsion, it would have a positive quality.

Liszt is slowly coming into his own kingdom as an acknowledged ruler. Long overshadowed by Wagner, who owed much to him, musically as in other ways, he was looked on chiefly as a piano virtuoso who had written much for his instrument. As the years go by he is more and more understood as a composer who created forms and moods. There are some who still object to this symphony because, forsooth, there is "little or no development." Thus they prove that they do not see any salvation for Faust, Gretchen and Liszt outside the strict sonata form. They are no doubt estimable persons in family life and social relations; they would serve with dignity as pallbearers, and would no doubt be impressive on a platform seated near the presiding officer and the orator of the evening; but they are unwholesome companions in the orgies of the Muses, nor would any person sensitive to impressions of art seek them out to crush a cup of two with them.

The performance last night had been carefully studied and prepared, and in spite of one or two trifling slips—even trifling slips are rare at these concerts—it was generally effective and often eloquent.

Surely there can be no dispute over the beauty of the "Gretchen" movement. This is, indeed, the music for Gretchen. As Mr. Newman once said, Gounod's music, charming as it is, is not peculiarly characteristic of Faust and Marguerite; it is for any Edwin and Angelina. Marguerite as depicted by Berlioz is more picturesque, more mediaeval than the Gretchen of Liszt, and yet it is hardly fair to compare the vocal-orchestral with the purely orchestral. Liszt never was more emotionally sincere and poignantly emotional than in this movement, and the apparition of Gretchen in the "Mephistopheles" movement is a fine feat of imaginative expression.

Yet it must be confessed that although Mr. Gericke succeeded in giving a convincing continuity of thought to the "Faust" movement, there are exasperating and barren stretches and futile repetitions of ideas. Faust is at times a bore. Probably the philosopher himself was one. The two chief themes are happily imagined, and the Love Theme is a haunting one, but the grandiose motive is inherently cheap and Liszt, when the endeavors to be grandiose, falls easily into circus pomp.

It matters not whether Liszt borrowed his idea of Mephistopheles parodying and mocking the themes of Faust from Berlioz's finale of the Fantastic Symphony. His task was a greater one in strict parody, and he performed it with much cleverness. The final chorus, however, is needed for the full effect. Mephistopheles does not have the least word in this world or the next, and the mystical chorus restores the balance and completes the work in all its fulness. The symphony should be heard at closer intervals of time. Mr. Scheel conducted it here two years ago at a Richard Strauss concert, but he puttered in detail and much of the first movement sounded worse than it really is.

Mr. Ben Davies is well known to the Symphony audience. He sang at one of these concerts for the first time 10 years ago this month. Inasmuch as he sings with unfailing good nature, in a breezy, manly way, with infinite gusto, the people hear him gladly. He reminds us, however, of Charles Incledon as described by Hazlitt: "He is a true old English singer, and there is nobody who goes through a drinking song, a hunting song, or a sailor's song like him. He makes a very loud and agreeable noise without any meaning."

APR 8 - 1906

Musikalische Angelegenheiten.

Der verflossene Konzertwinter.

Wohl steht uns noch eine Anzahl von Konzerten bevor, und manche davon werden garnicht unwichtig sein, aber die musikalische Hauptarbeit des Winters 1905—1906 ist, soweit New York in Betracht kommt, geschehen. Was jetzt noch kommt, wird an der Physiognomie der Saison nichts mehr ändern können. Wer aber stets mit dabei gewesen ist, hat sicherlich keinen Grund gehabt, sich über ein Zuwenig zu beklagen: er wird die Erinnerung an manches genußreiche Konzert mit in den musikarmen Sommer zu nehmen trachten, und die weniger erfreulichen Stunden, die er in den verschiedenen Konzertsälen hat absitzen müssen, wird er zu vergessen sich bemühen.

Faßt man das Dargebotene zusammen, so ergiebt sich eine Zunahme von Orchester- und Kammermusik-Konzerten, und eine, wenn auch nur geringe Abnahme von Einzelkonzerten, sogenannten Recitals. Das ist an und für sich gewiß ein recht erfreuliches Faktum, denn es sollte sich daraus folgern lassen, daß sich unser Publikum mehr den ernsteren musikalischen Aufgaben zuwendet, und dem Personenkultus geringeres Interesse entgegenbringt. Aber eine solche Schlußfolgerung wäre nur dann zutreffend, wenn Angebot und Nachfrage sich bei diesen Konzerten deckten, und wenn jene Orchester- und Kammermusik-Konzerte frei von Personenkultus wären. Wer der Sache nun auf den Grund geht, wird finden, daß weder das Eine noch das Andere der Fall war, und daher mag es wohlgethan sein, unserem Publikum nicht so ohne Weiteres zu seinem musikalischen Fortschritt zu gratuliren.

Ob Angebot und Nachfrage bei unseren Konzerten in einem gesunden Verhältnis zu einander stehen, läßt sich nach dem bloßen Augenschein nicht beurtheilen. Wie oft schien Carnegie Hall ausverkauft zu sein, wenn es in Wirklichkeit nur ausverschenkt war! Orchesterkonzerte haben in jenem Saale stattgefunden, die weit über tausend Dollars Unkosten verursachten, während an der Kasse weniger als ein paar hundert Dollars eingingen. Es ist unerquicklich, bei Künstlerangelegenheiten stets deren finanzielle Einträglichkeit zu erörtern, und es ist unstreitig wahr, daß die besten musikalischen Darbietungen durchaus nicht immer das zahlreiche Publikum heranziehen. Aber in einer Zeit und in einem Lande, wo das Geld als universaler Werthmesser angesehen wird, läßt sich eine darartige Erörterung garnicht zurückweisen. Was umsonst dargeboten wird, mag an sich noch so werthvoll sein, es verliert dennoch an allgemeiner Werthschätzung. Und das ist so ziemlich das Schlimmste, was Kunstleistungen passiren kann. —

Von den Instituten, die uns New Yorker mit Orchestermusik versorgen, scheint nur ein einziges ohne Subvention bestehen zu können, und das ist kein New Yorker Institut: das Bostoner Symphonieorchester. Ob Mayor Higginson am Schluß des Rechnungsjahres doch noch drauf zu zahlen hat, mag dahingestellt bleiben, — wenn er es thun muß, hängt er's wenigstens nicht an die große Glocke. Sicher ist, daß die New Yorker Konzerte des Bostoner Orchesters kein Defizit verursachen. Und das ist um so höher anzuschlagen, als der bisherige Dirigent dieses Orchesters, Wilhelm Gericke, gewiß keine persönliche Zugkraft ausübte. Man geht zu diesen Konzerten thatsächlich der Orchestermusik wegen, und daher findet sich in Carnegie Hall niemals ein feinsinnigeres musikalisches Publikum ein, als wenn das Bostoner Symphonieorchester dort spielt. Das sollte allen Denen die Augen öffnen, die da meinen, ein Aufsehen erregender Dirigent ist die Hauptsache, das Instrument, auf dem er spiele, das Orchester, komme erst in zweiter Linie in Betracht.

Die Existenz sämmtlicher New Yorker Orchester aber hängt von der Generosität einiger reicher Mitbürger und Mitbürgerinnen ab, die ihren Wohlthätigkeitssinn nach der musikalischen Seite hin zu bethätigen wünschen. Das Philharmonische Orchester hatte Jahrzehnte lang seinen Stolz darin gefunden, daß es finanziell durchaus auf eigenen Füßen stand. Als die Mitglieder vor drei Jahren einsahen, daß ihre orchestralen Leistungen allein nicht mehr die erforderliche Anziehungskraft ausübten, verfielen sie auf die kostspielige Importation europäischer Gastdirigenten, und nahmen die Unterstützung einiger Mäcene an. Als Uebergangsstadium hätte man sich das Experiment immerhin gefallen lassen können. Jetzt heißt es aber, daß die Subvention eine noch viel beträchtlichere und regelmäßige werden soll. Nun, [illegible] jene beträchtlichen Summen zur Verbesserung, zur Reorganisation des Orchesters verwendet würden. Statt dessen will man sie dazu verwenden, einen Dirigenten auf drei Jahre für dieses Orchester zu gewinnen, der durch die sensationelle Aufführung einer einzigen Symphonie die Aufmerksamkeit auf sich gelenkt hat. —

Das New Yorker Symphonieorchester war insofern glücklicher daran, als die reichliche Subvention auch dazu verwendet wurde, das Orchester selbst quantitativ und qualitativ zu stärken. Gleichwohl scheint auch die Bedingung gestellt worden zu sein, für einen kleinen Theil der Saison einen europäischen Gastdirigenten zu verpflichten. Da aber die Wahl auf Felix Weingartner gefallen war, konnte man sich jene Bedingung schon gefallen lassen; sicherlich ist es allseitig bedauert worden, daß Weingartner seine ferneren Verpflichtungen aus Gesundheitsrücksichten hat rückgängig machen müssen. Ob statt seiner ein anderer Dirigent von drüben eingeladen werden soll, oder ob das Symphonieorchester mit Walter Damrosch als einzigen Dirigenten weiter bestehen wird, darüber ist vorläufig noch nichts bekannt gegeben worden.

Das russische Symphonieorchester, das Volkssymphonieorchester, u. s. w. sie alle sind auf milde Beiträge angewiesen, und wenn man nun auch anerkennt, daß die Popularisirung guter Orchestermusik ein Kulturfaktor ist und ohne solche milde Gaben kaum begonnen werden kann, so ist doch auch die Frage erlaubt, ob die aufgewendeten Gelder und Anstrengungen wirklich den angestrebten Segen stiften. Es ist sicher, daß für manche dieser Konzerte erst das Bedürfnis geschaffen werden muß, und daß sie vor der Hand kaum mehr bezwecken, als den persönlichen Ehrgeiz des Dirigenten zu befriedigen. Und wenn man nun gezwungen ist, fortgesetzt Freibillets in großen Quantitäten auszugeben, entwöhnt man eben das Publikum von der heilsamen Pflicht, für seine Kunstgenüsse zu bezahlen. Es ist wohlgethan, für gute Konzerte den Preis so niedrig wie möglich anzusetzen, freien Eintritt zu gestatten heißt aber: das Publikum demoralisiren.

* *

From.....

Address.....

Date.....

WHAT NIKISCH WANTS.

He Asks $50,000 a Year and a Life Insurance of $125,000 to Come Here.

(Special Cable.)
LONDON STANDARD TO BROOKLYN EAGLE.

Berlin, April 10—Professor Arthur Nikisch, the celebrated musician, has just resigned his position of director of the Leipzig Opera House. Negotiations are proceeding with a view of his becoming director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The sole difficulty is that Nikisch demands a salary equal to his aggregate possible earnings in Europe, namely $50,000, in addition to the purchase of a life insurance of $125,000. It is expected that Mr. Higginson's aid will enable Boston to acquire Nikisch's services.

GERMAN HERALD
NEW YORK CITY
APR 1 1 1906

*

$50,000 jährlich will Herr Nikisch für seine Dienste als Dirigent des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters haben — „excusez du peu"! Die Kunst geht heutzutage nach Kuchen und Braten . . . .

NEW YORK SUN
APR 10 1906

Nikisch May Be Boston Symphony Leader.

Special Cable Despatch to THE SUN.

BERLIN, April 9.—Arthur Nikisch, who has given up his place as conductor of the Leipsic Opera and intends to settle in the United States, is negotiating with the Symphony Orchestra of Boston.

[251]

Vermischtes.

Riesengehälter der Kapellmeister in Amerika. In Amerika erheben sich jetzt allmählich die schwere Bedenken gegen das Starwesen, mit den Kapellmeistern betrieben wird, laut werden lassen. Durch die Riesengehälter, die an gewisse Orchesterdirigenten gezahlt werden, wird das ganze Gedeihen der Orchestervereine untergraben. Der Kapellmeister Safonow, der nicht einmal einen besonderen Weltruhm genießt, ist als Leiter der New-Yorker Philharmonischen Konzerte mit einem Gehalt von 20.000 Dollar jährlich auf drei Jahre engagiert worden. Weingartner erhielt von dem New-Yorker Symphonischen Orchester für die Leitung von sechzehn Konzerten 12.000 Dollar. Ebenso haben die Kapellmeister Mengelberg aus Amsterdam, Fiedler aus Hamburg und Schuch aus Dresden für das Engagement in Amerika ganz außerordentliche Gehälter gefordert. Wie außerordentlich sich die Anforderungen der Kapellmeister in den letzten Jahren gesteigert haben, läßt sich bei dem eben erfolgten Rücktritt des verdienten Leiters der Bostoner Symphoniekonzerte, Wilhelm Gericke, erkennen, der dreizehn Jahre hindurch dieser vorzüglichen Musikvereinigung vorgestanden hat. Gericke erhielt 12.000 Dollar das Jahr, was für damalige Zeiten ein sehr anständiges Gehalt war. Sein Vorgänger war in der gleichen Stellung Nikisch gewesen, der heute auch für das Fünffache der Summe diese Stellung nicht mehr übernehmen würde. Die großen Orchestervereinigungen Amerikas, die beiden großen New-Yorker Vereine, die sich in der Vorführung berühmter Kapellmeister überbieten, die Vereine von Philadelphia, Chicago und Cincinnati werden fast nur durch die Spenden reicher Musikfreunde erhalten und es besteht die Gefahr, daß alle diese für die musikalische Kultur Amerikas so bedeutsamen Institute noch einmal durch die ungeheuren Honorare, die die großen Kapellmeister fordern und die die Vereinigungen bezahlen zu müssen glauben, dem Untergange nahegebracht werden. Diese trübselige Prophezeiung läßt sich zum wenigsten in der New-Yorker „Tribune" hören.

Rückseite beachten.

From N. Y. EV'G WORLD

Address

Date APR 11 1906

NIKISCH DEMANDS $50,000 AND PREMIUMS

BERLIN, April 11.—Money is the sole difficulty in the way of the Boston Symphony Orchestra securing the services of Prof. Arthur Nikisch as leader.

He demands a salary equal to his possible aggregate earnings in Europe, which he places at $50,000, and the purchase of insurance on his life to the amount of $125,000.

NEW YORK SUN

APR 11 1906

NIKISCH WANTS $50,000,

Also a Life Insurance Policy of $125,000, to Lead Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Special Cable Despatch to THE SUN.

BERLIN, April 10.—Money is the sole difficulty in the way of the Boston Symphony Orchestra securing the services of Prof. Arthur Nikisch as leader.

He demands a salary equal to his possible aggregate earnings in Europe, which he places at $50,000, and the purchase of insurance on his life to the amount of $125,000.

THE MORNING TELEGRAPH

NEW YORK CITY.

APR 11 1906

NIKISCH DEMANDS $50,000.

Wants Also $1255,000 Life Insurance to Lead Boston Orchestra.

(Special Cable to The Morning Telegraph.)

BERLIN, April 10.—Arthur Nikisch, who has been asked to accept the directorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has demanded a salary equal to the [illegible] of his possible earnings in [illegible], which is $50,000, and in addition [illegible] be insured for $125,000. [illegible] that Mr. Henry L. [illegible] will make [illegible]

From N. Y. STAATSZEITUNG

Address

Date APR 11 1906

Nikisch vorsichtig.

Er verlangt von den Bostonern $50,000 Salair und eine Lebensversicherung von $125,000.

Berlin, 11. April. Professor Arth. Nikisch, welcher unlängst als Direktor der Leipziger Oper zurücktrat, steht zur Zeit wegen Uebernahme des Bostoner Sym-

Dirigent Arthur Nikisch.

phonie-Orchesters in Unterhandlung. Die einzige Schwierigkeit, die noch zu überwinden ist, ist die Geldfrage. Nikisch verlangt ein Salär von $50,000, welches seinen Gesammteinkünften in Europa gleichkommen würde, und die Aufnahme einer Versicherungspolice auf sein Leben in Höhe von $125,000.

NEW YORK SUN

APR 12 1906

When ARTHUR NIKISCH demands $50,000 for his services as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for one year he shows a complete understanding of musical conditions in this country to-day. They have changed since he was here. Conductors, with or without a baton, did not then receive $20,000 for a season's work. They were content with half as much. So long as that sum has been promised to one foreign conductor, Herr NIKISCH has not overrated his value in the least. His demand has, at all events, the justification of his high place among European musicians and the great demand for his services abroad.

NEW YORK HERALD

APR 12 1906

"A Lie," Says Major Higginson.

[SPECIAL DESPATCH TO THE HERALD.]

BOSTON, Mass., Wednesday.—Major Henry L. Higginson, when asked to-night to verify the report that Professor Arthur Nikisch, of Berlin, is coming to America to become conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, said:—"It's all a lie from beginning to end." He declined to make further comment.

Professor Nikisch has recently resigned as conductor of the Leipzig Orchestra. From 1891 to 1896 he was conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and a cable report said that money was the only difficulty in the way of the Boston organization obtaining his services. The salary demanded by him was reported to be $50,000 and $125,000 insurance on his life.

[illegible]

[illegible] YORK CITY

APR 11 1906

NIKISCH ASKS BIG SALARY.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Will Secure Him If Money Can Be Raised.

Berlin, April 10.—Money is the sole difficulty in the way of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's securing the services of Professor Arthur Nikisch as leader.

He demands a salary equal to his possible aggregate earnings in Europe, which he places at $50,000, and the purchase of insurance on his life to the amount of $125,000. It is expected that Mr. Higginson will aid in securing [illegible]

Newspaper Cutting Bureau of the World

GERMAN [illegible]

From [illegible]

Address NEW YORK CITY

Date APR 10 1906

Arthur Nikisch nach Boston?

Berlin, 10. April. Arthur Nikisch hat bekanntlich seine Verbindung mit der Leipziger Oper als deren musikalischer Leiter aufgegeben, und gedenkt sich angeblich in den Vereinigten Staaten dauernd niederzulassen. Er steht in Unterhandlung mit der Leitung des Boston Symphonie-Orchesters.

From NEW YORK HERALD

Address

Date APR 12 1906

Arthur Nikisch, of Berlin, FOREARMED! must have heard something about the manner in which Boston treats its musicians, as he demands a life insurance policy of $125,000 before consenting to lead the Symphony Orchestra.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

STANDARD

From [illegible]

Address MONTREAL, CAN

Date APR 7 - 1906

Wilhelm Gericke will retire from the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of this season, and will return to Europe. Rumor has mentioned several names as his probable successor, notably Felix Weingartner, Vincent d'Indy, and Fritz Steinbach.

SUNDAY HERALD

Published Every Day in the Year.

VOL. CXIX., NO. 112.

SUNDAY, APRIL 22, 1906.

MISS SAMAROFF AT THE SYMPHONY

Pianiste, at Orchestra Concert, Plays with Coolness and Ease, but None the Less Irresistibly.

ILLNESS PREVENTS THE TRUMPET SOLO

Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration" Substituted—Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony on Programme.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Gericke conductor, gave its 22d concert last night in Symphony Hall. Mme. Olga Samaroff was the pianist. The programme was as follows:

Symphony in A major, "Italian"..Mendelssohn
Concerto in A minor for piano.....Grieg
Tone Poem, "Death and Transfiguration"..Strauss
Overture to "Euryanthe".....Weber

The spirit of the first movement of the "Italian" symphony is stimulating for a time and the finale is a plausibly brilliant piece for a virtuoso orchestra, but the second and third movements are fine examples of Mendelssohn at his worst. How smug this music is, how exasperatingly respectable, how nobbishly genteel! It is like the picture of Mendelssohn that Aubrey Beardsley drew for the last number of the Savoy. Hearing the two middle movements, you can see the irreproachable cravat, the precisely cut quill, the self-complacent air of the last of the great formalists.

There is another Mendelssohn, the composer of the "Hebrides" overture, of the overture to the "Midsummer Night's Dream" and of some of the music in the "Walpurgis Night," but this charming landscapist is not the man of the "Italian" symphony. The latter has the irritating self satisfaction, the mincing neatness of mediocrity. No wonder that he could not understand Hector Berlioz and considered him an extraordinary person. How could the man of polished talent comprehend the flaming genius? You might as well think of E. P. Roe enjoying the society of

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From [illegible]

Address

Date

Arthur Nikisch, of Berlin, must have heard something about the manner in which Boston treats its musicians, as he demands a life insurance policy of $125,000 before consenting to lead the Symphony Orchestra.

[illegible] Paper Cutting Bureau in the World

From [illegible]

Address NEW YORK CITY

Date APR 10 1906

Arthur Nikisch nach Boston?

Berlin, 10. April. Arthur Nikisch hat bekanntlich seine Verbindung mit der Leipziger Oper als deren musikalischer Leiter aufgegeben, und gedenkt sich angeblich in den Vereinigten Staaten dauernd niederzulassen. Er steht in Unterhandlung mit der Leitung des Boston Symphonie-Orchesters.

From NEW YORK HERALD

Address

Date APR 12 1906

Arthur Nikisch, of Berlin, FOREARMED! must have heard something about the manner in which Boston treats its musicians, as he demands a life insurance policy of $125,000 before consenting to lead the Symphony Orchestra.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

STANDARD

From [illegible]

Address MONTREAL, CAN

Date APR 7 - 1906

Wilhelm Gericke will retire from the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of this season, and will return to Europe. Rumor has mentioned several names as his probable successor, notably Felix Weingartner, Vincent d'Indy, and Fritz Steinbach.

SUNDAY HERALD

Published Every Day in the Year.

VOL. CXIX., NO. 112.

SUNDAY, APRIL 22, 1906.

MISS SAMAROFF AT THE SYMPHONY

Pianiste, at Orchestra Concert, Plays with Coolness and Ease, but None the Less Irresistibly.

ILLNESS PREVENTS THE TRUMPET SOLO

Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration" Substituted—Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony on Programme.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Gericke conductor, gave its 22d concert last night in Symphony Hall. Mme. Olga Samaroff was the pianist. The programme was as follows:

Symphony in A major, "Italian"..Mendelssohn
Concerto in A minor for piano.....Grieg
Tone Poem, "Death and Transfiguration"..Strauss
Overture to "Euryanthe".....Weber

The spirit of the first movement of the "Italian" symphony is stimulating for a time and the finale is a plausibly brilliant piece for a virtuoso orchestra, but the second and third movements are fine examples of Mendelssohn at his worst. How smug this music is, how exasperatingly respectable, how nobbishly genteel! It is like the picture of Mendelssohn that Aubrey Beardsley drew for the last number of the Savoy. Hearing the two middle movements, you can see the irreproachable cravat, the precisely cut quill, the self-complacent air of the last of the great formalists.

There is another Mendelssohn, the composer of the "Hebrides" overture, of the overture to the "Midsummer Night's Dream" and of some of the music in the "Walpurgis Night," but this charming landscapist is not the man of the "Italian" symphony. The latter has the irritating self satisfaction, the mincing neatness of mediocrity. No wonder that he could not understand Hector Berlioz and considered him an extraordinary person. How could the man of polished talent comprehend the flaming genius? You might as well think of E. P. Roe enjoying the society of

[illegible] Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From [illegible]

Address

Date

Arthur Nikisch, of Berlin, must have heard something about the manner in which Boston treats its musicians, as he demands a life insurance policy of $125,000 before consenting to lead the Symphony Orchestra.

[illegible] Paper Cutting Bureau in the World

From [illegible]

Address NEW YORK CITY

Date APR 10 1906

Arthur Nikisch nach Boston?

Berlin, 10. April. Arthur Nikisch hat bekanntlich seine Verbindung mit der Leipziger Oper als deren musikalischer Leiter aufgegeben, und gedenkt sich angeblich in den Vereinigten Staaten dauernd niederzulassen. Er steht in Unterhandlung mit der Leitung des Boston Symphonie-Orchesters.

From NEW YORK HERALD

Address

Date APR 12 1906

Arthur Nikisch, of Berlin, FOREARMED! must have heard something about the manner in which Boston treats its musicians, as he demands a life insurance policy of $125,000 before consenting to lead the Symphony Orchestra.

[illegible] Paper Cutting Bureau in the World

STANDARD

From [illegible]

Address MONTREAL, CAN

Date APR 7 - 1906

Wilhelm Gericke will retire from the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of this season, and will return to Europe. Rumor has mentioned several names as his probable successor, notably Felix Weingartner, Vincent d'Indy, and Fritz Steinbach.

SUNDAY HERALD

Published Every Day in the Year.

VOL. CXIX., NO. 112.

SUNDAY, APRIL 22, 1906.

MISS SAMAROFF AT THE SYMPHONY

Pianiste, at Orchestra Concert, Plays with Coolness and Ease, but None the Less Irresistibly.

ILLNESS PREVENTS THE TRUMPET SOLO

Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration" Substituted—Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony on Programme.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Gericke conductor, gave its 22d concert last night in Symphony Hall. Mme. Olga Samaroff was the pianist. The programme was as follows:

Symphony in A major, "Italian"..Mendelssohn
Concerto in A minor for piano.....Grieg
Tone Poem, "Death and Transfiguration"..Strauss
Overture to "Euryanthe".....Weber

The spirit of the first movement of the "Italian" symphony is stimulating for a time and the finale is a plausibly brilliant piece for a virtuoso orchestra, but the second and third movements are fine examples of Mendelssohn at his worst. How smug this music is, how exasperatingly respectable, how nobbishly genteel! It is like the picture of Mendelssohn that Aubrey Beardsley drew for the last number of the Savoy. Hearing the two middle movements, you can see the irreproachable cravat, the precisely cut quill, the self-complacent air of the last of the great formalists.

There is another Mendelssohn, the composer of the "Hebrides" overture, of the overture to the "Midsummer Night's Dream" and of some of the music in the "Walpurgis Night," but this charming landscapist is not the man of the "Italian" symphony. The latter has the irritating self satisfaction, the mincing neatness of mediocrity. No wonder that he could not understand Hector Berlioz and considered him an extraordinary person. How could the man of polished talent comprehend the flaming genius? You might as well think of E. P. Roe enjoying the society of

[illegible]

[illegible]

[illegible]

Ausschnitt aus Salzburger Chronik, Salzburg
22. 3. 1906
vom:

Rückseite beachten.

Vermischtes.

Riesengehälter der Kapellmeister in Amerika. In Amerika erheben sich jetzt allmählich Stimmen, die schwere Bedenken gegen das Starwesen, das mit den Kapellmeistern betrieben wird, laut werden lassen. Durch die Riesengehälter, die an gewisse Orchesterdirigenten gezahlt werden, wird das ganze Gedeihen der Orchestervereine untergraben. Der Kapellmeister Safonow, der nicht einmal einen besonderen Weltruhm genießt, ist als Leiter der New-Yorker Philharmonischen Konzerte mit einem Gehalt von 20.000 Dollar jährlich auf drei Jahre engagiert worden. Weingartner erhielt von dem New-Yorker Symphonischen Orchester für die Leitung von sechzehn Konzerten 12.000 Dollar. Ebenso haben die Kapellmeister Mengelberg aus Amsterdam, Fiedler aus Hamburg und Schuch aus Dresden für das Engagement in Amerika ganz außerordentliche Gehälter gefordert. Wie außerordentlich sich die Anforderungen der Kapellmeister in den letzten Jahren gesteigert haben, läßt sich bei dem eben erfolgten Rücktritt des verdienten Leiters der Bostoner Symphoniekonzerte, Wilhelm Gericke, erkennen, der dreizehn Jahre hindurch dieser vorzüglichen Musikvereinigung vorgestanden hat. Gericke erhielt 12.000 Dollar das Jahr, was für damalige Zeiten ein sehr anständiges Gehalt war. Sein Vorgänger war in der gleichen Stellung Nikisch gewesen, der heute auch für das Fünffache der Summe diese Stellung nicht mehr übernehmen würde. Die großen Orchestervereinigungen Amerikas, die beiden großen New-Yorker Vereine, die sich in der Vorführung berühmter Kapellmeister überboten, die Vereine von Philadelphia, Chicago und Cincinnati werden fast nur durch die Spenden reicher Musikfreunde erhalten und es besteht die Gefahr, daß alle diese für die musikalische Kultur Amerikas so bedeutsamen Institute noch einmal durch die ungeheuren Honorare, die die großen Kapellmeister fordern und die die Vereinigungen bezahlen zu müssen glauben, dem Untergange nahegebracht werden. Diese trübselige Prophezeiung läßt sich zum wenigsten in der New-Yorker „Tribune" hören.

From N. Y. EV'G STAATSZEIT
Address
Date APR 11 190

Nikisch vorsichtig.

Er verlangt von den Bostonern $50,000 Salair und eine Lebensversicherung von $125,000.

Berlin, 11. April. Professor Arth. Nikisch, welcher unlängst als Direktor der Leipziger Oper zurücktrat, steht zur Zeit wegen Uebernahme des Bostoner Sym-

Dirigent Arthur Nikisch.

phonie-Orchesters in Unterhandlung. Die einzige Schwierigkeit, die noch zu überwinden ist, ist die Geldfrage. Nikisch verlangt ein Salär von $50,000, welches seinen Gesammteinkünften in Europa gleichkommen würde, und die Aufnahme einer Versicherungspolice auf sein Leben in Höhe von $125,000.

From N. Y. EV'G WORLD
Address
Date APR 11 19

NIKISCH DEMANDS $50,000 AND PREMIUMS

BERLIN, April 11.—Money is the sole difficulty in the way of the Boston Symphony Orchestra securing the services of Prof. Arthur Nikisch as leader.

He demands a salary equal to his possible aggregate earnings in Europe, which he places at $50,000, and the purchase of insurance on his life to the amount of $125,000.

NEW YORK SUN
APR 11 190

NIKISCH WANTS $50,000,

Also a Life Insurance Policy of $125,000, to Lead Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Special Cable Despatch to THE SUN.

BERLIN, April 10.—Money is the sole difficulty in the way of the Boston Symphony Orchestra securing the services of Prof. Arthur Nikisch as leader.

He demands a salary equal to his possible aggregate earnings in Europe, which he places at $50,000, and the purchase of insurance on his life to the amount of $125,000.

THE MORNING TELEGRAPH
NEW YORK CITY.
APR 11 190

NIKISCH DEMANDS $50,000.

Wants Also $1255,000 Life Insurance to Lead Boston Orchestra.

(Special Cable to The Morning Telegraph.)

BERLIN, April 10.—Arthur Nikisch who has been asked to accept the directorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has demanded a salary equal to the aggregate of his possible earnings in Europe, that is $50,000, and in addition that his life be insured for $125,000.

It is expected here that Mr. Henry L. Higginson will be able to arrange the difficulty.

From N. Y. EVG. STAATSZEITG
Address
Date APR 11 190

Nikisch vorsichtig.

Er verlangt von den Bostonern $50,000 Salair und eine Lebensversicherung von $125,000.

Berlin, 11. April. Professor Arth. Nikisch, welcher unlängst als Direktor der Leipziger Oper zurücktrat, steht zur Zeit wegen Uebernahme des Bostoner Sym-

Dirigent Arthur Nikisch.

phonie-Orchesters in Unterhandlung. Die einzige Schwierigkeit, die noch zu überwinden ist, ist die Geldfrage. Nikisch verlangt ein Salär von $50,000, welches seinen Gesammteinkünften in Europa gleichkommen würde, und die Aufnahme einer Versicherungspolice auf sein Leben in Höhe von $125,000.

---

m Iress NEW YORK SUN
e APR 12 190

When ARTHUR NIKISCH demands $50,000 for his services as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for one year he shows a complete understanding of musical conditions in this country to-day. They have changed since he was here. Conductors, with or without a baton, did not then receive $20,000 for a season's work. They were content with half as much. So long as that sum has been promised to one foreign conductor, Herr NIKISCH has not overrated his value in the least. His demand has, at all events, the justification of his high place among European musicians and the great demand for his services abroad.

NEW YORK HERALD

"A Lie," Says Major Higginson.

[SPECIAL DESPATCH TO THE HERALD.]

BOSTON, Mass., Wednesday.—Major Henry L. Higginson, when asked to-night to verify the report that Professor Arthur Nikisch, of Berlin, is coming to America to become conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, said:—"It's all a lie from beginning to end." He declined to make further comment.

Professor Nikisch has recently resigned as conductor of the Leipzig Orchestra. From 1891 to 1896 he was conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and a cable report said that money was the only difficulty in the way of the Boston organization obtaining his services. The salary demanded by him was reported to be $50,000 and $125,000 insurance on his life.

---

ess
APR 11 190

NIKISCH ASKS BIG SALARY.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Will Secure Him If Money Can Be Raised.

Berlin, April 10.—Money is the sole difficulty in the way of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's securing the services of Professor Arthur Nikisch as leader.

He demands a salary equal to his possible aggregate earnings in Europe, which he places at $50,000, and the purchase of insurance on his life to the amount of $125,000. It is expected that Mr. Higginson will aid in securing him.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau World
m GERMAN HERALD
Iress NEW YORK CITY
APR 10 190

Arthur Nikisch nach Boston?

Berlin, 10. April. Arthur Nikisch hat bekanntlich seine Verbindung mit der Leipziger Oper als deren musikalischer Leiter aufgegeben, und gedenkt sich angeblich in den Vereinigten Staaten dauernd niederzulassen. Er steht in Unterhandlung mit der Leitung des Boston Symphonie-Orchesters.

---

m NEW YORK HERAL
ress
e

FOREARMED! Arthur Nikisch, of Berlin, must have heard something about the manner in which Boston treats its musicians, as he demands a life insurance policy of $125,000 before consenting to lead the Symphony Orchestra.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
MONTREAL CAN
APR 7 190

Wilhelm Gericke will retire from the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of this season, and will return to Europe. Rumor has mentioned several names as his probable successor, notably Felix Weingartner, Vincent d'Indy, and Fritz Steinbach.

SUNDAY HERALD

Published Every Day in the Year.
VOL. CXIX., NO. 112.

SUNDAY, APRIL 22, 1906.

MISS SAMAROFF AT THE SYMPHONY

Pianiste, at Orchestra Concert, Plays with Coolness and Ease, but None the Less Irresistibly.

ILLNESS PREVENTS THE TRUMPET SOLO

Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration" Substituted—Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony on Programme.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Gericke conductor, gave its 23d concert last night in Symphony Hall. Mme. Olga Samaroff was the pianist. The programme was as follows:

Symphony in A major, "Italian"..Mendelssohn
Concerto in A minor for piano.....Grieg
Tone Poem, "Death and Transfiguration"..Strauss
Overture to "Euryanthe".....Weber

The spirit of the first movement of the "Italian" symphony is stimulating for a time and the finale is a plausibly brilliant piece for a virtuoso orchestra, but the second and third movements are fine examples of Mendelssohn at his worst. How smug this music is, how exasperatingly respectable, how nobbishly genteel! It is like the picture of Mendelssohn that Aubrey Beardsley drew for the last number of the Savoy. Hearing the two middle movements, you can see the irreproachable cravat, the precisely cut quill, the self-complacent air of the last of the great formalists.

There is another Mendelssohn, the composer of the "Hebrides" overture, of the overture to the "Midsummer Night's Dream" and of some of the music in the "Walpurgis Night," but this charming landscapist is not the man of the "Italian" symphony. The latter has the irritating self satisfaction, the mincing neatness of mediocrity. No wonder that he could not understand Hector Berlioz and considered him an extraordinary person. How could the man of polished talent comprehend the flaming genius? You might as well think of E. P. Roe enjoying the society of Henry Fielding.

gave admirable interpretation [illegible] widely dissimilar symphony of [illegible]sohn and the tone-poem of Strauss. "Thus Spake Zarathustra" had been announced for performance, but Mr. Kloepfel, the excellent first trumpeter, is sick and no other trumpeter was willing to play the difficult passage that is famous both for its effect and a stumbling block. Therefore, "Death and Transfiguration" was substituted, although it had already been performed this season. To us it is one of the composer's greatest compositions; it is surely the noblest.

Unlike "Zarathustra," "Heldenleben" and "Don Quixote," it may stand as absolute music; for in "Zarathustra" the composer gives to various sections headings from Nietzsche's book; and the other tone-poems just named are largely dependent on a programme for full appreciation; but in "Death and Transfiguration" the title is enough. Let the commentators make their ingenious discoveries; let Mr. William Mauke note a nice distinction between fever-theme No. 1 and fever-theme No. 2—a typhoid fever chart might possibly be helpful, unless a still more acute glossarist should discover that Strauss' sick man died of cancer of the liver. "Death and Transfiguration"—are not these two words a sufficient clew to even the hearer of slight imagination?

We remember Mr. MacDowell saying after he heard one of Strauss' more radical compositions for the first time: "This is undoubtedly art, and it is great and overwhelming art; but whether it is music, is another question. Perhaps it is a new form of art." He would not have queried today the musical art of "Death and Transfiguration," but an admirer of the modern school might with good reason question the high artistry of Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony. Strauss succeeded in his endeavor, but how much of Italy is in Mendelssohn's music? Compare the andante of the symphony with the slow movement "On the Heights" in Charpentier's "Impressions of Italy" and mark the difference in poetic thought and expression.

In the finale Mendelssohn put into music what he had experienced in the Corso in Carnival times. Some young ladies threw confetti at him. A young English woman was equally rude. Mendelssohn wrote that he "became desperate" and he, too, flung confetti. "My blue coat was soon as white as that of a miller." Remember that this was all highly proper. The young ladies were of good families and Mendelssohn had met them at select balls and receptions. His carnival music is most discreetly gay. He brushed his coat before he sat down to compose, brushed it and no doubt sponged it.

How inconsequential such music seems when a composition of true dramatic force, of imaginative power follows it. There are some who object to Strauss' subject. Like the poisoned man in Webster's "White Devil" they wish no one to mention death to them; the terrible word, death. They are reminded of unpleasant things by this music. The grand, consoling ending brings to them no peace. They cannot lift their eyes from the sick bed to see the flight of the delivered soul. But there is nothing mean, nothing fearful in this tone-poem of Strauss. There is the struggle with death; and in this struggle the poorest clown is as heroic a figure as Pope or Emperor. There is no cross or squalid realism. The sick chamber is the world; the fight of the lone and disappointed sufferer assumes epic proportions. Humanity, worn out, defeated, struggles with the last foe, and conquered, rises victor.

With the noble hymn of the transfiguration the concert should have closed. It would have been well for the hearer to go out into the night with such music filling his soul.

Mme. Samaroff played for the first time at these concerts, and gave an engrossing and impressive performance of the concerto by Grieg. There were moments in the first movement when she accentuated too sharply in the reading of a long phrase, accentuated in a temporal rather than rhetorical manner, and thus checked the melodic flow. This trick, for trick it is, with many pianists of the ultra-modern technic, was not so apparent toward the end of the movement, and with the second it disappeared. Mme. Samaroff played with full appreciation of the contrasting, jostling moods of the composer. She was romantic, fiery, brilliant, capricious, poetic. She played with a cool head, without futile motions, without any unnecessary nervous or physical strain; she worked her spell without apparent endeavor, but her spell was irresistible.

MUSIC NOTES

[252]

HERALD
BALTIMORE, M
MAY 25 1906

DR. MUCK TO LEAD

Court Conductor From Berlin for Boston Orchestra.

The Musical Courier of New York is authority for the statement that Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Berlin Opera, will be the next leader of the Boston Orchestra. Mr. M. L. Higginson, of Boston, whose close relations to the orchestra are well known, according to news from Boston, says he knows nothing about the matter. Mr. Charles A. Ellis, the manager of the Boston Orchestra, has been visiting the more important cities on the continent, including Munich and Vienna, and is now in Berlin. He is expected to return to Boston in about two weeks. It is presumed that Mr. Ellis has seen Nikisch, Mottl and other well known leaders. Nikisch wanted a prohibitive salary. Wassili Safonoff has recently been engaged as conductor for three years of the New York Philharmonic Society at a salary of $20,000 a year, the highest salary ever paid in America to a conductor.

Schneevoigt and Raabe, of the Kaim Orchestra, Munich, and Fiedler, of Hamburg, have been under discussion for the Boston Orchestra, but the latest news is that Dr. Muck has been chosen.

Dr. Muck was born at Darmstadt on October 22, 1859. His father, Dr. J. Muck, was, it is said, a conductor. The son studied music with Kissner at Wuerzburg and at the Leipzig Conservatory, but he also attended diligently the university courses at Leipzig and at Heidelberg.

In 1880 he received the degree of Ph. D. in Leipzig, and in that year he made his debut at the Gewandhaus as a pianist. He was engaged at the opera house of Zurich as chorus director, but the conductor suddenly fell sick and Muck was obliged to take his place. He then showed so much ability that he determined to follow the career of an opera conductor, and as such he won fame at Salzburg, Bruenn, Graz, and in 1886 as first conductor at Prague. He had been the conductor of Neumann's traveling company and showed his talent in Berlin before he was called to that city as court conductor of the opera, a position that he now holds with Richard Strauss. He has also conducted symphony concerts of the Royal Orchestra in Berlin, and has been successful as a "guest conductor" in St. Petersburg, Madrid, London, Vienna and other cities. He has been praised for "the phenomenal accuracy and versatility of his knowledge and his noble and objective artistry."

The First Established and Most Compre
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the MAIL EMPIRE
From TORONTO, ONT.
Address
JUN 2-1
Date

MUSIC.

The rumored appointment of Dr. Karl Muck to the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as successor to Wilhelm Gericke, will awaken much interest and speculation. As his name has not been even hinted at among those mentioned as probabilities in this connection, all the more curiosity will be aroused by this unexpected announcement, for though one of the most prominent conductors in Europe to-day, he has never yet given the musical public of America an opportunity to become familiar with his work. He was born in Darmstadt on October 22, 1859. With characteristic German ambition for thorough intellectual equipment he took a course in philosophy at the Heidelberg and Leipsic Universities, obtaining the degree of Doctor of Philosophy. For three years he studied at the Leipsic Conservatory and then received an appointment as conductor of the opera at Zurich. From there he went to Salzburg in 1881, thence to Brunn the following year, and in 1884 to Graz, where he became conductor of the Styrian Musical Society. In 1886 he was appointed conductor of the German Opera in Prague, where he remained till 1892, when he accepted a similar position at the Berlin Royal Opera. Ever since then he has steadily and unobtrusively made an enviable reputation for himself as a conductor of opera.

There can be no doubt of his adequate equipment for the position to which rumor has assigned him. Possessing a comprehensive knowledge of the resources of the orchestra, he exhibits a rare degree of skill and judgment in employing them to the highest artistic advantage. All his work is notable for its large dimensions and convincing power. While a man of broad musicianship and versatile style, he occupies a unique position as an interpreter of Richard Wagner's works, which he renders with imposing authority. For this reason his services as a Wagnerian conductor are much in demand and he is regularly engaged for the Bayreuth festivals. Personally, he is slight of stature, with a sharp cut profile of much individuality and keen black eyes. A man of broad culture and popular with his fellows, he enjoys special favor with the Kaiser, whose intervention prevented a prominent American orchestra from securing him a year or so ago.

SUN.
BALTIMORE, MD.
MAY 28 1906

FOR BOSTON SYMPHONY

Dr. Carl Muck, The New Conductor, A Man Of Strong Personality.

The announcement has been made that Dr. Carl Muck, chief musical director of the Royal Opera in Berlin, will fill the post left vacant by the resignation of Mr. Gericke as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Dr. Muck, who is now in the prime of life, is recognized as one of the greatest conductors in the world. While perhaps not possessing so much of the divine fire and temperament as Weingartner or Safonoff, he is still a conductor of great force and magnetism, who will certainly impress the great orchestra with his strong personality.

The conductor who wields the baton over this wonderful body of players should be something more than a drillmaster, something more than a well-educated musician. He should be a man of genius, of temperament, of enthusiasm, qualities that no conservatory of music can bestow with its diploma, if we would see the Boston Symphony attain to the loftiest ideals of orchestral music. Such conductors are, indeed, rare. Arthur Nikisch is one, and the Boston Symphony under his baton was a very different orchestra from that we have been accustomed to of late years. Perhaps under Dr. Muck this reserved, perfectly drilled body of musicians will become a joyous, throbbing thing of life.

EDWIN LITCHFIELD TURNBULL.

POST.
CHICAGO, ILL.
JUN 2-1906

It is rumored that Dr. Karl Muck has been appointed conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra as a successor to Wilhelm Gericke. Dr. Muck was born in Darmstadt in 1859. He completed a thorough education, taking the degree of doctor of philosophy after courses at Heidelberg and Leipzig. Studying at the Leipzig Conservatory he received an appointment as conductor of opera at Zurich, and from there went to Salzberg, Bruna, Graz, Prague and finally to Berlin in 1892, where he has been director of the Berlin Royal Opera.

LOVING CUP AND SALVER PRESENTED WILHELM GERICKE.

The Symphony concert last evening was one of special significance, inasmuch as it not only marked the completion of the years of existence of the orchestra since its foundation in 1881, but it also was the farewell appearance of Director Wilhelm Gericke, who has been identified with the orchestra during more than half of its existence. There was no soloist at the concert last evening, and the programme was as follows:

"The Roman Carnival".....Berlioz
Adagio and Gavotte.....Bach
(Arranged for strings by Bachrich.)
Fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet".....
.....Tschaikowsky
Symphony No. 5.....Beethoven

Each of these numbers were more or less familiar to the audience, and at this time extended comment is unnecessary. The "Roman Carnival" overture and the Symphony of Bach were received with great applause, as was also the "Romeo and Juliet" fantasia by Tschaikowsky, a work that grows in strength with each successive hearing. Mr. Gericke received an enthusiastic ovation upon his appearance, and also after each number of the programme. But the event of the evening came at the close of the concert. At the close of the performance of the Beethoven symphony, Mr. Henry M. Rogers ascended upon the platform and presented Mr. Gericke with a beautiful vase and salver.

Mr. Gericke, although evidently taken by surprise, nevertheless made a brief speech of acceptance which was said in a low tone of voice. In substance he thanked the donors for their munificent gift, and said that the success of his years as conductor was primarily owing to Mr. Higginson and then to the orchestra. The speech, though brief, was finely expressed and was received with enthusiasm.

The vase and salver presented to Mr. Gericke are the work of Mr. Arthur J. Gardner, Mass., from drawings by Mr. C. Howard Walker.

The vase, which is 10¼ inches in height, is of simple form with a delicate scroll ornamentation upon the shoulder of the vase, in the centre of which is the small figure of a winged Love with a baton conducting. Around the neck of the vase in fine gold letters is the following inscription: "To Wilhelm Gericke in Grateful Appreciation from Friends and Admirers, Boston, April 28, 1906."

The salver has as a border a wave pattern of laurel branches with the berries, in gold, upon the lines of the musical staff.

NO CONVENTION OF TEACHERS

National Educational Association Calls This Year's Meet Off

Dr. A. E. Winship of this city, editor of the Journal of Education, yesterday received a telegram from Chicago, bearing the information that the executive committee of the National Educational Association had decided not to hold an convention this year.

It had been arranged to meet in San Francisco during the coming summer, but the earthquake and conflagration in the California metropolis made such a proposition futile. Mayor Fitzgerald of the city endeavored to secure this year's convention in Boston, and his efforts were seconded by numerous public spirited citizens, to whom the news of this action by the executive committee will be a disappointment.

Eugenie's Fortune for Church

PARIS, April 28.—The Eclair today publishes a despatch from Milan to the effect that the vicar-general of the Pope has induced ex-Empress Eugenie to give her whole fortune at the disposal of the church. The former Empress' wealth is estimated at $30,000,000.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
EMOOKLE CHRONICLE
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
MAY 27 1906

It is announced that Dr. Carl Muck, conductor of the Royal Opera Company of Berlin, has been engaged as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to succeed Mr. Gericke. Dr. Muck, it should be explained, directs with an old-fashioned baton, not with a rake; but he has a reputation for getting there just the same.

REVUE
NEW YORK CITY
JUN 3-1906

Dr. Muck nach Boston.

Dirigent der Berliner Oper erhält vom Kaiser einen Jahresurlaub bewilligt.

Boston, 2. Juni. Major Henry L. Higginson empfing heute von Charles A. Ellison, dem Geschäftsführer des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters die Nachricht, daß mit besonderer Erlaubniß des deutschen Kaisers Dr. Carl Muck, Kapellmeister des königlichen Opernhauses in Berlin vom 1. Oktober 1906 ein Jahr Urlaub erhalten hat und die Leitung des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters am 12. Oktober übernehmen wird. Dr. Muck ist 1859 in Darmstadt geboren. (Vor acht Tagen brachte die [illegible] fein Bild und einen langeren [illegible]

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
BUFFALO, N. Y.
JUN 3-1906

The Symphony Society Mr. Hobart Weed, president, received a telephone message from Boston yesterday stating that Dr. Karl Muck had been engaged to direct the Boston Symphony Orchestra next season. He has been granted a leave of absence from Germany for one year by Emperor William.

As the Boston Symphony Orchestra is one of the organizations promised to Buffalo for one or two concerts next season, our musicians will have the opportunity of hearing and seeing this famous musician.

REGISTER
NEW HAVEN, CONN
JUN 3-1906

DR. MUCK TO LEAD BOSTON SYMPHONY

Kaiser Permits Berlin Leader to Come Over.

Boston, June 2.—Maj. Henry L. Higginson received a cable dispatch today from Charles A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony orchestra, announcing that by special permission of the German emperor, Dr. Carl Muck of the Royal Opera, Berlin, had been granted a leave of absence of one year, from October 1, 1906, and would come to this city to be conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra. His first appearance in Boston will be on October 12.

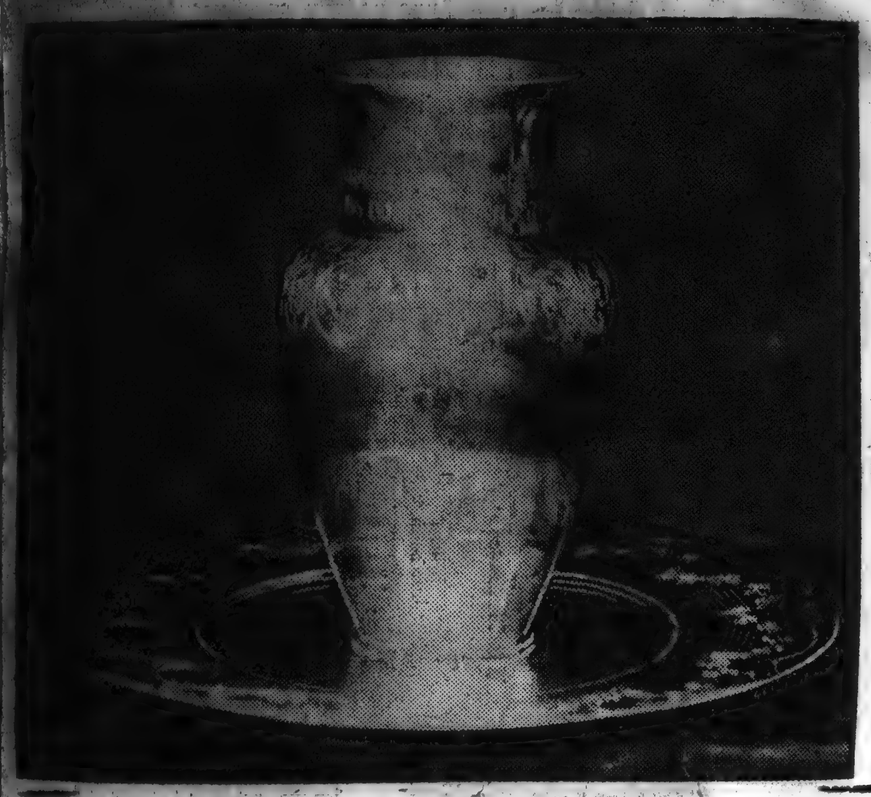
Manager Ellis has been in Europe since the middle of April, looking for a successor to Wilhelm Gericke, the retiring head.

[illegible] is considered [illegible]

[253]

TON SUNDAY POST: APRIL 29, 190

GERICKE GIVEN HANDSOME LOVING CUP AND SALVER



LOVING CUP AND SALVER PRESENTED WILHELM GERICKE.

The Symphony concert last evening was one of special significance, insomuch as it not only marked the completion of 25 years of existence of the orchestra since its foundation in 1881, but it also was the farewell appearance of Director Wilhelm Gericke, who has been identified with the orchestra during more than half of its existence. There was no soloist at the concert last evening and the programme was as follows:

Overture, "The Roman Carnival".....Berlioz
Prelude, Adagio and Gavotte.....Bach
(Arranged for strings by Bachrich.)
Overture-Fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet".....
Tschaikowsky
Symphony No. 5.....Beethoven

All of these numbers were more or less familiar to the audience, and at this time extended comment is unnecessary. The "Roman Carnival" overture and the Gavotte of Bach were received with great applause, as was also the "Romeo and Juliet" fantasia by Tschaikowsky, a work that grows in strength with each successive hearing. Mr. Gericke received an immense ovation upon his appearance, and also after each number of the programme. But the event of the evening came at the close of the concert. At the close of the performance of the Beethoven symphony, Mr. Henry M. Rogers appeared upon the platform and presented Mr. Gericke with a beautiful vase and salver.

Mr. Gericke, although evidently taken by surprise, nevertheless made a brief speech of acceptance which was said in a low tone of voice. In substance he thanked the donors for their munificent gift, and said that the success of his years as conductor was primarily owing to Mr. Higginson and then to the orchestra. The speech, though brief, was happily expressed and was received with enthusiasm.

The vase and salver presented to Mr. Gericke are the work of Mr. Arthur J. Stone of Gardner, Mass., from drawings by Mr. C. Howard Walker.

The vase, which is 10¼ inches in height, is of simple form with a delicate scroll decoration upon the shoulder of the vase, in the centre of which is the small figure of a winged Love with a baton conducting. Around the neck of the vase in fine gold letters is the following inscription: "To Wilhelm Gericke in Grateful Appreciation from Friends and Admirers, Boston, April 28, 1906."

The salver has as a border a wave pattern of laurel branches with the berries, in gold, upon the lines of the musical staff.

NO CONVENTION OF TEACHERS

National Educational Association Calls This Year's Meet Off

Dr. A. E. Winship of this city, edito of the Journal of Education, yesterda received a telegram from Chicago, bear ing the information that the executiv committee of the National Education Association had decided not to hold an convention this year.

It had been arranged to meet in Sa Francisco during the coming summer, b the earthquake and conflagration in t California metropolis made such a prop sition futile. Mayor Fitzgerald of t city endeavored to secure this year's c vention in Boston, and his efforts w seconded by numerous public spirited izens, to whom the news of this ac by the executive committee will be a appointment.

Eugenie's Fortune for Church

PARIS, April 28.—The Eclair today lishes a despatch from Milan to th fect that the vicar-general of the J has induced ex-Empress Eugenie to her whole fortune at the disposal church. The former Empress' we estimated at $30,000,000.

HERALD
BALTIMORE, M
MAY 25 1906

DR. MUCK TO LEAD?

Court Conductor From Berlin for Boston Orchestra.

The Musical Courier of New York is authority for the statement that Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Berlin Opera, will be the next leader of the Boston Orchestra. Mr. M. L. Higginson, of Boston, whose close relations to the orchestra are well known, according to news from Boston, says he knows nothing about the matter. Mr. Charles A. Ellis, the manager of the Boston Orchestra, has been visiting the more important cities on the continent, including Munich and Vienna, and is now in Berlin. He is expected to return to Boston in about two weeks. It is presumed that Mr. Ellis has seen Nikisch, Mottl and other well known leaders. Nikisch wanted a prohibitive salary. Wassili Safonoff has recently been engaged as conductor for three years of the New York Philharmonic Society at a salary of $20,000 a year, the highest salary ever paid in America to a conductor.

Schneevoigt and Raabe, of the Kaim Orchestra, Munich, and Fiedler, of Hamburg, have been under discussion for the Boston Orchestra, but the latest news is that Dr. Muck has been chosen.

Dr. Muck was born at Darmstadt on October 22, 1859. His father, Dr. J. Muck, was, it is said, a conductor. The son studied music with Kissner at Wuerzburg and at the Leipzig Conservatory, but he also attended diligently the university courses at Leipzig and at Heidelberg.

In 1880 he received the degree of Ph. D. in Leipzig, and in that year he made his debut at the Gewandhaus as a pianist. He was engaged at the opera house of Zurich as chorus director, but the conductor suddenly fell sick and Muck was obliged to take his place. He then showed so much ability that he determined to follow the career of an opera conductor, and as such he won fame at Salzburg, Bruenn, Graz, and in 1886 as first conductor at Prague. He had been the conductor of Neumann's traveling company and showed his talent in Berlin before he was called to that city as court conductor of the opera, a position that he now holds with Richard Strauss. He has also conducted symphony concerts of the Royal Orchestra in Berlin, and has been successful as a "guest conductor" in St. Petersburg, Madrid, London, Vienna and other cities. He has been praised for "the phenomenal accuracy and versatility of his knowledge and his noble and objective artistry."

SUN
s BALTIMORE, MD.
MAY 28 1906

FOR BOSTON SYMPHONY

Dr. Carl Muck, The New Conductor, A Man Of Strong Personality.

The announcement has been made that Dr. Carl Muck, chief musical director of the Royal Opera in Berlin, will fill the post left vacant by the resignation of Mr. Gericke as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Dr. Muck, who is now in the prime of life, is recognized as one of the greatest conductors in the world. While perhaps not possessing so much of the divine fire and temperament as Weingartner or Savonoff, he is still a conductor of great force and magnetism, who will certainly impress the great orchestra with his strong personality.

The conductor who wields the baton over this wonderful body of players should be something more than a drillmaster, something more than a well-educated musician. He should be a man of genius, of temperament, of enthusiasm, qualities that no conservatory of music can bestow with its diploma, if we would see the Boston Symphony attain to the loftiest ideals of orchestral music. Such conductors are, in deed, rare. Arthur Nikisch is one, and the Boston Symphony under his baton was a very different orchestra from that we have been accustomed to of late years. Perhaps under Dr. Muck this reserved, perfectly drilled body of musicians will become a joyous, throbbing thing of life.

EDWIN LITCHFIELD TURNBULL.

The First Established and Most Comple Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the Wo
From MAIL EMPIR TORONTO, ONT.
Address
Date JUN 2- 1

MUSIC.

The rumored appointment of Dr. Karl Muck to the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as successor to Wilhelm Gericke, will awaken much interest and speculation. As his name has not been even hinted at among those mentioned as probabilities in this connection, all the more curiosity will be aroused by this unexpected announcement, for though one of the most prominent conductors in Europe to-day, he has never yet given the musical public of America an opportunity to become familiar with his work. He was born in Darmstadt on October 22, 1859. With characteristic German ambition for thorough intellectual equipment he took a course in philosophy at the Heidelberg and Leipsic Universities, obtaining the degree of Doctor of Philosophy. For three years he studied at the Leipsic Conservatory and then received an appointment as conductor of the opera at Zurich. From there he went to Salzburg in 1881, thence to Brunn the following year; and in 1884 to Graz, where he became conductor of the Styrian Musical Society. In 1886 he was appointed conductor of the German Opera in Prague, where he remained till 1892, when he accepted a similar position at the Berlin Royal Opera. Ever since then he has steadily and unobtrusively made an enviable reputation for himself as a conductor of opera.

There can be no doubt of his adequate equipment for the position to which rumor has assigned him. Possessing a comprehensive knowledge of the resources of the orchestra, he exhibits a rare degree of skill and judgment in employing them to the highest artistic advantage. All his work is notable for its large dimensions and convincing power. While a man of broad musicianship and versatile style, he occupies a unique position as an interpreter of Richard Wagner's works, which he renders with imposing authority. For this reason his services as a Wagnerian conductor are much in demand and he is regularly engaged for the Bayreuth festivals.

Personally, he is slight of stature, with a sharp cut profile of much individuality and keen black eyes. A man of broad culture and popular with his fellows, he enjoys special favor with the Kaiser, whose intervention prevented a prominent American orchestra from securing him a year or so ago.

POST.
CHICAGO, ILL.
JUN 2- 1906

It is rumored that Dr. Karl Muck has been appointed conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra as a successor to Wilhelm Gericke. Dr. Muck was born in Darmstadt in 1859. He completed a thorough education, taking the degree of doctor of philosophy after courses at Heidelberg and Leipzig. Studying at the Leipzig Conservatory he received an appointment as conductor of opera at Zurich, and from there went to Salzberg, Brunn, Graz, Prague and finally to Berlin in 1892, where he has been director of the Berlin Royal Opera.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
ROCHESTER CHRONICLE
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
MAY 27 1906

It is announced that Dr. Carl Muck, conductor of the Royal Opera Company of Berlin, has been engaged as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to succeed Mr. Gericke. Dr. Muck, it should be explained, directs with an old-fashioned baton, not with a rake; but he has a reputation for getting there just the same.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
REVUE.
NEW YORK CITY
JUN 2 - 1906

Dr. Muck nach Boston.

Dirigent der Berliner Oper erhält vom Kaiser einen Jahresurlaub bewilligt.

Boston, 2. Juni. Major Henry L. Higginson empfing heute von Charles A. Ellison, dem Geschäftsführer des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters die Kabelnachricht, daß mit besonderer Erlaubniß des deutschen Kaisers Dr. Carl Muck, Kapellmeister des königlichen Opernhauses in Berlin vom 1. Oktober 1906 ein Jahr Urlaub erhalten hat und die Leitung des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters am 12. Oktober übernehmen wird. Dr. Muck ist 1859 in Darmstadt geboren. (Vor acht Tagen brachte die „Revue" sein Bild und einen längeren Artikel über den genialen Musiker.)

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
JUN 8 - 1906

The Symphony Society Mr. Hobart Weed, president, received a telephone message from Boston yesterday stating that Dr. Karl Muck had been engaged to direct the Boston Symphony Orchestra next season. He has been granted a leave of absence from Germany for one year by Emperor William.

As the Boston Symphony Orchestra is one of the organizations promised to Buffalo for one or two concerts next season, our musicians will have the opportunity of hearing and seeing this famous musician.

REGISTER
JUN 2- 1906

DR. MUCK TO LEAD BOSTON SYMPHONY

Kaiser Permits Berlin Leader to Come Over.

Boston, June 2.—Maj. Henry L. Higginson received a cable dispatch today from Charles A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony orchestra, announcing that by special permission of the German emperor, Dr. Carl Muck of the Royal Opera, Berlin, had been granted a leave of absence of one year, from October 1, 1906, and would come to this city to be conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra. His first appearance in Boston will be on October 12.

Manager Ellis has been in Europe since the middle of April, looking for a successor to Wilhelm Gericke, the retiring head.

Dr. Muck is considered the most popular musical conductor in Berlin. He was born in Darmstadt in 1859.

ARTICLE INCOMPLETE

From NEW YORK S
Address
Date JUN -2 19

...N SYMPHONY'S NEW HEAD.

...ck of Berlin Royal Opera En... Conductor by Emperor's Consent.

...ston, June 2.—Major Henry L. Hig... received a cable despatch this after... from Charles A. Ellis, manager of the ...ston Symphony Orchestra, announcing ...t by special permission of the German ...eror Dr. Carl Muck of the Royal Opera, ...lin, had received a leave of absence of ... year from October 1, 1906, and would ... to Boston to be the conductor of the ...ston Symphony Orchestra.

...s first appearance in this city will be ... the first public rehearsal of the coming ...son, on Friday afternoon, October 12.

...r. Ellis has been in Europe since the ...middle of April to secure a successor to ...r. Gericke, who retired from the conductor... ...p of the orchestra at the end of the season ...t is just finished.

Negotiations with Dr. Muck have been in progress for some time, but his engage... was made most uncertain by the un... ...ingness of Emperor William to give ... a leave of absence from his important ...ties in Berlin. This permission was not ...ived from the Emperor until this morn..., when the contract was closed.

Dr. Muck has the reputation of being one of the greatest conductors of Europe and his musical career has been one of uninterrupted successes.

He was born in Darmstadt October 22, 1859. His father was a Government clerk and intended him for a mercantile career. After leaving the gymnasium in Darmstadt, he went to Heidelberg in 1877 for a course of philosophy. After a year's residence there he went to the Leipsic Musical Conservatory. He continued his university studies, which brought him the degree of doctor of philosophy from Heidelberg.

Determined to be a musician, he made his debut in 1880 as a pianist at a concert in Leipsic. His success was one of the features of the season, but instead of pursuing the career of a pianist he immediately prepared himself to become a conductor. His first post was in Zurich, whence he went to Salzburg and afterwards to Grats. His next important post was the opera in Prague, where he went in 1886 and remained for six years.

His first appearance in Berlin was in 1891, when he was a "guest" conductor at the Lessing Theatre. In 1892 he became conductor of the Royal Opera, at Berlin. He has conducted at the Royal Opera at Covent Garden and at symphony concerts in London, Paris, St. Petersburg, Moscow, Brussels, Madrid and Vienna.

The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From NEW YORK SU
Address
Date JUN -3 1906

If the reported engagement of Dr. Carl Muck to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra is verified, the plans of Heinrich Conried will be in a measure upset. He wanted to engage the distinguished Wagner conductor for a season at the Metropolitan next winter in the effort to add greater brilliancy to the Wagner performances. Muck has been the first conductor at Berlin since the retirement of Weingartner. He has frequently conducted at Covent Garden. He won his degree at Heidelberg and later studied music at the Leipsic Conservatory. He was conductor in various German cities before he was called to Berlin. The efforts of C. A. Ellis to secure Arthur Nikisch for one year fell through on account of the excessive salary he demanded. Then an attempt was made to secure Mr. Nikisch for five years from next spring, but his [illegible]

NEW YORK STAATSZEITUNG
Datum JUN 3 - 1906

Carl Muck kommt.

Boston, Mass., 2. Juni. Dem Major Henry L. Higginson ging heute eine Depesche vom Geschäftsleiter des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters, Charles A. Ellis, zu, worin er mittheilt, mit besonderer Erlaubniß des deutschen Kaisers habe Dr. Carl Muck vom königlichen Opernhause in Berlin ein einjähriger Urlaub von einem Jahr b. J. ab bewilligt worden. Muck werde hierher kommen, um die Leitung des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters zu übernehmen. Sein erstes Auftreten hier in Boston am 12. Oktober [illegible]. Der Geschäftsleiter Ellis weilte seit der Mitte des Monats in Europa, nach einem Nachfolger für den bisherigen Dirigenten Gottlieb Gericke suchend. Dr. Muck wird als [illegible] in Berlin bezeichnet. Er lebte in Darmstadt im

HEARST'S BOSTON AMERICAN

BY KAISER'S GRACE WILL LEAD THE SYMPHONY.

Dr. Carl Muck of Royal Opera, Berlin, Famous Through Europe, Is Loaned by Monarch to Boston for Coming Year

By special permission of the German Emperor, Dr. Carl Muck of the Royal Opera, Berlin, will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra next season. His first appearance will be at the first public rehearsal on October 12.

This information was received by Henry L. Higginson yesterday by cable from Charles A. Ellis, manager of the Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Ellis has been abroad since the middle of April, his mission being to secure a successor to Mr. Gericke, who retired at the end of the season just finished. Negotiations with Dr. Muck have been in progress some time, but the engagement was made uncertain by the unwillingness of the Kaiser to allow him leave of absence. Finally, however, he was granted a year's leave, and the contract was closed.

THE SPRINGFIELD SUNDAY REPUBLICAN:
JUNE 3, 1906. ...ful | TH

Dr Carl Muck, Who Is to Conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Of Dr Karl Muck, who has been named as Mr Gericke's successor at the head of the Boston symphony orchestra, Musical America gives this account: As his name has not even been hinted at among those mentioned as probabilities in this connection, all the more curiosity will be aroused by this unexpected announcement, for though one of the most prominent conductors in Europe to-day, he has never yet given the musical public of America an opportunity to become familiar with his work.

He was born in Darmstadt on October 22, 1859. With characteristic German ambition for thorough intellectual equipment, he took a course in philosophy at the Heidelberg and Leipsic universities, obtaining the degree of doctor of philosophy. For three years he studied at the Leipsic conservatory, and then received an appointment as conductor of the opera at Zurich. From there he went to Salzburg in 1881, thence to Brunn the following year, and in 1884 to Graz, where he became conductor of the Styrian musical society. In 1886 he was appointed conductor of the German opera in Prague, where he remained till 1892, when he accepted a similar position at the Berlin Royal opera. Ever since then he has steadily and unobtrusively made an enviable reputation for himself as a conductor of opera. There can be no doubt of his adequate equipment for the position to which rumor has assigned him. Possessing a comprehensive knowledge of the resources of the orchestra, he exhibits a rare degree of skill and judgment in employing them to the highest artistic advantage. All his work is notable for its large dimensions and convincing power. While a man of broad musicianship and versatile style, he occupies a unique position as an interpreter of Richard Wagner's works, which he renders with imposing authority. For this reason his services as a Wagnerian conductor are much in demand, and he is regularly engaged for the Baireuth festivals. Personally he is of slight stature, with a sharply-cut profile of much individuality, and keen black eyes. A man of broad culture and popular with his fellows, he enjoys special favor with the Kaiser, whose intervention prevented a prominent American orchestra from secur[illegible]

DR KARL MUCK.

...on Music.
...John P. Runciman, ...

THE BOSTON SUNDAY GLOBE—JUNE ...

AS LEADER OF THE SYMPHONY

Dr Carl Muck Coming From Berlin.

Will Conduct for One Year, Beginning Oct 1.

Gets Leave of Absence From Emperor William.

Henry L. Higginson received a cable dispatch yesterday afternoon from Charles A. Ellis, manager of the Boston symphony orchestra, announcing that by special permission of the German emperor, Dr Carl Muck of the royal opera, Berlin, had received a leave of absence of one year from Oct. 1, 1906, and would come to Boston to be the conductor of the symphony orchestra. His first appearance in this city will be at the first public rehearsal next season, on Friday afternoon, Oct 12.

DR CARL MUCK

Of the Royal Opera in Berlin, Who Will Conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra for One Year.

Mr Ellis has been in Europe since the middle of April, his mission having been to secure a successor to Mr Gericke, who retired from the conductorship of the orchestra at the end of last season. Negotiations with Dr Muck have been in progress for some time, but his engagement was made uncertain by the unwillingness of Emperor William to give him a leave of absence from his important duties in Berlin. This permission was not received from the emperor until yesterday morning, when the contract was closed.

The coming of Dr Muck to Boston will bring to America one of the great conductors of Europe, a man who stands in the same class with Mottl, Nikisch, Richter and Weingartner. Now in the prime of life, his musical career has been one of uninterrupted successes, and in Berlin he is the most popular conductor that city has had in many years.

He was born in Darmstadt Oct 22, 1859. His father was a government clerk and intended him for a mercantile career. After leaving the gymnasium in Darmstadt, he went to Heidelberg for a course of philosophy in 1877. After a year's residence there he went to Leipsic and entered the musical conservatory, studying under Richter and Reinecke. He continued, however, his university studies, which brought him, in due time, the degree of doctor of philosophy. Determin[illegible]

The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From RECORD HERALD CHICAGO, ILL.
Address
Date JUN 2- 1906

ORCHESTRA PROSPECTUS.

The announcement for the coming season of concerts by the Theodore Thomas Orchestra, which was issued rather unexpectedly yesterday afternoon by the trustees, contains official confirmation of the fact previously mentioned in this column that the organization has at last been able to pay its way, "but only by a dangerously narrow margin." How narrow the margin may be we are not informed, as no financial statement has been issued. It is enough, however, to know that the orchestra has been finally dragged out of the quicksands of an annual deficit onto a firm foundation.

* * * * *

In the announcement an explanation of the reasons for lengthening the season to twenty-eight weeks receives the major portion of attention. The series is to begin Oct. 12 and 13 and will continue without a break until April 20, which period will undoubtedly set the limits of the coming musical season. The explanation follows:

"It has always been and still is necessary, in order to secure such artists as constitute this orchestra, to engage them for at least twenty-eight weeks, covering the busy season of the musical year, during which musicians must earn the major part of their livelihood. At first, twenty weeks of this engagement were played in Chicago, and the remainder on tours among other principal cities, interrupting the Chicago season twice or thrice therefor. One by one these cities, inspired by hearing our or the Boston Orchestra, have formed associations of their own; and Philadelphia, Pittsburg, Cincinnati, St. Louis, Milwaukee and Minneapolis now possess local orchestras of merit, which command, as they ought to, the local support formerly accorded to us. In consequence, our outside business has vanished, and we have gradually been forced to play at home, at first for twenty-two weeks, then for twenty-four, and, finally, for the whole twenty-eight weeks of the above engagement. This has materially affected our finances.

"For the season of 1905-1906 the income from hall and building rents and from the box office has for the first time enabled the association to meet all expenses, including interest on mortgage debt; but only by a dangerously narrow margin. If, however, our season subscribers will hereafter assist the association by subscribing for twenty-eight weeks' concerts instead of twenty-four we estimate that the increase of income resulting will not only provide a margin above all outgo but will enable us to offer to our patrons several important advantages in return, namely: To present each year three or four more of those first-rank singers and other soloists whose cost has heretofore been prohibitory; to add to the regular number of the orchestra some additional musicians of late years more and more often demanded by the heavy scoring of the modern composers and heretofore engaged only for the occasion; after another year to reseat the house with more comfortable chairs; from time to time to buy better instruments for the use of our men than many of them now possess; to add to the library, etc., etc. In short, to continue the upward development of our entire institution."

* * * * *

The following soloists have already been engaged for next season, negotiations with others being under way:

Vocalists—
Mme. Schumann-Heink, Alma Burnstaller,
Mme. Louise Homer, Herbert Witherspoon.

Instrumentalists—
Mme. Camille Blumenfeld, Josef Lhevinne,
Mme. Rosenthal, Miss Olga Samaroff.

[illegible] Pietschnikoff, Miss Maud Powell.

Last Tuesday the orchestra played

From N. Y. TRIBUNE,
Address
Date JUN -3 1906

DR. MUCK TO LEAD BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Boston, June 2.—Major Henry L. Higginson received a cable dispatch to-day from Charles A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announcing that by special permission of the German Emperor Dr. Carl Muck, of the Royal Opera, Berlin, had obtained a leave of absence of one year from October 1, 1906, and would come to this city to be conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. His first appearance in Boston will be on October 12. Manager Ellis has been in Europe since the middle of April, looking for a successor to Mr. Gericke, the retiring head.

[254]

Newspaper Cutting Bureau
From ILLUSTRATED EXPRESS
Address BOSTON, MASS.
Date JUN 3 - 1906

...telephone message yesterday, ... Mrs. Mal Davis Smith from the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra confirmed the news item given out a week ago by the New York Musical Courier, although unconfirmed ... Boston papers, of the engagement of Dr. Karl Muck of Berlin as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. ... contract is for a year only, as the German Emperor has given Dr. Muck leave of absence for that period from ... duties as court conductor ... a position which he holds jointly ... Richard Strauss.

Dr. Muck is a notable ... music world abroad. He was ... Darmstadt in 1859. He studied ... at Wuerzburg and Leipsic ... made his debut in the latter ... concert pianist. He was ... opera as chorus director ... ductor suddenly fell ill and ... obliged to take his place. ... showed so much ability ... mitted to follow the ... conductor, and ...

ARTICLE INCOMPLETE

From NEW YORK S
Address
Date JUN -?

BOSTON SYMPHONY'S NEW HEAD.

Dr. Carl Muck of Berlin Royal Opera Engaged as Conductor by Emperor's Consent.

BOSTON, June 2.—Major Henry L. Higginson received a cable despatch this afternoon from Charles A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announcing that by special permission of the German Emperor Dr. Carl Muck of the Royal Opera, Berlin, had received a leave of absence of one year from October 1, 1906, and would come to Boston to be the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

His first appearance in this city will be at the first public rehearsal of the coming season, on Friday afternoon, October 12.

Mr. Ellis has been in Europe since the middle of April to secure a successor to Mr. Gericke, who retired from the conductorship of the orchestra at the end of the season that is just finished.

Negotiations with Dr. Muck have been in progress for some time, but his engagement was made most uncertain by the unwillingness of Emperor William to give him a leave of absence from his important duties in Berlin. This permission was not received from the Emperor until this morning, when the contract was closed.

Dr. Muck has the reputation of being one of the greatest conductors of Europe and his musical carreer has been one of uninterrupted successes.

He was born in Darmstadt October 22, 1859. His father was a Government clerk and intended him for a mercantile career. After leaving the gymnasium in Darmstadt, he went to Heidelberg in 1877 for a course of philosophy. After a year's residence there he went to the Lepisic Musical Conservatory. He continued his university studies, which brought him the degree of doctor of philosophy from Heidelberg.

Determined to be a musician, he made his début in 1880 as a pianist at a concert in Leipsic. His success was one of the features of the season, but instead of pursuing the career of a pianist he immediately prepared himself to become a conductor. His first post was in Zurich, whence he went to Salzburg and afterwards to Gratz. His first important post was the opera in Prague, where he went in 1886 and remained for six years.

His first appearance in Berlin was in 1891, when he was a "guest" conductor at the Lessing Theatre. In 1892 he became conductor of the Royal Opera, at Berlin. He has conducted at the Royal Opera at Covent Garden and at symphony concerts in London, Paris, St. Petersburg, Moscow, Brussels, Madrid and Vienna.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From NEW YORK SU
Address
Date JUN -3 1906

If the reported engagement of Dr. Carl Muck to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra is verified, the plans of Heinrich Conried will be in a measure upset. He wanted to engage the distinguished Wagner conductor for a season at the Metropolitan next winter in the effort to add greater brilliancy to the Wagner performances. Muck has been the first conductor at Berlin since the retirement of Weingartner. He has frequently conducted at Covent Garden. He won his degree at Heidelberg and later studied music at the Leipsic Conservatory. He was conductor in various German cities before he was called to Berlin. The efforts of C. A. Ellis to secure Arthur Nikisch for one year fell through on account of the excessive salary he demanded. Then an attempt was made to secure Mr. Nikisch for five years from next spring, but his demands made that also impossible.

NEW YORK STAATS ZEITUNG
Date JUN 3 - 1906

Carl Muck kommt.

Boston, Mass., 2. Juni. Dem Major Henry L. Higginson ging heute eine Depesche vom Geschäftsleiter des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters, Charles A. Ellis, zu, worin er mittheilt, mit besonderer Erlaubnis des deutschen Kaisers sei Dr. Carl Muck vom königlichen Opernhause in Berlin ein einjähriger Urlaub vom 1. Oktober d. J. ab bewilligt worden und Muck werde hierher kommen, um die Leitung des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters zu übernehmen. Sein erstes Auftreten werde in Boston am 12. Oktober erfolgen. Der Geschäftsleiter Ellis weilte in Europa seit der Mitte des Monats April, um sich nach einem Nachfolger für den zurücktretenden Dirigenten Wilhelm Gericke umzusehen. Dr. Muck wird als der beliebteste Musikdirigent in Berlin betrachtet. Er wurde in Darmstadt im Jahre 1859 geboren.

HEARST'S BOSTON AMERICAN

BY KAISER'S GRACE WILL LEAD THE SYMPHONY.

Dr. Carl Muck of Royal Opera, Berlin, Famous Through Europe, Is Loaned by Monarch to Boston for Coming Year

By special permission of the German Emperor, Dr. Carl Muck of the Royal Opera, Berlin, will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra next season. His first appearance will be at the first public rehearsal on October 12.

This information was received by Henry L. Higginson yesterday by cable from Charles A. Ellis, manager of the Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Ellis has been abroad since the middle of April, his mission being to secure a successor to Mr. Gericke, who retired at the end of the season just finished. Negotiations with Dr. Muck have been in progress some time, but the engagement was made uncertain by the unwillingness of the Kaiser to allow him leave of absence. Finally, however, he was granted a year's leave, and the contract was closed.

THE SPRINGFIELD SUNDAY REPUBLICAN: JUNE 3, 1906.

t-Go[illegible]rful | TH

Dr Carl Muck, Who is to Conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Of Dr Karl Muck, who has been named as Mr Gericke's successor at the head of the Boston symphony orchestra, Musical America gives this account: As his name has not even been hinted at among those mentioned as probabilities in this connection, all the more curiosity will be aroused by this unexpected announcement, for though one of the most prominent conductors in Europe to-day, he has never yet given the musical public of America an opportunity to become familiar with his work.

He was born in Darmstadt on October 22, 1859. With characteristic German ambition for thorough intellectual equipment, he took a course in philosophy at the Heidelberg and Leipsic universities, obtaining the degree of doctor of philosophy. For three years he studied at the Leipsic conservatory, and then received an appointment as conductor of the opera at Zurich. From there he went to Salzburg in 1881, thence to Brunn the following year, and in 1884 to Graz, where he became conductor of the Styrian musical society. In 1886 he was appointed conductor of the German opera in Prague, where he remained till 1892, when he accepted a similar position at the Berlin Royal opera. Ever since then he has steadily and unobtrusively made an enviable reputation for himself as a conductor of opera. There can be no doubt of his adequate equipment for the position to which rumor has assigned him. Possessing a comprehensive knowledge of the resources of the orchestra, he exhibits a rare degree of skill and judgment in employing them to the highest artistic advantage. All his work is notable for its large dimensions and convincing power. While a man of broad musicianship and versatile style, he occupies a unique position as an interpreter of Richard Wagner's works, which he renders with imposing authority. For this reason his services as a Wagnerian conductor are much in demand, and he is regularly engaged for the Baireuth festivals. Personally he is of slight stature, with a sharply-cut profile of much individuality, and keen black eyes. A man of broad culture and popular with his fellows, he enjoys special favor with the kaiser, whose intervention prevented a prominent American orchestra from securing him a year or so ago.

DR KARL MUCK.

Nietzsche's Influence on Music.

The London critic, John F. Runciman, deplores the influence of the "pseudo-philosopher" Nietzsche upon German and [illegible]

THE BOSTON SUNDAY GLOBE—JUNE 3, 1906

AS LEADER OF THE SYMPHONY

Dr Carl Muck Coming From Berlin.

Will Conduct for One Year, Beginning Oct 1.

Gets Leave of Absence From Emperor William.

Henry L. Higginson received a cable dispatch yesterday afternoon from Charles A. Ellis, manager of the Boston symphony orchestra, announcing that by special permission of the German emperor, Dr Carl Muck of the royal opera, Berlin, had received a leave of absence of one year from Oct 1, 1906, and would come to Boston to be the conductor of the symphony orchestra. His first appearance in this city will be at the first public rehearsal next season, on Friday afternoon, Oct 12.

DR CARL MUCK

Of the Royal Opera in Berlin, Who Will Conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra for One Year.

Mr Ellis has been in Europe since the middle of April, his mission having been to secure a successor to Mr Gericke, who retired from the conductorship of the orchestra at the end of last season. Negotiations with Dr Muck have been in progress for some time, but his engagement was made uncertain by the unwillingness of Emperor William to give him a leave of absence from his important duties in Berlin. This permission was not received from the emperor until yesterday morning, when the contract was closed.

The coming of Dr Muck to Boston will bring to America one of the great conductors of Europe, a man who stands in the same class with Motti, Nikisch, Richter and Weingartner. Now in the prime of life, his musical career has been one of uninterrupted successes, and in Berlin he is the most popular conductor that city has had in many years.

He was born in Darmstadt Oct 22, 1859. His father was a government clerk and intended him for a mercantile career. After leaving the gymnasium in Darmstadt, he went to Heidelberg for a course of philosophy in 1877. After a year's residence there he went to Leipsic and entered the musical conservatory, studying under Richter and Reinecke. He continued, however, his university studies, which brought him, in due time the degree of doctor of philosophy fr[illegible] Heidelberg.

Determine[illegible] a debut

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From RECORD HERALD CHICAGO, ILL.
Address
Date JUN 2 - 1906

ORCHESTRA PROSPECTUS.

The announcement for the coming season of concerts by the Theodore Thomas Orchestra, which was issued rather unexpectedly yesterday afternoon by the trustees, contains official confirmation of the fact previously mentioned in this column that the organization has at last been able to pay its way, "but only by a dangerously narrow margin." How narrow the margin may be we are not informed, as no financial statement has been issued. It is enough, however, to know that the orchestra has been finally dragged out of the quicksands of an annual deficit onto a firm foundation.

* * * * *

In the announcement an explanation of the reasons for lengthening the season to twenty-eight weeks receives the major portion of attention. The series is to begin Oct. 12 and 13 and will continue without a break until April 20, which period will undoubtedly set the limits of the coming musical season. The explanation follows:

"It has always been and still is necessary, in order to secure such artists as constitute this orchestra, to engage them for at least twenty-eight weeks, covering the busy season of the musical year, during which musicians must earn the major part of their livelihood. At first, twenty weeks of this engagement were played in Chicago, and the remainder on tours among other principal cities, interrupting the Chicago season twice or thrice therefor. One by one these cities, inspired by hearing our or the Boston Orchestra, have formed associations of their own; and Philadelphia, Pittsburg, Cincinnati, St. Louis, Milwaukee and Minneapolis now possess local orchestras of merit, which command, as they ought to, the local support formerly accorded to us. In consequence, our outside business has vanished, and we have gradually been forced to play at home, at first for twenty-two weeks, then for twenty-four, and, finally, for the whole twenty-eight weeks of the above engagement. This has materially affected our finances.

"For the season of 1905-1906 the income from hall and building rents and from the box office has for the first time enabled the association to meet all expenses, including interest on mortgage debt; but only by a dangerously narrow margin. If, however, our season subscribers will hereafter assist the association by subscribing for twenty-eight weeks' concerts instead of twenty-four we estimate that the increase of income resulting will not only provide a margin above all outgo but will enable us to offer to our patrons several important advantages in return, namely: To present each year three or four more of those first-rank singers and other soloists whose cost has heretofore been prohibitory; to add to the regular number of the orchestra some additional musicians of late years more and more often demanded by the heavy scoring of the modern composers and heretofore engaged only for the occasion; after another year to reseat the house with more comfortable chairs; from time to time to buy better instruments for the use of our men than many of them now possess; to add to the library, etc., etc. In short, to continue the upward development of our entire institution."

* * * * *

The following soloists have already been engaged for next season, negotiations with others being under way:

Vocalists—
Mme. Schumann-Heink. Aloys Burgstaller.
Mme. Louise Homer. Herbert Witherspoon.
Pianists—
Mrs. Fannie Bloomfield Zeisler. Josef Lhevinne.
Moritz Rosenthal. Mme. Olga Samaroff.
Violinists—
Alexander Petschnikoff. Miss Maud Powell.
Cellist—Josef Hollman.

Last Tuesday the orchestra closed a tour

From N. Y. TRIBUNE.
Address
Date JUN -3 1906

DR. MUCK TO LEAD BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Boston, June 2.—Major Henry L. Higginson received a cable dispatch to-day from Charles A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announcing that by special permission of the German Emperor Dr. Carl Muck, of the Royal Opera, Berlin, had obtained a leave of absence of one year from October 1, 1906, and would come to this city to be conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. His first appearance in Boston will be on October 12. Manager Ellis has been in Europe since the middle of April, looking for a successor to Wilhelm Gericke, the retiring head.

[254]

ILLUSTRATED EXPRESS
From
Address
Date JUN 3 - 1906

A telephone message yesterday to Mrs. Mai Davis Smith from the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra confirmed the news item given out a week ago by the New York Musical Courier, although unconfirmed by Boston papers, of the engagement of Dr. Karl Muck of Berlin as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The contract is for a year only, as the German Emperor has given Dr. Muck leave of absence for that period from his duties as court conductor of the opera, a position which he holds jointly with Richard Strauss.

Dr. Muck is a notable figure in the music world abroad. He was born at Darmstadt in 1859. He studied music at Wuerzburg and Leipsic and in 1880 made his debut in the latter city as a concert pianist. He was engaged at the opera as chorus director, but the conductor suddenly fell ill and Muck was obliged to take his place. He then showed so much ability that he determined to follow the career of an opera conductor, and as such he won fame at Salzburg, Bruenn, Graz and in 1886 as first conductor at Prague. He has conducted symphony concerts of the Royal Orchestra in Berlin and has been successful as a guest conductor in Saint Petersburg, Madrid, London, Vienna and other cities.

Dr. Muck has also

...LEAD SYMPHONY

...ctor of Royal Orchestra ...ing to Be in Boston During 1906-07.

...enry L. Higginson received a ...yesterday afternoon from Mr. ... Ellis, the manager of the ... Symphony Orchestra, who is ... ...ssenger stated that Dr. Karl ...uctor of the Royal Oper... ...special permission of Em... ...William, has received leave of ab... ...one year from Oct. 1, and the ... ...will come to Boston to be the ... ...of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. ... ...will make his first ... ...United States as ... ...and at the public ... ...of Oct. 12.

...has been in Europe since ... ...middle of April in search of a suc... ...to Mr. Gericke. The names of ... ...four conductors have been men... ...authoritatively, each as that of ...Gericke's successor; Mr. Nikisch, ...Steinbach, Mr. Motti, Mr. Mahler. ...The names of lesser men have been ...mentioned significantly. It was stated ...May 23 that Dr. Muck would be the ...man. There were negotiations with him ...at that time, but he was not engaged ...until yesterday.

...Herald on May 24 published a ...cut of Dr. Muck seated at a piano, ...and then published a sketch of his ...life, stating that there were contra... ...accounts of his early career. ...Here it is said that his father was a ...conductor at Darmstadt, and it is also ...said that he was a clerk in a Bavarian ...government office. It is said that the ...degree of doctor of philosophy was ...given to Mr. Muck by Heidelberg Uni... ...Others say he received it from ...Leipsic University.

...Muck was born at Darmstadt, Oct. ...1859. After he had completed his ...studies at the gymnasium and studied ...a year at Heidelberg University he ...went to Leipsic and studied at the Con... ...servatory of Music under Richter and ...Reinecke. He also pursued his philo... ...sophical studies at Heidelberg and re... ...ceived his degree.

...In 1880 he appeared for the first ...time in public as a pianist at the ...Gewandhaus, Leipsic, but in spite of ...his success he preferred the career of ...an opera conductor and began it at ...Zurich. He afterward conducted at the ...opera houses in Salzburg, Bruenn, Graz, ...and in 1886 he was appointed first con... ...ductor of the opera house at Prague. ...There he remained six years and con... ...ducted the Philharmonic concerts.

...He also was the leader of Neumann's ...company when it went to Russia to give ...performances of the "Ring." In 1891 ...he conducted at the Lessing Theatre, ...Berlin, performances of the Prague com... ...pany, and was so successful that in 1892 ...he was called to the Royal Opera of ...Berlin, where Richard Strauss and Felix ...Weingartner have been his colleagues. ...The latter has announced his intention ...of devoting his time to rest and com... ...position. Dr. Muck's contract with the ...Intendent of the Opera House would ...have expired in 1907.

...Dr. Muck is highly esteemed as a con... ...ductor, not only in Berlin but in St. ...Petersburg, Moscow, Paris, London, ...Madrid and Vienna. He has been praised ...for the "phenomenal accuracy and ver... ...satility of his knowledge and his noble ...and objective artistry." He does not ...seek sensational effects, and although ...he has a marked individuality, he does ...not court the limelight. He is said to ...be an excellent disciplinarian and a be... ...liever in thorough preparation, whether ...the work be old or new. He enjoys a ...great reputation as an interpreter of ...Wagner's music dramas and at Bay... ...reuth for his reading of "Parsifal" he ...was hailed as the successor of Levi.

...His engagement as conductor of the ...Boston Symphony Orchestra is for one ...year. Whether this engagement will be ...extended at the expiration of that time ...will undoubtedly depend on whether the ...public will like him and whether he will ...like the work and the life in this coun... ...try.

BALTIMORE, MD.
JUN 4 - 1906

...BOSTON SYMPHONY NEW HEAD

...Carl Muck, Of Berlin Roy... ...Opera, Engaged As Conductor

...Special Dispatch to the Baltimore Sun.

...Boston, June 3.—Major Henry L. Hig... ...ginson has received a cable dispatch from ...Charles A. Ellis, manager of the Boston ...Symphony Orchestra, announcing that by ...special permission of the German Emperor ...Dr. Muck, of the Royal Opera, Berlin, ...has received a leave of absence of one year ...from October 1, 1906, and would come to ...Boston to be the conductor of the Boston ...Symphony Orchestra.

...His first appearance in this city will be ...at the first public rehearsal of the coming ...season on Friday afternoon, October 12.

...Mr. Ellis has been in Europe since the ...middle of April to secure a successor to ...Mr. Gericke, who retired from the con... ...ductorship of the orchestra at the end of ...the season that is just finished.

...Negotiations with Dr. Muck have been ...in progress for some time, but his engage... ...ment was made most uncertain by the un... ...willingness of the German Emperor to ...give him a leave of absence from his im... ...portant duties in Berlin.

...Dr. Muck has the reputation of being ...one of the greatest conductors of Europe, ...and his musical career has been one of ...uninterrupted successes.

...He was born in Darmstadt October 22, ...1859. His father was a Government clerk ...and intended him for a mercantile career.

...After leaving the gymnasium in Darm... ...stadt, he went to Heidelberg for a ...course of philosophy in 1877.

...After a year's residence there he went ...to the Leipsic Musical Conservatory, ...studying under Richter and Reinecke. ...He continued his university studies, ...which brought him the degree of doctor of ...philosophy from Heidelberg.

...If determined to be a musician, he made ...his debut in 1880 as a pianist at a concert ...in Leipsic. His success was one of the ...features of the season, but instead of pur... ...suing the career of a pianist he immediately ...prepared himself to become a conductor.

...His first post was in Zurich, whence he ...went to Salzburg and then to Graz.

...His first post of real importance was in ...Prague, where he was called in 1886, and ...stayed for six years. During that time ...he conducted the Philharmonic concerts ...in Prague, and was conductor of the ...company which Angelo Neumann took to ...Russia to present in that country for the ...first time Wagner's "Ring."

...Appearance in Berlin

...His first appearance in Berlin was in ...1891, when he was a "guest" conductor at ...the Lessing Theatre. So deep was the im... ...pression he made that he was offered the ...post of conductor of the Royal Opera. ...His contract in Prague having still a ...year to run, he was unable to accept this ...until the following year, when he went ...to Berlin, where he has since been, his ...colleagues in the opera having been Rich... ...ard Strauss and Felix Weingartner.

...In the '90s he was invited to Bayreuth ...to conduct "Parsifal," and such was his ...success with this work that he was called ...the real successor of Hermann Levi, ...Levi having been the great Wagnerian ...conductor who had charge of the first ...performance of the Wagner music ...dramas.

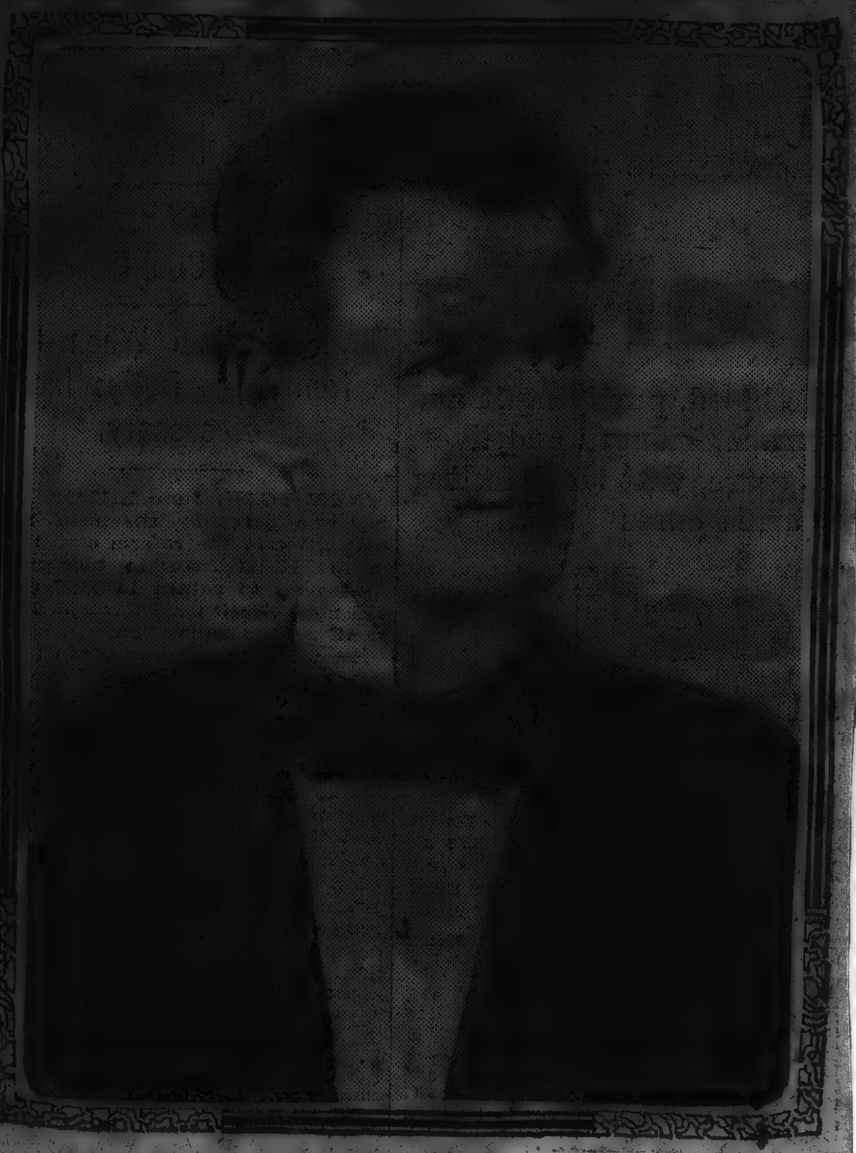
...In recent years he has conducted, as ...guest, symphony concerts in London, ...Paris, St. Petersburg, Moscow, Brussels ...and Madrid, and has been conductor of ...the Royal Opera at Convent Garden. ...During the past winter he has shared with ...Felix Mottl the honor of conducting the ...Philharmonic concerts in Vienna.

...Dr. Muck is described as thoroughly a ...man of the world, in addition to being a ...great artist. He has enjoyed the friend... ...ship of Emperor William for many years, ...with whom he is a favorite.

...BOSTON, JUNE 3.

NEW CONDUCTOR OF SYMPHONY

Dr. Karl Muck of the Royal Orchestra, of Berlin, Ger., Who Has Been Granted One Year's Leave of Absence by Emperor William, Will Come to Boston's Famous Organization for Season of 1906-07.



DR. KARL MUCK COMES TO LEAD SYMPHONY

(Continued from Page One, Column 3)

...time in public as a pianist at the ...Gewandhaus, Leipsic, but in spite of ...his success he preferred the career of ...an opera conductor and began it at ...Zurich. He afterward conducted at the ...opera houses in Salzburg, Bruenn, Graz, ...and in 1886 he was appointed first con... ...ductor of the opera house at Prague. ...There he remained six years and con... ...ducted the Philharmonic concerts.

...He also was the leader of Neumann's ...company when it went to Russia to give ...performances of the "Ring." In 1891 ...he conducted at the Lessing Theatre, ...Berlin, performances of the Prague com... ...pany, and was so successful that in 1892 ...he was called to the Royal Opera of ...Berlin, where Richard Strauss and Felix ...Weingartner have been his colleagues. ...The latter has announced his intention ...of devoting his time to rest and com... ...position. Dr. Muck's contract with the ...Intendent of the Opera House would ...have expired in 1907.

...Dr. Muck is highly esteemed as a con... ...ductor, not only in Berlin but in St. ...Petersburg, Moscow, Paris, London, ...Madrid and Vienna. He has been praised ...for the "phenomenal accuracy and ver... ...satility of his knowledge and his noble ...and objective artistry." He does not ...seek sensational effects, and although ...he has a marked individuality, he does ...not court the limelight. He is said to ...be an excellent disciplinarian and a be... ...liever in thorough preparation, whether ...the work be old or new. He enjoys a ...great reputation as an interpreter of ...Wagner's music dramas and at Bay... ...reuth for his reading of "Parsifal" he ...was hailed as the successor of Levi.

...His engagement as conductor of the ...Boston Symphony Orchestra is for one ...year. Whether this engagement will be ...extended at the expiration of that time ...will undoubtedly depend on whether the ...public will like him and whether he will ...like the work and the life in this coun... ...try.

...BOSTON SUNDAY POST

DR. MUCK SELECTED TO HEAD SYMPHONY

Kaiser Yields to Boston and Releases Famous Conductor

Mr. Henry L. Higginson received a cable despatch yesterday afternoon from Charles A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announcing that by special permission of the German Emperor, Dr. Carl Muck of the Royal Opera, Berlin, received a leave of absence of one year from Oct. 1, 1906, and will come to Boston to act as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. His first appearance in this city will be at the first public rehearsal of the coming season on Friday afternoon, Oct. 12.

CONTRACT CLOSED

Mr. Ellis has been in Europe since the middle of April, his mission having been to secure a successor to Mr. Gericke, who retired from the directorship of the orchestra at the end of the season just finished.

Negotiations with Dr. Muck have been in progress for some time, but his engagement was made most uncertain by the unwillingness of Emperor William to give him a leave of absence from his important duties in Berlin.

This permission was not received from the Emperor until yesterday morning, when the contract was closed.

The coming of Dr. Muck to Boston will bring to America one of the great conductors of Europe, a man who stands in the same class with Mottl, Nikisch, Richter and Weingartner.

Now in his prime of life, his musical career has been one of uninterrupted successes, and he is in Berlin the most popular conductor that city has had in many years.

He was born in Darmstadt on Oct. 22, 1859. His father was a government clerk and intended him for a mercantile career.

After leaving the gymnasium in Darmstadt, he went to Heidelberg for a course of philosophy in 1877.

After a year's residence there he went to Leipsic and entered the Musical Conservatory, studying under Richter and Reinecke. He continued, however, his university studies, which brought him in due time the degree of doctor of philosophy from Heidelberg.

Determined to be a musician he made his debut in 1880 as a pianist at a Gewandhaus concert in Leipsic. His success was one of the features of the season, but instead of pursuing the career of a pianist he immediately prepared himself to become a conductor.

His first post was in Zurich, whence he went to Salzburg and then to Graz.

His first post of real importance was in Prague, where he was called in 1886, and stayed for six years. During that time he conducted the Philharmonic concerts in Prague, and was conductor of the company which Angelo Neumann took to Russia to present in that country for the first time Wagner's "Ring."

Appearance in Berlin

His first appearance in Berlin was in 1891, when he was a "guest" conductor at the Lessing Theatre. So deep was the impression he made that he was offered the post of conductor of the Royal Opera. His contract in Prague having still a year to run, he was unable to accept this until the following year, when he went to Berlin, where he has since been, his colleagues in the opera having been Richard Strauss and Felix Weingartner.

In the '90s he was invited to Bayreuth to conduct "Parsifal," and such was his success with this work that he was called "the real successor of Hermann Levi," Levi having been the great Wagnerian conductor who had charge of the first performance of the Wagner music dramas.

In recent years he has conducted, as "guest," symphony concerts in London, Paris, St. Petersburg, Moscow, Brussels and Madrid, and has been conductor of the Royal Opera at Convent Garden. During the past winter he has shared with Felix Mottl the honor of conducting the Philharmonic concerts in Vienna.

Dr. Muck is described as thoroughly a man of the world, in addition to being a great artist. He has enjoyed the friendship of Emperor William for many years, with whom he is a favorite.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

MORGEN JOURNAL
NEW YORK CITY.
JUN 4 - 1906

Dr. Muck nach Boston.

Kaiser Wilhelm bewilligt dem berühmten Dirigenten Urlaub für Amerika-Tournee.

Boston, 3. Juni. — Charles A. Ellis, der Geschäftsführer des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters, telegraphirte gestern Major Henry L. Higginson, daß es ihm endlich gelungen sei, Dr. Karl Muck vom Königl. Opernhaus in Berlin für ein Jahr an das Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester zu verpflichten. Die Verhandlungen zogen sich deshalb so lange hinaus, weil Kaiser Wilhelm anfänglich nicht recht geneigt war, Dr. Muck auf so lange Zeit zu beurlauben.

Dr. Muck wird das Bostoner Orchester am 12. Oktober d. J. zum ersten Mal dirigiren. Vorher hat Muck, der in Leipzig Musik und in Heidelberg Philosophie studirte, schon in den bedeutendsten Städten Europas Symphonie-Orchester dirigirt, u. A. auch die Londoner Philharmoniker, sowie das Wiener philharmonische Orchester. Der berühmte Dirigent, ein gebürtiger Darmstädter, steht im 57. Lebensjahr.

COMMERCIAL
NEW YORK CITY
JUN 4 - 1906

Dr. Muck Will Head Boston Symphony.

Boston, June 3.—Major Henry L. Higginson received a dispatch yesterday from Charles A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announcing that by permission of the German emperor Dr. Carl Muck of the Royal Opera, Berlin, had received a leave of absence of one year from Oct. 1, 1906, and would be the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

DR. KARL MUCK TO BE CONDUCTOR

Noted German Musician Engaged to Lead Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Through the efforts of Charles A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck has accepted the position of conductor of this musical organization, in which position he succeeds Wilhelm Gericke. Henry L. Higginson confirms the selection of Dr. Much as the new conductor of the orchestra. It was necessary to get permission of the German emperor before the matter could be completed. Dr. Muck recently has been conductor of the Royal Opera at Berlin.

The new conductor is one of the most prominent men in his chosen profession in Europe, and has never appeared before an American audience. He was born in Darmstadt Oct. 22, 1859. After obtaining the degree of doctor of philosophy he began the study of music at Leipzig Conservatory. Subsequently he received an appointment as conductor of the opera at Zurich. He went to Salzburg in 1881, to Bruna the following year, and in 1884 to Graz, where he became conductor of the Styrian Musical Society.

Dr. Much is considered one of the leading directors in the musical world. For a number of years he has enjoyed the warm friendship and admiration of Emperor William. All his work is notable for its large dimensions and convincing power. While a man of broad musicianship and versatile style, he occupies a unique position as an interpreter of Wagner's works, which he renders with imposing authority. For this reason, his services as a Wagnerian conductor are much in demand, and he is regularly engaged for the Beireuth festivals. His leave of absence will extend from Oct. 6, 1906, to Oct. 6, 1907, one year only. He will make his first public appearance in this city on Friday afternoon, Oct. 12, at a public rehearsal.

DR. KARL MUCK COMES TO LEAD SYMPHONY

Conductor of Royal Orchestra, Berlin, to Be in Boston During 1906-07.

Mr. Henry L. Higginson received a cablegram yesterday afternoon from Mr. Charles A. Ellis, the manager of the Boston Symphony orchestra, who is in Berlin.

The cablegram stated that Dr. Karl Muck, a conductor of the Royal Opera in Berlin, by special permission of Emperor William, has received leave of absence for one year from Oct. 1, and that Dr. Muck will come to Boston to be the conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra next season, viz.: 1906-07.

Dr. Muck, then, will make his first appearance in the United States as a conductor at Boston and at the public rehearsal of Oct. 12.

Mr. Ellis has been in Europe since the middle of April in search of a successor to Mr. Gericke. The names of three or four conductors have been mentioned "authoritatively," each as that of Mr. Gericke's successor; Mr. Nikisch, Mr. Steinbach, Mr. Mottl, Mr. Mahler, and the names of lesser men have been mentioned significantly. It was stated on May 23 that Dr. Muck would be the man. There were negotiations with him at that time, but he was not engaged until yesterday.

The Herald on May 24 published a portrait of Dr. Muck seated at a piano, and it then published a sketch of his life, stating that there were contradictory accounts of his early career. Thus it is said that his father was a conductor at Darmstadt, and it is also said that he was a clerk in a Bavarian government office. It is said that the degree of doctor of philosophy was given to Mr. Muck by Heidelberg University. Others say he received it from Leipsic University.

Dr. Muck was born at Darmstadt, Oct. 22, 1859. After he had completed his course at the gymnasium and studied for a year at Heidelberg University he went to Leipsic and studied at the Conservatory of Music under Richter and Reinecke. He also pursued his philosophical studies at Heidelberg and received his degree.

Early in 1880 he appeared for the first

BUA
BALTIMORE Md
JUN 4 1906

BOSTON SYMPHONY NEW HEAD

Dr. Carl Muck, Of Berlin Royal Opera, Engaged As Conductor.

[Special Dispatch to the Baltimore Sun.]

Boston, June 3.—Major Henry L. Higginson has received a cable dispatch from Charles A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announcing that by special permission of the German Emperor Dr. Carl Muck, of the Royal Opera, Berlin, had received a leave of absence of one year from October 1, 1906, and would come to Boston to be the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

His first appearance in this city will be at the first public rehearsal of the coming season, on Friday afternoon, October 12.

Mr. Ellis has been in Europe since the middle of April to secure a successor to Mr. Gericke, who retired from the conductorship of the orchestra at the end of the season that is just finished.

Negotiations with Dr. Muck have been in progress for some time, but his engagement was made most uncertain by the unwillingness of the German Emperor to give him a leave of absence from his important duties in Berlin.

Dr. Muck has the reputation of being one of the greatest conductors of Europe, and his musical career has been one of uninterrupted successes.

He was born in Darmstadt October 22, 1859. His father was a Government clerk and intended him for a mercantile career. After leaving the gymnasium in Darmstadt he went to Heidelberg in 1877 for a course of philosophy. After a year's residence there he went to the Leipsic Musical Conservatory. He continued his university studies, which brought him the degree of doctor of philosophy from Heidelberg.

Determined to be a musician, he made his debut in 1880 as a pianist at a concert in Leipsic. His success was one of the features of the season, but instead of pursuing the career of a pianist he immediately prepared himself to become a conductor. His first post was in Zurich, whence he went to Salzburg and afterward to Gratz. His first important post was the opera in Prague, where he went in 1886 and remained for six years.

His first appearance in Berlin was in 1891, when he was a "guest" conductor at the Lessing Theatre. In 1892 he became conductor of the Royal Opera at Berlin. He has conducted at the Royal Opera at Covent Garden and at symphony concerts in London, Paris, St. Petersburg, Moscow, Madrid and Vienna.

NEW CONDUCTOR OF SYMPHONY

Dr. Karl Muck of the Royal Orchestra, of Berlin, Ger., Who Has Been Granted One Year's Leave of Absence by Emperor William, Will Come to Boston's Famous Organization for Season of 1906-07.

DR. KARL MUCK COMES TO LEAD SYMPHONY

(Continued from Page One, Column 6)

time in public as a pianist at the Gewandhaus, Leipsic, but in spite of his success he preferred the career of an opera conductor and began it at Zurich. He afterward conducted at the opera houses in Salzburg, Bruenn, Graz, and in 1886 he was appointed first conductor of the opera house at Prague. There he remained six years and conducted the Philharmonic concerts.

He also was the leader of Neumann's company when it went to Russia to give performances of the "Ring." In 1891 he conducted at the Lessing Theatre, Berlin, performances of the Prague company, and was so successful that in 1892 he was called to the Royal Opera of Berlin, where Richard Strauss and Felix Weingartner have been his colleagues. The latter has announced his intention of devoting his time to rest and composition. Dr. Muck's contract with the Intendent of the Opera House would have expired in 1907.

Dr. Muck is highly esteemed as a conductor, not only in Berlin but in St. Petersburg, Moscow, Paris, London, Madrid and Vienna. He has been praised for the "phenomenal accuracy and versatility of his knowledge and his noble and objective artistry." He does not seek sensational effects, and although he has a marked individuality, he does not court the limelight. He is said to be an excellent disciplinarian and a believer in thorough preparation, whether the work be old or new. He enjoys a great reputation as an interpreter of Wagner's music dramas and at Bayreuth for his reading of "Parsifal" he was hailed as the successor of Levi.

His engagement as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is for one year. Whether this engagement will be extended at the expiration of that time will undoubtedly depend on whether the public will like him and whether he will like the work and the life in this country.

DR. MUCK SELECTED TO HEAD SYMPHONY

Kaiser Yields to Boston and Releases Famous Conductor

Mr. Henry L. Higginson received a cable despatch yesterday afternoon from Charles A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announcing that by special permission of the German Emperor, Dr. Carl Muck of the Royal Opera, Berlin, received a leave of absence of one year from Oct. 1, 1906, and will come to Boston to act as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. His first appearance in this city will be at the first public rehearsal of the coming season on Friday afternoon, Oct. 12.

CONTRACT CLOSED

Mr. Ellis has been in Europe since the middle of April, his mission having been to secure a successor to Mr. Gericke, who retired from the directorship of the orchestra at the end of the season just finished.

Negotiations with Dr. Muck have been in progress for some time, but his engagement was made most uncertain by the unwillingness of Emperon William to give him a leave of absence from his important duties in Berlin.

This permission was not received from the Emperor until yesterday morning; when the contract was closed.

The coming of Dr. Muck to Boston will bring to America one of the great conductors of Europe, a man who stands in the same class with Mottl, Nikisch, Richter and Weingartner.

Now in his prime of life, his musical career has been one of uninterrupted successes, and he is in Berlin the most popular conductor that city has had in many years.

He was born in Darmstadt on Oct. 22, 1859. His father was a government clerk and intended him for a mercantile career.

After leaving the gymnasium in Darmstadt, he went to Heidelberg for a course of philosophy in 1877.

After a year's residence there he went to Leipsic and entered the Musical Conservatory, studying under Richter and Reinecke. He continued, however, his university studies, which brought him in due time the degree of doctor of philosophy from Heidelberg.

Determined to be a musician he made his debut in 1880 as a pianist at a Gewandhaus concert in Leipsic. His success was one of the features of the season, but instead of pursuing the career of a pianist he immediately prepared himself to become a conductor.

His first post was in Zurich, whence he went to Salzburg and then to Graz.

His first post of real importance was in Prague, where he was called in 1886, and stayed for six years. During that time he conducted the Philharmonic concerts in Prague, and was conductor of the company which Angelo Neumann took to Russia to present in that country for the first time Wagner's "Ring."

Appearance in Berlin

His first appearance in Berlin was in 1891, when he was a "guest' conductor at the Lessing Theatre. So deep was the impression he made that he was offered the post of conductor of the Royal Opera. His contract in Prague having still a year to run, he was unable to accept this until the following year, when he went to Berlin, where he has since been, his colleagues in the opera having been Richard Strauss and Felix Weingartner.

In the '90s he was invited to Bayreuth to conduct "Parsifal," and such was his success with this work that he was called "the real successor of Hermann Levi," Levi having been the great Wagnerian conductor who had charge of the first performance of the Wagner music-dramas.

In recent years he has conducted, as "guest," symphony concerts in London, Paris, St. Petersburg, Moscow, Brussels and Madrid, and has been conductor of the Royal Opera at Convent Garden. During the past winter he has shared with Felix Mottl the honor of conducting the Philharmonic concerts in Vienna.

Dr. Muck is described as thoroughly a man of the world, in addition to being a great artist. He has enjoyed the friendship of Emperor William for many years, with whom he is a favorite.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
MORGEN JOURNAL
NEW YORK CITY
JUN 4 - 1906

Dr. Muck nach Boston.

Kaiser Wilhelm bewilligt dem berühmten Dirigenten Urlaub für Amerika-Tournee.

Boston, 3. Juni. — Charles A. Ellis, der Geschäftsführer des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters, kabelte gestern Major Henry L. Higginson, daß es ihm endlich gelungen sei, Dr. Karl Muck vom Königl. Opernhaus in Berlin für ein Jahr an das Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester zu verpflichten. Die Verhandlungen zogen sich deshalb so lange hinaus, weil Kaiser Wilhelm anfänglich nicht recht geneigt war, Dr. Muck auf so lange Zeit zu beurlauben.

Dr. Muck wird das Bostoner Orchester am 12. Oktober d. J. zum ersten Mal dirigiren. Vorher hat Muck, der in Leipzig Musik und in Heidelberg Philosophie studirte, schon in den bedeutendsten Städten Europas Symphonie-Orchester dirigirt, u. A. auch die Londoner Philharmoniker, sowie das Wiener philharmonische Orchester. Der berühmte Dirigent, ein gebürtiger Darmstädter, steht im 57. Lebensjahr.

COMMERCIAL
NEW YORK CITY
JUN 4 - 1906

ess

Dr. Muck Will Head Boston Symphony.

Boston, June 3.—Major Henry L. Higginson received a dispatch yesterday from Charles A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announcing that by permission of the German emperor Dr. Carl Muck of the Royal Opera, Berlin, had received a leave of absence of one year from Oct. 1, 1906, and would be the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Transcript
June 4

DR. KARL MUCK TO BE CONDUCTOR

Noted German Musician Engaged to Lead Boston Symphony Orchestra

Through the efforts of Charles A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck has accepted the position of conductor of this musical organization, in which position he succeeds Wilhelm Gericke. Henry L. Higginson confirms the selection of Dr. Much as the new conductor of the orchestra. It was necessary to get permission of the German emperor before the matter could be completed. Dr. Muck recently has been conductor of the Royal Opera at Berlin.

The new conductor is one of the most prominent men in his chosen profession in Europe, and has never appeared before an American audience. He was born in Darmstadt Oct. 22, 1859. After obtaining the degree of doctor of philosophy he began the study of music at Leipzig Conservatory. Subsequently he received an appointment as conductor of the opera at Zurich. He went to Salzburg in 1881, to Brunn the following year, and in 1884 to Graz, where he became conductor of the Styrian Musical Society.

Dr. Much is considered one of the leading directors in the musical world. For a number of years he has enjoyed the warm friendship and admiration of Emperor William. All his work is notable for its large dimensions and convincing power. While a man of broad musicianship and versatile style, he occupies a unique position as an interpreter of Wagner's works, which he renders with imposing authority. For this reason, his services as a Wagnerian conductor are much in demand, and he is regularly engaged for the Beireuth festivals. His leave of absence will extend from Oct. 6, 1906, to Oct. 6, 1907, one year only. He will make his first public appearance in this city on Friday afternoon, Oct. 12, at a public rehearsal.

BOSTON HERALD—TUESDAY JUNE 5 1906.

DR. MUCK'S ENGAGEMENT.

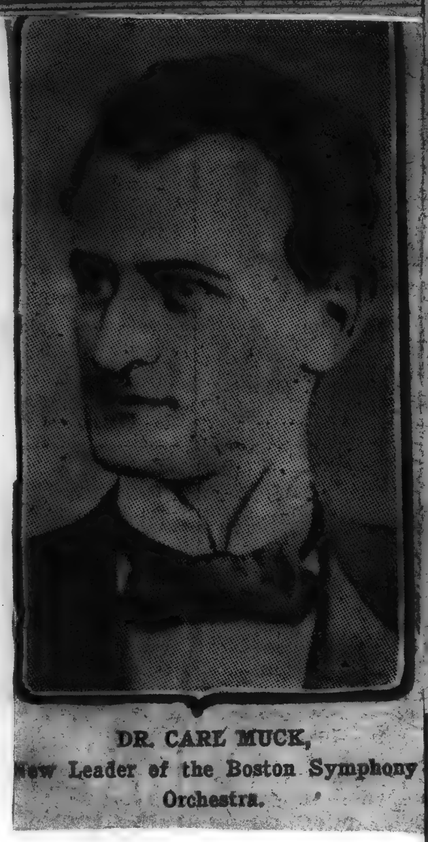
Dr. Karl Muck of the Royal Opera Berlin, whose engagement by Mr Henry L. Higginson to be conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra was announced last Sunday, is coming to this city for one season only. Dr. Muck since the retirement of Felix Weingartner, is practically the only conductor of the first rank in Berlin, for Richard Strauss does very little work of that kind there. It was therefore only with the greatest difficulty that Emperor William was induced to give him a leave of absence to come to this country, and the maximum leave he would grant was one year.

THE BOSTON JOURNAL—TUESDAY, JUNE 5, 1906.

The New Conductor

As The Journal some little time ago announced was a strong probability, Dr. Carl Muck of the Berlin Royal Opera House is to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the ensuing season, having obtained leave of absence from the Kaiser for the purpose. Essentially and mainly a man of grand opera, he has also made his mark in purely orchestral leadership, and there is no question of his high rank in the world of music. We do not understand that he is a "virtuoso" conductor, in the sense that Nikisch, Strauss, and Weingartner are, but neither was Mr. Gericke, and few men in the world could have duplicated his splendid services for our great organization. Dr. Muck will have the incalculable advantage of finding here ready to his hand and brain a superb musical instrument created and perfected by his predecessor. His knowledge and temperament should be able to accomplish noble results.

Dr. Muck's contract, it will be noted, is but for a year, and that, it is announced, necessarily means that he is a stop-gap, employed to bridge over the time while Maj. Higginson shall find another and perhaps a greater man. But even under these conditions, Dr. Muck will be received with great interest and sincere wishes for a season's success.



DR. CARL MUCK,
New Leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

TIMES
WASHINGTON, D. C.
JUN 10 1906

THE NEW LEADER OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

What the forthcoming musical season will produce is a question that is agitating the harmonically inclined of Washington. The year just passed offered much that was interesting as well as instructive to the local realm of harmony, and there is manifest a decided disposition to ask for more.

From the manner in which the various productions of merit were received last season, it can reasonably be expected that the really good offerings of the year to come will be given the support such ventures justify.

Washington has shown itself to be a music loving community; particularly when the pure ideal of the muse is produced upon a proper basis. Of course horse play, in pure parlance, will not be accepted by an intelligent public. Neither does Washington want heroic expedients to drive an audience to a worthy performance. In this is the logic clear; honor to that to which honor is due, and then is success assured.

Harmony of intention must be the keynote before the gamut can even be attempted, or else there will be a discord that will put the unresolved seventh chord to blush. Washington has taken the good music intention earnestly, and will insist upon its being carried out properly.

Probably the most interesting bit of information to the local lyric world, is the announcement that Dr. Carl Muck is going to lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra next season as the successor to Mr. Gericke. Here is the opportunity for a comparison of deep seated musical characteristics. Gericke we know as an exponent of the revivified contrapuntal graspings. His adaptability for the earlier Puccinnic groupings with the later Allemainic theories made him master of his concert and his band.

In this peculiarity Dr. Muck is said to excel, and the outcome will be looked forward to with extreme interest.

The contract with Dr. Muck is for a year, as the German Emperor has given him leave for that period only from his duties as court conductor of the opera at Berlin, a position which he holds jointly with Richard Strauss.

For the past thirteen seasons, Dr. Muck has been one of the chief conductors of the royal opera in Berlin, having been appointed to this post by Emperor William in 1892 and during all this time he has enjoyed the personal friendship of the Emperor, with whom he has always been a favorite. When he first went to Berlin he was associated with Weingartner and Richard Strauss, but the retirement from the opera of Weingartner has left him and Strauss the only conductors of first rank connected with the institution. The difficulty of securing a leave of absence for him from the Emperor would have been great in any event, but now that Strauss conducts very little at the opera, being out of favor with the Emperor, and that Weingartner has retired from the field entirely, making a vacancy in the conductorship of the royal concerts, it made the task of Charles A. Ellis, the manager of the orchestra, who was in charge of the negotiations, almost impossible. It may be said that when the Emperor finally did consent to let Dr. Muck go for a year, it was due entirely first to his very kindly feeling toward this country, and second, to his feeling toward Harvard University with which Henry L. Higginson is so intimately connected.

Many efforts have been made in the past by different parties to bring Dr. Muck to this country, but he has never been able to secure a long enough leave to come to this country, consequently he will make his debut in America at the first public rehearsal of the next symphony season in Boston on Friday afternoon, October 12, and will be heard in Washington about four weeks later.

Dr. Muck is the son of a Government clerk and was born in the city of Darmstadt on October 22, 1859. He went to the gymnasium in Darmstadt and then to Heidelberg, where he was supposed to prepare for a mercantile career. A year of philosophical studies in the ancient city on the Necker, his love for music came to the front and he went to Leipsic, where he entered the conservatory and studied under Richter and Reinecke. At the same time he continued his philosophical studies and took his degree of doctor of philosophy in Heidelberg.

His first public appearance as a musician took place at a Gewandhaus concert in Leipsic in 1880 when he made his debut as a pianist. His success was such that everybody thought he would follow the career of a pianist; but he had made up his mind to be a conductor and shortly after secured his first post in Zurich. This was followed by appointments to the opera houses of Salzburg, Bruenn and Graz, all in Austria, and finally in 1886 he was appointed the first conductor of the very important opera in Prague. There he remained for six years, conducting at the same time the Philharmonic concerts of that city.

While there he became known and began to take "guest" engagements at various operas and with various orchestras of the Continent. He toured Russia as conductor of the company which Angelo Neuman took thither to produce Wagner's "Ring." He conducted concerts in St. Petersburg and Moscow, in Vienna, Brussels, Madrid and other cities. In 1891 he was a guest conductor at the Lessing Theater in Berlin and so profound was the impression he made that the associate conductorship of the Royal Opera was offered to him before he left the city. His contract with Prague prevented him from accepting at that time, but he went to Berlin a year later and there he has since been. He has conducted the German Opera in Covent Garden, London, has conducted concerts in that city and in Paris, and during the last winter shared with Mottl the honor of conducting the Philharmonic concerts in Vienna.

Dr. Muck has been described as a strict disciplinarian and an advocate of much rehearsing. He has been praised for the phenomenal "accuracy and versatility of his knowledge and his noble and objective artistry." It is a significant fact that when Mr. Gericke, the late conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, returned from abroad three years ago, he said that the one perfect thing he heard in music was a performance of Mozart's "Don Giovanni" under the baton of Muck.

Dr. Muck is not a sensationalist and while there is abundant individuality seen in his work he does not court the limelight. While he is a profound admirer of the "classics" he is in close and sympathetic touch with all the modern movements in music. He is described as thoroughly a man of the world, of most attractive personality and his coming will make for a year at least a most desirable addition to musical life in this country.

My Times June 10

Dr. Karl Muck.

The New Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and His Career.

DR. KARL MUCK of Berlin, as was announced last Sunday, has been engaged as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for next season, after much tribulation on the part of Mr. Henry L. Higginson in finding a successor to Wilhelm Gericke, and much guessing on the part of those who were interested in the outcome of the search. The appointment of Mr. Gericke's successor is a matter of much interest to the New York musical public, for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's ten concerts are among the most important features of the New York musical season, and none of its audiences are more jealous of its perfection than its New York audiences. Ever since Mr. Gericke's retirement was announced last winter conjecture has been very active as to who his successor would be.

Dr. Muck has been engaged for only one year, and it is said that he obtained a year's leave of absence from Emperor William to take up his work in Boston only with great difficulty. Dr. Muck is one of the conductors of the Royal Opera of Berlin, and as such is in the service of the Emperor. Charles A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and personal representative of Mr. Higginson, has been for two months seeking to secure Dr. Muck for some time, but has been in negotiations with Richard Strauss, one of all the important conductors of the Berlin opera, [illegible] was not [illegible]

Dr. Karl Muck.

1859. Like many other musicians who have won fame, he was at first intended for a professional career; so he studied at the University of Heidelberg for the degree in philosophy. After a year there he transferred his activity to the University of Leipzig, after the manner of German students; but something more than the university attracted him to the Saxon city, for besides his university studies he began work also at the Leipzig Conservatory, and it must have been hard work, too, for very soon after he had got his Ph. D. from Heidelberg he made a public appearance in Leipzig as a pianist, in the Gewandhaus. It was a successful appearance; but instead of devoting himself to the piano, he turned conductor. Beginning with minor posts in small municipal Opera Houses—Zurich, Salzburg, and Gratz—he finally won an important position in the opera of Prague, where he was conductor for six years, from 1886 to 1892. One of his engagements at this period was as conductor [illegible] was engaged as conductor at the Royal Opera in Berlin, and has been there ever since. He has, however, frequently appeared as conductor of orchestral concerts in most of the musical capitals of Europe. One of his most important engagements of this sort was in Vienna, where he conducted the famous Vienna Philharmonic Society, after that organization, like its New York namesake, having lost Hans Richter, took up the plan of having visiting conductors appear in rotation.

[256]

THE BOSTON HERALD---TUESDAY, JUNE 5, 1906.

DR. MUCK'S ENGAGEMENT.

Dr. Karl Muck of the Royal Opera, Berlin, whose engagement by Mr. Henry L. Higginson to be conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra was announced last Sunday, is coming to this city for one season only. Dr. Muck, since the retirement of Felix Weingartner, is practically the only conductor of the first rank in Berlin, for Richard Strauss does very little work of that kind there. It was therefore only with the greatest difficulty that Emperor William was induced to give him a leave of absence to come to this country, and the maximum leave he would grant was one year.

THE BOSTON JOURNAL—TUESDAY, JUNE 5, 1906.

The New Conductor

As The Journal some little time ago announced was a strong probability, Dr. Carl Muck of the Berlin Royal Opera House is to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the ensuing season, having obtained leave of absence from the Kaiser for the purpose. Essentially and mainly a man of grand opera, he has also made his mark in purely orchestral leadership, and there is no question of his high rank in the world of music. We do not understand that he is a "virtuoso" conductor, in the sense that Nikisch, Strauss and Weingartner are, but neither was Mr. Gericke, and few men in the world could have duplicated his splendid services for our great organization. Dr. Muck will have the incalculable advantage of finding here ready to his hand and brain a superb musical instrument created and perfected by his predecessor. His knowledge and temperament should be able to accomplish noble results.

Dr. Muck's contract, it will be noted, is but for a year, and that, it is announced, necessarily means that he is a stop-gap, employed to bridge over the time while Maj. Higginson shall find another and perhaps a greater man. But even under these conditions, Dr. Muck will be received with great interest and sincere wishes for a season's success.

DR. CARL MUCK,
New Leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

TIMES
WASHINGTON, D. C.
JUN 10 1906

THE NEW LEADER OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

What the forthcoming musical season will produce is a question that is agitating the harmonically inclined of Washington. The year just passed offered much that was interesting as well as instructive to the local realm of harmony, and there is manifest a decided disposition to ask for more.

From the manner in which the various productions of merit were received last season, it can reasonably be expected that the really good offerings of the year to come will be given the support such ventures justify.

Washington has shown itself to be a music loving community; particularly when the pure ideal of the muse is produced upon a proper basis. Of course horse play, in pure parlance, will not be accepted by an intelligent public. Neither does Washington want heroic expedients to drive an audience to a worthy performance. In this is the logic clear; honor to that to which honor is due, and then is success assured.

Harmony of intention must be the keynote before the gamut can even be attempted, or else there will be a discord that will put the unresolved seventh chord to blush. Washington has taken the good music intention earnestly, and will insist upon its being carried out properly.

Probably the most interesting bit of information to the local lyric world, is the announcement that Dr. Carl Muck is going to lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra next season as the successor tor Mr. Gericke. Here is the opportunity for a comparison of deep seated musical characteristics. Gericke we know as an exponent of the revivified contrapuntal graspings. His adaptability for the earlier Puccinnic groupings with the later Allemainic theories made him master of his concert and his band.

In this peculiarity Dr. Muck is said to excel, and the outcome will be looked forward to with extreme interest.

The contract with Dr. Muck is for a year, as the German Emperor has given him leave for that period only from his duties as court conductor of the opera at Berlin, a position which he holds jointly with Richard Strauss.

For the past thirteen seasons, Dr. Muck has been one of the chief conductors of the royal opera in Berlin, having been appointed to this post by Emperor William in 1892 and during all this time he has enjoyed the personal friendship of the Emperor, with whom he has always been a favorite. When he first went to Berlin he was associated with Weingartner and Richard Strauss, but the retirement from the opera of Weingartner has left him and Strauss the only conductors of first rank connected with the institution. The difficulty of securing a leave of absence for him from the Emperor would have been great in any event, but now that Strauss conducts very little at the opera, being out of favor with the Emperor, and that Weingartner has retired from the field entirely, making a vacancy in the conductorship of the royal concerts, it made the task of Charles A. Ellis, the manager of the orchestra, who was in charge of the negotiations, almost impossible. It may be said that when the Emperor finally did consent to let Dr. Muck go for a year, it was due entirely first to his very kindly feeling toward this country, and second, to his feeling toward Harvard University with which Henry L. Higginson is so intimately connected.

Many efforts have been made in the past by different parties to bring Dr. Muck to this country, but he has never been able to secure a long enough leave to come to this country, consequently he will make his debut in America at the first public rehearsal of the next symphony season in Boston on Friday afternoon, October 12, and will be heard in Washington about four weeks later.

Dr. Muck is the son of a Government clerk and was born in the city of Darmstadt on October 22, 1859. He went to the gymnasium in Darmstadt and then to Heidelberg, where he was supposed to prepare for a mercantile career. A year of philosophical studies in the ancient city on the Necker, his love for music came to the front and he went to Leipsic, where he entered the conservatory and studied under Richter and Reinecke. At the same time he continued his philosophical studies and took his degree of doctor of pholosophy in Heidelberg.

His first public appearance as a musician took place at a Gewandhaus concert in Leipsic in 1880 when he made his debut as a pianist. His success was such that everybody thought he would follow the career of a pianist; but he had made up his mind to be a conductor and shortly after secured his first post in Zurich. This was followed by appointments to the opera houses of Salzburg, Bruenn and Graz, all in Austria, and finally in 1886 he was appointed the first conductor of the very important opera in Prague. There he remained for six years, conducting at the same time the Philharmonic concerts of that city.

While there he became known and began to take "guest" engagements at various operas and with various orchestras of the Continent. He toured Russia as conductor of the company which Angelo Neuman took thither to produce Wagner's "Ring." He conducted concerts in St. Petersburg and Moscow, in Vienna, Brussels, Madrid and other cities. In 1891 he was a guest conductor at the Lessing Theater in Berlin and so profound was the impression he made that the associate conductorship of the Royal Opera was offered to him before he left the city. His contract with Prague prevented him from accepting at that time, but he went to Berlin a year later and there he has since been. He has conducted the German Opera in Covent Garden, London, has conducted concerts in that city and in Paris, and during the last winter shared with Mottl the honor of conducting the Philharmonic concerts in Vienna.

Dr. Muck has been described as a strict disciplinarian and an advocate of much rehearsing. He has been praised for the phenomenal "accuracy and versatility of his knowledge and his noble and objective artistry." It is a significant fact that when Mr. Gericke, the late conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, returned from abroad three years ago, he said that the one perfect thing he heard in music was a performance of Mozart's "Don Giovanni" under the baton of Muck.

Dr. Muck is not a sensationalist and while there is abundant individuality seen in his work he does not court the limelight. While he is a profound admirer of the "classics" he is in close and sympathetic touch with all the modern movements in music. He is described as thoroughly a man of the world, of most attractive personality and his coming will make for a year at least a most desirable addition to musical life in this country.

N.Y. Times June 10

Dr. Karl Muck.

The New Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and His Career.

DR. KARL MUCK of Berlin, as was announced last Sunday, has been engaged as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for next season, after much tribulation on the part of Mr. Henry L. Higginson in finding a successor to Wilhelm Gericke and much guessing on the part of those who were interested in the outcome of the search. The appointment of Mr. Gericke's successor is a matter of much interest to the New York musical public, for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's ten concerts are among the most important features of the New York musical season, and none of its audiences are more jealous of its perfection than its New York audiences. Ever since Mr. Gericke's retirement was announced last Winter conjecture has been very active as to who his successor would be.

Dr. Muck has been engaged for only one year, and it is said that he obtained a year's leave of absence from Emperor William to take up his work in Boston only with great difficulty. For Dr. Muck is one of the conductors of the Royal Opera of Berlin, and as such is in the service of the Emperor. Charles A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and personal representative of Mr. Higginson, has been in Europe for two months seeking for a conductor, and had been in negotiation with Dr. Muck for some time, and as Muck shares with Richard Strauss the direction of all the important productions of the Berlin opera, his absence from his post there was not at all to the taste of the authorities.

Dr. Muck has had a career of well-earned success extending over twenty-five years. He is forty-seven years old, and was born at Darmstadt in 1859. Like many other musicians who have won fame, he was at first intended for a professional career; so he studied at the University of Heidelberg for the degree in philosophy. After a year there he transferred his activity to the University of Leipzig, after the manner of German students; but something more than the university attracted him to the Saxon city, for besides his university studies he began work also at the Leipzig Conservatory, and it must have been hard work, too, for very soon after he had got his Ph. D. from Heidelberg he made a public appearance in Leipzig as a pianist, in the Gewandhaus. It was a successful appearance; but instead of devoting himself to the piano, he turned conductor. Beginning with minor posts in small municipal Opera Houses—Zurich, Salzburg, and Gratz—he finally won an important position in the opera of Prague, where he was conductor for six years, from 1886 to 1892. One of his engagements at this period was as conductor for Angelo Neumann's traveling opera company, a post in which Anton Seidl was a predecessor. His first appearance in Berlin was at the Lessing Theatre as visiting conductor. In 1892 he was engaged as conductor at the Royal Opera in Berlin, and has been there ever since. He has, however, frequently appeared as conductor of orchestral concerts in most of the musical capitals of Europe. One of his most important engagements of this sort was in Vienna, where he conducted the famous Vienna Philharmonic Society, after that organization, like its New York namesake, having lost Hans Richter, took up the plan of having visiting conductors appear in rotation.

Dr. Karl Muck.

[256]

BLANK PAGE

BLANK PAGE

[illegible]

END OF VOLUME

END OF REEL

PLEASE REWIND